In amending the Civil Air Regulations to require that "no individual who had reached his 60th birthday shall be utilized or serve as a pilot on any aircraft while engaged in air carrier operations," the Agency acted in conformance with the responsibility given to the Administrator by the Federal Aviation Act of 1958 that, "In prescribing standards, rules, and regulations * * * the Administrator shall give full consideration to the duty resting upon air carriers to perform their services with the highest possible degree of safety in the public interest * * *" and that, "The Administrator shall exercise and perform his powers and duties under this act in such a manner as will best tend to reduce or eliminate the possibility of, or recurrence of, accidents in air transportation."

The regulation will take effect March 15, 1960.

This regulation does not, however, apply to pilots of small aircraft who operate under part 42, covering irregular air carrier operations. Such a regulation will be the subject of further study by the Agency, and will be presented as a proposal if considered necessary.

A study of the comments received by the FAA as a result of the proposed rulemaking indicated that the amendment requiring airline pilots to make the transition to turbojets prior to age 55, was the only item which warranted a public hearing, since the purpose of such a hearing is to provide an opportunity to obtain information over and above that which can be secured by written comments. Accordingly, a public hearing on this proposal only has been scheduled for 10 a.m., eastern standard time, on January 7, 1960, at FAA headquarters, 1711 New York Avenue NW.

The proposals to establish these age requirements were published in the Federal Register on June 27 as proposed amendments to parts 40, 41, and 42 of the Civil Air Regulations and were circulated to interested persons for comment at that time. (Those who wished to express their views on the proposed regulations had 90 days in which to do so.) All comments received on the draft proposals were carefully evaluated before the Agency made its final decision.

Requests for a public hearing on the age 60 portion of the proposal indicated no issue not already considered, nor any items not already covered by written comments.

Arguments were advanced both in favor of and opposition to the proposal. The Air Transport Association representing the major air carriers was in favor of the age-60 regulation, the Air Line Pilots Association was strongly opposed and recommended that pilot fitness should be made on an individual basis with no age qualification.

In rejecting the latter as an inadequate safety standard, the FAA considered the inability of present-day medical science to predict in advance on an individual selective basis such sudden incapacitating occurrences as heart attacks or strokes, even where exceptional medical care and examination programs exist.

Under the new regulations contained in amendments to part 20 of the Civil Air Regulations, all commercial pilots will be required to have a minimum of 10 hours of instrument flight instruction. They must also demonstrate their ability to manually control their aircraft solely by the use of instruments and must demonstrate a cross-country planned flight.

Private pilots will be required to have dual instruction in the basic control of the aircraft by the use of instruments; demonstate emergency manual capability in attitude control simulating the loss of visual reference during flight. In addition, both commercial and private pilots must be familiar with and demonstrate the use of radio for communications and navigation in cross-country flying. The new regulations do not affect pilots who already meet the new requirements.

FAA officials said the number of fatal accidents clearly indicates the need for higher private pilot qualifications. During 1958, private pilots were involved in a total of 272 major accidents in which 345 pilots and passengers were killed and 155 seriously injured. Of these accidents, 120 or 44 percent resulted from inability to cope with emergencies which developed primarily en route. A total of 125 or 46 percent resulted from fundamental weaknesses in pilot judgment or technique.

The new instrument requirements are also necessitated by the advent of new aircraft which permit flights of considerable distance in a matter of a few hours. This new capability, officials said, brings about exposure to variable and unanticipated visibility conditions.

FAA officials emphasized that the instrument training required by the new rule conveys no instrument flying privileges. To engage in instrument operations, a pilot must hold an instrument rating and the airplane must be equipped for IFR operations as prescribed by part 43 of the Civil Air Regulations.

FAA officials said the announced changes constitute part of the new safety program designed to improve pilot competency standards. Additional revisions of the Civil Air Regulations to further implement the safety program are under consideration.

The amendments are in substantial agreement with those published as proposed rulemaking on April 18, 1958, by the Civil Aeronautics Board. They will be effective March 16, 1960. The interim period will permit those affected to take the necessary training to be certificated under the new requirements.

The most recent study on general (nonair carrier) aviation's safety and accident rate show there was a total of 4,135 accidents last year. These resulted in 640 fatalities. A total of 741 aircraft were destroyed and more than 3,000 were substantially damaged.

AIRBORNE WEATHER RADAR EQUIPMENT REQUIREMENTS FOR AIRPLANES CARRYING PASSENGERS

In a notice of rulemaking published in the Federal Register (24 F.R. 5847) and circulated as Draft Release No. 59–10, dated July 15, 1959, the Federal Aviation Agency proposed to amend parts 40, 41, and 42 of the Civil Air Regulations to require airborne weather radar to be installed on all aircraft certificated under the transport category rules and carrying passengers. Operationally, it was proposed to require that such radar equipment be in operation for all IFR flights, and for night VFR flights when thunderstorms or severe weather conditions were forecast for the flight plan route during the time of flight.

In commenting upon the draft release, the Air Line Pilots Association was strongly in favor of the proposal and recommended its extension to all large aircraft engaged in air transportation.

Comments from representatives of the scheduled trunkline carriers recognized the desirability of having airborne weather radar on aircraft but opposed the mandatory requirement of such equipment by regulation.

Comments from local service air carriers, or their representatives, were generally opposed to any requirement for radar equipment on airplanes certificated in the nontransport category or for airplanes such as the DC–4 or C–46 certificated in the transport category, which are the type of airplanes being used by such air carriers.

As stated in the draft release, a recent survey of air carrier aircraft accidents for the calendar years 1950 through 1958 has indicated the importance of airborne weather radar as a safety measure in preventing aircraft accidents during certain severe weather conditions. The value of airborne weather radar as an aid to the safety of flight is further supported by the fact that a considerable number of air carrier airplanes are presently equipped with such radar and provisions have been made for the installation of such equipment on practically all new transport-type airplanes. It is considered particularly significant that at least one large air carrier presently has its entire fleet of airplanes fully equipped with airborne weather radar and during a 2-year period has not experienced a single passenger or crew injury or any appreciable airplane damage due to thunderstorms or hail. Moreover, the air carrier has completed a high percentage of scheduled trips. As experience has indicated, radar equipment contributes to greater safety in passenger operations, since it facilitates the early detection and location by the pilot of certain areas of severe turbulence and enables him to avoid such areas or to take such other action as may be necessary in the interest of safety.

In view of the foregoing, the Administrator has concluded that, in the interest of safety, approved airborne weather radar should be made a required item of equipment at the earliest practicable date for transport category airplanes used in passenger operations under the provisions of parts 40, 41, or 42 of the Civil Air Regulations, with the exception of Curtiss-Wright C–46 airplanes. The C–46 has been specifically exempted since it was not originally certificated under transport category rules. The notice of proposed rulemaking did not make this point clear.

The draft release proposed to allow 6 months for the procurement and installation of required radar equipment. However, in consideration of comments received and upon further investigation, the problems associated with the procurement and installation of the airborne radar equipment reasonably appear to require a longer period of time for the industry to comply with this regulation. The airlines have stated that the installation of the airborne radar equipment requires approximately 1,450 hours per airplane and some airplanes may require more time because of necessary modifications. Also, the manufacturers may not be able to furnish the total number of airborne radar units for all airplanes within the proposed 6-month period. These problems, together with the problems associated with the scheduling of airplanes for maintenance and overhaul, as well as for the installation of airborne radar equipment, have been considered in establishing the time allowed for the industry to meet this regulation. Upon these considerations the Administrator has determined that except for turbine-powered airplanes, a greater period of time should be allowed for the orderly procurement and installation of required equipment in order to avoid imposing any undue hardship upon operators of airplanes who are subject to this regulation. Accordingly, July 1, 1960, has been established as the date after which approved airborne weather radar will become required equipment for all turbine-powered airplanes used in the carriage of passengers under the provisions of parts 40, 41, or 42 of the Civil Air Regulations. Since all turbine-powered aircraft subject to this regulation are, with very few exceptions, now equipped or are scheduled to be equipped with airborne weather radar prior to July 1, 1960, it appears that this compliance date will provide an adequate period of time to procure the required equipment and install it in those few remaining turbine-powered aircraft. January 1, 1961, has been established as the compliance date for certain other transport category airplanes specified in section 1(b) and used in passenger operations. Since approximately 80 percent of such airplanes used in passenger operations already have radar equipment installed, it appears that the January 1, 1961, compliance date will provide the operators with an adequate period of time to procure the required equipment and install it in the balance of such airplanes. After January 1, 1962, approved airborne weather radar will be required equipment for the remaining airplanes certificated under the transport category rules, except for Curtiss-Wright C–46 airplanes, and used in passenger operations under parts 40, 41, or 42 of the Civil Air Regulations.

For the information of the operators, a note has been added to section 1(c) to indicate some of the transport category airplanes in current use which will have to have such equipment by January 1, 1962.

Technical Standard Order C–63, adopted by the Administrator, effective December 1, 1959 (24 F.R. 9262), contains the minimum performance standards for the approval of airborne weather radar equipment required by this regulation. Under the provisions of this technical standard order, airborne weather radar equipment approved prior to the effective date of that order will also be approved for installation under this regulation.

To provide for the accomplishment of an orderly installation of the required airborne weather radar equipment, each operator conducting passenger operations under the provisions of parts 40, 41, or 42 of the Civil Air Regulations is required by section 2 of this regulation to establish a schedule for the progressive completion of such radar installations on its transport category airplanes on or before the dates specified therein. On or before July 1, 1960, a copy of the schedule required by paragraph (a) of section 2 shall be submitted to an authorized representative of the administrator, together with a list of any airplanes the operator intends to discontinue using in the carriage of passengers prior to the date on which radar equipment must be installed.

Equipment requirements for dispatch and continuation of flight are described in section 3 of this regulation. Draft Release 59–10 proposed to require the radar equipment to be in operation for all IFR operations, and for night VFR operations when thunderstorms or severe weather conditions were forecast for the flight plan route during the time of flight. However, in the light of comments received, it appears that the original proposal would be unreasonably restrictive. Accordingly, the original proposal has been modified so as to bring the dispatch rule into accord with the capabilities of the radar equipment required to be installed. Thus, the dispatching rule prescribed herein provides that no airplane subject to this regulation shall be dispatched under IFR or night VFR conditions when current weather reports indicate that thunderstorms, or other potentially hazardous weather conditions detectable by airborne weather radar, may reasonably be expected to be encountered along the route to be flown, unless the approved airborne weather radar equipment is in a satisfactory operating condition. Should such equipment become inoperative en route, the airplane must be operated in accordance with the instructions and procedures specified in the operations manual for such occurrence. It should be noted that these dispatch and en route rules will apply after March 31, 1960, to all transport category airplanes subject to this regulation that have approved airborne weather radar equipment installed even though such equipment is not required to be installed until a later date. It should also be noted that approval of the instructions and procedures for the continuation of flight, in the event the radar equipment becomes inoperative en route, will be required at such time as the particular aircraft is required to have approved airborne weather radar equipment installed. In order to permit adequate time for the review of such instructions and procedures the operator should submit them to the assigned air carrier inspector at least 30 days prior to the required approval date. In this regard, the Federal Aviation Agency expects all air carrier aircraft not equipped with airborne weather radar to be operated strictly in accordance with procedures specified in the air carrier's operations manual, when there is a possibility of encountering potentially hazardous weather conditions.

Section 4 expressly exempts from the provisions of this regulation airplanes used for the carriage of passengers solely within the States of Alaska and Hawaii. These operations have been excluded because thunderstorms and other potentially hazardous meteorological conditions detectable by radar rarely occur in those areas. The language of section 4 also makes it clear that the provisions of this regulation are not intended to be applicable to a transport category airplane during the conduct of a bona fide all-cargo, training, test, or ferry flight.

It will be noted that helicopters have not been made subject to this regulation. Upon further consideration of the original proposal, the Administrator has concluded that the installation of radar equipment is not a necessary safety requirement for helicopters at this time. Finally, attention is directed to the fact that large nontransport category airplanes presently being used in passenger service have been omitted from the list of airplanes subject to this regulation, as for example, C–46, DC–3, and L–18 type airplanes. However, the Federal Aviation Agency will continue to give active consideration to the necessity of requiring approved radar equipment to be installed on such airplanes.

This special regulation is being promulgated in lieu of individual amendments to parts 40, 41, and 42 of the Civil Air Regulations because such a regulation is considered the most expedient method of implementing the original proposal.

Interested persons have been afforded an opportunity to participate in the making of this regulation (24 F.R. 5847), and due consideration has been given to all relevant matter presented.

In consideration of the foregoing, the Administrator of the Federal Aviation Agency hereby makes and promulgates the following special civil air regulation:

1. Airborne weather radar equipment requirement: After the dates specified, the following transport category airplanes shall not be used for the carriage of passengers under the provisions of parts 40, 41, or 42 of the Civil Air Regulations, unless approved airborne weather radar equipment is installed in such airplanes:

(a) July 1, 1960, for all turbine-powered airplanes certificated under the transport category rules.

(b) January 1, 1961, for the airplane types listed below:

Douglas DC–7 series.
Douglas DC–6 series.
Lockheed 1049 and 1649 series.

(c) January 1, 1962, for all airplanes certificated under the transport category rules, except C–46 type airplanes.

Note: Airplanes subject to the provisions of paragraph (c) of this section include, but are not limited to, the following types: Boeing 377; Convair 240, 340, and 440; Lockheed 049 and 749; and Martin 202 and 404; and Douglas DC–4.

2. Schedule for installation of equipment: (a) Each operator conducting passenger operations under the provisions of parts 40, 41, or 42 of the Civil Air Regulations with transport category airplanes on which airborne weather is not installed, shall establish a schedule for the progressive completion of such radar installations, in accordance with the provisions of section 1 of this regulation. The schedule shall provide for the completion of all required radar installations on or before the dates specified in section 1 of this regulation, and the completion of at least 40 percent of the required installations on or before the following dates:

(1) August 1, 1960, for airplanes of the types specified in section 1(b), and

(2) February 1, 1961, for airplanes of the type specified in section 1(c).

(b) On or before July 1, 1960, a copy of the schedule required by paragraph (a) of this section shall be submitted to an authorized representative of the Administrator, together with a list of any airplanes the operator intends to discontinue using in the carriage of passengers prior to the date on which radar equipment must be installed.

3. Requirement for dispatch and continuance of flight: After March 31, 1960, all transport category airplanes having approved airborne weather radar installed shall be operated in accordance with the following rules when used in passenger operations under parts 40, 41, or 42:

(a) Dispatch: No airplane shall be dispatched (or flight of an airplane started under the provisions of pt. 42) under IFR or night VFR conditions when current weather reports indicate thunderstorms, or other potentially hazardous weather conditions which can be detected by airborne weather radar, may reasonably be expected to be encountered along the route to be flown, unless approved airborne weather radar equipment is installed in the airplane and is in a satisfactory operating condition.

(b) En route: In the event the airborne weather radar becomes inoperative en route, the airplane shall be operated in acordance with the instructions and procedures specified in the operations manual for such occurrence. After the date specified by section 1 of this regulation for the mandatory installation of approved airborne weather radar on the type of airplane involved, such instructions and procedures shall meet with the approval of an authorized representative of the Administrator.

4. Exceptions: The provisions of this regulation shall not apply to those airplanes used solely within the States of Alaska or Hawaii, or during all-cargo, training, test, or ferry flights.

5. Effective date: Except as otherwise specified, this regulation shall become effective February 15, 1960 (secs. 313(a), 601, 604, 605; 72 Stat. 752, 775, 778; 49 U.S.C. 1354, 1421, 1424, 1425).

DRINKING AND SERVING OF ALCOHOLIC BEVERAGES

A notice of proposed rulemaking was published in the Federal Register July 3, 1959 (24 F.R. 5424), and circulated to the industry as Draft Release 59–7, dated July 3, 1959, which proposed to amend part 40 by adding a new section 40.371 to prohibit (1) the drinking of any alcoholic beverage aboard an air carrier aircraft unless the beverage has been served by the air carrier operating the aircraft, and (2) the serving by the air carrier of such beverage to any person who is or who appears to be intoxicated.

A large number of comments were received from individuals, air carriers, and other industry representatives. These comments ranged from opposition to hearty endorsement of the proposal, including suggestions that it did not go far enough and that all drinking and serving of alcoholic beverages aboard air carrier aircraft should be prohibited. Many of the comments were motivated by moral, religious, or social considerations, as well as safety.

The Federal Aviation Agency, when it proposed the rule, did so only after careful investigation and study. The Agency's responsibility is only for the air safety considerations and not for the social or moral aspects. The study and investigations which preceded the notice of proposed rulemaking were largely conducted by the Civil Aeronautics Administration, one of the predecessor agencies of the Federal Aviation Agency. The result indicated that there was no factual information, nor any specific occurrences sufficient to establish a safety hazard arising from the serving of alcoholic beverages by the air carrier to passengers aboard air carrier aircraft. The instances which were revealed tended to show that the occasional difficulties experienced had been caused either by passengers who had consumed a considerable quantity of alcoholic beverages prior to boarding the plane, or by those who drank from their own bottles during the course of the flight. This conclusion has been emphasized and verified by many of the comments received from the air carriers affected.

In addition to being confined to the safety aspects of this problem, the proposal was designed to regulate only so far as was necessary to meet safety requirements. It proposed to interfere as little as possible with the personal freedom of passengers and at the same time to prevent abuses that could possibly create a hazardous situation. It was for this reason that the proposed rule did not prohibit the consumption of alcoholic beverages, but sought to subject it to reasonable control. It is a generally accepted fact that flat prohibition has not proven successful in preventing consumption of alcoholic beverages. In this type of situation, it might even work adversely, since passengers who wish to drink might either do so to excess in advance of the flight, knowing that they could not obtain a drink aboard an aircraft, or would be encouraged to engage in surreptitious drinking from their own supply after boarding.

Some of the carriers and individuals who commented apparently misconstrued the intent of the proposed regulation insofar as they interpreted it as prohibiting passengers from bringing their own liquor aboard an aircraft. This was not our intention. The restriction proposed is against the consumption of alcoholic beverages unless they are served to the passengers by the air carriers. So construed, this would permit persons to bring liquor aboard and have it served to them by the air carrier, if the air carrier wishes to provide such service. Some of the comments received from individuals made the point that they were accustomed to having a drink before a meal, or that they required or desired some liquor for medicinal reasons or to contribute to their peace of mind while flying. The rule as proposed and adopted herein would permit a carrier to develop its own policies in this regard so that it might accommodate the varying needs of its passengers, and at the same time prevent any safety hazard.

There was also some misapprehension as to the extent of the carrier's and its personnel's responsibility for enforcing this regulation. Some apparently thought that the crewmembers would be required to restrain physically a passenger who wished to consume drinks that were not served to him by the carrier, and they foresaw difficulties with discharging such a responsibility. This regulation would impose no such responsibility on the flight crewmembers. This regulation, like all other regulations adopted by the Agency, would be enforced through the various enforcement processes of the Agency. It is expected of the carriers that they would advise their passengers of the restriction in such a regulation and make suitable reports to the Agency of any known violations. The only time it would be expected that a crewmember would be required to take direct action would be when such action is required for the safety of the flight. This is no greater burden than that now on the crewmembers to do whatever is necessary for the safety of the aircraft and the persons aboard it.

Several comments were made pointing out that the proposed rule prohibited an air carrier from serving an alcoholic beverage to any person if such person is or appears to be intoxicated. It was pointed out that a person might not appear to be intoxicated when, in fact, he or she was, and those commenting did not feel that it was proper to impose responsibility for this type of judgment. With this the Agency agrees and the words "is or" will be stricken from the proposed regulation, so that the carrier and its personnel may rely on the appearance of the passenger in determining whether or not to serve him or her alcoholic beverages. Two of the carriers proposed that action on the proposed regulation be delayed to permit the air carrier industry to develop a code which would control the amount and time of serving alcoholic beverages aboard aircraft. The Agency is strongly in favor of any such voluntary agreements that can be reached among the carriers. To the extent that they are in effect and complied with, they would clearly contribute to decreasing any safety hazard arising from the consumption of alcoholic beverages aboard air carrier aircraft. On the other hand, a code of this kind could not reach the principal problem involved—that of uncontrolled consumption by a passenger of his own liquor supply. Therefore, the adoption of a code, while extremely helpful, would not meet the entire problem. The adoption of this regulation will not in any way inhibit the industry from adopting their own code, and in fact such a move would be viewed with favor by this Agency.

Interested persons have been afforded an opportunity to participate in the making of this regulation and due consideration has been given to all relevant matter presented.

In consideration of the foregoing, part 40 of the Civil Air Regulations (14 CFR part 40) is hereby amended by adding a new section 40.371 to read as follows:

"Section 40.371. Drinking and serving of alcoholic beverages:

"(a) No person shall drink any alcoholic beverage aboard an air carrier aircraft unless such beverage has been served to him by the air carrier operating the aircraft.

"(b) No air carrier shall serve any alcoholic beverage to any person aboard an air carrier aircraft if such person appears to be intoxicated."

This amendment shall become effective on March 10, 1960 (secs. 313(a), 601; 72 Stat. 752, 775; 49 U.S.C. 1354, 1421).

Issued in Washington, D.C., on January 6, 1960.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, in brief conclusion, as long as we have machines and men operate them, we are going to have accidents. We have human nature to contend with. I do not care what machine it is, whether it is an airplane, truck, or tractor; if a man is in that machine there are going to be accidents.

I commend the airlines. I commend all flying for the remarkable safety record it has achieved over the years. I have been an air pilot for 30 years, and I can point out the lackadaisical way our air traffic rules have been enforced. In 30 years I have never been asked to show my license or instrument ticket showing I am proficient to fly on instruments when I file instrument flight plans. I have many friends who fly on instruments, but, nevertheless, have never been asked to show their instrument tickets. I have never been asked to show my medical certificate. I am just one of several thousand pilots, and I have never been asked in 30 years to show these tickets or certificates—and not asking for them is a violation of the rules. I think it is high time that a man like General Quesada enforces rules that are working in the military, and in so doing greater safety in the airlines will be achieved.

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, what the Senator from Arizona has just said needs saying in the Senate and in the House of Representatives; and, equally important, it needs saying throughout the country. The able Senator from Arizona is a pilot. He is a general in the Air Force. He has an interest in safety of aviation and flying which you do, Mr. President, and I do, and the people of the Nation do.

Just how did General Quesada come into the service as a civilian in the Government of the United States? He came in when as a result of tragic air crashes 2 years and more ago, the Congress finally enacted legislation setting up just such an air traffic safety responsibility and give it to one man, who would serve the cause of safety in aviation in all the skies over America. The President of the United States signed the new legislation into law and searched this country over for a man with sufficient experience and competence and fairness and intestinal fortitude to take the newly created position and enforce the safety law that Congress laid down. He chose General Quesada, who, to his infinite credit, unselfishly relinquished his commission as a general in the U.S. Air Force, after magnificent and patriotic and dedicated service in World War II, to take this new responsibility and discharge it with distinction and with a dedication to bring maximum safety, under all the circumstances to the air traveling public.

The Senator from Arizona has said what needed saying, Mr. President. The Government and the people of this Nation want safety when they fly and they are going to get it because of the painstaking devotion to duty which a civilian, Mr. Quesada, is demonstrating in the discharge of his responsibilities.

I congratulate my friend the Senator from Arizona.

During the course of Mr. GOLDWATER's remarks,

The VICE PRESIDENT. The time available to the Senator from Arizona, under the 3-minute limitation applicable to the morning hour, has expired.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I ask that notwithstanding the 3-minute limitation, I may conclude my remarks.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I must object. Instead, I hope the Senator from Arizona will speak on another subject.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, the Senator from Montana has sat here, day after day, when the remarks of other Senators in the morning hour have exceeded the 3-minute limitation, and has not objected. During recent days I have spoken on only a few subjects, and I have limited my remarks as much as possible. I have sat here and listened to 20- and 30-minute speeches on both sides of the aisle.

Mr. MANSFIELD. The request was made in good faith, to try to expedite the business of the Senate. I withdraw my objection.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I have just as much desire to expedite the business of the Senate as has the Senator from Montana. I am glad the Senator from Montana withdrew his objection.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that this colloquy appear at the end of my statement.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. HARTKE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a broadcast by Bryson Rash from station WRC–TV, relating to recent airplane crashes.

There being no objection, the broadcast was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Good evening. The airline industry at the moment is taking a most undeserved and unjustified beating in the important field of public opinion. This sorry state of affairs has come about because of unfortunate accidents completely beyond the control of the companies operating in this dynamic field of mass transportation, by air. The fact of the matter is that you are much safer in a plane in flight than in a mad dash across a busy intersection in any metropolitan area in the Nation. You must remember that the bombing of an airliner is madness—the same kind of madness which always exists any place, any time. Since 1938 there have been just three cases of bombings of airliners in the United States, one not yet proved. In that time 500 million, a half billion, passengers have been carried by air. Your chances, percentagewise, of getting killed from such madness is 0.000000147. But what can be done about even this minute figure? Senator MIKE MONRONEY, of Oklahoma, is holding hearings toward that goal. Thus far the suggestions which he favors are these:

Give the Federal Government legal authority to retain the bodies of victims of air crashes and their luggage until a proper investigation can be completed. Permit the Federal Bureau of Investigation to enter each case immediately rather than await a request by other authorities.

Extend the unjust enrichment laws of some States to transportation in interstate commerce.

And finally, extend the time period or eliminate entirely insurance payments for suicide, thus eliminating the profit motive if there is such a thing in self-destruction. And if you think this madness is profitable, here are the cold facts in the cases of those who have tried bombing airliners—two were executed for the crime and two died in the crash. Not 1 penny of insurance was paid to those who perpetrated the outrage.

UKRAINIAN INDEPENDENCE DAY

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, today, January 22, 1960, marks the 42d anniversary of the proclamation by a national council at Kiev declaring the Ukraine to be a free and independent republic. The independence of the Ukraine, so proudly proclaimed in 1918, was short lived. In 1920, the Communists brutally subjugated the Ukraine, and that country has been dominated by the Kremlin ever since.

The two decades following the Russian revolution will be recorded as one of the blackest periods in the history of mankind because of the crimes which were perpetrated by the Bolsheviks upon the Ukraine and other independent states.

The record shows that the people of the Ukraine are still being oppressed by the leaders of communism. The record also shows that the spirit of freedom still exists in the hearts of the Ukrainian people. They have never given up hope of regaining their sovereignty.

On this anniversary date of the declaration of Ukrainian independence, the free world should rededicate itself to the eventual peaceful liberation of the Ukrainian people, and all other freedom-loving peoples, from the domination of communism.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a letter from Mr. Lev E. Dobriansky, chairman of the Ukrainian Congress Committee of America, Inc., be printed in the RECORD following this statement.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

UKRAINIAN CONGRESS COMMITTEE OF AMERICA, INC.,
New York, N.Y., January 13, 1960.

Senator PRESCOTT BUSH,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR BUSH: You will agree, I'm sure, the Captive Nations Week resolution last July was quite revealing. This obviously was not the first time we Americans bespoke the freedom of the captive nations. Yet this one event struck Khrushchev in an unprecedented way. Every month since then, Moscow has shown its troubled concern over this resolution and its effects.

As we request you to join with us in observing the 42d anniversary of the independence of Ukraine on Friday, January 22, we also ask you to ponder the meaning of the above developments. Why this deep Moscow concern? The answer lies in the fact that for the first time we officially recognized the existence of the majority of captive nations in the U.S.S.R. itself. The enormous politico-psychological advantages and leverage this opens up for us are the very thing Moscow fears most.

Contrary to the fictions of a "Soviet nation," "Soviet people," a "Soviet GNP," and "integrated Soviet military might," the U.S.S.R. is a basic empire of captive nations and different peoples, with a gross imperial product and armed forces consisting of about 45 percent captive non-Russians. The illusion of monolithic power in all these aspects is what Moscow wants us to believe in: support and understanding of the captive non-Russian nations in the U.S.S.R. destroys this illusion.

The continuous pressure for freedom by 42 million Ukrainians is not something to be overlooked. This is the largest captive non-Russian nation both in the U.S.S.R. and behind the Iron Curtain. Even Janus-faced Khrushchev often has to appease this pressure by calling Ukraine "a truly free and sovereign nation;" while in this very period of "the spirit of Camp David," his agents murdered a Ukrainian patriotic leader in Munich, new trials of Ukrainian freedom fighters are scheduled in western Ukraine, and under an economic guise, mass deportations of Ukrainians to central Asia are being conducted.

On this 42d anniversary, your message in Congress and to freedom-aspiring Ukraine will, indeed, be a message in our own national interest. All for the advance of freedom will appreciate greatly its good purpose.

Sincerely yours,
LEV E. DOBRIANSKY,
Georgetown University.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, all peoples have their aspirations and ideals, and the noblest of these is the desire for freedom and independence. Though not all peoples attain that dearly cherished goal, yet they all are willing, when unfree and held down by oppressive forces, to work for its attainment. At times centuries of ceaseless effort and endurance of all kinds of suffering unfortunately do not attain the desired reward. Scarcely less unfortunate are those who, after regaining their freedom, are forced to surrender it to brute overpowering force. That certainly is the case of the Ukrainian people.

For some 250 years Ukrainians lived under the oppressive Czarist regime of Russia, and all that time they tried to regain their freedom. The opportunity came toward the end of the First World War, and on January 22 of 1918 they proclaimed their independence. They hardly had time to put their homes in order when the country was overrun and then incorporated into the Soviet Union. Since then some 42 million Ukrainians have been suffering under the Soviet dictatorship. Today, after 40 years, it is difficult to foresee their future, but as long as they cling to their ideals of freedom and independence, they may be sure there their sacrifices and sufferings have not been in vain. I am indeed glad to echo their fine patriotic and freedom-loving sentiments on the 42d anniversary of their independence day.

Mr. MCNAMARA. Mr. President, today American citizens of Ukrainian descent commemorate the 42d anniversary of the independence of Ukraine. It is only fitting that we—in Congress—call public attention to this anniversary—and recognition to the present-day sufferings of the Ukrainian people.

The story of Ukrainian valor is well known—and so is the harshness of present-day life in Ukraine—the life of 42 million freedom-loving men, women, and children under the yoke of an alien Communist dictatorship.

But are we sure that we shall remember this story in the years to come? Are we certain that the so-called spirit of Camp David—the promise of better relations between us and the U.S.S.R.—will not dull our memory of the peoples that are threatened with extinction of their national life under the totalitarian power of the Soviet state?

We all want peace, but we also want freedom—freedom not only for ourselves but for all people, wherever they may live, whatever language they may speak.

Let us then use this occasion of the anniversary of that short-lived, yet glorious, independence of Ukraine to remind ourselves here in these United States that lasting peace cannot be ours unless justice shall be brought to the captive peoples—to Ukraine—and to all the others.

Peace and justice are indivisible, here as everywhere else, on the face of this earth.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, on this 42d anniversary of the independence of the Ukrainian nation, Ukrainians can only celebrate the anniversary of an unfortunately short-lived independence. This day nevertheless is a highly significant reminder to all of us that there still exists a deep and unquenched desire for freedom and independence among important national groups within the Soviet Union, as well as within those nations now subjugated as Soviet satellites.

As have other Members of this Senate, I have received the provocative letter from Prof. Lev E. Dobriansky, of Georgetown University, the chairman of the Ukrainian Congress Committee of America, Inc., which clearly underscores the importance to the world political situation of this restive nation within the Soviet Union. It is most appropriate that we consider its contents today, and I commend the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BUSH] for inserting the letter into the RECORD.

Mr. WILLIAMS of New Jersey. Mr. President, Americans and citizens of free nations everywhere have a special reason for remembering January 22 of every year. It is the anniversary day of the Independence of the Ukraine. In 1960, the 42d such anniversary is to be observed.

As we all know, the Ukraine is the largest captive non-Russian nation both in the U.S.S.R. and behind the Iron Curtain. Forty-two million Ukrainians seek the freedom that was theirs too briefly after their independence day more than four decades ago.

These anniversaries of captive peoples are of great importance not only to those peoples but to all who believe that freedom will be the ultimate state of man if all men work for it. I would like to add this brief statement to those already made this year, and I ask unanimous consent that this statement be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

UKRAINIAN INDEPENDENCE DAY

Mr. President, Americans and citizens of free nations everywhere have a special reason for remembering January 22 of every year. It is the anniversary day of the independence of Ukraine. In 1960, the 42d such anniversary is to be observed.

As well all know, the Ukraine is the largest captive non-Russian nation both in the U.S.S.R. and behind the Iron Curtain. Forty-two million Ukrainians seek the freedom that was theirs too briefly after their independence day more than four decades ago.

These anniversaries of captive peoples are of great importance not only to these peoples but all who believe that freedom will be the ultimate state of man if all men work for it. I would like to add this brief statement to those already made this year, and I ask unanimous consent.

ANNIVERSARY OF POLISH INSURRECTION OF 1863

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, today is a date of major importance in the history of Polish nationalism. On January 22, 1863, Polish patriots led an insurrection against Russian control. This insurrection failed, with the result that Poland was directly incorporated into the Russian Empire and the Polish people were ruthlessly punished and suppressed under Russian domination.

The event has special significance to the world today, when Poland is once again under the domination of a Russian-oriented Communist imperialism. The recent history of the Polish people has been an unhappy story of control by neighboring imperialistic powers. But political subjugation has always seemed to enhance the spiritual and intellectual independence of the liberty-loving Polish people. Today the press repeatedly reports manifestations of this fact within present-day Poland. It is clearly the presence of Soviet might that maintains a regime which is daily losing less of the confidence and sympathy of the Polish people.

This fact calls for careful and enlightened policy on the part of this country toward Poland and other captive nations. Today's anniversary is an appropriate occasion for the U.S. Government to reassure the people of Poland and the fine loyal Polish Americans of our own country that our policy continues to have as a fundamental goal the achievement of peace with freedom in the world, with the right of free democratic self-government for all the nations of the world.

REMARKS OF HON. EDWARD J. DERWINSKI, OF ILLINOIS

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the remarks of my colleague, Hon. EDWARD J. DERWINSKI, of Illinois, on the occasion of the anniversary of the Polish insurrection on January 22, 1863.

There being no objection, the remarks were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

We commemorate the 97th anniversary of one of the most heroic yet tragic chapters in the history of the brave Polish nation.

At the same time that America was engaged in the great Civil War, to bring freedom to all Americans, the Polish people revolted against the brutal oppression of the Russian czarist government and waged a heroic but futile struggle for freedom.

To my mind, the special significance of this historic struggle lies in its parallel to the present Communist domination of the brave Polish people. The philosophy of atheistic communism is completely foreign to Poland. Poles have for the past thousand years been a people determined to maintain the utmost possible personal liberties and have built their nation and culture on a deep-rooted religious foundation. At the present time, the traditional religious faith of the Polish people is pitted against the materialistic onslaughts of the false ideology of a Communist puppet government. Supported by Soviet bayonets, it rules Poland, but the hearts and minds of her people look forward to the day when they can once again enjoy the blessings that political freedom gives.

Throughout the entire 19th century, the Polish people suffered as a result of the partition of their country, but resisted all attempts to eliminate traces of their national culture and heritage. I am confident that their steadfast faith and perseverance is providing them with the necessary strength to resist present day Soviet domination.

The Polish uprising of 1863 ended in a military defeat; however, it was a demonstration of the intense national spirit of the Polish people and their determination to achieve freedom at all cost. This freedom finally came following World War I, when the Polish nation arose from the ashes of wartime devastation.

The tragic consequences of the Yalta Conference, when the wartime American President blindly betrayed the free peoples now behind the Iron Curtain are known to all.

The people in Poland cannot commemorate on January 22 the anniversary of their struggle for independence, so many years ago. However, to once again fly the banner of freedom is their most cherished goal.

Nations, just as individuals, are endowed with faith. We salute the brave Polish people now suffering under Communist tyranny, knowing that their steadfast faith will one day reward them with the previous gifts of freedom that they deserve to possess.

May I call the attention of the Members of the House to the other captive nations behind the Iron Curtain: Czechoslovakia, Hungary, Yugoslavia, Albania, and those nations entirely irradicated by Soviet expansion; namely, Lithuania, Latvia, and Estonia, which are suffering the same tragic fate that is Poland's. Our words of appreciation and encouragement must, at all times, go out to those people as well.

I take this opportunity in directing these remarks to the Members of Congress to remind them of the sad plight of the people in Poland today and to remind those people of our constant interest, sympathetic understanding, and our faith in the ultimate freedom of all mankind.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, is morning business concluded?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there further morning business?

INTEREST RATES

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, on January 21, Britain raised its official bank interest rate from 4 percent to 5 percent. This rate is somewhat comparable to our Federal Reserve discount rate in that it is a basic rate. Other rates in this country and Britain range upward from the basic rate.

I am apprehensive that this action on the part of Great Britain will be used as another excuse by the Federal Reserve System to push up our own interest rates even further by raising our already high discount rate.

It would be unfortunate if the United States and Britain should wage an economic war by each alternately raising interest rates as a means of solving the balance of payments problem of either nation. Instead of solving the problem, such action will in some respects aggravate it. Last fall the United States had a higher interest rate structure than did any major banking country with the exception of Canada and West Germany. Now Britain apparently wishes to top us. Some financial circles in the United States now feel the United States should move again and top Great Britain.

If this were just a matter of international bankers playing leapfrog, I would not be so concerned. When translated into domestic terms, however, this action would mean that every farmer, every small businessman, every home purchaser, every automobile purchaser, indeed, every consumer who buys anything on credit, must pay the price—a high price. It would mean an increase in the cost of living.

This is one of the questions which the Senate will want to examine in detail when it is asked to remove the interest rate ceiling on Government bonds. I bring this subject up now so that it can be given thoughtful consideration by all concerned, and to express my apprehension over the possible action of the Federal Reserve Board in the future.

PRICING POLICIES OF DRUG INDUSTRY

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, the Subcommittee on Antitrust and Monopoly of the Senate Judiciary Committee is presently holding hearings involving the drug industry and generally the whole question of administered prices. The first brace of hearings was held the second week of December. I was not present at the time, but I did cause the staff to make a very careful analysis of the entire transcript. The news articles and headlines that I saw in the press were absolutely fantastic and incredible.

Yesterday morning, when we resumed the hearings, I felt duty bound, in duty to my conscience, to straighten out the record notwithstanding that it was in contravention of the opinion held by the chairman of the committee.

The substance of what I said in committee and in the hearing I have reduced to a written text, and by way of fortification there are quite a number of editorials from newspapers in different parts of the country. I would have this whole matter appear in the body of the RECORD. I would prefer not to presume on the time of the Senate.

I ask unanimous consent that my remarks appear in the body of the RECORD, with the enclosures.

There being no objection, the statement and newspaper comments were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR DIRKSEN

DRUGS AND HEADLINES

On December 7, 1959, the U.S. Senate Subcommittee on Antitrust and Monopoly began hearings on the pricing policies of the ethical drug industry. The first witness was Mr. Francis C. Brown, president of Schering Corp., an ethical drug manufacturer. Shortly after Mr. Brown completed his testimony, the chief economist of the subcommittee introduced an exhibit into the record which seemed calculated to make headlines and front-page stories. This was done by alleging that the Schering Corp. was marking up its products from 1,118 percent to 7,079 percent, when the fact was that Schering was operating on a 12- to 16-percent profit after taxes. Mr. President, the exhibit on its face was misleading, because it excluded the necessary expenditures of doing business under usual accounting practices accepted by the Internal Revenue Service by virtue of the income-tax laws of our Nation. By excluding these expenditures, the chief economist used a computed cost figure of $1.57 in relation to the selling price of $17.90 for 100 tablets of prednisolone, when it was evident from the financial statement of Schering Corp. that proper allocated costs, namely, cost of production, research, selling, and distribution, administrative, and taxes, were $15.03 rather than the computed costs of $1.57. Had the proper costs been allocated, a profit of 16 percent after taxes, or a markup of 33 percent before taxes, would have resulted, which is the true picture. Mr. President, the result of all this was the glaring and misleading headlines and front-page stories of 1,000 percent to 10,000 percent profit by drug manufacturers, when the facts show that there was 12 to 16 percent profit after taxes for these drug manufacturers. Let us examine the transcript of the testimony of December 7 to prove the point. On page 50 of the transcript of the testimony, volume 1, Monday, December 7, 1959, the chief counsel stated that they had devised an exhibit that he wanted the chief economist to explain. After the exhibit was explained, Mr. Brown was asked to give his viewpoint, and he stated as follows on page 55 of the transcript:

"Mr. BROWN. Now, if we were simply doing the things that you have described in this piece of paper, it would seem to me that your question would be pertinent; but, as I have described in my statement, we are doing a great many more things, such as informational work, the pioneering work which we did in the preparations of these compounds, and which we continue to do as the company which originated them, and, moreover, the supporting of the distribution system which we have built up over the years at considerable expense and the maintenance of the research which we are endeavoring to do to push back the medical horizons for the future. These are just as much a part of our costs as wastage in production and tableting and bottling."

Under questioning, Mr. Brown stated that expenses of doing business included costs of production, selling and distribution, research, administrative expenses, taxes, plant maintenance and depreciation, and all of the necessary costs that normally go into the operation of any business under proper accounting practices. However, Mr. Brown's explanation was ignored by the staff who insisted upon stating that there was a markup of 1,118 percent to 7,079 percent on Schering products. Mr. Brown countered as follows on page 60:

"Mr. BROWN. If I may be permitted to do so I would like to say that I consider this not to be the proper relationship because it does not include the expenses of doing business which I have outlined."

No matter how careful Mr. Brown was in his explanation of the necessary expenses that went into the operation of his business which indicated that his company was operating on a 12 percent to 16 percent profit after taxes, the members of the staff persistently referred to the exhibit introduced by the chief economist to reemphasize the grossly erroneous markup of 1,118 percent to 7,079 percent on the three products of Schering. Chairman KEFAUVER noted that Schering Corp. only manufactured five products and that he found none that Schering made a less profit than Schering made on prednisolone. (See pp. 107–108). How then can these high percentages of over 1,000 percent possibly be relevant to the profit schedule of Schering (or any other drug manufacturer) if the records of the Schering Corp. show that Schering Corp. operated at a profit of 16 percent on sales after taxes. If the staff's theory of 1,118 percent to 7,079 percent markup were correct then Schering Corp. profits would have been over 1,000 percent rather than the established 12 percent to 16 percent profit on sales after taxes. At the proper time I shall submit my individual or minority views if a report of these hearings is submitted. I don't want to fully discuss the evidence nor the issues raised at the hearings at this time, since the hearings are not completed. However, I want to raise my voice in opposition to the practices and procedures followed by staff experts in the hearings held December 7 to 12, where staff resorted to exhibits and testimony which told a misleading story and grossly misrepresented the profit percentage of the three drug manufacturers. Mr. Francis C. Brown, of Schering; Mr. John Connor, of Merck; and Dr. E. Gifford Upjohn, of Upjohn Co., clearly stated their cost-price picture, which reflected a mark-up profit of 12 percent to 16 percent. Mr. Blackman, of Premo Co., a smaller competitor, on page 1025, stated that the expenditures of these companies were legitimate although he complained of their selling and distribution expenditures.

But the best evidence of the fallacy of the 1,118 percent markup by the drug manufacturers was Chairman KEFAUVER'S own statement on page 112 when he said: "Mr. Brown, what I can't understand is that small companies buy the same thing from Vroussel (for 11 cents) and sell it for $2 to $3, you sell it for $8."

Mr. Brown explained the differential in expenditures but that is not the point I wish to make here. Mr. President, Senator KEFAUVER should realize that the 11 cents cost into the $2 price by small companies is 18.2 times or, 1,820 percent markup, and the 11 cents cost into the $3 price by small companies is 27.3 times markup or 2,730 percent markup. On this product Senator KEFAUVER has apparently approved the 2,730 percent markup by the small company while he and his staff experts have condemned Schering Corp., Merck Co., and Upjohn Co. for a 1,118 percent or more markup. The answer is clear. Neither the large nor the small drug manufacturers can be accused of such tremendously high markup because in every case the high markup is meaningless since it is caused by the failure to include all of the necessary expense of doing business as have been enumerated previously. When those necessary business expenses have been considered and allocated properly against the price of the product or products, then you will arrive at the markup percentage of approximately 33 percent before taxes which varies from company to company.

What makes my complaint significant is, not only the harm done to the Senate by introduction of misleading exhibits and explanations by staff, but the impact on the people who must buy these wonder or miracle drugs. Imagine how they must feel in reading a misleading headline stating that drug manufacturers make a 7,079 percent profit on the drug that they must have to ease their pain when in all reality Senator KEFAUVER admitted to Senator WILEY on the last day of the hearings that the drug manufacturers were making 16 percent profit after taxes. (See pp. 1283 to 1290 of the transcript.) Senator WILEY, the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin, condemned the use of "asinine high percentages" through exhibits when staff knew they were misleading. Also, of great significance, is the distortion in the minds of the press and the public what markup on products means. If this practice continues, how will the farmer feel if only his cost of the seed should be used against the price he sells his wheat, cotton, produce, etc. Let's examine the small bakeries that serve our many towns and cities if their markup was the price of 2½-cent wheat against an 18-cent loaf of bread or 725 percent markup; or a small canner of peas whose original cost of peas is 3.1 cents as against a 21.2 cents for price he receives for a can of peas or 700 percent markup; or fertilizer manufactured in Tennessee and elsewhere which is sold for $30 a ton and the cost of raw material zero which means an unlimited percent markup; or manufacturers of shirts that sell for $3.94 when cost of cotton was 28 cents or 1,400 percent markup. Why, the Congress would be deluged with letters from small and large businessmen for such trickery. On top of that the public would lose faith in our Congress. Is such techniques to get a few headlines and front page stories worth the damage to the reputation of Congress? Our Subcommittee on Antitrust and Monopoly has scheduled other hearings on drugs. Before such hearings begin I shall expect from the chairman a clarification on the record of these misconceptions brought on by the chief economist's exhibits and explanations which he continued to use every day of the hearings although cautioned time and time again.

For the information of Congress, I am submitting certain newspaper editorials from all sections of the country to show how critical its editors have been of certain aspects of the ethical drug hearings.

THE PRICE OF DRUGS

A Senate subcommittee is inquiring into the prices charged for prescription drugs. Senator KEFAUVER and his colleagues of the committee are studying two questions: (1) Are the drug houses making exorbitant profits by gouging the sick? and (2) if the answer is yes, are they able to do this because they are violating the antitrust laws or because these laws, as they stand, do not give the public adequate protection?

Everyone knows that many of the new drugs are not cheap. These days you can expect to pay as much to cure a girl of pneumonia as to take her to dinner and the theater. There is therefore something for Mr. KEFAUVER and his colleagues to investigate and we wish them good hunting.

But we hope that they will not become so obsessed with the costliness of drugs that they fail to hear both sides of the story. It is a good deal more important that the girl get well than that she get well for $1.50. Her life is worth a $25 drugstore bill. If the result of this investigation should be to discourage research by the drug houses, Mr. KEFAUVER and his colleagues will have on their consciences many thousands of needless deaths and many millions of hours of avoidable suffering.

Of course, all the research into new drugs is not the work of the pharmaceutical houses. All progress in this field does not depend upon them, but they have made contributions of great importance to the discovery of new remedies and methods of manufacture.

We hope, therefore, that Mr. KEFAUVER gives them an ample opportunity to tell their side, particularly as they have a stirring story to tell.

Research is expensive; the usual estimate is that this year the drug industry is laying out $200 million in the hope that from this large expenditure in the laboratories some useful discoveries will come.

There is no guarantee that any return will be reaped and no certainty that if something is discovered, some better remedy will not replace it long before the original cost is recovered. In considering the price of prescription drugs, the risks taken by the manufacturer cannot be left out of account.

Last September, John T. Connor, president of Merck & Co., one of the leading drug manufacturers, spoke in Chicago before the American Association of Medical Clinics. He told the story of a 17-year research project that contributed to an understanding of how the kidneys work and produced two useful drugs, one of them for the relief of gout and another of great value in eliminating excess fluids from the tissues and reducing high blood pressure. The concluding paragraphs of Mr. Connor's speech are worth quoting:

"Nikita Khrushchev, Anastas Mikoyan, and other Soviet leaders have been going up and down our land telling everyone who would listen that communism will supplant capitalism as capitalism supplanted feudalism. They say communism can do a better job of organizing the productive resources of society.

"I challenge them. Specifically, I challenge Soviet communism to do a better job than U.S. capitalism of discovering, developing, producing, and distributing new and effective drugs to alleviate the diseases that plague mankind.

"I will even give the Soviets a 10-year handicap for this peaceful competition. If their pharmaceutical industry, including its research, is doing a better job for the Soviet people by 1969 than we did for ours in 1959, we shall declare them the victors. In this peaceful competition there will be no victim except disease.

"In the 42 years since their October revolution, Soviet science and technology have been unable to come up with a single major drug discovery. Every one of them has come from the West.

"Communism is still pirating the results of our research instead of developing its own. The Russian bureaucratic machinery for producing these copies creaks along at a miserably slow rate. Its distribution system is snarled up with redtape and recurring shortages. The Soviet pharmaceutical industry today is a showpiece for the inefficiency of communism.

"In contrast, I submit a spectacular demonstration of efficiency in a democratic environment. This efficiency was not the result of force, fear, or totalitarian control; it was due entirely to the willing collaboration of freemen and free institutions working together to discover, to produce, and to use new weapons of life for the common good of mankind."

[From the Newark (N.J.) News, Dec. 12, 1959]

THE DRUG INQUIRY

Senator KEFAUVER seems to have a facility for getting more headlines out of his investigations than most any other congressional rival in the field. His 1950–51 crime series catapulted him into national prominence, an unsuccessful bid for the Democratic presidential nomination in 1952, and finally landed him on his party's ticket as candidate for the Vice Presidency in 1956.

As head of the Senate Judiciary Antitrust and Monopoly Subcommittee, Mr. KEFAUVER'S interest has ranged from baseball, football, and other professional team sports, to administered prices, particularly in the steel industry. All of these are popular subjects. But none is calculated to yield anything like the mileage inherent in drug prices which is the Senator's current preoccupation.

Practically everybody has a lifetime intimacy with medicines and their cost. The committee's charges of astronomical markups in drug prices—some as high as 7,000 percent—have captured page 1 headlines and voters' attention.

Thus far the investigation has developed charges that put large drug manufacturers on the defensive. Monopolistic practices, price-rigging, and other illegal procedures are legitimate fields of inquiry. But how the companies conduct their business, so long as it is legally operated, is hardly Government business unless, of course, Congress intends to go into the manufacture and sale of drugs.

Furthermore, Senator KEFAUVER is on the wrong side of the street if he thinks the high cost of pharmaceutical research and promotion—or any other industrial research for that matter—should be financed out of capital and not out of earnings. At its best, research is a big risk and it would be unfair to expect a publicly owned corporation to gamble with new capital.

Still, there's no getting around the fact that the prices of some of the wonder drugs are sky high. The committee would serve a useful purpose if its questioning could result in a price level that would be fair both to drug manufacturer and public.

But politics and pursuit of headlines must be subordinated if discovery of new ways to cure disease and prolong health are not to be impeded or even discouraged. Too many owe too much—perhaps their lives—to pharmaceutical research.

[From the Chicago (Ill.) Sun-Times, Dec. 12, 1959]

THE PRICE OF PRESCRIPTION DRUGS

On the first day of his subcommittee's investigation of the wholesale price of prescription drugs, Senator ESTES KEFAUVER created headlines that read: "7,000 Percent Markup in Drugs." This was in reference to one particular drug deal. It certainly is not typical of the entire pharmaceutical industry as evidence later in the week brought out.

Representatives of the industry conceded that it is relatively profitable but asserted that it deserves to be. We find no reason to criticize this attitude. There is a great deal of difference between a profitable enterprise and a profiteering enterprise. Although it is possible to cite individual instances in which prices seem to be out of line—the same drug may be priced high in one circumstance and low in another—we find no evidence that the industry as a whole is profiteering and gouging the American public. On the contrary, in recent years it has distinguished itself through its research for making great contributions to the control and care of illness and disease.

There is hardly a family that has not benefited in recent years through some of the so-called wonder drugs that have been developed by the working of the free enterprise pharmaceutical industry. A study by Dan Rennick, editor of the American Druggist, shows that at least 78 percent of all drugs prescribed today were not even in existence 10 years ago. It is ironic that Senator KEFAUVER protests the cost of drugs for elderly people although some of them are still alive because of the new drugs.

Certainly an effort should be made to keep the price of drugs at a reasonable level. But unless Senator KEFAUVER wishes to suggest that the pharmaceutical industry be nationalized, the price of drugs must have some relation to the cost of developing and producing them. It is far better to rely on the working of our competitive free enterprise system to produce the best at lowest cost in drugs as it does in other areas of consumer needs. And, according to Rennick's study, the price of prescriptions is in line with average cost of other things.

For example, the average prescription in 1939 cost $1.11—1 hour and 45 minutes of work for the average wage earner. Today it is $3.08—1 hour and 27 minutes of work. In the 8 years from January 1952 through November 1959 there were 3,548 price changes in lists printed every 2 weeks in the druggists' magazine. Of these, 1,226 were up but 2,322 were down.

Prices go down in the drug field as competition intensifies, as mass production takes over and as manufacturing techniques improve. This is true of most American manufactured goods. In measuring the cost of drugs, expensive research costs must be taken into consideration.

A corollary of Senator KEFAUVER'S investigation should be the good the industry has done as well as the prices it charges. The Senator should keep his investigation in perspective even though this might not give him as much limelight.

[From the Detroit (Mich.) News, Dec. 9, 1959]

ON THE PRICE OF MEDICINE: WE WOULD LIKE TO KNOW

If there has ever been a congressional inquiry which started out on the premise that there's a lot we don't know and we want to find out, we can't recall it. The standard approach appears to be: "We know the answers; all we need are facts to match."

Unfortunately for the drug industry and the public, the Senate investigation into drug prices appears to be cast in the classic mold. The probers seem already convinced that prices are unconscionably high; their predilections show in the glee with which they hop upon the spread between the material cost of a pill and its retail price—a comparison which, taken alone, ignores all kinds of pertinent factors.

The spread is, in some cases, startling. It may or may not be too much, in any given case. The public interest will best be served by an earnest attempt to find out, not by assuming the answer at the outset and defying the industry to prove otherwise.

There are valid questions this probe can answer if its masters have the will to do so: How long, on the average, must a drug firm charge a premium price on a new product to recoup its development cost, in view of the industry's mercurial rate of technological change—which can render a product obsolete overnight?

How much is a company entitled to make on a product developed by somebody else, to which it adds only its own brand name and salesmanship? How much of the industry's high marketing costs stem from legitimate work to acquaint doctors with the uses of a new product, and how much from simple plugging of one brand over its competitors?

What is a valid standard of comparison between the company which spends great sums to insure wide distribution—and therefore availability—of its products, and the firm which spends little on marketing and satisfies itself with a small and cozy market, based upon the marketing efforts of others?

What is a reasonable profit margin for the drug industry, not in terms of a dozen unrelated fields, but in terms of its own peculiar risks and opportunities?

These and many others are questions worth asking. From the past history of congressional probes and the premiere performance of this one, we cannot confidently expect the answers. We can only hope for them.

[From the Morgantown (W. Va.) Post, Dec. 8, 1959]

DON'T FOOL US

A Senate antitrust subcommittee, headed by Senator KEFAUVER, of Tennessee, heard testimony yesterday that a pharmaceutical manufacturer makes a pill for 1.6 cents, sells it wholesale at 17.9 cents, and suggests that the retailer sell it at 29.8 cents.

Looks pretty bad, doesn't it? Especially since the pill is said to be effective for those suffering from arthritis and asthma, many of whom may be short of cash to buy so expensive a medicine.

But there may be more to this than appears on the surface. How did the manufacturer know that this pill, derived from cortisone, is effective as an arthritis-asthma medicine? And once having made the discovery, what steps did the manufacturer have to take to establish that unknown side effects would not be worse than the ailment sought to be cured or relieved?

Staff investigators of the Senate subcommittee said that their figures (which they obtained from the manufacturer) included the costs of preparing and bottling the pills, but not of marketing them. Apparently they did not include either the cost of the research which went into the development of this pill and the testing which had to be carried out before it could safely be put on the market.

And yet it must be a matter of common knowledge that research for new medicines can be very expensive. Look at the money being spent every year on innumerable research projects related to cancer, heart disease, and other intractable human ailments. It runs into the tens and hundreds of millions of dollars every year. Of course, most of this money is not being spent by the pharmaceutical industry; it is coming from public appropriations and from grants made by voluntary health organizations. This same thing was true of the Salk vaccine for polio. If the pharmaceutical industry had had to include in its price for Salk vaccine a charge for the development costs met by the National Foundation for Infantile Paralysis and other voluntary agencies the selling price might have been almost prohibitive.

Well, the best pharmaceutical companies have their own research departments which they support with their own funds. A good deal of what they spend on such research is money that goes down the drain. No researcher can be sure that he is going to come up with something useful. Much research, in fact, is certain to end in a blind alley, but may and often does have value by eliminating possibilities.

We do not know how much money the Schering Corp. spent in developing Neticortelone, the medicine mentioned in the Senate subcommittee testimony yesterday. But it surely must have spent something, and to eliminate that cost factor is unfair and misleading.

Then there is the matter of marketing, which the Senate subcommittee's investigators specifically eliminated from their cost figures. Once a pharmaceutical company has developed and perfected a new medicine of proved efficacy, a demand does not immediately and spontaneously develop for that medicine. The manufacturer must make the medical profession aware of the development of this new medicine and must satisfy the profession that it can safely and effectively be used. This marketing process (if you want to call it that) can also cost quite a bit of money. The pharmaceutical companies have representatives called detail men who call upon physicians and furnish them information (and free samples). They must give evidence to back up their claims. It might well be that a pill costing only 1.6 cents would require an even larger expenditure to bring it to the awareness and acceptance of the physicians who alone may prescribe it for their patients.

If the pharmaceutical industry is engaging in shady practices, the Senate subcommittee has a duty to bring those practices to the public's attention. But it also has a duty not to mislead the public and not to discourage the research from which the better treatment of human ailments can come.

NO END IN SIGHT TO PROBES

Enough has been developed in the new and sensational investigation into drug prices to permit sensible comment.

The nub of the probe, launched by the Senate Antitrust Subcommittee, is that the American public is being clobbered by the prices charged by drug makers and reflected in the retail prices charged by drugstores.

We do not for a moment consider that it is within the province of the unit, headed up by Senator ESTES KEFAUVER, Democrat of Tennessee, to harry the drug manufacturers because of what they charge in wholesaling their wares.

No one as yet in this capitalistic democracy has established what is a fair markup. If Congress has in its head the notion of legislating on what percentage of profits is reasonable, then this is a step toward socialism of the most remarkable and unprecedented order.

How much shall a manufacturer charge for his goods and products and how much money shall be make? No one can say whether it should be 1 percent or 1,000 percent. The very same imbroglio developed during the thirties, during the depression, and no minds were able to deduce what the profit margin should be. Is there a moralism involved? Perhaps. But who shall set the moral rate of profit?

In essence, despite the lurid headlines, the Senate unit is charging the drug makers with combining in restraint of trade and for charging the very same prices for the very same drugs and pills.

If so, this is a matter for the Justice Department and Attorney General Rogers. It is not a subject for a probe and an inquisition that furnishes headlines. There is the Sherman Antitrust Act that can be brought into play and there are endless precedents which have been erected during the past 5 years during the course of proceedings of antitrust actions more of which were filed during the period than during the preceding two decades.

If drugs and pills are high it is because they are resultant from highly expensive research that made them possible in the first place. Research is a devourer of money.

Then, too, many drugs and pills are perishable and if local doctors do not prescribe them for one reason or another, then they must sit on the shelf of the druggist who has to take a loss simply because he cannot dispose of them. He is caught in the middle between the traffic of the doctor who does not prescribe and the obligation to store them on his shelves.

As is true of many congressional probes, there is a tendency to blow off to the press and to the public on facts that are slender and do not quite tell the complete story.

We are not in any way disparaging the fact that drugs are expensive. All health measures are expensive especially during a period of inflation. But the Senate committee is wasting lots of money and time and energy that should be a Justice Department bailiwick, if there are any grounds for an antitrust action.

[From the Fort Worth (Tex.) Star-Telegram, Dec. 16, 1959]

A PLACE FOR CAUTION

When congressional investigations turned up malpractice in the labor movement, a wave of public resentment swept a bill through Congress to correct the situation. Now another congressional inquiry is seeking evidence of wrongdoing, this time in the drug industry. Again the public blood pressure is running high. But in this instance great caution must be exercised, lest the Nation's constitutional well-being, as well as its physical health, be placed in peril.

The people are justified in their outrage at the thought that price fixing or other unethical practices might be responsible in part for the zooming cost of medicines and prescriptions used to counteract human suffering. If this sort of thing has been going on, something assuredly ought to be done about it. But findings published thus far do not clearly establish that it has. As some drug industry spokesmen have pointed out, much of what has been described in the inquiry as excess profits has gone into research that has produced many new cures and remedies. Few people would wish to see this progress interrupted. Should subsequent evidence appear to justify Federal action, however, caution still would be most important as regards the type of action to be taken.

In the labor case, new legislation was needed, since there was no law under which the necessary reforms could have been effected. This is in contrast with the fact that there are antitrust and antimonopoly laws that could be invoked to put a stop to price fixing or other practices in violation of statutes designed to preserve business competition. That would entail court action, though, and not legislative action. Especially to be avoided are new laws that would put drug pricing in Government hands, as one Senator has proposed.

Were the public, swept blindly along by its emotions, to allow the passage of such laws, it would for certain be doing away with competition in the drug industry. Not only that, it would be permitting a dangerous precedent for future moves to establish Federal control over private industries.

PROFIT A NAUGHTY WORD

Now it is the manufacturers of ethical drugs who are under the spotlight of a congressional committee. They are charged with having marked up the price of a certain pill 7,000 percent above the cost. The impression is conveyed that the public is being milked through the introduction of new drugs.

But these investigators, like so many congressional committees, are going further than that. Whether their charges of financial excesses are soundly based or not, through their questions and statements they suggest that profits in themselves are somehow reprehensible.

This idea may be appealing to those on the bottom rungs of the economic ladder and may win their votes for those who expound it. It is, however, about as un-American as an idea can get.

This country was developed on the profit motive; profits which today it has become fashionable to term "excessive" were essential to create the capital pools without which further development would have been impossible. Our system, even our Government, is based on profits. They are the source of indispensable income taxes. But the investigators ignore all that.

Listening to these congressional committees, a visitor from abroad would gain the impression that American profits are not without honor save in their own country.

[From the New York (N.Y.) Mirror]

REMEMBER THE FABLE

The trial of the portion of the drug industry which deals in so-called ethical pharmaceuticals, generally those that must be prescribed by a physician, was recessed Saturday before the Senate Antitrust Subcommittee, ESTES KEFAUVER, Democrat, Tennessee, chairman.

So far the testimony has generated some heat, some light, and some demands for Government control or laws.

The companies involved admit profits are high (though they can fluctuate greatly) but they point out also that the industry spends more for research than any other and that the new drugs, developed within the last two or three decades have helped to add 10 years to the average life span.

These contributions of the industry to the well-being of the Nation must be balanced against the allegations of profiteering and price fixing. So it is just as well that hearings will not be renewed until after the first of the year. There will be time to weigh the facts and determine what congressional action, if any, is needed.

The life-preserving drugs should be available at prices that are fair and that those in want of them can afford to pay.

But the industry should not be the object of punitive, hastily framed legislation.

The high costs of research (more than $190 million will be spent in 1960) must be taken into consideration.

In the correction of any evils which may exist, it will be pertinent to remember the fable of the goose that laid the golden eggs. Let's not kill the goose.

[From the Kingsport (Tenn.) Times, Dec. 14, 1959]

INVESTIGATING DRUG COMPANIES

The present investigation into the drug industry seeks to show that somebody is making unconscionable profits from the drugs that are often a matter of life and death to the public. And that is not all. There are charges that someone is foisting off on the people drugs that, far from being beneficial, are positively harmful to health. How much of this is justified, we do not know. But we all know that the net result will be to shake public confidence in the drugs that the doctors prescribe, in the doctors, and in the hospitals where the drugs are dispensed. This is not good.

When a doctor or reputable pharmacist goes on the witness stand and denounces the use of certain drugs, it is not the place of a layman to call him a crackpot or a publicity seeker. But it is the business of the layman to weigh the value of that individual opinion against the opinion of others. We do know that the medical profession leans over backward to prevent the marketing of a drug until it has been tested and retested and the preponderance of evidence is all in favor of its use. But we also know that there are always individuals of a singular cast of mind who refuse to go along with the majority, no matter how great that majority. And the layman who is not entitled to an opinion of his own must conclude that it is safer to follow the preponderance of opinion than the lone wolf.

We know that some medical men have pet ideas. We have heard a doctor say that adults should not drink sweet milk. We have heard a doctor say that white wheat bread is bad. So it is not too surprising that there is some opinion that looks askance at the new drugs. But we cannot help but feel that on the whole, the tests that new drugs are put through before they are given the stamp of approval is as much guarantee of safety as we can get. There must always be the margin for human error.

When it comes to the question of pricing drugs, anyone who has had a prescription filled knows that the prices are very high. Are they higher than they need be? Is someone making abnormal profits? We have seen figures quoted indicating a fantastic change from the cost of production to the price the patient pays. There is a question about the figure used as the cost of production.

We are all aware of the fact that every company making special drugs or other scientific materials must maintain great laboratories with very expensive equipment and employing many technicians constantly doing experimental work. Much of this work is not productive of positive results. Not every experiment pays off. Not every young scientist can say "Eureka."

But the things that are produced for commercial development must absorb all the costs that the first is put to. So the real cost of production on any given drug is not as easy to place as it might seem. The cost of research may be greater.

It would appear that whether the price is out of line with cost can best be discovered by the books of the company rather than by comparison of figures that may be less than complete. The Government has access to the books of the companies for audit. This dramatic investigation is hardly necessary.

In any case it is hard to see what the Government can do even if the prices are higher than we think is fair. No one is going to suggest that the Government fix prices, are they?

In this connection it is noticed that recently the courts threw out the Government's case of price fixing against some of the drug companies. The judge decided that the Government did not have enough evidence to warrant giving the case to the jury.

[From the Minneapolis (Minn.) Star, Dec. 14, 1959]

THE PRICE OF PILLS

If the Senate investigation of drug prices can help the public know what are proper considerations in determining such prices, a service will be done. And if the effect of the hearings is to insure that the manufacturers and sellers of drugs keep within the bounds of fair prices, that will be an even greater service.

It is too soon to judge any drug firms on the basis of information presented so far. Some of the markups cited sound fantastic—but it is well known that some of the costs behind the development and production of drugs may also be sometimes fantastic.

In a speech given last September John T. Connor, president of Merck & Co., said: "The pharmaceutical industry is one in which the profit motive works quite effectively for the benefit of the consumer. We grow and prosper almost directly in relation to the number of new, needed, and effective discoveries that come from our laboratories."

The number of drugs available to cure Americans' ills is multiplying rapidly. Of the 4,000 or so now in use in this country, 90 percent have been developed in the last 10 years. The industry spent $170 million on research alone in 1958. As a result, we have today all sorts of new wonder drugs which are saving lives, or at least alleviating pain—and measured against the effect, who is to question the price? Yet to persons dependent upon frequent, continuing doses of expensive medicine, the cost can become a serious problem.

Competition is keen among the drug manufacturers—but competition in itself raises questions for the skeptics. Does the lure of high profits make the high-priced development especially worth while? And shouldn't competition, as in many other fields, ultimately bring lower prices for the public? A recent upsurge in competition from foreign sources has the American producers concerned. A curious public wonders why some Japanese drugs are selling for less in the United States than in Japan, and why some American pills can be bought for less in certain South American countries than in the United States.

What the customers want is simply effective, dependable drugs at a fair price. They expect the producers and retailers to make a reasonable profit. They want the manufacturers to make enough to permit competent research and development of new remedies—but they don't expect this cost to serve as an excuse for high prices on countless items which can be produced at low cost. And they wish they had some way of knowing when the drug bills they pay are proper and justified and when they are out of line.

The investigation of Senator KEFAUVER'S committee should at least illuminate the subject.

[From the Augusta (Ga.) Chronicle, Dec. 14, 1959]

TWO SIDES TO IT

In the midst of the flood of adverse publicity against the Nation's big drug firms now flowing out of the senatorial investigation at Washington, it is in order, perhaps, to caution the public about jumping at conclusions too soon. These investigations, it is true, may produce some factual data to sustain the general conviction that drug prices are too high. If so, it is to be hoped, proper steps can be taken to alleviate the situation for the public.

At the same time there can be no discounting of the fact that the large drug companies have made a big contribution to the cause of medical research. In recent years the pharmaceutical firms have contributed more than $20 million to medical and pharmacy schools, hospitals and institutions, and for scholarships and fellowships. Outright grants amounted to more than $5 million and contracts for special research projects totaled almost $2 million. These figures represent findings in a partial survey only and it is true probably that a more thorough and intensive survey would bring these totals to a much higher figure.

Some companies, it has been pointed out, have spent as much as $5 million in their own laboratories on the development of a single drug before it was offered for public use. One firm, Modern Medicine said in its Washington news column, spent $30 million on one drug alone before the first prescription for it was written.

These facts, which may or may not receive full publicity in the Washington hearings, should be fully considered before arriving at any conclusions about the evils ascribed to the drug companies.

[From the Des Moines (Iowa) Tribune, Dec. 17, 1959]

STATE SAVES BY BIDS ON DRUGS

The fact that Government hospitals can buy drugs at prices well below those paid by the general public has been brought out by the Senate committee investigating drug prices. The justification for giving special discounts to Federal, State, and county hospitals which buy in large quantities is obvious. The expense to drug firms in dealing with these institutions is much less than for most of their business.

Iowa institutions under the board of control buy drugs in many cases at prices lower than wholesalers pay the drug firms. The board of control has general contracts with some 50 drug firms, which for the most part allow generous discounts. The contract with one typical major firm allows the Iowa institutions to buy drugs 51 percent below what druggists pay wholesalers for the same items.

These contracts enable each institution to order drugs as its needs arise. The institutions are expected to check the catalog of each firm and order from the firm with the lowest price. Catalog prices vary widely. A random check of five catalogs showed prices on aspirin ranging from 90 cents to $2.16 for the same quantity.

The board of control can buy cheaper still by having its central purchasing office negotiate special contracts with drug firms or by inviting firms to bid competitively. One firm with a catalog price of 75 cents for a vial of penicillin—which includes the State's discount—offered to supply the same item for 25 cents when asked to bid. Another firm with a catalog price of $3.39 for a quantity of phenobarbital cut its asking price to $2.10 when it submitted a competitive bid.

Testimony at the Senate hearing has shown that prices for a drug vary greatly, depending on whether the drug is ordered by its generic name or its brand name. The larger Iowa board of control institutions, which have full-time pharmacists, attempt to buy by generic name. The purchasing office of the board also asks for bids by generic name.

Drug purchases account for most of the board of control's annual $750,000 bill for medical supplies. Theoretically, the way to make these funds go farthest is to buy all drugs by generic name on a competitive bid basis. However the largest single drug item purchased—tranquilizing drugs—is marketed only on a brand name basis. Some physicians also have strong preference for particular brand name drugs and distrust the quality of products from lesser-known firms. As a result only about 5 percent of the drug items purchased currently are bought on a competitive bid basis.

Senate committee testimony and Iowa experience show there is considerable give in drug prices. Since this is true, it would seem desirable to buy as much as practical by competitive bidding, without, of course, making any compromise on quality of the drugs.

RESEARCH IS CLOSELY TIED TO DRUG PROFITS

It seems to us that the investigation of pharmaceutical manufacturers' profits is on the order of a tempest in a teapot, conducted in a manner which appeals more to prejudice than to reason. While some drug prices may seem excessive, it must be remembered that many factors determine their cost.

William Graham, chairman of the Pharmaceutical Manufacturers Association and president of Baxter Laboratories, which has a large plant in Mississippi at Cleveland, made a statement on television last Sunday which explains a great deal.

If pharmaceutical firms cannot make a satisfactory profit, he said, there is no incentive for them to carry on research for new products. People everywhere will suffer if drug research is limited and jeopardized by Government intervention.

He said profits range from 6 to 16 percent of sales and his own firm has annual sales of $30 million of which some 6 percent is profit. About $1,500,000 is spent on research. The industry as a whole spends $190 million a year for research.

In modern pharmacy, much overhead is devoted to uncertainties, including research. Some products developed at enormous cost are outdated even before they can be put on the market.

There is no question but that the United States excels in the production and distribution of new and wonderful drugs beneficial to all humanity. We could never enjoy this leadership if margins of profits had been so limited that research was handicapped. Adequate incentive is essential if medical progress is to continue.

PHILANTHROPY IN MENTAL HEALTH

The Arkansas Mental Health Association's telegram commending Senator ESTES KEFAUVER's investigation of the wholesale price of certain drugs may inadvertently have left a public impression that the State doesn't appreciate the philanthropy of pharmaceutical houses that manufacture tranquilizers.

This telegram, which was revised from the original resolution that State papers published, pointed to the difficulty of low-income families who need to buy tranquilizers regularly for a member. When the drugs can't be obtained, the patient has to go back to a hospital, and again becomes a public charge. But most any heavy drug bill is beyond the means of a poor family these days. Tranquilizers are just a part of a very big health-economic problem, national in scope.

Manufacturers of tranquilizers probably have made tremendous profits but in fairness to them, their benefactions should be recognized. For instance, Smith, Kline, French of Philadelphia, maker of chloropromazine, one of the main drugs of this group, reduced prices as the demand zoomed. Out of profits the company set up a foundation for psychiatric research and education.

Entirely at its own expense the foundation made a movie for hospitals and medical schools to use in training psychiatric nurses. The film has been shown in the Arkansas State Hospital and numerous other institutions and nowhere does the picture plug chloropromazine.

This foundation conducted studies of remotivation of mental patients. Then it sent a team to State hospitals, including our own, to train ward attendants in technique. The company product wasn't pushed.

These facts should be fully considered before any conclusion is arrived at concerning the evils of the drug companies.

[From the Cleveland (Ohio) Plain Dealer, Dec. 11, 1959]

ARE DRUGS TOO EXPENSIVE?

Anyone who purchases drugs today knows they cost a lot of money, and a first impression is to conclude that drug manufacturers are making more profit than they should. Perhaps they are—that is what the Senate subcommittee is trying to find out.

But it should be borne in mind by the Senate investigators that a great deal of money has been spent in developing these drugs; that not all of the research turns out a safe, salable product, and that if new drugs are to be developed research must go on constantly.

Perhaps the best way for the average man to determine whether the drugs he buys are worth what it costs him, is to imagine what might happen to loved ones and friends if such drugs were unavailable. Fifty dollars might seem like an exorbitant price to pay for some particular course of pills, but if the pills saved the life of someone who probably would have died without them, you'd consider the pills the greatest of bargains.

It would be a tragic thing if the investigation caused drug manufacturers to say: "OK, we've had it. We'll cut out any further research and get along with what we've developed. If we don't have to spend more money for research we can drastically reduce the price of what we've got."

Just as patients have to pay for the expensive education of a physician or surgeon, so users of pills have to pay for the research that produced the pills, and the distribution system that makes them available to the public. It is unfair to assume that the chemicals which go into pills constitute their entire cost, and that the cost to purchasers should be based on this alone.

Whether the markup is too high is properly debatable; it would appear that in many cases it is. But the drug industry, which this year will spend $194 million in search of new and better medicines, certainly has a right to its day in court.

[From the Wausau (Wis.) Record-Herald, Dec. 10, 1959]

PRICE OF DRUGS

Senate investigators reported recently that a major drug manufacturer produced a new medicine for 1.6 cents a tablet, set a wholesale price of 17.9 cents (a markup of 1,118 percent), and suggested a rental price of 29.8 cents.

The markup represents quite a spread but the drugmaker contends that it is not excessive. A company spokesman says that actual production cost is only one of many factors which have to be considered in setting a price. Among them are selling and distribution costs, research, and many items peculiar to the industry such as informational activity on new drugs and trailblazing work to keep a flow of products constantly under development.

Along that line, we wonder how many expensive failures the drug firm had in trying to develop helpful new products for each success it had. Another question involves how long a newly developed product lasts before it is replaced by a still newer and better product.

Such things certainly should have an important bearing on what a drugmaker gets for his product as well as the actual cost of making a pill once the long process of development is out of the way.

We aren't in any position to say whether or not the price of drugs, as has been contended, is too high. Maybe by law or other means government could force a reduced markup. Such a result might save the consumer money on the price of drugs, but it might also tend to discourage drugmakers from supplying the public with new and better drugs.

[From the Chattanooga News-Free Press, Dec. 10, 1959]

THE DRUG PROBE

Senator ESTES KEFAUVER's subcommittee investigating drug prices has gotten off to a start with some pretty tricky business that has successfully captured national attention but seems to be highly and purposely misleading.

A subcommittee staff economist came up with the contention that it cost one drug manufacturer $1.57 to make a bottle of arthritic pills called Prednisolene that was sold at $17.90. This, the staff economist reported with a note of triumph, was a markup of 1,118 percent.

This also was a phony claim.

If the staff economist tried to get away with such a distorted picture in advertising, the Federal Trade Commission or somebody else would be on him post haste. The Kefauver subcommittee headline seeker (and achiever) had neglected to put into his price comparison other vital cost factors such as production, marketing, administration, research, royalty and taxes. The company figured these and other costs in and claimed the alleged 1,118 percent markup dissolved down to a "reasonable" profit of 12.3 percent. That's quite a difference; somebody's badly wrong.

Perhaps the prices of some drugs are too high, but the subcommittee won't find the answers and help solve the problem if it uses rigged figures. It is possible that some may consider such things, though not accurate, to be good politics.

Undoubtedly, there are many people who have difficulty paying for the drugs they need. There are people who have trouble paying for food, clothing, and rent. The average American spends $34 a year for tobacco, $55 a year on liquor—compared to $12 a year on drugs. We haven't heard of a subcommittee investigating tobacco and liquor pricing.

No industry, no operation—private, nonprofit or governmental—can be assumed not to have any shortcomings or bad practices or faults. Look into any, and some lack of efficiency or unsound policies will be found. In the drug industry, for example, maybe it would be difficult to explain how an American manufacturer making vitamins can sell his product in South America for $2.63 while the same size bottle costs $4.88 in the United States. But whatever the explanation, whether it is a good one or a bad one, doesn't justify the distortion typified by the subcommittee staff economist's mythical 1,118 percent markup.

Sick people don't like being sick. They much prefer to be well. They don't feel good and complaint is normal. And it's no pleasure to spend money on medicine when everyone would rather feel fine and spend the money on more enjoyable things. But we'd really complain if no miracle drugs existed. The major reason there are high-priced drugs—and low-priced ones, too—to treat so many modern ills is that the drug industry in recent years has become the miracle industry, producing a variety of compounds for relief and cure of ills that formerly were simply suffered as chronic discomforts, or which led to death.

Research has made these new drugs possible. Research costs money. The drug manufacturers could have avoided any Kefauver probe if they had simply stuck to making aspirin tablets and rubbing alcohol, perhaps competing only by debating which aspirin dissolves faster. But we'd be in bad shape if the drug industry had not undertaken costly research.

One company spent $2 million trying to produce a synthetic penicillin, a major lifesaving drug. It failed; the $2 million went down the drain. And about that time another company, also spending lots on research, succeeded. Where do the millions for research come from? They must come from sales of already developed drugs. Cut the prices down to a bare minimum and you cut research down to a bare minimum. Then you have no new miracle drugs to relieve suffering and prolong life.

Yes, but the manufacturers not only make a profit but pass drugs along with suggested prices to druggists of 33⅓-percent markup, it is claimed. Does that mean every druggist is making a killing? Last year 30 percent of the Nation's 56,000 druggists went into the red because of high operating costs.

A major probe distortion comes from the unfair pinpointing of the price of a single drug, suggesting it is typical. Markups vary for good reason. The only true picture comes from an across-the-board survey of drug manufacturers' entire operations.

There's no question that Americans are getting the best in drug developments and service that they or any people have ever gotten in seeking to determine whether the costs for this service are in line or too high, let's keep our feet on the ground and look at facts, not politically inspired fancies.

[From the Wilmington (Del.) News, Dec. 10, 1959]

EXCESSIVE DRUG PROFITS?

High drug prices and high drug profits are a prime target of Chairman KEFAUVER'S Antitrust and Monopoly Subcommittee in its investigation just opened. The Senator no doubt hopes to spotlight sensational facts which will shock the public and lead for a demand that Congress do something. Already there has been testimony that the wholesale price of a wonder drug for painful and crippling arthritis went up more than 1,000 percent, while the wholesale price of one hormone rose by 7,079 percent.

Such factfinding is good if it makes the public or the legislators go behind the facts and do hard thinking about the conflicting philosophies and principles involved. A drug manufacturer testified to the subcommittee, for instance, that his firm's profits are justified because they provide money for research which will produce other wonder drugs, Salk vaccines, and so on. "The consumers of today," he said, "must contribute to the benefits which the future will bring."

They must indeed. There would be no progress in the world if each generation evaded its responsibility to the future. But the question in each case is how this responsibility should be met. In our mixed economy we try a little of everything. Medical research is supported partly by Government funds raised by taxes, partly by funds raised in drives by nonprofit organizations, partly by various philanthropic donations (tax-deductible), and partly by plowing profits of drug companies back into research to develop new drugs on which new profits can be made to be plowed back into new research.

Should we apply the term "excessive" to these profits? How much profit is legitimate, and how much is too much? Isn't free enterprise entitled to charge all the traffic will bear, especially when it takes some of its profits and spends them on humanitarian research?

To questions like these, Americans would return a wide variety of answers. Merely asking them demands thinking about basic philosophy from a people who prefer the pragmatic approach (and are proud of it). But we suspect that most pragmatists would say, off the cuff, that profits of 1,000 percent and up are too high. If the pragmatist has arthritis, lives on a pension, and has been charged $29.83 for 100 prednisolone tablets that cost the manufacturer $1.57 to make, he is bound to think so.

But if profits are reduced, drug manufacturers can spend less on research, and the next generation may have fewer wonder drugs. If research is to be adequate under those circumstances, the Government will have to support more of it with tax money. Pragmatists won't like that, either.

But the Kefauver investigation should make us think more about the alternatives involved, and that will be a good thing.

[From the Dallas (Tex.) News, Dec. 10, 1959]

DIGGING FOR SCANDAL IN THE DRUG FIELD

It appears that the fifty-niners of the political mining camps have discovered that there are votes in them-thar scandals. The scandal now alleged by a new Kefauver investigating committee is that the Schering Corp. has made a profit of 7,079 percent on a new drug combination which it recently marketed. The News is inclined to suspect a charge like that because of its sheer dimensions.

The Schering Corp. has been in business since 1935. It has just under 4 million shares of common stock of $1 par value, with a relatively small amount of preferred stock. The book value of the common stock was recently estimated at $12.34 per share. Market price has been around $1.75. Dividends paid ranged from 13 cents paid in 1952 to a current rate of $1.40 a share. Earnings for 1958 were reported as $3.06 a share.

This does not read like a get-rich-quick enterprise—certainly not on a scale of 7,079 percent profits. It is fair to assume that for each wonder drug developed, there are 10,000 experiments which have to be washed down the laboratory drain. Somebody pays for 10,000 failures previous to the 10,001st experiment which produces.

The most patent, the most dangerous, and most prevalent markup in American life today is the political markup. What men like ESTES KEFAUVER cost the taxpayer, compared to what the Kefauvers are worth to the taxpayers, would probably be much more than 7,079 percent.

THE 12-POINT AGRICULTURAL PROGRAM PROPOSED BY THE JUNIOR SENATOR FROM MISSOURI

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, day before yesterday the distinguished junior Senator from Missouri introduced a bill with which I judge he hopes to settle all of agriculture's ills at one stroke. I should like to think this worthy objective were possible of such immediate accomplishment, and I should like further to believe that the Senator from this great farm State has the solution in his 12-point package.

The two chief standards one must apply to judge the worth of such a bill are, it seems to me, its workability and its cost.

What I ask my colleague, therefore, is how much will it cost?

I would agree wholeheartedly with the Senator when he says that immediate positive action is essential. I would welcome positive action today, say, on wheat and conservation reserve legislation.

The administration sought without success in the last session to get immediate positive action on wheat, which is in the deepest trouble of all. What we got, however, was delayed negative action.

We have $3.5 billions tied up in wheat alone. It will go up under the present program. I am sure the distinguished junior Senator from Missouri would agree that the present wheat program is badly out of joint and could use some immediate positive action.

I would agree further with the Senator that our present program is a failure. Everyone from the President on down does not dispute that. The administration has certainly bent every effort to change this program. The resistance to all positive proposals for immediate action has come from the majority side of the aisle.

I agree with the Senator's comment that "overproduction has built up huge surpluses." I wonder if the Senator would now agree with me as to the reason for the overproduction? I think we could stipulate farmer efficiency and unusually good weather and improved technology. Would the Senator then agree that price fixing by Government plus loopholes were further reasons?

Certainly I agree with his charge to the Congress that "it is essential that the Congress act—and act now." I would add that it is lamentable Congress has not acted long since.

The Senator laments that there has been no change of policy on the part of the administration. This is indeed a compliment. The administration truly has held to the course of insisting on a constructive, sound, and realistic price support policy. It has never deviated. What is needed here is not a change in policy but a change in program. Herein lies the failure. Only Congress has the power to change the program.

Before commenting on the 12-point program as such, I wish to point out that a number of these points are already part of the administration program. This pays the administration the highest form of flattery—imitation. I am sure the Senator recognizes this, especially since he is a member of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Now to the 12 points.

First. The first of the Senator's points deals with the disposition of our surpluses. He states that "these surpluses have not been used to any real advantage either at home or abroad."

The administration has a food-use policy which provides the best diets Americans have ever had and also has provided more food for the needy abroad than ever before in our history. Americans today have available the most wholesome, nutritious, and varied food supply in the history of any nation. Furthermore, no nation has ever been so generous with its abundance as has the United States. Our war against hunger has shown great results. It is the only war we want to be engaged in.

Since Public Law 480 program was authorized in 1954, U.S. surplus agricultural commodities having export market value of more than $4 billion have been programed for export to 37 friendly countries, plus about 8 billions of pounds donated to the needy of 91 countries. The record is abundantly clear as to the constructive use of these surpluses abroad. I would appreciate hearing what specific additional ways the surpluses can be used to advantage.

Last fiscal year almost 2 billion pounds of U.S. surplus foods were donated to the school lunch, welfare institutions, and the needy of the United States. During the first half of 1959, for example, about one person out of nine received some surplus foods donated by the Government.

Second. His program would establish a national reserve stockpile of food items for use in event of enemy attack and place them under the Office of Civilian Defense Mobilization. Competent studies by career people made as to the desirability of stockpiling food reserves for use in case of enemy attack have indicated that such a program of any magnitude is not desirable because of the perishability aspects, the difficulty of assuring safe stocks, and so forth.

Third. His program would make another attempt to stop the surplus buildup by bringing production into balance with national food and fiber needs. The administration has constantly urged the Congress to adopt changes in basic farm legislation which would permit bringing production into balance with needs. Experience has shown that such attempts under present legislation by means of control and regimentation of farmers has completely failed.

Fourth. His program would establish farmer advisory and administration committees of bona fide farmers so as to have more practical farm programs. We already have such committees of "bona fide" farmers.

Fifth. This point of tailoring individual commodity programs to conditions affecting that commodity is rather vague. The Secretary of Agriculture already has some authority within this area. For example, the milk marketing orders and other marketing agreement and order programs which are operating successfully. The administration has continuously requested legislation which would permit more authority with which to adapt programs to better fit the needs.

Sixth. His program requires the preparation of a true parity price formula. "Prior to adoption of such a formula," the Senator states, "price goals are established at 90 percent of the present parity formula."

One can only conclude from this that the Senator is calling for a program based on 90 percent of untrue parity.

The parity principle is one of long standing. However, parity price formula has been used in many instances for purposes for which it was not originally conceived or designed. Use of the parity price formula was not intended for price support purposes, and it has very serious limitations. I am glad that my colleague now recognizes this. Why continue in use a formula which the Senator agrees gives an untrue answer? Ninety percent of untrue is still untrue.

Seventh. Finally the Senator concludes by endorsing a program which is a product of this administration and which is the first realistic attempt by Government to give sound help to low-income farmers who represent almost 60 percent of the farm population.

The rural development program now going forward is proving to be a very satisfactory means of helping the low-income farmers. This should be expanded, but there is no need to create a new agency to deal with this problem as the Senator advocates.

It is interesting to note that press accounts describe this as a "catchall" bill with little chance of passage. I do not know what it is trying to "catch." It is a pointless 12-point program, in which the sound suggestions have long since been pioneered by this administration and the unsound proposals long since rejected.

TOBACCO INTERESTS OPPOSE ATTEMPTS TO PROVIDE INFORMATION CONCERNING CANCER AND CIGARETTES

Mr. NEUBERGER. Mr. President, the activities of certain tobacco interests to discredit medical findings of a causal relationship between cigarettes and lung cancer may well be recorded in history books as an outstanding example of unenlightened self-interest operating to the public detriment.

I wish today to bring to the attention of future chroniclers of the annals of human health a most revealing sample of the astonishing attitude exhibited by some in this industry.

The following item is taken in its entirety from the July 10, 1959, issue of the magazine Tobacco, the International Weekly of Industry and Science:

> Here's something new the cigarette industry must face: New York City's Bureau of Public Health Education has completed a program to deter schoolchildren and teenagers from smoking. Dr. Morey R. Fields, director of the bureau, says the drive will also include education on the harmful effects of narcotics and alcohol. Miss Mary Fitzgerald, associate director of health education of the board of education, said the program would seek to chiefly impress boys and girls between 11 and 13 years of age. Support will be had from the parent and teacher associations, youth organizations, city agencies with youth programs, and the tobacco industry. The topics of talks to the children, said Dr. Fields, will be informative "of the relationship between smoking and lung cancer and cardiac involvement" and how smoking is linked to such illnesses as Buerger's disease and gangrene.
> The disturbing factor about the New York City school antismoking educational drive is that other cities might follow. It might deter all children from ever becoming smokers. However, for some 300 years antitobacco crusaders have loudly predicted dire consequences for tobacco users. Yet, despite these warnings, per capita consumption has steadily increased. The industry is currently doing its largest sales volume in history, and undoubtedly enjoying its most profitable period.

Mr. President, I wish to reread two sentences from this amazing statement. Again, I quote:

> The disturbing factor about the New York City school antismoking educational drive is that other cities might follow. It might deter all children from ever becoming smokers.

Mr. President, first, I want to point out to the magazine Tobacco that numerous cities have had in operation for some time a program such as that announced in New York. One such city happens to be my own home of Portland, Oreg. As a prophet, I think Tobacco magazine will prove quite accurate. In view of the increasingly large mass of evidence regarding the positive relationship between cancer and cigarettes being brought to the public attention by the U.S. Public Health Service and private researchers, I am confident that many other cities will consider adoption of such educational programs for their youth.

"RECRUITMENT" DROP SHOWN

I believe that Tobacco magazine is also correct in its assertion that these programs may have the effect of deterring children from smoking cigarettes. A recent issue of Consumer Reports states that in Portland a year-long survey of 21,980 students showed that educational programs regarding smoking dropped the net "recruitment" rate from 13 to 7.7 percent among boys and from 6.4 to 2.1 percent among girls.

What is truly incredible about the comment of Tobacco magazine with respect to these programs is its implicit thesis that it is disturbing to find that American youth may be more concerned with their health than they are with acquiring the nebulous symbols of social status with which cigarette advertising attempts to secure their patronage.

Cigarette advertising is distinguished by its efforts to associate its product with symbols which will appeal to youth. Athletic prowess is associated with smoking by full-page four-color pictures of prominent sports stars holding their favorite cigarette. The glamour of Hollywood is utilized by portraying sophisticated screen celebrities smoking a cigarette. Popularity of a television gun slinger is employed by showing him perched on the corral rail holding a pack of some he-man brand.

INDUSTRY EXHIBITS CYNICISM

"Today's adolescents are tomorrow's addicts," is the theme which threads through all cigarette advertising. Yet despite its cynical manipulation of symbols in an effort to boost sales figures, some tobacco interests have the temerity to criticize efforts to present another view of cigarette smoking.

One can almost picture the counterpart of these tobacco spokesmen at the time of Pasteur's discovery of the relationship between fermentation in liquids and the growth of bacteria, a discovery which resulted in the development of pasteurization of milk and is today regarded as a giant forward step in the battle to better protect human health.

"The disturbing factor about Dr. Pasteur's finding is that other people may find out," this advertising ancestor would say, "it might deter all people from drinking raw milk."

CHILDREN ENTITLED TO FACTS

Mr. President, American children should have an opportunity to learn the facts about the potential dangers to human health involved in cigarette smoking. Once they have such information, then they will be in a position to make a wise voluntary decision as to whether or not they wish to smoke. There is evidence to indicate that children given such an opportunity, more frequently elect not to smoke than those who do not receive such an advantage. In this connection, I ask unanimous consent that there appear at the conclusion of my remarks an article from the January issue of Consumer Reports reporting on the results of educational programs regarding smoking.

Mr. President, I have introduced legislation to provide Federal grants to States to assist them in informing and educating children in schools with respect to the harmful effects of tobacco, alcohol, and other potentially deleterious consumables. The number of my bill is S. 1394.

PROOF MAY BE TOO LATE

I think that our children are entitled to have made available to them accurate medical information about cigarettes and cancer. A recent survey of doctors in Massachusetts showed that more than 93 percent of the physicians polled advocated an educational campaign to warn teenagers.

As Surg. Gen. Leroy Burney said recently:

In protection of human health * * * absolute proof often comes late. To wait for it is to invite disaster.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there appear at the end of my remarks a press release issued by the Surgeon General this fall as part of the Public Health Service's continuing effort to inform the public of the facts about cancer and cigarettes; an editorial from the Bulletin of Cancer Progress, published by the American Cancer Association, commenting on tobacco industry attempts to discourage acceptance of scientific evidence concerning this relationship; and an editorial from the Christian Science Monitor entitled "Tobacco Propaganda."

There being no objection, the article, press release, and editorials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From Consumer Reports, January 1960]

AND THOSE WHO DON'T

(By Harold Aaron, M.D.)

There has been a heartening slowdown in the rate at which high school students begin to smoke when they are exposed to educational campaigns. In Portland, Oreg., a year-long survey of 21,980 students showed that antismoking education dropped the net recruitment rate from 13 to 7.7 percent among the boys and from 6.4 to 2.1 percent among the girls. As Daniel Horn, Ph.D., of the American Cancer Society, explained to the annual meeting of the American Public Health Association last fall, this may seem like small progress; but if it were carried out cumulatively for 4 years, it would mean 20 percent of the high school students who otherwise would become regular smokers by graduation time would not do so. In Jacksonville, Fla., Dr. Paul A. Mori, chief radiologist at Baptist Memorial Hospital, says, "We've reached some 20,000 students." The New York City schools are planning their own program.

Do physicians themselves give up smoking? A 5-year followup study of the smoking habits of Massachusetts doctors now has been completed. In 1954, 34 percent of them were not smoking; the percentage has risen to 44.5 percent. Only 38.5 percent of the smokers now smoke cigarettes, though 52 percent did in 1954 (17 percent now smoke only cigars or a pipe). About half the current cigarette smokers use less than a pack a day. The over-a-pack-a-day smokers have dropped by more than 40 percent. Asked about an educational campaign to warn teenagers, more than 93 percent of the doctors advocated it.

PRESS RELEASE OF NOVEMBER 27, 1959, BY U.S. DEPARTMENT OF HEALTH, EDUCATION, AND WELFARE, PUBLIC HEALTH SERVICE

"Unless the use of tobacco can be made safe, the individual's risk of lung cancer can be reduced best by the elimination of smoking," Dr. Leroy E. Burney, Surgeon General of the Public Health Service, concludes in an article appearing in the current (November 28) issue of the Journal of the American Medical Association.

In the article, which is titled "Smoking and Lung Cancer, a Statement of the Public Health Service," the Surgeon General states: "The weight of evidence at present implicates smoking as the principal etiological (causative) factor in the increase of lung cancer."

The statement, which was made available in Washington today, contains an extensive review of leading studies made in recent years on the relationship between smoking and lung cancer. The studies cited are both in support of and against the hypothesis that smoking is a principal causative factor in the rising death rate from lung cancer in the United States and other parts of the world.

Dr. John D. Porterfield, Acting Surgeon General in Dr. Burney's absence from the country, said that the Service, in submitting the article for publication in the Journal of the American Medical Association and in releasing it simultaneously to the public, was following an established policy of making fully available to the medical and health professions all the facts on the smoking and lung cancer question as rapidly as they are developed.

Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare Arthur S. Flemming said: "I heartily endorsed this policy and commended the Service for assembling the data and making public its own conclusions. Both physicians and the public should welcome the views of the Surgeon General and the Public Health Service on the subject."

The Service has also concluded, according to the article, that the following statements are also supported by present evidence:

1. Cigarette smoking particularly is associated with an increased chance of developing lung cancer.

2. Stopping cigarette smoking even after long exposure is beneficial.

3. No method of treating tobacco or filtering the smoke has been demonstrated to be effective in materially reducing or eliminating the hazard of lung cancer.

4. The nonsmoker has a lower incidence of lung cancer than the smoker in all controlled studies, whether in rural areas, urban regions, industrial occupations, or by sex.

5. Individuals who have never smoked at all (cigarettes, cigars, or pipe) have the best chance of escaping lung cancer.

The article presents the criticisms leveled at the proponents of the smoking and lung cancer relationship by dissenting scientists. A number of investigators, the article points out, have suggested that "increased volumes of automobile exhaust fumes and industrial vapors polluting the air are to a great part responsible for the causation of lung cancer. The possibility that there are other factors yet unknown also has been suggested."

"Since carcinoma of the lung is also a disease of nonsmokers," the statement says, "it is evident that factors other than tobacco contribute to its etiology."

The Surgeon General points out that studies of smoking habits "have not accounted adequately for the variation in death rates between men and women."

"The Service," Dr. Porterfield said, "is distributing reprints of the article to members of the medical and public health profession."

The bibliography which accompanies the article consists of 81 citations and includes reference to the work of research scientists both in the United States and abroad.

[From the Bulletin of Cancer Progress, March–April 1958]

AFTER THE DELAYING ACTION A TRIP TO CANOSSA

When military defeat is inevitable the commander orders a delaying action, never decisive or victorious, to cover a withdrawal—euphemism for retreat and defeat.

Dr. Little, scientific director of the Tobacco Industry Research Committee, is executing an ordered delaying action in the cigarette-lung cancer controversy, which he refers to as a "battle."

This tactical maneuver, which is apparently agreeable to the other members of his scientific advisory board, is to deny repeatedly the validity of the many authoritative reports indicating by accepted epidemiological, experimental, and pathological studies that cigarette smoking causes lung cancer; to prevent or delay, and to neutralize in this country any widespread public education, like that now being promoted in England, that would hurt sales of cigarettes; to mislead the public into believing that no change in smoking habits is indicated from the existing statistical and pathological evidence, nor will be until "direct experimental evidence" is at hand; and to convince the trusting, tobacco-consuming public of the industry's eleemosynary, "lasting interest in people's health."

With human lives at stake, smoking cannot be considered as innocent until proved guilty, but must stand guilty, on the evidence until proved innocent.

Presumably, the chairman, his board, and their sponsors would engage the medical profession and the public in "calm deliberation" for the next 40 or 50 years, when such direct evidence could be available from a human guinea-pig experiment set up today. As a scientist he knows such a direct-evidence experiment is impossible, and he utilizes its impossibility for continuing productive, long-term delay. Success of this strategy is reflected in the continued increase in cigarette sales—an indication of the public's need for the facts. It will be interesting to follow the tobacco industry's response to the invitation of the Federal Trade Commission to cooperate in developing uniform specifications for testing cigarette smoke for tars and nicotine "to end confusion arising from widely varying tests conducted privately by the companies."

Most scientists closest to the total evidence now agree that cigarette smoking is a highly significant cause in the majority of cases of lung cancer.

The immediate duty of the physician, of the educator, of the parent, and of the governmental and voluntary health agencies is obvious—a concerted educational attack that will rout the formidable force executing the delaying action and speed its spokesman on his prophesied, inevitable, penitential "trip to Canossa."

[From the Christian Science Monitor, Jan. 7, 1960]

TOBACCO PROPAGANDA

What is ethical advertising? Certainly it is not the kind practiced by much of the American tobacco industry. Through misleading claims, campaigns to encourage teenage smokers, and attacks on warnings about tobacco, the industry is out to sell cigarettes, no matter what.

In appeal to the teenager and beginning smoker half a dozen companies each claim their brand to be lowest in tar and nicotine. In the meantime the industry's public relations organization, Tobacco Institute, Inc., seeking to meet anticigarette campaigns in the schools, has boosted its budget this year for protobacco propaganda in counterattack.

Picturing smoking as a necessary activity "of the good American way of life," the industry tries to make all nonsmokers and opponents of smoking appear as killjoys. It seeks to create a picture of "a strong, sadistic bluenose element that is forever puritanically dead set against anyone else's taking an innocent enjoyment or pleasure in anything-at-all."

Added to the danger in the tobacco industry's effort to educate the teenager to smoke is its additional attempt to bar from the public information unfavorable to cigarettes. Consumer Reports, quoting Advertising Age, tells of one incident where "serious complaints from cigarette advertisers" forced the removal of an advertisement of the Reader's Digest from New York commuter trains. (The Digest has been prominent in reporting factual studies of cigarettes.)

A New York Times report quotes an advertising executive: "If I think that some anticigarette copy would make (major cigarette advertisers) unhappy with me, I have to think twice about accepting it."

Such tactics violate basic American concepts of freedom. The Federal Trade Commission is beginning to move against misleading tobacco advertising. It should also tackle coercive use of tobacco money-power to suppress advertising. And every group devoted to the public welfare should become aroused to resist more militantly both subtle and blatant aggressions by the tobacco pushers.

CONSERVATION OF NATURAL RESOURCES

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. President, the history of the United States emphasizes the fact that as our population increases so does the need to conserve our natural resources.

National awareness of this fact has been aroused in several ways dating back to colonial days, but especially to the administration of President Theodore Roosevelt and the great work of Gifford Pinchot and others.

If a need existed sufficient to inspire those great men and citizens of that era, even greater need exists today. The burden of tomorrow's conservation will rest, as it always does, upon today's children.

Thus, schoolwork directed toward that objective should receive appropriate attention, and I am convinced that it does in a majority of our public schools.

Occasionally, however, a group of students exhibits unusual interest in conservation and produces an outstanding school conservation project or exhibit.

I have just received such a piece of work from the McCoy Elementary School at Aztec, N. Mex., the county seat of San Juan County, one of the Nation's richest in undeveloped natural resources.

Guided by Curn C. Harvey, the students of that school published a special edition of their school publication, the Aztec Siren, and attracted guest articles by Interior Secretary Fred Seaton and Mr. Marshall D. Dana, first president of the National Reclamation Association. A number of other writers on conservation also contributed.

I wish it were possible for all Senators to examine the work these children performed. The artwork, the text, the several colors, the time devoted to this special editor of the Siren are of a nature to make all Americans proud.

Recognizing limitations upon insertions into the RECORD, I am not going to ask that the text of this publication be reproduced here. The artwork and the colors would not appear and they are an essential part of this special edition.

However, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a portion of a letter I have received from Mr. Harvey, in which he describes the enthusiasm the project aroused in the Aztec students, be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the excerpts were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

I am sending you a copy of our special edition of the Aztec Siren because I know that it deals with a subject close to your heart—conservation of natural resources. And I also know that it is a problem of vital concern to the Congress of the United States.

This special edition grew out of an interest of the school boys and girls and their parents. As you know, the entire economy of New Mexico and especially of sections such as San Juan County is entirely dependent upon wise use of resources. In studying the topic, we found many instances in which New Mexico has led the way in the wise use of natural resources.

You will note that the date on this special edition is January 1960. It will be released at the end of the second week in January when we present an assembly program on conservation. The reason the paper is finished so long in advance is that once the boys and girls dug into the subject they became so absorbed in it that there was no stopping them. Talk about a good science project, study of our natural resources and how they should be used positively can't be beat.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, is morning business concluded?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there further morning business? If not, morning business is concluded.

DEPRESSED AREAS

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, in the first session of this Congress the Senate approved a bill dealing with depressed areas. The bill contained roughy $389 million in grants and loans, and is presently pending in the House of Representatives.

A great deal has been said about depressed areas, and I caught the overtones of some remarks on the Senate floor yesterday. In that connection I should like to have printed in the RECORD an editorial which comes from the Marion Daily Republican in southern Illinois, in the very heart of what is alleged to be the depressed area in our State.

This enterprising newspaper undertook to query six banks in six different communities in this one county and, lo and behold, notwithstanding the tag of "depressed area," the bank deposits in those six banks since last year have increased $3.9 million and total assets have increased by $4.3 million. That very properly inspires the question, Mr. President, how does one raise bank deposits in six small country banks, so to speak, by $3.9 million in a single year if the area is depressed?

So I ask unanimous consent to have the editorial printed in the RECORD, along with my observations.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THIS TERRIBLE "DEPRESSED AREA"(?)

Senator DOUGLAS and Congressman KENNETH GRAY, both Democrats and both candidates for reelection, have been telling the world that we live in a "depressed area" with terrible unemployment problems.

An examination of the deposits of the six banks in Williamson County will give the lie to such reports. In 1 year—just 12 months—the deposits of the six county banks have grown by $3,949,298.49.

The total assets have grown in the same 12 months from $33,558,090.54 to $37,891,146.04, or a total of $4,333,055.50. These are not figures taken from thin air, but taken from their reports to the State banking examiners. They can be verified and are as follows:

	Deposits	Total assets	Deposits	Total assets	Increase in assets
The Bank of Marion	$9,937,692.13	$11,443,891.13	$9,463,058.52	$10,828,672.55	$615,218.58
Bank of Egypt	4,297,273.29	4,720,880.00	3,731,897.90	4,096,130.82	624,749.18
Carterville State & Savings Bank	2,851,774.06	3,222,893.29	2,555,009.74	2,891,291.23	331,602.16
Johnston City State Bank	2,322,406.83	2,514,519.46	2,201,491.28	2,376,681.46	137,838.00
The Bank of Herrin	11,268,464.91	12,345,511.84	9,572,898.08	10,554,019.93	1,891,491.91
Herrin Security Bank	3,371,762.33	3,643,450.32	2,575,719.54	2,811,294.55	832,155.77
Total	34,049,373.55	37,891,146.04	30,100,075.06	33,558,090.54	4,333,055.50
Increase in total deposits in 1 year					3,949,298.49
Increase in total assets in 1 year					4,333,055.50

Senator DOUGLAS and Congressman GRAY will you now please put away your vote-getting campaign by telling the world we are depressed and have thousands of unemployed? You cannot live in a depressed community and have your bank assets grow $4⅓ million in 1 year.

The Chicago Tribune, in speaking of Senator DOUGLAS' efforts to damage the economy of southern Illinois through calling us depressed said "he will change his tune as soon as he discovers southern Illinois resents his efforts to make it a community of beggars."

INVITATIONS SENT OUT FOR THE 1964 NEW YORK WORLD'S FAIR

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, I am delighted to announce this morning that yesterday the Secretary of State, in the name of the President of the United States, sent to the Ambassadors of all foreign nations represented in this country an invitation to participate in the 1964 New York World's Fair.

The invitation keynotes the theme of the fair, "Peace through understanding," and outlines the process whereby New York City was recommended by the Presidential Commission on a World Fair. The Commisison's report and recommendations were accepted by the President on October 29, 1959. Secretary Herter's invitation quoted from this report and cited the great and mounting enthusiasm in this country for a dynamic and far-reaching cultural, economic, and scientific expression of America's stature in the world of 1964.

Mr. President, I am confident that the 1964 fair will inspire a full and free sharing of ideas among all the nations of the world. I am extremely proud that New York City, as the home of the United Nations, and a great trade and cultural center, has been selected for this high honor.

The 1964 World's Fair is a long way off. The die has now been cast with the sending out of invitations to the nations of the world. I am hopeful that participation of foreign nations in this fair will be extensive. I am hopeful that the newly independent nations of the world will take this opportunity to show us their accomplishments and tell us of their objectives. I am hopeful, too, that the nations of Europe and of the Soviet bloc will come forth to affirm their desire for increased international understanding and cooperation in all fields of endeavor.

Mr. President, I salute all of the men and women of the great city of New York who have worked long and hard for the 1964 World's Fair. Their job is by no means over. It is just beginning. The Secretary's invitation marks a beginning and a challenge—a challenge to fulfill the aims of all of us for a most successful and worthwhile American World's Fair in 1964.

Mr. President, I ask at this time that a sample copy of the invitation to foreign governments to participate in the New York 1964 World's Fair be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the copy of the invitation was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The Secretary of State presents his compliments to Their Excellencies and Messieurs the Chiefs of Mission and has the honor to transmit from the Honorable Robert F. Wagner, mayor of the city of New York, an invitation to take an active part in the 1964 World's Fair to be held at New York, N.Y., in that year in celebration of the tercentenary anniversary of the city of New York, and to encourage and assist their commercial, industrial, trade, educational, artistic, and other cultural groups to participate in this fair.

The 1964 World's Fair at New York has adopted as its theme, "Peace Through Understanding," and is sponsored as an event of primary international significance. Although held under private auspices, it enjoys the support and cooperation of the governments of the State of New York and the city of New York, as well as prominent business, civic, industrial, trade, and labor organizations having national and international ties of great importance.

The selection of the city of New York as the location for the 1964 World's Fair was recommended by a Presidential Commission in a report approved by the President of the United States of America on October 29, 1959. This report included the following statements:

"In recent years the United States, through all levels of our public and private life, has participated in many great fairs in various parts of the world. * * * A world's fair in an American city would typify our continuing efforts to cooperate with other peoples in peaceful pursuits of mutual benefit. It would provide a fitting occasion to welcome to our country visitors and participants from all over the world to mingle with our people in an atmosphere of good will and cultural enjoyment. It would encourage constructive trade and competition and contribute to economic development and the cause of peace.

"We recommend that this exposition should be held in New York during 1964. We believe that New York, as a symbol of freedom to millions of immigrants and others, * * * and as one of the world's outstanding centers of culture, finance, trade, and industry fully measures up to the highest standards for the holding of such a fair. * * * New York, of all American cities, is the best qualified to accomplish the monumental effort required."

For these reasons, and also because 1964 will mark the 15th anniversary of New York as the permanent home of the United Nations, the Department of State favors the holding of such an important international exposition and hopes that as many nations as possible will be represented at the 1964 World's Fair at New York.

The General Regulations of the New York World's Fair will be made available at the earliest opportunity. Correspondence and inquiries concerning the New York World's Fair should be addressed to the New York World's Fair 1964 Corp., Empire State Building, New York 1, N.Y.

The Secretary of State takes pleasure in bringing to your attention the recommendation of Dwight D. Eisenhower, President of the United States of America, that there be maximum participation by foreign nations and their nationals in the 1964 World's Fair to be programed and executed by the city of New York and would be grateful if each Chief of Mission would forward this information to his government.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE.
WASHINGTON, January 21, 1960.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, I also ask that a copy of the letter from Mayor Robert F. Wagner of New York City, accompanying the Secretary's invitation, be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NOVEMBER 19, 1959.

DEAR MR. AMBASSADOR: I have the honor to extend to your government a formal invitation to participate in a World's Fair to be held in the city of New York to celebrate its tercentenary anniversary in the year 1964.

The holding of this fair has been approved by the President of the United States on the recommendation of a Special Presidential Commission appointed by him which, under date of October 29, 1959, recommended to the President of the United States that the holding of an international exposition of the first category in the city of New York in 1964 should be supported by the Federal Government and which Commission further recommended that "New York City, of all American cities, is best qualified to accomplish the monumental effort required."

The President of the United States also approved the recommendations of the Presidential Commission to assist in obtaining maximum participation by foreign nations in the New York City 1964 World's Fair.

I would like to express our sincere wish that the commercial, industrial, and trade organizations in your country might also exhibit at the 1964 New York World's Fair and that your Government will assist them in arranging for their participation.

This 1964 New York World's Fair has taken for its theme, the significant words, "Peace Through Understanding" and it is our hope that the exhibitors, both governmental and private, will demonstrate to the millions of visitors to the fair, the interdependence of all nations and people to the end that through this 1964 New York World's Fair, all who visit it will carry away with them a deeper understanding of each of the nations of the world—an understanding that will help to promote that peace sought by all peoples everywhere.

The occasion for this fair, our tercentenary anniversary, enables me to call to your attention the close ties between New York City and the nations of the world. In these 300 years, through our city have come millions of immigrants, who have brought to this Nation the culture and national backgrounds of every nation on earth. These immigrants, by their later citizenship in the United States have created ties with all nations that have and will ever be a major influence in the mutual good will between our great country and yours. Our great city has been the host to the leaders of other nations, and time and time again has, we hope, supplied living proof that peoples of many national origins, race, color, and creed can live together in peace and harmony.

I believe that the 1964 New York World's Fair to be held in honor of this anniversary will truly be an event of international importance. In 1964, it will have been 25 years since last the nations of the world met in our city to exchange cultural, commercial, and industrial ideas. Then we called that World Fair, "The World of Tomorrow." When one considers the strides that have been made since that time, the new discoveries and industries that were then undreamed of—atomic power, television, cybernetics—it is not difficult to picture the wonders that this 1964 New York World's Fair will reveal.

The city of New York is, I believe, a most desirable place for the holding of this world's fair. The site of the previous fair held in the United States in the year 1939 is admirably adapted and has been made available for the 1964 New York World's Fair. This location, at Flushing Meadow, was originally prepared at a cost in excess of $26 million—and has been preserved as a park during the years since 1939. In addition, since the establishment of the United Nations Headquarters in New York City, our city has become increasingly important in international affairs; and is, we hope you will agree, the leading center of trade and commerce in the world today. It is the largest city on this continent and possesses more facilities for housing, transporting, feeding and entertaining visitors than any other city in the United States.

This fair has the full support of all segments of business, industry, and culture of the city and State and the Governor of the State of New York, the Honorable Nelson A. Rockefeller, has pledged the full support of the State of New York to this exposition and has joined in our request that the Federal Government transmit this invitation to your Government.

Detailed information about the 1964 New York World's Fair will be communicated to you by the fair's management.

Most respectfully,

ROBERT F. WAGNER,
Mayor.

RECENT EVENTS IN CUBA

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, recent events in Cuba are cause for concern of all people who are interested in the progress, cooperation, and strength of the Western Hemisphere. It appears that Premier Castro's personal vendetta against the world and particularly his anti-American policies have reached the point of no return.

Historically, a bridge of friendship has always joined Cuba with the U.S. mainland. It is not our wish to have that bridge disappear and to see Cuba emerge as an aircraft carrier off our shores, operating as enemy rather than friend, and menacing the peace and the solidarity of the Western Hemisphere. Furthermore, the wholly arbitrary acts of the Castro government in its assumption of rights to control of American-owned lands and businesses constitute an affront both to established treaties and contracts and to the dignity of the United States.

In my view, it is high time for a massive reappraisal of American policies toward Cuba. Admittedly, this is a thorny task, involving as it does intertwining economic interests and close bonds of friendship between the two countries.

The present emergency suggests strongly the need for warranted counter action in the form of legislation giving the President the authority to revise the terms and conditions of the Sugar Act in such a manner as to bring home to the Castro regime the economic facts of life that bear heavily upon the stability of the Cuban Government.

Furthermore, the state of affairs in Cuba remains not only a threat to our national interests, but also a source of concern with respect to the broad international interests of the Americas. Cuba, in its present posture of enmity and defiance, stands as a cloud on ill omen that may well spread its pernicious influence into other Latin-American nations. This situation raises the question as to whether the times may not already be here to make a critical appraisal of the need for a reevaluation of the Monroe Doctrine, and a possible rewriting of it in terms of threats to hemispheric defense and solidarity from within. The cancer of communism must not be allowed to grow in this hemisphere. The overthrow of Dictator Batista was hailed by all as a triumph of democratic forces in Cuba. It now becomes apparent that the so-called revolution is merely a reorientation of dictatorships, with consequences perhaps even more menacing, even more far reaching.

If Premier Castro insists on being the Pecks bad boy of international politics, the pressure of the world community—either through the good offices of the U.S. Government, the Organization of American States, or the United Nations, must be brought to bear on him. Immature and misguided acts by a dictator basking in the self-delusion of his own infallibility should not be allowed to interfere with the harmony and friendly relations of all our neighbors of the Western Hemisphere.

It is my fervent hope that the course of events may transform Cuba into the land it has been, the land its citizens surely want it to be: the home of a free people, the home of a traditional friend and neighbor of the United States.

THE ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND POLITICAL PSYCHOLOGY OF THE AMERICAN PEOPLE

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, first let me say that in all my experience in this body this is the first time I have ever seen the majority leader or acting majority leader presiding over the Senate. I congratulate the acting majority leader [Mr. MANSFIELD] upon his rise to such eminent heights. I hope we shall not take undue advantage of him while he is in a position in which he cannot talk for the next few minutes. [Laughter.]

This morning, in the New York Times dated Friday, January 22, there is an article by Mr. Arthur Krock, on the editorial page, which I believe is one of the most objective and realistic articles I have seen on the problems which face us from the psychological point of view, and from the point of view of the people of our country as a whole.

The article is critical of the administration in one sense, and it is critical of the party of which the majority leader is a member in another sense. But essentially it points out the fact that underlying the entire picture is the psychology of the American people. To change that psychology, if it is necessary to change it, becomes the responsibility of all parties—the President's party as well as the Democratic Party.

I ask unanimous consent to have the article by Mr. Krock printed in the body of the RECORD at this point as a part of my remarks, because I feel that it is exceedingly important.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A TRUE BILL THAT NEEDS TO BE BROADENED
(By Arthur Krock)

WASHINGTON, January 21.—There is sound basis for the criticism that the President's messages to Congress this year stress the production of private possessions, which could be spared, over national needs, which must be supplied if the United States is to attain and keep the power level required to effect its proclaimed objectives and the security of its system. But the indictment will have to be broadened to include all those responsible, if a sense of urgency is to replace the Nation's sybaritic psychology.

To point out that the President and his administration alone cannot change this economic, social and political psychology of the American people is not to excuse or condone their boast of its material products. The same would be true if the Republican Party alined itself solidly behind such an effort at correction. Unless the principal leaders of the Democratic Party, their political allies among the special interest pressure groups, and the financiers, manufacturers, and entrepreneurs of private luxury goods fully cooperate to this end with a President, Republican or Democrat, the productive emphasis of the Nation on private possessions will continue until reversed by a bitter common experience of disaster. And where is the public man who reveals the courage to make the demand on all those responsible, and specify the exactions they would have to fulfill?

If, for example, the national revenues are to produce the additional funds required for better education, closer competition with Soviet Russia in missiles and so on, higher taxes must immediately be levied. But how many politicians, labor leaders, and spokesmen of special interest groups are urging this on an adequate scale in this year of a presidential election? If taxes are to be increased sufficient to these vital purposes, which of these groups is also demanding that the tax structure be at the same time made equitable so that the drain of greater levies will not be imposed on those already taxed toward the point of confiscation and penalized for ability and success?

Prolonged strikes in essential industry, in pursuit of an ever-ascending wage scale beyond a compensating rise in productivity, are a constant threat to any form of the economy, however it may be downgraded from consumer goods production. But neither this Republican administration nor the Democratic Party—certainly no labor leader—has ventured to champion any effective curbs on the monopoly power of organized labor and sustains the threat.

Many who criticize the administration for its concept of prosperity as primarily a rising flow of consumer goods are advocates of a planned economy. Inevitably politicians employ this system to dispense the larger earnings of one community to pay for the better education, and so forth, in others which learned under the New Deal that Washington could be relied on to subsidize local neglect of private and public obligations. But these particular critics, precisely like the special-interest blocs, refuse to accept the lesson of experience that the President could not achieve the benefits of the changed psychology they are urging except under the free enterprise system for which they would substitute a form of collectivism.

This would be the substitute, because these advocates of a planned economy, like the others who lay all the blame on the administration for its concept of prosperity and security, are urging that Federal funds be supplied for the better local education, slum clearance and the rest, which are being subordinated to consumer-goods production. And the teaching of human experience is that with the growth of Federal financing of local obligations Central Government direction grows in direct proportion.

One fundamental cause of the suffusion of the economy with luxury goods is the artificial stimulation of consumption by high-pressure advertising and easy installment buying. But, when this has the inevitable result of individual debt and default, the political community demands lower interest rates and easier money. And, since to reduce both sources of lopsided production would mean at least temporary unemployment, the leaders of labor become the principal champions of artificial stimulations.

The administration certainly has followed the trend toward more and more consumer production of articles in a time when the trend should be reversed. But the same indictment can be made of its political opposition and pressure-group allies.

INDUSTRIAL PERSONNEL SECURITY PROGRAM

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. President, on June 30, 1959, the Supreme Court in its decision in Greene against McElroy struck down the industrial personnel security program on the ground that neither the President nor Congress had authorized the Secretary of Defense to deprive a person of his job in a proceeding in which he was not afforded the safeguards of confrontation and cross-examination of his accusers. In presenting the opinion of the Court, Chief Justice Warren said, in part:

> Certain principles have remained relatively immutable in our jurisprudence. One of these is that where governmental action seriously injures an individual, and the reasonableness of the action depends on factfindings, the evidence used to prove the Government's case must be disclosed to the individual so that he has an opportunity to show that it is untrue. While this is important in the case of documentary evidence, it is even more important where the evidence consists of the testimony of individuals whose memory might be faulty or who, in fact, might be perjurers or persons motivated by malice, vindictiveness, intolerance, prejudice, or jealousy. We have formalized these protections in the requirements of confrontation and cross-examination. They have ancient roots. They find expression in the sixth amendment which provides that in all criminal cases the accused shall enjoy the right to be confronted with the witnesses against him.
> This Court has been zealous to protect these rights from erosion. It has spoken out not only in criminal cases, but also in all types of cases where administrative and regulatory actions were under scrutiny. Nor, as it has been pointed out, has Congress ignored these fundamental requirements in enacting regulatory legislation.

On the day of the Court's decision, as chairman of the Subcommittee on Constitutional Rights, I scheduled hearings to consider methods which would assure due process of law and fair hearing procedures in loyalty-security programs, including the industrial personnel security program. An invitation was extended to the Secretary of Defense and to the Attorney General to appear before the subcommittee and present their views.

The subcommittee heard two witnesses on July 7, 1959, and expected to continue with the hearing of testimony from the Secretary of Defense and the Attorney General. The Attorney General declined the invitation in a reply which suggested that the problem was primarily that of the Department of Defense. The Secretary of Defense also declined an appearance until the matter could be given further study and the position of the executive branch established. The letter concluded with the statement that—

> Upon the establishment of an executive branch position I shall communicate with you further.

Since that time there have been several reports in the newspapers that the industrial security program would be dealt with through an Executive order. I have had additional correspondence with the Secretary of Defense regarding these reports, and on September 22, 1959, received the assurance from the Department's General Counsel, J. Vincent Burke, Jr., that—

> You may be sure that upon the establishment of an executive branch position we will communicate with you further.

A few days ago another such report of an impending Executive order reestablishing the industrial personnel security program, appeared in the New York Times of January 17, 1960. This news story, written by Anthony Lewis, spells out in considerable detail the provisions of the Executive order which is expected to be issued within the next few weeks.

My reason for calling this matter to the attention of the Senate at this time is that though the administration has apparently arrived at a well-developed position on the industrial personnel security program, it has not informed the Senate Subcommittee on Constitutional Rights, though such information was assured in a letter signed by the present Secretary of Defense and again in a letter from the Department's General Counsel.

There is of course no obligation on the executive branch to consult with the Senate on the issuance of an Executive order. However, should the Senate wish to consider legislation on an industrial security program it is entitled to an opinion from the executive agency—in this case the Department of Defense—which might be designated to administer the program.

There is a further matter of concern. While the Supreme Court did not rule on the constitutionality of a program which denied full confrontation and an opportunity to cross-examine accusing parties, the language of the opinion indicated clearly that should such procedures be reinstated by Executive order or by statute, the Court would apparently not hesitate to rule on the constitutional question. Justice Clark, the single dissenter in the Greene case, observed in his opinion:

> While the Court disclaims deciding this constitutional question, no one reading the opinion will doubt that the explicit language of its broad sweep speaks in prophecy.

The proposed Executive order reported to be in circulation in several executive departments apparently provides exceptions to the rule of full confrontation. One exception applies to regularly established confidential informants. Another applies to casual informants—neighbors, acquaintances, the corner grocery clerk, and similar persons who have no connection whatever with our intelligence agencies or the FBI. According to the news report, the head of a department or his "special designee" could rule that statements from such casual informants could be accepted as evidence without the charged person being given an opportunity to confront and cross-examine his accuser. Exceptions to the rule of confrontation could be made administratively on such vague grounds as "good and sufficient cause."

The Subcommittee on Constitutional Rights began its operations in 1955 and first concerned itself with the administration of the loyalty-security program as it related to constitutional rights. A number of the cases heard were subsequently adjudicated by the courts and serve to illustrate the dangers of administrative procedures which are vaguely defined and careless of the safeguards of constitutional law.

If the executive branch proposes to deal with the industrial personnel security program administratively, it will do well to avoid its earlier mistakes and to heed the admonition of the Court in the Greene case which makes this action necessary. The Court stated:

> Without explicit action by lawmakers, decisions of great constitutional import and effect would be relegated by default to administrators who, under our system of government, are not endowed with authority to decide them.

It would indeed be unfortunate if the executive branch should institute a new program which invited a new round of litigation in which the Supreme Court would be required to finally resolve the constitutional issue.

I have written the Secretary of Defense again requesting that he appear before the Subcommittee on Constitutional Rights to present the position of the executive branch on this serious problem. I sincerely hope that he will accept the invitation and that we may look forward to a program which promotes the national security and also safeguards our cherished constitutional liberties.

Mr. President, I invite attention to well-written articles discussing these problems, "The Right of Confrontation," by Robert B. McKay, professor of law,

New York University, published in the Washington University Law Quarterly, volume 1959, No. 2; and "Nonconfrontation in Security Cases: The Greene Decision," by Joseph L. Rauh, Jr., attorney in some of these cases, published in the Virginia Law Review, 1959, volume 45, No. 7.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to include as a part of my remarks at this place in the RECORD the article above referred to by Anthony Lewis, printed in the January 17, 1960, New York Times; New York Times editorial published the following day; article by Peter Kihss entitled "Hearing Is Urged on Security Code—Workers Defense Unit Also Asks That Judges Rule on Denials of Confrontation," published in the New York Times January 18, 1960; editorial entitled "No Place for a Detour," published in the St. Louis (Mo.) Post-Dispatch, January 20, 1960; and an exchange of correspondence on the subject between the Senate Constitutional Rights Subcommittee and the Departments of Defense and Justice, from January 30, 1959, through January 21, 1960.

There being no objection, the articles, editorials, and correspondence were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Times, Jan. 17, 1960]

DEFENSE WORKERS TO GET NEW RIGHT IN SECURITY CASES—ADMINISTRATION STUDIES DRAFT OF AN EXECUTIVE ORDER ON CONFRONTING ACCUSERS

(By Anthony Lewis)

WASHINGTON, January 16.—The administration will soon set up a new industrial security program making significant concessions to the principle that suspects should be able to confront their accusers.

The existing program, covering defense plant workers, was struck down by the Supreme Court last June 29. The Court held that neither Congress nor the President had authorized a system in which informants' names were kept secret.

Administration lawyers have been struggling since then to write an Executive order that would satisfy the Court's demand for fair procedures—and at the same time satisfy investigative agencies' fears about disclosure of their secrets.

The White House is now circulating a draft order among interested agencies—the Defense, Justice and State Departments, Atomic Energy Commission, and National Aeronautics and Space Administration.

ORDER EXPECTED SOON

President Eisenhower is likely to issue the order within a few weeks.

The draft order makes it the general rule that anyone charged under the industrial security program shall have the right to cross-examine any source of information against him. Two specific exceptions are made to the general assumption.

First, the name of a genuine confidential informant—such as a Federal Bureau of Investigation informant inside the Communist Party—may be withheld from the accused individual under certain circumstances.

The head of the department supplying the information would personally have to certify that the source is a confidential informant who has been engaged in obtaining intelligence information for the Government, and that to disclose his identity would be substantially harmful to the national interest.

ATTORNEY GENERAL'S ROLE

If an FBI report were involved, for example, such a certification would have to be made by the head of the Justice Department, the Attorney General. No department head would be allowed to delegate this job of certifying genuine confidential informants.

Second, provision is made for the use in special circumstances of statements made by so-called casual informants, such as neighbors of the accused individual, without their being available for cross-examination.

The head of the department handling the security case, or his "special designee," would have to determine that such a source of information could not appear in person because of "death, severe illness, or some other good and sufficient cause."

Further, there would have to be a determination that failure to receive the statement from this casual informant would be "substantially harmful to the national security."

Finally, in any case where cross-examination of a casual informant was denied, only the head of the department involved could make a final decision to deny the accused man security clearance. And the department head would be required to consider, in deciding the case, the suspect's lack of opportunity to cross-examine all witnesses.

A number of lawyers within the Government regard those two exceptions as too broad—especially the power to keep casual informants secret for an undefined "good and sufficient cause." Other provisions of the draft order are being criticized as too open to unfair administration.

Nevertheless, the whole approach of the draft is a sharp change in what has been the consistent policy of all Government security programs over the last dozen years.

The presumption has been that the accused individual had no right to know his accusers' names or cross-examine them. Security officials have had no obligation to come forward with live witnesses; in many hearings the Government has produced no witnesses, relying wholly on undisclosed statements.

Under the proposed new industrial security program, the situation would be psychologically reversed.

The presumption would be that the hearing board or official making the decision would see and hear only what the accused individual sees and hears—as in a judicial trial. The burden would be on security officials to show some special reason for changing that presumption.

The draft, as now written, does not contain a flat statement of this presumption—that decisions shall be based on the open hearing record, with the specific exceptions provided. Some lawyers considering the proposal feel strongly that it should have such a statement of policy.

Another section of the proposed Executive order that has given rise to some confusion and concern deals with the use of classified documents in security proceedings. Though it does not say so, investigative reports may be included.

The draft says that the head of the department concerned, or his special designee, may permit the use of such documents without the accused individual's seeing them if they are relevant and if failure to admit them would be substantially harmful to the national security.

Furthermore, the accused is to be given a summary of the document as complete as security considerations permit. And if such a document is admitted, only the department head itself could make a final decision against the individual security clearance.

What confuses and concerns the critics of this provision is the thought that it may be inconsistent with the two relatively carefully defined exceptions allowing the use of informants' statements without cross-examination.

If a hearing board is given carte blanche to see the complete investigative report on an individual, it will undoubtedly read a number of unidentified adverse comments on him. The critics feel that the drafters of the new program did not intend such a result but that they should make their intention clearer.

The draft order would retain the present standard that clearance may be given only when clearly consistent with the national security.

THREE MILLION FIVE HUNDRED THOUSAND CLEARED

About 3,500,000 defense-plant workers have been cleared to date under the industrial security program. The number denied clearance has been running as a tiny fraction of those cleared.

In the year 1958, for example, 49 persons were denied clearance after formal hearings. Forty-three dropped their application for clearance after receiving a statement of charges.

The Defense Department has a central screening board here that decides whether to bring formal charges against anyone. Since the Supreme Court's decision last June, cases have kept coming into the board.

The screening board has cleared all persons as to whom adverse information did not justify formal charges. It has had about 100 cases in which it thought charges should be filed, but it has done nothing about those pending new legal authority for the program.

About 100 persons have been left in limbo as a result. A man may have applied for clearance last July, for example, and not received any answer. All these cases will presumably be acted upon as soon as the President issues the new Executive order.

THE RIGHT OF CONFRONTATION

The sixth amendment states that "In all criminal prosecutions the accused shall enjoy the right * * * to be confronted with the witnesses against him." Proceedings under the so-called industrial security program, involving some 3½ million defense workers, are not criminal prosecutions, yet under them an accused or suspected person may lose his job and his reputation. The Supreme Court dealt with this issue last June, but confined itself to the decision that neither Congress nor President had authorized industrial security proceedings lacking the constitutional safeguard.

As Anthony Lewis reported to this newspaper yesterday, the administration is now trying to draft an Executive order that will meet the situation this created. This order would make "significant concessions to the principle that suspects should be able to confront their accusers." There are, however, disquieting exceptions. It is proposed that the names of confidential informants—a term which seems to include gossiping neighbors as well as authorized FBI agents—may be withheld if a designated official thinks it would be "substantially harmful to the national interest" to disclose them.

The proposed Executive order is still apparently in the formative stage. Those who are mulling it over may well ask themselves which is the more important to our security: the eternal rights and liberties that characterize a free country or the convenience of a few transient officials.

[From the New York Times, Jan. 18, 1960]

HEARING IS URGED ON SECURITY CODE—WORKERS DEFENSE UNIT ALSO ASKS THAT JUDGES RULE ON DENIALS OF CONFRONTATION

(By Peter Kihss)

President Eisenhower was urged yesterday to provide for public hearings on new regulations for the industrial security program before an Executive order is formally promulgated. The program covers perhaps 3 million defense plant workers.

The Workers Defense League here also proposed that a Federal judge rule on each case in which an accused was denied the right to confront a witness or examine a document.

Under a reported new Government plan, a department head would certify any denial of confrontation as substantially harmful to the national interest or security.

SEES "SERIOUS EFFORT"

In asking for hearings, the 24-year-old legal aid group said the draft of the new program, as reported in the New York Times yesterday, appears to be a serious effort to comply with the spirit as well as the language of the Supreme Court decision, which last June struck down an earlier program.

The Court held that neither the President nor Congress had authorized a denial of confrontation.

In a letter, Vera Rony, national secretary, and Carl Rachlin, general counsel, said the league had long been active in the security field, and was devoted both to constitutional safeguards of due process and the requirements of national security.

The league proposal would have a judge, on application of an accused, decide whether confrontation or examination of a document would be injurious to the national interest.

"In the event that the judge ruled that no such damage would follow," they went on, "the Government would either permit confrontation or withdraw its complaint. If, alternatively, the judge rules that the Government is justified in denying confrontation, the hearing would proceed in its normal course."

They compared this with examination before trial in civil lawsuits. Its value, they said, would be that the decision on confrontation "would be taken out of the hands of Government officials whose complete objectivity may be open to question."

In a separate comment, Stanley Faulkner, of 9 East 40th Street, who estimated he had been counsel in more than 100 security risk cases under various programs, said the reported new program falls far short.

The sources of evidence, Mr. Faulkner said, should be made available to an accused. He declared that security to our country is not achieved by protecting informants from cross-examination, and under such protection depriving people of their constitutional rights.

[From the St. Louis (Mo.) Post-Dispatch, Jan. 20, 1960]

NO PLACE FOR A DETOUR

The U.S. Constitution says that "in all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall be confronted with the witnesses against him." This right to confrontation was a factor in the case of the $18,000-a-year Maryland industrialist, William Lewis Greene, who was discharged from his executive position by his company after his security clearance was removed by the Defense Department. His company was engaged almost solely in Navy contract work. Greene took his case to the Supreme Court where he won, 8 to 1, last June. Chief Justice Warren, speaking for the majority, said that neither Congress by statute nor the President by Executive order had authorized the Defense Department's procedure of withholding a man's accusers yet at the same time depriving him of his employment.

Now comes word that the administration is preparing an Executive order, in which the Justice and Defense Departments and all other interested agencies would join, to cover such cases as the Greene case. Presumably in some form it would seek to preserve the power to invoke security procedures without permitting the accused to confront his accusers.

We hope Attorney General Rogers will be very sure of each step he takes in this matter. There is not the slightest showing, so far as we have seen, that the Greene decision has placed the national security in jeopardy. If the handling of defense contracts has been embarrassed, that has not been demonstrated either.

Let us not forget the words of Chief Justice Warren in the Greene decision. Declaring that "certain principles remain relatively immutable in our jurisprudence," he said that one of these is that "where governmental action seriously injures an individual, and the reasonableness of the action depends on factfindings, the evidence used to provide the Government's case must be disclosed to the individual so he has an opportunity to show that it is untrue. While this is important in documentary evidence, it is even more important where the evidence consists of the testimony of individuals whose memory might be faulty or who, in fact might be perjurers or persons motivated by malice, vindictiveness, intolerance, prejudice, or jealousy. We have formalized these protections in the requirements of confrontation and cross-examination."

If any attack is to be made on the Greene decision, let it be straightforward, with full opportunity for congressional and public debate. A tricky order would look mighty small when set beside the Supreme Court's sound and wholly reasonable Greene decision.

The Pentagon, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: The attached news article by Anthony Lewis, from the January 17, 1960, New York Times, reporting that an Executive order reestablishing the industrial personnel security program will soon be issued, has just come to my attention. It has been my understanding from earlier correspondence with the Secretary of Defense that such action would not be taken before the Secretary's views had been given to the Senate Subcommittee on Constitutional Rights.

On June 30, 1959, I extended an invitation to your predecessor, the Honorable Neil H. McElroy, to appear before the Subcommittee on Constitutional Rights to present the Secretary's views on methods of obtaining due process of law in hearing procedures under the industrial personnel security program, in keeping with the decision of the Supreme Court in the Greene case which invalidated that program.

The invitation was declined in a communication signed by yourself, dated July 10, 1959, suggesting that further study of the problem was needed before a position of the executive branch could be established. On that occasion you stated: "Upon the establishment of an executive branch position, I shall communicate with you further regarding such an appearance."

In subsequent correspondence, prompted by other reports in the newspapers that an Executive order reestablishing the industrial security program was imminent, this commitment to inform the subcommittee of the executive branch position was repeated.

The subcommittee would still like to hear the Secretary of Defense on this matter before an Executive order is issued. I am sure that a mutually convenient date can be arranged. Considering the grave constitutional issues involved in this matter, which are of profound interest to the Congress as well as the executive branch, I sincerely hope that you will accept this invitation to appear before the Senate Subcommittee on Constitutional Rights.

I would appreciate hearing from you at your earliest convenience.

Sincerely,

THOMAS C. HENNINGS, Jr.,
Chairman.

GENERAL COUNSEL OF THE
DEPARTMENT OF DEFENSE,
Washington, D.C., October 30, 1959.

Mr. CHARLES H. SLAYMAN, Jr.,
Chief Counsel and Staff Director,
Subcommittee on Constitutional Rights,
Committee on the Judiciary,
U.S. Senate.

DEAR MR. SLAYMAN: This refers to your letter of October 26, 1959, with respect to action to be taken by the Government as a result of the Supreme Court's decision in the Greene case. I have reviewed the previous correspondence between the subcommittee and the Department of Defense and I believe it has been indicated that the executive branch as a whole has had under consideration since the issuance of that decision appropriate action to bring the industrial security program into consonance with the decision of the Court.

Both the possible issuance of an Executive order and the submission of proposed legislation to the Congress have been under consideration, but no final decision with respect to these has been made. I am sure you are aware that the decision to issue an Executive order is that of the President. In addition, any recommendation for legislation submitted by any branch of the executive department can be made only with the approval of the President, usually provided through the medium of the Bureau of the Budget. These decisions are, of course, not within the purview of the Department of Defense or of this office.

We will be pleased to receive copies of the subcommittee hearings of July 2 as soon as these are available. We have previously obtained copies of the statements of the witnesses which we have studied with interest.

Sincerely yours,

J. VINCENT BURKE, Jr.

OCTOBER 26, 1959.

Hon. J. VINCENT BURKE, Jr.,
General Counsel, Department of Defense,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. BURKE: I am taking the liberty of writing you in connection with your letter dated September 22, 1959, which was a reply to the letter addressed to the Secretary of Defense dated September 12, 1959, by Senator THOMAS C. HENNINGS, JR., chairman of the Constitutional Rights Subcommittee, concerning hearing procedures under the industrial personnel security program.

I believe there is apprehension that hearing procedures will be established by Executive order for an industrial personnel security review program without legislative authorization because of a statement made on the floor of the House on Friday, September 11, 1959.

CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 105, part 15, p. 19123:

"RELATING TO SECURITY PROGRAM WITH RESPECT TO DEFENSE CONTRACTORS AND THEIR EMPLOYEES

"Mr. WALTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

"The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

"There was no objection.

"Mr. WALTER. Mr. Speaker, there has been scheduled under suspension of the rules H.R. 8121. I have just been informed that the matter involved in this bill will be treated with administratively, and therefore I wish to announce that there will be no motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill."

Seantor HENNINGS is expected to return within a few weeks and I merely wish to remind you that the Senate Constitutional Rights Subcommittee wanted to be able to receive the views of the Department of Defense and, if necessary, the Department of Justice, before any industrial personnel security review program is established. As soon as a printed record of the public hearing held by the subcommittee on July 2, 1959—shortly after the U.S. Supreme Court decision in the Greene case—is available, we shall be happy to send you immediately as many copies as you desire.

Your continuing cooperation will be appreciated.

Sincerely,

CHARLES H. SLAYMAN, JR.,
Chief Counsel and Staff Director.

GENERAL COUNSEL OF THE DEPARTMENT OF DEFENSE,
Washington, D.C., September 22, 1959.

Hon. THOMAS C. HENNINGS, Jr.,
Chairman, Subcommittee on Constitutional Rights, Committee on the Judiciary, U.S. Senate.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: The Secretary of Defense has asked me to reply to your letter of September 12, 1959, with regard to the problem of establishing hearing procedures under the industrial security program of the Departmnet of Defense to meet the pronouncements of the Supreme Court in the Greene case.

The effect of the Greene case upon the future operation of the industrial security program has been the subject of study not only by this Department but by the executive branch of the Government as a whole. We are not aware of the source of the story in the Washington Evening Star of September 11, which you enclosed. I am informed that a decision with respect to this matter has not in fact been made.

You may be sure that upon the establishment of an executive branch position we will communicate with you further.

Sincerely yours,

J. VINCENT BURKE, Jr.

SEPTEMBER 12, 1959.

The Honorable NEIL H. MCELROY,
The Secretary of Defense, the Department of Defense, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: On June 30, 1959, and again on July 13, 1959, I wrote you a letter inviting you to appear before the Subcommittee on Constitutional Rights to present the views of the Department of Defense concerning methods of obtaining due process of law in hearing procedures under the Federal loyalty security programs, particularly the industrial personnel security program.

On July 10, 1959, Deputy Secretary of Defense Thomas S. Gates replied to my initial letter, stating that the Department of Defense, together with other interested agencies of the Government, were engaged in an intensive study of the decision of the Supreme Court in the Greene case to determine its significance and effect on the future operations of the industrial security program. Secretary Gates stated that until such time as that study was completed, it would be inappropriate for any Department of Defense official to testify before this subcommittee, but that upon the establishment of an executive branch position he would communicate further with me regarding such an appearance.

In the light of Secretary Gates' letter, and a letter of similar import sent to me on July 16 by George W. Vaughan, assistant to the Secretary for Legislative Affairs, it was highly disturbing to read in the Friday, September 11, edition of the Washington Evening Star a news dispatch reporting that the White House intends to issue an Executive order in the near future dealing with the industrial personnel security program. I trust that this news dispatch was in error, and that no such definitive action formalizing procedures in the industrial personnel security program will be taken before the Constitutional Rights Subcommittee has the opportunity to hear the testimony of appropriate Government officials, including representatives from the Department of Defense.

I shall appreciate hearing from you immediately whether the study of the Greene decision referred to in Secretary Gates' letter has been completed, and if so, when it would be convenient for you and other appropriate officials of the Department of Defense to testify before the Subcommittee on Constitutional Rights.

Sincerely yours,

THOMAS C. HENNINGS, Jr.,
Chairman.

OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY OF DEFENSE,
Washington, D.C., July 16, 1959.

Hon. THOMAS C. HENNINGS, Jr.,
Chairman, Committee on the Judiciary, Subcommittee on Constitutional Rights, U.S. Senate.

DEAR SENATOR HENNINGS: This refers to your letter of July 13, 1959, addressed to the Secretary of Defense, indicating the desire of the committee to commence hearings on July 29.

As was indicated in this Department's letter of July 10, 1959, the Greene decision is being studied by the Department and by other interested agencies; and consideration is being given to whether the administration should make recommendations for legislation, and to any other steps which should be taken. I do not know at this time whether such studies will have been completed by July 29. The nature of the problem is covered in the Greene case opinion. Until a proposed solution is determined within the executive branch, there is, of course, little which a witness could contribute to the committee's study.

Sincerely,

GEORGE W. VAUGHAN,
Assistant to the Secretary for Legislative Affairs.

JULY 13, 1959.

The Honorable NEIL H. MCELROY,
Secretary of Defense, Department of Defense, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: I have received a letter from Deputy Secretary of Defense Thomas S. Gates, in response to my letter to you dated June 30, 1959.

In my letter to you of June 30, inviting you to appear before the Senate Constitutional Rights Subcommittee to present your views on methods of obtaining due process of law in hearing procedures under Federal loyalty-security programs, particularly the industrial personnel security programs, I did not mention any specific date when the subcommittee would prefer to hear your testimony since I wanted to afford you the greatest possible leeway and convenience in fitting such an appearance into your schedule.

Since writing that letter, however, I have heard reports that as a result of the Supreme Court's decision in the case of Greene v. McElroy the administration is considering the issuance of an Executive order covering, among other things, hearing procedures under the industrial personnel security program.

In view of the grave constitutional rights questions dealing with confrontation and cross-examination raised in the majority opinion in the Greene case, I think it is highly important, before any action is taken, either in the form of legislation or Executive order, to formulate new rules or authorization for the industrial personnel security program, that this subcommittee have the opportunity to hear the testimony of appropriate Government officials.

Accordingly, I have scheduled a hearing by the subcommittee for the morning of Wednesday, July 29, to hear your views as Secretary of Defense.

I hope that this date is convenient for you.

Sincerely yours,

THOMAS C. HENNINGS, Jr.,
Chairman.

OFFICE OF THE ATTORNEY GENERAL,
Washington, D.C., July 14, 1959.

Hon. THOMAS C. HENNINGS, Jr.,
Chairman, Subcommittee on Constitutional Rights, Committee on the Judiciary, U.S. Senate.

DEAR SENATOR: This is in regard to your letter of July 13 suggesting that I testify before your subcommittee on July 28, regarding the Supreme Court's decision in Greene v. McElroy. The administration has studied that decision and is considering what legislative recommendations, if any, to make as a result of it. It is also considering what action to take in the event it is decided that legislation is not advisable.

The industrial security program, as you know, is under the direct supervision of the Defense Department. The opinions in the Greene case set forth the nature and extent of the legal problems involved so that there is little or nothing that could be added by way of testimony in that regard at the present time.

Because there is little of a constructive or helpful nature which a representative of the Department of Justice could provide by testimony now it would be appreciated if any decision as to such testimony could be postponed at this time.

With kind personal regards.

Sincerely,

WILLIAM P. ROGERS,
Attorney General.

JULY 13, 1959.

The Honorable WILLIAM P. ROGERS,
The Attorney General, Department of Justice, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. ATTORNEY GENERAL: In my letter to you of June 30, inviting you to appear before the Senate Constitutional Rights Subcommittee to present your views on methods of obtaining due process of law in hearing procedures under Federal loyalty-security programs, particularly the industrial personnel security programs, I did not mention any specific date when the subcommittee would prefer to hear your testimony since I wanted to afford you the greatest possible leeway and convenience in fitting such an appearance into your schedule.

Accordingly, I have scheduled a hearing by the subcommittee for the morning of Tuesday, July 28, to hear your views as chief legal officer of the Government.

I hope that this date is convenient for you.

Sincerely yours,

THOMAS C. HENNINGS, Jr.,
Chairman.

THE SECRETARY OF DEFENSE,
Washington, July 10, 1959.

Hon. THOMAS C. HENNINGS, Jr.,
Chairman, Committee on the Judiciary Subcommittee on Constitutional Rights, U.S. Senate.

DEAR SENATOR HENNINGS: Your letter of June 30, 1959, inviting Mr. McElroy to present the views of the Department of Defense to your subcommittee concerning the methods for obtaining due process of law in hearing procedures under the Federal loyalty-security programs is appreciated.

Since the Greene decision on June 29, the Department of Defense, together with other interested agencies of the Government, have been engaged in an intensive study of the decision to determine its significance and effect on the future operations of the industrial security program. Until such time as that study has been completed and a position of the executive branch established, I believe it would be inappropriate for any Department of Defense witness to testify before your subcommittee.

Upon the establishment of an executive branch position I shall communicate with you further regarding such an appearance.

Sincerely yours.

THOMAS S. GATES,
Deputy.

JUNE 30, 1959.

The Honorable NEIL H. MCELROY,
The Secretary of Defense,
The Department of Defense,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: This is to invite you, as an interested Government official, to appear before the Senate Constitutional Rights Subcommittee and present your views on methods of obtaining due process of law in hearing procedures under Federal loyalty-security programs, with particular reference to an industrial personnel security program.

For your convenience, I am enclosing copies of statements dated May 25, and June 25, 1959. As you will note, our first hearing will be held Thursday morning, July 2, 1959.

When would you prefer to testify?

I look forward to hearing from you about this matter in the near future.

Sincerely yours,

THOMAS C. HENNINGS, Jr.,
Chairman.

The Honorable WILLIAM P. ROGERS,
The Attorney General, Department of Justice, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. ATTORNEY GENERAL: This is to invite you, as an interested Government official, to appear before the Senate Constitutional Rights Subcommittee and present your views on methods of obtaining due process of law in hearing procedures under Federal loyalty-security programs, with particular reference to an industrial personnel security program.

I would also be interested in receiving your views on the use today of the "Attorney General's List" of proscribed organizations—how the list is compiled, how names of organizations are added to the list, how names are removed, and who uses the list for what purposes.

For your convenience, I am enclosing copies of statements dated May 25 and June 25, 1959. As you will note, our first hearing will be held Thursday morning, July 2, 1959.

When would you prefer to testify?

I look forward to hearing from you about this matter in the near future.

NECESSITY FOR A NEW LOOK AT THE UNITED STATES-CUBAN POLICY

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, the difficulties arising out of the changeover in the government of Cuba—with its new policies and attitude toward the United States—requires, I believe, a new look at U.S. policy.

The United States, I believe, has a great stake in assuring good relations on a mutually beneficial basis with Cuba.

By experience, however, it has become increasingly evident that the changeover in governments of Cuba—accompanied by a revision of Cuban policy—has created new and difficult problems between the two countries.

Currently, for example, we face decisions on first, what action to take in relation to the sugar trade with Cuba—that is, whether to raise or lower the sugar quotas; and second, how best to protect—and obtain adequate compensation for—expropriated U.S. properties and investments in Cuba.

As I understand it, Ambassador Bonsal is coming back to Washington for further conferences on the situation.

In view of the criticalness of the situation—as well as the state of flux that exists—I believe the Congress should favorably consider any request by the President—as standardbearer of our foreign policy—for authority to raise or lower sugar quotas, if such acts best serve our national interests.

Unfortunately, there have been dissident voices which, by sometimes extreme criticism, have made more difficult the carrying on of what should be good, friendly relations between the two countries.

However, the situation will not be solved by blasts and counterblasts. Rather, the crisis requires calm, cool thinking, aimed toward finding constructive, and acceptable agreements to the differences.

Basically, we, in the United States, respect the rights of the Cuban people to pursue, by self-determination, their nationalistic goals. This concept is in complete accord with our own history. Despite the "wave of criticism," I have every confidence that there exists between the Cuban people and the citizens of the United States a strong bond of friendship, of mutual respect, and a desire for a better climate of relationships.

As a nation which has undergone the "trial-and-error process" in achieving our goals as a nation, the United States should appreciate—and attempt to patiently understand—the difficulties confronting the Cubans. At the same time, however, it is essential that efforts be made to protect U.S. interests and investments which are significant, not only to the American people, but also have been important to the Cuban economy.

I believe, therefore, that the United States should take a new look at its Cuban policy, to see what can be done to avert a real estrangement of the two Governments, to iron out the difficulties, and to improve relationships for the mutual benefit of the two nations.

FOREST SERVICE BUDGET WILL NOT FULFILL BENSON PROGRAM

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. President, last year the Congress had presented to it a "program for the national forests." I take some personal pride in having joined with others in the Congress in urging over the last few years that this be done.

I ask unanimous consent that Secretary Benson's letter of transmittal be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
Washington, D.C., March 24, 1959.

The PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE,
U.S. Senate.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: A report entitled "Program for the National Forests" is transmitted herewith for information of the Congress and appropriate reference.

President Eisenhower in his state of the Union message in February 1953 called attention to the vast importance to this Nation, now and in the future, of our soil and water, our forests and minerals, and our wildlife resources. He indicated the need for a strong Federal program in the field of resource development.

On July 31, 1953, the President supplemented that message by sending to the Congress a special message relative to a program designed to conserve and improve the Nation's natural resources.

In referring to the national forests administered by this Department and to other public lands, the President stated in that special message that the Federal Government has a responsibility to manage wisely those public lands and forests under its jurisdiction necessary in the interest of the public as a whole. Important values exist in these lands for forest and mineral products, grazing, fish, and wildlife, and for recreation. Moreover, it is imperative to the welfare of thousands of communities and millions of acres of irrigated land that such lands be managed to protect the water supply and water quality which comes from them. In their utilization of these lands, the people are entitled to expect that their timber, minerals, streams and water supply, wildlife and recreational values should be safeguarded, improved and made available not only for this but for future generations. At the same time public lands should be made available for their best use under conditions that promote stability for communities and individuals and encourage full development of the resources involved.

Accordingly, provisions for a marked increase in management activities on the national forests have been made in recent years. These Federal properties have been substantially improved. The flow of values stemming from them has markedly increased. Our management experience clearly dictated the need for still more intensive development and management.

As a result, in 1956 I asked the Forest Service to develop a long-range conservation program for national-forest resources. The first result of this request was a 5-year program, "Operation Outdoors"; the second is the enclosed "Program for the National Forests."

This conservation program embraces all the renewable resources of the national-forest system—water, timber, recreation, forage, and wildlife habitat. It includes both long-range objectives and interim proposals. The program provides for the continued, orderly use and development of the renewable resources of these Federal lands in accordance with the basic conservation principles of sustained yield and multiple use. What is done in the next 10 to 15 years will largely determine whether these vastly important public lands will contribute by the year 2000 their fair share to a greatly expanded national economy.

The national forests are widely scattered throughout the United States, occurring in all but 10 States and in Puerto Rico. They are of direct benefit to millions of people. From them are derived an impressive portion of the Nation's supply of meat, fiber, shelter, water for irrigation, industrial, and domestic purposes, hydroelectric power, feed for livestock and wildlife, and outdoor recreation.

These national forests belong to all American citizens. Their resources and services are available for use by everyone. In recent years the use of these lands has been increasing steadily. Demands are now such that a comprehensive program for the orderly growth of development and management activities is of demonstrated urgency. Our rapidly growing population and expanding economy indicate mounting and competitive pressures for national-forest resources.

Legislative authorities for the recommended program are generally adequate. Supplemental legislation will be proposed as the need arises. Appropriation requests to implement the program will be submitted to the Congress in future years in connection with budget presentations after due consideration of the overall fiscal needs and resources of the Federal Government.

A similar letter is being sent to the Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Sincerely yours,

EZRA TAFT BENSON,
Secretary.

Mr. MURRAY. This letter stresses the imperative need for action now.

On May 18, 1959, Senator HAYDEN held a unique open meeting of the Senate Appropriations Committee, which was attended by 17 Senators. The Members of this body know that this is a real testimonial to the importance given the national forests and conservation.

I attended that meeting, and I desire to insert in the RECORD at this point key statements made by Assistant Secretary of Agriculture Peterson.

There being no objection, the statements were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

With your permission I would like to introduce the people from the Forest Service here with me. On my left is Dr. McArdle, Chief of the Forest Service; Mr. Cliff, Assistant Chief of National Forest Resource Management; Dr. Harper, Assistant Chief, in charge of Forest Research; and Mr. Crafts, Assistant Chief, in charge of Program Building and Legislation.

We welcome the opportunity to discuss with you the program for the national forests which was recently submitted to the Congress by the Secretary of Agriculture.

The program is based on the experience of the Department of Agriculture in over 50 years of managing the extensive and valuable Federal lands which make up the national forests. These lands are located in 39 States and Puerto Rico. They comprise 181 million acres grouped into 148 national forests.

LAND UTILIZATION PROJECTS

In addition, the Forest Service administers some 65 land-utilization projects totaling over 4.5 million acres in 27 States. They are administered under the same general multiple-use and sustained-yield objectives as are the national forests.

During most of the history of the national forests they have been remote, difficult of access, and, until recent years, not greatly used. Costs of management and protection were relatively small. The revenues produced were of little significance. Management was predominantly custodial. This is no longer true.

Now they are readily accessible or can be made so. A rapidly growing demand for forest products, higher yield of useful materials through more complete utilization, modern roadbuilding equipment, and better logging methods, a growing population seeking more and more outdoor recreation, and growing demands for water—all of these things result in progressively greater use of the national forests.

The job of national forest management is no longer custodial. On the contrary, it is to provide sustained yield of all the multiple-use values of these lands up to the optimum obtainable. To do this in response to present and foreseeable demand means intensive management. It means greater expenditures for all facets of management including research. It means greater revenue. It means a continuing increase in all economic returns which come from productive forest properties.

BASIS FOR FUTURE EXPANSION OF PROGRAM

Why is full development of the national forests needed? It is to respond to the Nation's economic development and population growth; to accommodate the swing to outdoor recreation; to utilize our timber and water resources more effectively; and because it is necessary to plan a long time ahead in order to grow timber and manipulate other natural resources to meet future needs.

We should not develop one resource and lag behind in another. It would be unwise to intensify timber management and harvesting practices and fail to adequately develop recreational facilities. True multiple use requires that intensified development and utilization progress at an orderly and coordinated pace among all resources—a balanced program of development.

As Mr. McArdle will tell you later, activities are now out of balance in some respects. So the program calls for much greater intensification of some activities than others in order to reestablish this necessary balance.

Now to mention a few of the many benefits of the program. There will be a substantial increase in direct financial revenues to the Treasury. But probably a much greater overall benefit will be the secondary and intangible values.

The greatest overall benefit will be that national-forest resources—in keeping with population growth and public need for values obtainable from them—will yield their maximum good to the American people.

Many of the activities proposed for the short-term program will not immediately produce their greatest returns. Such measures as roadbuilding, tree planting, range reseeding, water conservation, research, and recreation proposed for the initial period are geared not only to short-term needs but also to the longer range objectives.

DIRECT FINANCIAL REVENUES

Direct financial revenues will double by the end of the interim program to an estimated $210 million annually. The major part of this will be from the sale of timber which should by the year 2000 reach 21 billion board feet of sawtimber worth $350 million a year at 1958 prices.

National forest lands, forage, and timber have an estimated current capital value of over $7 billion. This will increase by at least a full billion dollars as a result of improvements under the short-term program.

An estimated 60 percent more people will derive their livelihood from harvesting, processing, hauling, and merchandising national-forest timber and derived products than at the present time. It is estimated that every dollar of stumpage will be worth $20 by the time it reaches the ultimate consumer. The consumer value of the increase in timber sales will be some $3.7 billion.

The 130 million recreation visits estimated by 1969 will put into trade channels approximately a billion dollars' worth of expenditures for sporting equipment, transportation, licensing, lodging, and other items.

No realistic dollar value can be placed on water from the national forests. Water is already the most precious commodity in the West and will remain so. Water-conservation programs on the national forests will improve soil stabilization, result in more regular streamflow, enhance water quality, and foster the infiltration of water into underground storage. This means that the need will be less for the construction of surface reservoirs, settling basins, and other costly water-construction works.

There is no measurement to express the worth of the recreational value provided for millions of people by the national forests. Nor can there be any assessment in dollars of the lives saved, damage prevented, and resources preserved by better accessibility, prevention of fires and floods, and suppression of epidemic pests.

Mr. MURRAY. On the cost of the program, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD part of the statement of the Chief of the Forest Service, Dr. McArdle.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

In round figures and in oversimplified terms, it can be said that the program would require increased costs of about $40 million for each of the first 5 years, then leveling off at about $321 million for most of the remaining short-term period.

Mr. MURRAY. I ask unanimous consent to include in the RECORD a colloquy from that hearing between myself and departmental witnesses.

There being no objection, the colloquy was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ANTICIPATED NATIONWIDE BENEFITS

Senator MURRAY. I was wondering if this program was not put into effect, what would be the loss suffered by the Nation?

Mr. MCARDLE. While Mr. Peterson was making his statement, he indicated some of the benefits that would be achieved. To answer your question very briefly, if the program were not put into effect, those benefits that he listed would not be achieved. For example, we would not be doing on the national forests the things that we need to do to improve the quality of water and to increase the quantity of the water yield. And you saw on the chart these national forests are located where most of the water is born. If the program is not put into effect, we will not achieve a cut of 21 billion board feet of timber. And the Treasury will lose the income that would thereby be derived.

If the program is not put into effect, we will not be able to take care of in any reasonably adequate fashion the many millions of recreational visitors. That will mean that some areas perhaps will have to be closed because of the need for sanitation protection or for protection from fire. I think I could go on at great length. But in brief——

PRIORITY OF PROJECTS

Senator MURRAY. If Congress allowed you only half the money you are seeking, which projects would you give priority to?

Mr. MCARDLE. I think I would want a little time to answer a question as important as that one.

But just speaking off the cuff, as I am sure you will understand I am doing now, I think that I would give more attention to the tree planting and timber stand improvement operations that have been lacking for so long. I would try to get caught up on meeting our recreational needs.

And I think that I would try to give more attention than we have been able to give for watershed management, particularly in the control of soil erosion.

Senator MURRAY. If the total program is carried out, of course, it would be of great benefit to the Nation as a whole, would it not?

Mr. MCARDLE. Yes, sir.

Mr. PETERSON. Senator MURRAY, there is another aspect to the question which you put with respect to what might happen if this program is not carried out. And that is the impact upon private forest lands as a result of the growing use of forest products of all kinds.

Undoubtedly those private lands would be put under greater pressure to supply additional forest products and thereby the management of those lands might not be as good as it would otherwise be if the national forests should reach full productivity within a reasonable time. I think the impact of this program if carried out, on the private lands of the country, is of some consideration in respect to the program also.

Senator MURRAY. Thank you.

Mr. MURRAY. I left this hearing with the distinct impression that all concerned in the executive branch were in enthusiastic support of this program. I watched the press coverage and found universal support for rapid implementation of this conservation work.

Consultation with a number of Senators further reassured me and we got behind the Appropriations Committee in full support of Senator HAYDEN's plan to advance the date for starting this conservation work by putting $27 million of the needed funds in for fiscal year 1960.

We were all disappointed when the Bureau of the Budget declined to agree with this position, but we were gratified when the Appropriations Committees of the two Houses finally provided in all a $10.9 million increase for 1960.

I ask unanimous consent that table 1 be printed in the RECORD, showing the budget action for fiscal year 1960, and the balance needed to implement the national forest program in fiscal year 1961. This table shows that a $33 million increase is required.

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Appropriation	Administration's request, 1960	Appropriated by Congress, 1960	Budget estimate required for 1961, if national forest program fully implemented	Increase required over 1960

[1] Program need based on 1960 budget estimate of $24,000,000, plus $11,600,000 for 1st year of national forest program is $35,600,000. This is $5,600,000 more than the $30,000,000 authorized by the Federal-Aid Highway Act.

[3] Action by Congress permitted use of full $30,000,000 authorization, cash provided, $28,000,000.

[4] New fund added by Congress in fiscal year 1960 to permit purchase or condemnation of existing roads. If total road is acquired, private timber to pay fair share for hauling over the road. If partial share is acquired, payment will be in proportion to Government timber. The $5,000,000 represents amount passed by Senate in fiscal year 1960 based on need list submitted by Department of Agriculture on request of Committee on Appropriations.

[5] This 10 percent of prior year national forest receipts available for forest roads and trails.

[1] Proposed adjustments in the functional project structure for the national forest protection and management activity of the forest land management subappropriation. The purpose of these adjustments, as shown below, is to (a) eliminate the functional account "Ranger district management" and distribute the amount previously budgeted for this purpose to other program functions remaining in the "National forest protection and management" activity, and (b) transfer $283,000 from the "Land utilization projects" function to other national forest protection and management functions for administration of about 300,000 acres of title III, Bankhead-Jones Farm Tenant Act lands which have been transferred to national forest status by Executive Order 10851 and Proclamation 3326, dated Nov. 27, 1959, and Executive Order 10844, dated Oct. 9, 1959.

[2] Decrease of $304,500 due to providing a direct appropriation to the General Services Administration for certain leasing costs previously paid from the "forest protection and utilization" appropriation.

[3] A supplemental estimate of $21,500,000 for fighting forest fires in fiscal year 1960 is proposed for later transmission.

[5] Amounts shown are not obligations but appropriations or cash requirements to liquidate obligations. The appropriation of $28,000,000 for fiscal year 1960 and $30,000,000 for fiscal year 1961 permits obligating the full $30,000,000 authorized for each of these years. Accordingly the obligations for 1960 will be $2,000,000 greater than the appropriation but for 1961 obligations and appropriation are the same. Following is the comparison between 1960 and 1961 on an obligation basis:

	1960	1961	Increase or decrese
Construction	$31,460,000	$33,140,000	+$1,680,000
Maintenance	10,400,000	10,500,000	+100,000
Total	51,860,000	43,640,000	+1,780,000
Deduct "roads and trails for States" (10-percent fund)	−11,860,000	−13,640,000	−1,780,000
Net obligations from appropriated funds	30,000,000	30,000,000	----------

[6] This relates to the act terminating Federal supervision over the Klamath Indian Tribe in Oregon (68 Stat. 718; 72 Stat. 816). There is no firm basis for estimating the cost for acquisition of Klamath Indian lands which are not sold to private parties. Accordingly, funds for this liability have been provided in a Budget Bureau "Reserve for contingencies" for the 1961 budget estimates.

INDEX TO APPROPRIATION ITEMS IN PRINTED BUDGET

NOTE.—Amounts shown in the printed budget for all activities under each appropriation represents costs (goods and services received and used). Therefore the amounts in the printed budget will not always agree with amounts in the above summary which are based on obligations, except for forest roads and trails which is on a cash basis (see footnote 5 above). However, the amounts shown in the printed budget for appropriation are on the basis of authority to incur obligations.

Mr. MURRAY. The President's budget request is $20,132,500 below the required amount. This is a great disappointment. It became even greater when I studied the budget and saw how few of the key items the Chief of the Forest Service listed as vital were increased. Dr. McArdle and Secretary Peterson apparently thought last year that tree planting, watershed management, soil erosion, and recreation needed more attention, but of these items only recreation was increased.

The document by Secretary Benson and the testimony by Assistant Secretary Peterson and Chief Forester McArdle give eloquent support to the need for this vital work.

The warm words of last spring are now frozen, cold and lifeless, in a stillborn budget that was conceived without either the hope or promise for a better tomorrow.

The conservation and immediate budgetary questions are secondary to the responsibility we have to coming generations. Will we pass on tc our successors the treeless mountains we created, the eroded range that we destroyed, the muddied streams that we permitted?

Our resource balance is in debt. This debt exceeds any dollar debt attributed to our Federal Government. Its reduction far transcends the importance of jingling dollars and imagining we have a magical surplus.

I hope that this Congress will rise to its responsibilities and provide for adequate public resource management.

I close asking unanimous consent that there be printed in the RECORD table 3, a comparison of Forest Service appropriation increases in the President's budget for 1961 with increases suggested for the program for the national forests.

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FEDERAL ELECTIONS ACT OF 1959

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I move that the unfinished business be laid before the Senate for consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be stated by title for the information of the Senate.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. A bill (S. 2436) to revise the Federal election laws, to prevent corrupt practices in Federal elections, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Montana.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate resumed the consideration of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. THURMOND].

Mr. THURMOND obtained the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MANSFIELD in the chair). Will the Senator from South Carolina yield to permit the Chair, as a Member of the Senate, and not as the presiding officer, to suggest the absence of a quorum?

Mr. THURMOND. I am pleased to yield for that purpose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair suggests the absence of a quorum. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GOLDWATER in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, will the Senator from South Carolina yield to me again?

Mr. THURMOND. I am very pleased to yield to the distinguished Senator from Montana.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I express the hope that the attachés of the Senate on both sides of the aisle will call Senators who are not in attendance and inform them that we may have a vote shortly, and that this will be a yea-and-nay vote on the amendments offered by the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I desire to modify my amendments identified as "1-19-60-F" in the following manner: On page 4, line 3, I propose to delete the period and the quotation mark, and insert after the word "work" a comma and the words "or any committee, agent, or designee of such organization."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the modification will be made.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, the amendments I have offered would amend the present law which prohibits corporations and labor unions from making political contributions and expenditures.

At the present time, section 610 of title 18 prohibits corporations and labor unions from making political contributions or expenditures in connection with a Federal election. The language of the section is in terms of a blanket prohibition. However, because of the interpretation given the statute by the Supreme Court in two cases in recent years, several types of political expenditures have been held to be without the prohibition of the statute, and considerable doubt exists as to whether other types of activity are within or without its reach. It is the purpose of the proposed amendment to clarify the present situation as to the limitations on political activity which the Congress intends to be placed.

Mr. President, the effect of the amendments I have offered would be to prohibit all political contributions of labor unions and corporations with three specific exceptions: First, the amendments would in no way affect the right of labor unions and corporations to communicate with the members or stockholders through the medium of a union newspaper or house organ, so long as its distribution was limited primarily to the members or stockholders concerned; advocating the election of a particular candidate or slate of candidates through this medium would not be curtailed in any manner; second, the amendment protects the alleged constitutional right of labor unions and corporations to discuss the issues of the campaign impartially and to declare their position on such issues; third, the amendment specifically guarantees the right of labor unions and corporations to sponsor news programs and programs in which the opposing candidates are presented on a panel discussion, debate, or similar type program. To explain the amendment in the terms of a hypothetical example, Mr. President, it prevents a labor union or a corporation from spending money to influence the public at large to vote for candidate A instead of candidate B. There are three sanctions imposed on labor unions which commit violations: First, noncertification by the National Labor Relations Board and inability to file an unfair labor practice charge; second, removal of any exemption from the antitrust laws; and, third, loss of tax exemption for 1 year following the violation. For a violation by a corporation, there is imposed a $10,000 fine. In addition, a fine of $1,000 and imprisonment for 1 year, or both, is imposed on any person who receives any contribution prohibited by the amendment and on any officer or director who consents to any contribution or expenditure prohibited.

Mr. President, the forerunner of the present section of the United States Code which prohibits political expenditures or contributions by labor unions and corporations was first enacted in 1907. An appreciation of the circumstances which raised this problem is necessary, and an understanding of it is essential for a consideration of the amendment which I have offered.

The great concentration of wealth which followed the industrial expansion in the United States in the post-War Between the States era had profound effects on the American economy. The impact of abuses resulting from this concentration of wealth in the control of industrialists gradually made itself felt by a rising tide of reform protest in the last decade of the 19th century. The Sherman Antitrust Act was in response to the threat to economic freedom created by enormous industrial combines. The income tax law of 1894 reflected congressional concern over the growing disparity of income between the many and the few.

In this latter decade of the 19th century, there was a growing popular feeling that the large aggregations of capital were unduly influencing politics, an influence not stopping short of corruption. The prosperity of the times was great, but the wealth was gravitating rapidly into the hands of a small portion of the population. The power of wealth threatened to undermine the political integrity of the Nation. This is best demonstrated by the multiplicity of States which passed laws in the 1890's requiring candidates for office and their political committees to make public the sources and amounts of contributions to their campaign funds and the recipients and amounts of their campaign expenditures. The theory of these laws was not unlike that which fostered the approach of the Kennedy-Ervin labor bill to prevent abuses in the labor union movement, namely, that the spotlight of reporting and publicity tend to discourage unethical practices. The purpose was to discourage corporations from making political contributions, thereby ending their control over party policies. However, the futility of this approach to the problem was soon realized. As early as 1894 the 1st session of the 59th Congress was urged to prohibit political contributions by corporations altogether. I quote from the hearings before the House Committee on Elections:

> The idea is to prevent * * * the great railroad companies, the great insurance companies, the great telephone companies, the great aggregations of wealth from using their corporate funds, directly or indirectly, to send members of the legislature to these halls in order to vote for their protection and the advancement of their interests as against those of the public. It strikes at a constantly growing evil which has done more to shake the confidence of the plain people of small means of this country in our political institutions than any other practice which has ever obtained since the foundation of our Government. And I believe that the time has come when something ought to be done to put a check to the giving of $50,000 or $100,000 by a great corporation toward political purposes upon the understanding that a debt is created from a political party to it.

Mr. President, concern over the size and source of campaign funds was one of the vital issues in the presidential campaign of 1904. Popular sentiment for Federal action to purge national politics of the pernicious influence of huge campaign contributions was crystallizing. President Theodore Roosevelt, in his annual message to Congress on December 5, 1905, recommended that:

> All contributions by corporations to any political committee or for any political purpose should be forbidden by law; directors should not be permitted to use stockholders' money for such purposes; and moreover, a prohibition of this kind would be, as far as it went, an effective method of stopping the evils aimed at in corrupt practices acts.

The wisdom of this recommendation was becoming more and more apparent. It was contrary to the primary purpose of the existence of the corporations to allow executive officers and directors to use moneys in support of political candidates or platforms. Whether the contribution was made for the purpose of supporting political views or with the desire to obtain protection for the corporation, it was wholly unjustifiable. In the first instance, executive officers were seeking to impose their political views upon a constituency of divergent convictions, and in the other they were guilty of a serious offense against public morals.

In this first decade of the twentieth century, corporations were frank in their admission that the contributions were made upon the expectation that candidates thus aided in their election would support the interests of those companies.

The public demand for a reform bill was about to reach a crescendo.

In 1906, Mr. President, the Committee on Elections of the House of Representatives began considering a number of proposals designed to cleanse the political process. There were numerous groups which advocated a Federal publicity bill, feeling that the light of revelation would curb the most flagrant abuses of purchases of influence. One of the strongest advocates of reform legislation was the president of the American Federation of Labor, Samuel Gompers, who is known as the father of the American labor movement. His testimony before the House committee on the publicity bill is as follows:

> Whether this bill meets all of the needs may be questioned; that is open to discussion; but the necessity for some law upon the subject is patent to every man who hopes for the maintenance of the institutions under which we live. It is doubtful to my mind if the contributions and expenditures of vast sums of money in the nominations and elections for our public offices can continue to increase without endangering the endurance of our Republic in its purity and in its essence. * * * If the interests of any people are threatened by corruption in our public life or corruption in elections, surely it must of necessity be those, that large class of people, whom we for convenience term the "wageworkers."
> I am not in a mood, and never am, to indulge in denunciations or criticism, but it does come to me sometimes that one of the reasons for the absence of legislation of a liberal or sympathetic or just character, so far as it affects the interest of the wage-earners of America, can be fairly well traced with the growth of the corruption funds and the influences that are in operation during elections and campaigns. * * * I am under the impression that the patience of the American workingman is about exhausted.
> If we are really determined that our elections shall be free from the power of money and its lavish use and expenditure without an accounting to the conscience and the judgment of the people of America, we will have to pass some measure of this kind.

In his annual message to the Congress in 1906, President Roosevelt listed as the first item of congressional business a law prohibiting political contributions by corporations.

In 1907 the forerunner of the present statute which purports to prohibit political contributions and expenditures by both labor unions and corporations was passed. The language of that prototype section was:

> That it shall be unlawful for any national bank, or any corporation organized by authority of any laws of Congress, to make a money contribution in connection with any election to any political office. It shall also be unlawful for any corporation whatever to make a money contribution in connection with any election at which Presidential and Vice Presidential electors or a Representative in Congress is to be voted for or any election by any State legislature of a U.S. Senator.

Mr. President, the purpose of this original section was not merely to prevent the subversion of the integrity of the electoral process. The basic underlying philosophy was to sustain the active, alert responsibility of the individual citizen in a democracy for the wise conduct of government. Individual initiative was being lost in the face of huge aggregations of wealth; and the political segment had begun to cater to corporate interests, to the detriment of the population as a whole. Accountability to the individual voter had become a thing of the past.

In 1910 Congress responded to the public demand for further curbs on the political power of wealth by enacting a publicity law that required committees operating to influence the results of congressional elections in two or more States to report all contributions and disbursements and to identify contributors and recipients of substantial sums. That law also required persons who spent more than $50 annually for the purpose of influencing congressional elections in more than one State to report those expenditures if they were not made through a political committee. At the next session that act was extended to require all candidates for the Senate and the House of Representatives to make detailed reports with respect to both nominating and election campaigns. The amendment also placed maximum limits on the amounts that congressional candidates could spend in seeking nomination and election, and forbade them from promising employment for the purpose of obtaining support. And in 1918, Congress made it unlawful either to offer or to solicit anything of value, to influence voting.

In 1925, Congress made a comprehensive revision of existing legislation concerning elections, and enacted the Federal Corrupt Practices Act of 1925. The forerunner of the present section 610 of title 18, prohibiting political contributions by corporations, was strengthened by expanding the definition of "contribution," and by penalizing the recipient of any forbidden contribution, as well as the contributor.

Mr. President, the political potentialities of wealth were further restricted in 1940, when Congress made it unlawful for any political committee to receive contributions of more than $3 million or to make expenditures of more than that amount in any calendar year. The same act made it unlawful "for any person, directly or indirectly, to make contributions in an aggregate amount in excess of $5,000, during any calendar year, or in connection with any campaign for nomination or election, to or on behalf of any candidate for an elective Federal office" or any committee supporting such a candidate. The term "person" was defined to include any committee, association, organization, or other group of persons. The author of the amendment, in offering it on the floor of the Senate, made the following observation:

> We all know that money is the chief source of corruption. We all know that large contributions to political campaigns not only put the political party under obligation to the large contributors, who demand pay in the way of legislation, but we also know that large sums of money are used for the purpose of conducting expensive campaigns through the newspapers and over the radio; in the publication of all sorts of literature, true and untrue; and for the purpose of paying the expenses of campaigners sent out into the country to spread propaganda, both true and untrue.

Mr. President, as all of us are aware, World War II precipitated an unprecedented economic mobilization and enormously stimulated the power of organized labor, and soon aroused outside its ranks a consciousness of its power. This concentration of power was emphasized each time workers conducted strikes during the period when the Nation was engaged in the greatest conflict the world has ever known. Thus there was a growing realization that, just as the great corporations had made huge political contributions to influence governmental action or inaction, whether consciously or unconsciously, the powerful unions were pursuing a similar course, and with the same untoward consequences for the democratic process. It was for this reason that the Corrupt Practices Act was extended to include labor organizations, when Congress, in 1943, passed the Smith-Connally Act to secure defense production against work stoppages.

Public opinion toward labor unions was undergoing a change. Since the inception of the organized labor movement, privileges and immunities granted to labor unions have created instruments of almost uncontrolled power. These include, first, immunity under the antitrust laws; second, practically full immunity to injunctions in the Federal courts; third, immunity from taxation; fourth, power to compel employees to join unions, as a condition of employment; fifth, right to represent all of the employees as exclusive bargaining agent, even if only a bare majority has selected the union as such agent; sixth, power to compel employers to bargain collectively; seventh, although not required to be incorporated, their members are free from the liability for the debts of the union, unlike the members of other unincorporated associations; eighth, unions are not liable for the acts of their individual members, in contrast to other types of unincorporated associations.

And thus, during World War II, it became apparent that the infant labor movement which had been nutured by beneficial legislation and public opinion, reached its maturity and had come of age. As a result of the demonstrations of labor power in the form of wartime strikes, the public came to the conclusion that labor unions, as public institutions, should be granted the same rights, and no greater rights, than any other public group. The detrimental effect that concentrations of wealth had on elections ignore the source, for an association of individuals—whether they be a labor union or a corporation—expect and sometimes demand consideration by the beneficiaries of their contributions which not infrequently is harmful to the general public interest. It was a realization of this fact that led Congress to place labor unions on exactly the same basis, insofar as their financial activities were concerned, as corporations had been on for many years.

Despite the wartime application of the Federal Corrupt Practices Act to labor organizations, some unions continued to make enormous financial outlays. The Political Action Committee of the Congress of Industrial Organizations played a vigorous role in the national elections of 1944. However, the Senate's Special Committee on Campaign Expenditures did not find a violation of the Corrupt Practices Act by the PAC, for it had limited its activity to "expenditures" on behalf of candidates, and had not made direct contributions to their campaign funds. It became quite obvious, Mr. President, that the statute was woefully inadequate to prevent labor union political fiscal activity if it was to be subjected to such a narrow construction. The detriment to the electoral process was as great in the case of an expenditure on behalf of a particular candidate as a direct contribution to his campaign fund. In both cases the responsibility of the individual citizen in the democratic system of elections was diminished and the beneficence of the organization expending the money was a potential factor in legislative determination. It was apparently for this reason that concern was growing over the possibility of emasculation of the statutory policy through a narrow construction of contributions.

In 1945 the House Special Committee To Investigate Campaign Expenditures in the 1946 elections urged that the prohibition on political contributions be extended to cover political expenditures on behalf of a candidate as well, and noted the futility of a law which prohibited the direct contribution to a candidate and yet permitted the expenditure of large sums in his behalf.

Mr. President, the Congress realized the necessity of protecting the political process from what it deemed to be the corroding effect of concentrations of wealth. The prohibition of political contributions by labor unions contained in the Smith-Connally Act was made permanent in 1947 by the Taft-Hartley Act. In addition, the section was extended to proscribe "expenditures" as well as "contributions," and the coverage was expanded to include Federal primaries and nominating conventions. And thus the present section became law when the Congress overrode the President's veto of the Taft-Hartley law.

The section has been before the Supreme Court on two occasions, Mr. President. In United States v. Congress of Industrial Organizations (335 U.S. 106), a 1948 decision of the Court, it was held that the section did not prevent a labor union from distributing a regularly published union newspaper to its members, although it contained an editorial urging all members of the union to vote for a certain candidate. In the course of the opinion, the Court said that "if section 313 were construed to prohibit the publication, by corporations and unions in the regular course of conducting their affairs, of periodicals advising their members, stockholders or customers of danger or advantage to their interests from the adoption of measures, or the election to office of men espousing such measures, the gravest doubt would arise in our minds as to its constitutionality." Noting its responsibility to construe a statute so as to avoid giving it an unconstitutional interpretation if possible, and the apparent intention of the Congress, as indicated by the debate on the Taft-Hartley bill, the Court held that the advocacy of a candidate "within the family," so to speak was consistent with the act.

Certain observations by the Supreme Court in the CIO case gave rise to the belief that so long as the funds for political expenditures were not drawn from the general treasury of the union, partisan political activity could be engaged in by the labor organization. Existing and subsequently created political "educational" committees of the labor unions thereby circumvented the intent of the statute, and have continued to do so until the present time. The political activities of these organizations has been justified on the ground that the funds are the result of voluntary contributions of the individual union members, freely given, and with full knowledge of the purposes for which they are to be spent. However, such has not been the case, Mr. President. The individual union member has no assurance that his so-called voluntary contribution will not be used to advance the caues of a candidate to whom he is violently opposed. There have been innumerable instances in which the national union has expended money on behalf of a candidate whose ideology and political philosophy bear no reasonable resemblance to those of a substantial number, and in many cases, a majority of rank and file union members. On June 16 of last year, Mr. President, during the debate on the Potter amendment to the labor reform bill, I cited many instances in which the dues of working people had been contributed to causes with no regard to their desires. One such instance precipitated the case of Allen against the Southern Railway System in the State of North Carolina last year. A group of employees of the Southern Railway, objecting to union shop contracts, had brought suit in the superior court at Charlotte charging that section 2 of the Railway Labor Act (45 U.S.C. sec. 152) was unconstitutional because it permits union shop agreements in violation of the North Carolina right-to-work law. The employees also contended that assessments had been made against them as individuals and the proceeds of those assessments used for lobbying and political purposes. Such use of assessments, they contended, were not only an infringement or impairment of first amendment rights but also in violation of the Act itself, which contemplates that assessments may be made only for collective bargaining purposes. The jury in the Allen case returned answers in response to several questions which had been submitted by the Court. The Court asked "Do the defendant unions use dues and fees which they collect from railroad employees in support or opposition to legislation which is not reasonably necessary or related to collective bargaining?" The jury answered the question in the affirmative. In response to the question whether the expenditures were necessarily or reasonably related to collective bargaining, the jury said "No."

Forcing ideological conformity by the expenditure of union dues and alleged "voluntary payments" collected through the structure of the union raises serious questions of constitutional law, Mr. President. The voluntariness of collections for political purposes by labor organizations, coupled with the expenditures in support of candidates and platforms advocating principles, policies, programs, and activities to which a substantial number of union members do not subscribe, should be in contravention of the first or fifth amendment to the Constitution. This position was urged in the case of Railway Employees' Department against Hanson, in 1956, but the Supreme Court reserved judgment on the question.

The question of labor union political spending has been raised again by a decision of the Georgia Supreme Court in the so-called Looper case. It involves a group of railroad employees who refuse to pay union dues under a compulsory union membership contract because part of the money is spent to support political candidates and views with which the employees do not agree. The court held that a union shop contract requiring membership in the union is invalid where part of the dues is used for political purposes.

With 80 percent of unionized employees working under union shop contracts, the decision, if upheld, could force unions to give up compulsory union membership contracts or curtail their political spending.

Many reasons have been advanced for curtailing or prohibiting expenditures by both labor unions and corporations, Mr. President. To my mind, however, the most compelling is the basic philosophy of our form of Government. The foundation of the democratic system is constructed on the premise that the individual citizen will maintain his responsibility in the electoral process and that an accumulation of this responsibility culminating in the exercise of the right to vote will result in a legislative process designed to serve the people as a whole. Large aggregations of wealth in the control of a few interfere with this process. This was recognized at the turn of the century, when Congress in its wisdom decided that the expenditure of such sums by corporations had a deleterious effect on the electoral process. It was recognized by Samuel Gompers, known as the father of the American labor movement, who believed that labor unions, like corporations, should stay out of politics. This equality of treatment with respect to unions and corporations expending funds to support candidates for political office was instituted in 1943 with the passage of the Smith-Connally Act, and again in 1947 in the Taft-Hartley Act. However, the prohibition on labor unions has been circumvented by the formulation of separate political vehicles, and the power now wielded by labor in the political field is practically unfettered. These organizations presently spend millions of dollars in violation of the intent of the present statute prohibiting political expenditures by both labor unions and corporations. No information is available on exactly how much unions are presently spending, for no reports are required of local and State organizations expending sums within State boundaries, nor what the unions spend out of dues funds for so-called political education. Reports filed with the Clerk of the House of Representatives indicate that labor organizations spent $1,828,777, but the figure covers only what was spent out of voluntary contributions raised or spent in more than one State for direct political action.

The size of organized labor has grown from a low of 2,500,000 members and an annual income of $30 million to $40 million in 1932 to 17,500,000 members and an annual income of $650 million in 1957.

The strength of labor unions in the political field is indicated by the statement of AFL–CIO President George Meany that "we have not changed the complexion of Congress enough; we will have to go further in the political field."

Mr. President, on that point I should like to quote a column written by one of the greatest writers in America today, David Lawrence, published in the Washington Evening Star in the fall of 1959. It is entitled "Carey Letter and Lewis' Views," and the subhead is "Former CIO Chief Quoted on 'Quid Pro Quo' for Political Contributions":

CAREY LETTER AND LEWIS' VIEWS—FORMER CIO CHIEF QUOTED ON "QUID PRO QUO" FOR POLITICAL CONTRIBUTIONS

(By David Lawrence)

When the labor union bosses raise money to contribute to the campaigns of Members of Congress, must those who are elected disregard their personal convictions on the merits of proposed laws and do the bidding of the groups that furnished the funds? This issue seems to have been projected by James B. Carey, one of the top leaders of the AFL–CIO, whose recent letter to Members of Congress has caused a stir. He expresses gratitude to those who voted as labor wanted and wrote in bitter sarcasm to those who, having accepted campaign contributions from labor interests, voted against their wishes on the Landrum-Griffin bill.

Mr. Carey threatens reprisals at the ballot box, and apparently the labor unions will withhold contributions next time from those Members of Congress who refused to consider a campaign contribution as a bribe.

There is nothing unusual about Mr. Carey's letters to Members of Congress. He should not be criticized as being alone in his viewpoint. For what he has written is in line with CIO policy for years. Indeed, John L. Lewis, while active in the CIO, was characteristically frank about the meaning of a contribution from laboring men to the campaigns of candidates for office.

When the late President Franklin D. Roosevelt, having accepted big contributions from labor unions for his 1936 campaign, said in the midst of a strike in 1937 something that the labor union leaders didn't like, Mr. Lewis declared publicly:

"It ill behooves one who has supped at labor's table and who has been sheltered in labor's house to curse with equal fervor and fine impartiality both labor and its adversaries when they become locked in deadly embrace."

In a biography of Mr. Lewis written by Saul D. Alinsky and published in 1949 by G. P. Putnam & Sons, the author tells of an interview with the labor leader during the Roosevelt regime. Mr. Lewis is quoted as having said:

"Everybody says I want my pound of flesh, that I gave Mr. Roosevelt $500,000 for his 1936 campaign, and I want quid pro quo. The United Mine Workers and the CIO have paid cash on the barrel for every piece of legislation that we have gotten.

"We have the Wagner Act. The Wagner Act cost us many dollars in contributions which the United Mine Workers have made to the Roosevelt administration with the explicit understanding of a quid pro quo for labor. These contributions far exceed the notions held by the general public or the press. Is anyone fool enough to believe for one instant that we gave this money to Roosevelt because we were spellbound by his voice? It is common knowledge that we spent approximately three-quarters of a million dollars in the 1936 campaign. And you might be interested to know that the $500,000 direct contribution wasn't my price, but was the figure named by the White House, and I was given approximately 48 hours to get that money.

"Certainly there was a quid pro quo—the right for labor to organize. But there was more than that. The sums we spent in 1936 were not only cash contributions that were made to the Democratic Party, but also were money expended in terms of salaries for organizers and other personnel who worked full time organizing and electioneering for Roosevelt. Radio time purchased, billboards, handbills, literature, and all other paraphernalia that are part and parcel of the process of being elected President of the United States didn't come gratis."

The same interview reveals that in 1938 when the tensions between Mr. Lewis and Mr. Roosevelt had eased off somewhat and the Democratic President was trying in primary contests to purge certain Southern Democratic Senators who happened also to be antilabor, the United Mine Workers' chief rendered a helping hand. Again Mr. Lewis is quoted in the Saul Alinsky book as follows:

"Where did the money come from that Franklin D. Roosevelt siphoned into those Southern States to try to bolster up the fight against the anti-New Deal Senators? Where did the money come from?

"I'll tell you where it came from. Right here, from the coffers of the United Mine Workers of America. It came by request of the President of the United States through one of his trusted aides. You tell this to the President, and if he questions it, and I'm certain that he will not, you may inform the President that I am perfectly willing to name names and sums, chapter and verse, to satisfy any slight amnesia that there might be on this particular issue.

"You ask me for gratitude in terms of an administration that we have literally poured our life's blood into supporting. You wonder that I do not express the feeling that one should have for a great champion of labor. I say that labor's champion has to a large extent here been a bought and paid for proposition. There is nothing we should be grateful for when we paid cash on the barrelhead at the price demanded for it."

So the philosophy of the money raisers in labor's ranks hasn't changed much in the 20 years since John L. Lewis spoke. In the 1958 congressional campaign when the labor unions boasted that a majority of the House of Representatives was elected through their help, the Federal records show a relatively small sum was contributed. Big amounts were, however, donated largely to State organizations which do not come under the Federal laws requiring the reporting of contributions. It is estimated that labor raised approximately $10 million. Much of it was spent to uphold laws compelling workers to forgo their civil rights and join unions.

Mr. President, the Congress of 1907, which prohibited political contributions by corporations, was not confronted with the innumerable, well-organized, and effective political organizations which today seek to impose the will of labor leaders on the Congress. There is the Nonpartisan League of the United Mine Workers. Railroad brotherhoods carry on their political activities through the Railway Labor's Political League. Numerous national unions have their own political organizations. These include: Amalgamated Clothing Workers Political Education Committee, International Typographical Union Political Committee, Textile Workers Union Political Fund, Trainmen's Political Education League, United Automobile Workers Political Action Committee, United Brotherhood of Carpenters Nonpartisan Political Committee, United Steelworkers of America voluntary political action fund, and the Upholsterers' International Union Trades Campaign Committee.

The best known, largest and most effective labor political organization, however, Mr. President, is the Committee on Political Education of the AFL–CIO—a merger of the old CIO Political Action Committee and the AFL Labor's League for Political Education.

The COPE organization—Committee on Political Education—covers the entire country and operates through a committee which includes the secretary-treasurers of 30 international unions. An administrative committee composed of the 29-member AFL–CIO executive council and the presidents of 15 unions not represented on the council.

There are more than 400 COPE organizations operating in congressional districts, counties, or cities.

It is at once apparent, Mr. President, that with the interlocking officers of labor unions and the labor political committees, the same objections exist to the political expenditures of the numerous political committees as moved the Congress in 1943, and again in 1947, to prohibit political expenditures by the labor unions themselves. The corrupting influence of huge aggregations of wealth is the same, whether it be in the control of labor leaders, corporate officers and directors, or so-called political education committees.

The influence of the individual citizen and the will of the people as a whole is diminished to no smaller degree when the gigantic pressure group and lobbyist is an organization composed of identical officers and methods of collection as the principal labor organization. As far as the evils sought to be corrected are concerned it matters not whether the expending organization is the General Motors Corp., the AFL–CIO, or the Committee on Political Education of the AFL–CIO. In any event, the result is the same.

Mr. President, the proponents of the amendment on primaries have eloquently expressed their heart-felt desire for clean elections untainted by the corruption which accompanies large contributions and expenditures. If indeed there is a bona-fide desire to preserve the election process for the individual voter, this amendment will be adopted. If we would rid the election process of the evil that accompanies the use of large concentrations of wealth in elections, we must effectively close all loop-holes in the Corrupt Practices Act. There must be no privileged group in the field of campaign contributions and expenditures. The American people will not be deceived—they can measure our sincerity by the action on this amendment.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. THURMOND. I am happy to yield to the able and distinguished Senator from Arizona.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I believe the Senator from South Carolina has offered an amendment which, if it is adopted, will make the pending bill a clean elections bill in fact. If it is not adopted I believe the name will be only a sham. I also believe that the people of the United States will, in that case, look correctly to those who voted against the amendment and wonder why.

I should like to ask the Senator a question. The language of the Senator's language on page 1, line 8, reads:

> 2. Make a contribution to any committee, association, or organization, whether political or nonpolitical in nature, which makes contributions or expenditures for the purpose of influencing an election or a primary, political convention, or caucus held to select candidates.

Is it the Senator's intention that the language cover political associations which might be formed by business associations?

Mr. THURMOND. It certainly is. It is the intention of the amendment to embrace any partisan political association or committee formed by a corporation, as well as by a labor union. The Senator from South Carolina has no desire to punish corporations. He has no desire to punish labor unions. He feels that the tremendous concentration of wealth in corporations or labor unions, used in elections, can corrupt elections, and therefore should be curbed.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Will the Senator yield further?

Mr. THURMOND. I yield.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Is it the Senator's intention that the language which I have quoted from his amendment should also cover political organizations such as the Committee on Political Education?

Mr. THURMOND. It is the intention of the amendment to cover the Committee on Political Education. I might say, further, that my amendment would prohibit political contributions of labor unions and corporations, with three specific exceptions. I wish to make those clear: First, the amendment would in no way affect the right of labor unions and corporations to communicate with the members or stockholders through the medium of a union newspaper or house organ, so long as its distribution was limited primarily to the members or stockholders concerned; second, the amendment protects the alleged constitutional right of labor unions and corporations to discuss the issues of the campaign impartially and to declare their position on such issues; third, the amendment specifically guarantees the right of labor unions and corporations to sponsor news programs and programs in which the opposing candidates are presented on a panel discussion, debate, or similar type program.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I wished to make that clear. I thank the Senator for his answer. It needs to be made clear, because there seems to be a great misunderstanding about the operations of a committee like COPE. Does the Senator agree with the junior Senator from Arizona that under the Supreme Court decision in United States against United Auto Workers the business fraternity or business organizations and corporations may also organize committees such as labor has organized?

Mr. THURMOND. The Senator from South Carolina is of the opinion that business organizations and corporations could organize committees similar to COPE, just as labor unions have done.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Does the Senator agree further with the junior Senator from Arizona that the threat of this happening is one of the gravest threats to our constitutional Republic which faces us? I say that for this reason. If we wind up in this country within the next few years with a gigantic political operation operating on the one hand with funds derived from unions, and, on the other, a gigantic organization operating politically with funds which have come from corporations, where will a candidate who wishes to run on the old fashioned Jeffersonian or Lincolnian principles be able to get any money? Will a candidate not have to be beholden, and openly beholden, either to the management side or the labor side, whose principles will be exactly the same—economic? Would the Senator from South Carolina agree?

Mr. THURMOND. The Senator from South Carolina is in accord with the opinion expressed by the distinguished Senator from Arizona. If it reaches that point, a candidate who could stand any chance of being elected would have to be beholden to the tremendous power and wealth of corporations or unions. Therefore, an independent candidate who wished to represent the public at large would be precluded from any chance of election.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I thank the Senator. If the Senator will allow me, I should like to establish a little legislative history, because yesterday the debate established very clearly that there is a broad misunderstanding of what constitutes political activities by one of these committees. Yesterday, during the course of my efforts to convince the chairman of the committee that this should be met in the bill, I read a list of political activities of the Committee on Political Education. I will read those again: compiling, publishing, and distributing voting records; political training classes; getting workers registered; paying election day workers; providing automobiles to get voters to the polls; political meetings.

Nevertheless, there are many Members of the Senate who do not understand that that constitutes political activity.

I read that yesterday from a publication issued by the U.S. Chamber of Commerce. One of our colleagues, the distinguished senior Senator from Illinois, was much annoyed by the fact that I have confidence in the U.S. Chamber of Commerce. So, to be bipartisan, so to speak, in this matter, I wish to read from "How To Win—A Handbook for Political Education," published by AFL–CIO Committee on Political Education. By the way, it is one of the finest books of its type ever written, and I urge everyone in politics to get a copy of it, because it tells exactly how to win. I wish to read this to back up the Senator's contention that the Committee on Political Education is not educational at all; it is a political committee.

For instance, I refer to one chapter: "How To Get the Best Man or Woman Elected." Will the Senator from South Carolina agree that that is political? "How To Get the Best Man or Woman Elected" is the title of one chapter.

Mr. THURMOND. It would certainly appear that that was the purpose in writing the book and publishing it. It was not put out for general information.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I believe the Senator will agree that the purpose of how to get the best man or woman elected would certainly be political.

Mr. THURMOND. It would be political, in the opinion of the Senator from South Carolina. The best man or woman elected would be the man or woman who would conform to the wishes of the group which put out that book.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Let me read what COPE itself says. I have been trying to establish in this body for a long time that COPE, and other committees like it, which can be formed, function according to the interpretation of the Supreme Court, which, in my opinion, has invalidated the intent of the Taft-Hartley Act as it refers to political contributions by unions and corporations. I find the best evidence that it has by this statement:

> COPE's role in election campaigns:
> Chances are the election campaign—be it for county dogcatcher or U.S. Senator—is organized by the political party of the candidate your COPE has endorsed.

How any reasonable person can assume, after reading that, that COPE, or committees organized like it, are organized only to educate people, is beyond me. They admit that they endorse candidates. They admit that they endorse political parties. If one reads further through the book, he will see headings on how to form a campaign committee—"Research," "Publicity," "Speakers' Bureaus," "Campaign Managers." They tell what to do, and give all the little details, such as to list every precinct, to be realistic, and so on.

This is a well-written book on how to win elections. Yet there are Senators and Members of the House who maintain stanchly that there is nothing wrong with this practice; that it has no bad influence on American politics.

We have before us a bill which is traveling under the name of a "clean elections" bill; yet the chairman of the committee which prepared the bill is not able to show that there is a threat to our elections if such organizations are allowed to continue to operate without a requirement for reporting.

The distinguished Senator from South Carolina [Mr. THURMOND] has just given the finest explanation of this type of organizational work I have ever heard. He pointed out very cogently that it is contended that it is unfair to prohibit the contribution of money by one group of people, but that it is perfectly all right to have money contributed in any amounts by the other side.

I know there is not a Senator who would not rather have an organization like this working for him than all the money he could put together. Money does not win elections; it is the people who work for the candidates who win elections. That is why labor has been so successful. If either political party worked as hard to elect the persons they wanted to elect, the political parties would be much better off. It is men and women who win elections, not money.

Mr. President, I point out that COPE, according to its own language, is a political organization. I know that in my last election campaign COPE sent people into Arizona from outside the State to try to defeat me. I was somewhat amazed the other day to hear stated an amendment which would restrict money from going across State lines, but which said nothing about people. Hundreds of persons were sent into my State of Arizona from Illinois, Michigan, Indiana, and California, for one reason only: to "get GOLDWATER," because they did not happen to agree with me. I think the people of my own State can say better whether they want to "get GOLDWATER" or "keep GOLDWATER." I am happy with their decision.

Mr. President, we are talking about something which is very, very vital. I cannot see how we can, with any conscience, call this a clean elections bill; how we can go before the people and say, "Oh, we have cleaned up elections. You do not need to worry about money influencing candidates any more. We have taken care of that."

We cannot say that if we leave in the bill a loophole as large as the one we are now discussing. This is a tremendous loophole. We do not know what a committee like COPE spends. We have no way of making estimates.

I observe on the floor the distinguished senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. McCLELLAN]. I served under his guidance on the Special Committee To Investigate Lobbying. We were trying to examine into the matter of costs. We learned that in one county in Michigan money was being spent at the rate of approximately $37,000 a day for people to work in an election. It was not a Federal election; it was a local election.

If money in such amounts is being contributed across the country, in addition to the cost of publishing handbooks for political education and the cost of preparing millions of pieces of paper for mailing, I would hesitate even to guess what must be spent by this organization on politics, but it is not in the neighborhood of $10,000, $100,000, or $1 million; I think it is much more than that.

The time has come for the American people to know how much money is being spent by one organization in this country on politics.

In closing, I wish to emphasize that I am just as violently opposed to corporations being in politics as I am to labor unions being in politics. I am happy that the amendment of the Senator from South Carolina adequately and completely includes both groups.

One more comment at this point. It has a bearing on the subject, because it shows how strong and powerful labor organizations have become. In the last election in California, there was a proposal on the ballot for a so-called right-to-work law. Two men who were members of the International Association of Machinists took a stand contrary to the union's stand. The union had taken a stand against that bill. These two men spoke for the bill. They were dismissed from the union because of disloyalty.

Mr. President, I think this is a serious situation. I have before me an editorial published in last night's Washington Star which states:

> A California judge has ruled that it is a mark of disloyalty for a union member to speak out in opposition to his union's position on a political matter.

In other words, we are now seeing power exerted to destroy the constitutional rights of men and women in this country. I believe one of the roots of that power certainly stems from the organization we have been discussing.

I say to the Senator from South Carolina that the same thing could happen if business got into the field of politics. I am fearful that business will do so, because business cannot stand still and allow labor to attack the free enterprise system in the Halls of Congress. Business is being forced into the position of taking a part in politics. I think we ought to prevent both business and the labor movement from doing so.

If the Senator from South Carolina does not object, I should like to ask unanimous consent that the editorial entitled "Punishing Free Speech," published in last night's Evening Star, be printed at this point in the RECORD.

Mr. THURMOND. I do not object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Arizona?

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PUNISHING FREE SPEECH

A California judge has ruled that it is a mark of disloyalty for a union member to speak out in opposition to his union's position on a political matter.

In 1958 the International Union of Machinists was against California's right-to-work proposal. Two members campaigned for the proposal, however, and in turn were expelled by the union. They sued for reinstatement and damages, but the judge ruled against them. He said that by taking a public stand in opposition to the union's position on the issue they were guilty of conduct unbecoming a member and of disloyalty to the union.

This decision will be appealed, as it should be. For if it were to stand it would mean that no union member could safely speak his mind in any matter in which he opposed the official union position. In other words, a union member would have to surrender his right of free speech or be expelled. And expulsion from a union might mean that the worker would lose his job.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I thank the Senator from South Carolina for yielding to me. As a fellow American, I thank him for performing a long needed service in suggesting a remedy for this disease which exists in this country.

Mr. THURMOND. The junior Senator from South Carolina wishes to commend the statement of the distinguished Senator from Arizona, and to state that he is in accord with the Senator.

I feel that the junior Senator from Arizona is one of the great men in this country, one of the ablest Senators who has ever sat in the Senate. It is a pleasure to me personally to have the Senator from Arizona express the views he has stated.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GOLDWATER. I yield.

Mr. CURTIS. I, too, wish to commend the distinguished Senator from South Carolina for his work on the bill and for offering his amendments.

The vote on these amendments will be the test of whether the Senate desires to have a clean elections bill enacted into law, because these are the ones that strike at the widespread abuses.

So, Mr. President, I expect to support the amendments of the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. THURMOND. I thank the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, if the Senator from South Carolina will yield further, I wish to inquire of the Senator from Arizona in regard to his recent remarks.

Mr. THURMOND. I am pleased to yield for that purpose.

Mr. CURTIS. The distinguished Senator from Arizona referred to the amount of money spent by COPE, and estimated it to be a great sum. Does he believe that amount has been raised by voluntary contributions?

Mr. GOLDWATER. No, I do not believe it has been raised by voluntary contributions; I do not believe that organization can raise that much in that way.

I do believe—and I said so on yesterday—that the money which COPE gives to a candidate or to a committee for a candidate is now raised voluntarily. I do not want to state at this time the amount used in that connection, because I do not have the figure at my fingertips.

But the money used to operate the mechanism known as COPE comes right out of union dues money.

Mr. CURTIS. I thank the Senator from Arizona. I also thank the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I wish to thank the Senator from Nebraska for his fine work in this field, too.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MANSFIELD in the chair). The question is on agreeing to the amendments of the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. McNAMARA. Mr. President, I rise to speak briefly on the amendment submitted by the Senator from South Carolina.

In my opinion these amendments constitute class legislation of the first order. I believe they would make less than first-class citizens of 16 million Americans who not only are members of labor unions but also are members of consumer groups, educational groups, ethnic groups, religious groups, economic groups, political groups, and many others; but just because they happen to be—in addition to belonging to the other groups I have mentioned—members of organized labor, they would be treated, under these amendments, as I understand them, as less than first-class Americans.

Mr. President, regardless of how much validity there may be in their interest in Government because of their membership in any other kinds of organization, the fact that they now belong to a labor organization—and even though their membership in it might be incidental to their interest in the other groups to which they belong—would, under the provisions of these amendments, cause them to be denied first-class citizenship.

Mr. President, I hope these amendments will be rejected, for I believe they constitute class legislation of the first order.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Michigan yield to me?

Mr. McNAMARA. I am glad to yield.

Mr. JAVITS. I should like to state that I shall vote against these amendments, for the same reason that led me to vote against the bill of rights to the Taft-Hartley Act which was submitted by the distinguished Senator from Arkansas [Mr. McCLELLAN], and which we subsequently refined and made into an instrument of law for which it was possible for the overwhelming majority of the Members of this body to vote.

Mr. President, I make that statement because of the fact that the problems I find involved in connection with these amendments are legal ones, and relate to due process.

I believe that in our anxiety to act in accordance with what we feel should be the will of the people in regard to a matter of this character, we must not overlook the fundamental rights of individuals. Hence, Mr. President, I compare the situation which now confronts us with the situation which faced us in connection with the highly desirable bill of rights question, which I think we resolved very wisely.

Mr. President, I shall be specific in connection with this matter, for I have very great regard for the proponent of these amendments.

In the first place, let us make clear that labor organizations are specifically included under section 610 of the Taft-Hartley Act, and it already is illegal for a labor union to make a political contribution.

However, these amendments seek to confine the activities of labor unions to political activities within the unions. That is really the fundamental purpose of the amendments; otherwise, there would be no point to them. They also would tighten up somewhat the penalty; but I do not believe that is their main purpose. Their main purpose, in my opinion, is to determine what a union may do in respect to its own members, with regard to funds to be used in dealing with political questions, political issues, or political candidates.

On that point I am concerned with two things. First there are items of definition which are contained in this amendment—and let us remember that a violation would be a criminal act—which I think jeopardizes, because they are not precise enough, the question of due process, or possibly the question of constitutionality.

I should like to call the attention of my colleague to the use of the word "impartial." Again, as I said, the amendment is designed to deal with intraunion affairs and intraunion activities with respect to the union's own candidates.

I point out that the application of the word "impartial"—that is, an impartial statement of the issues in the election and an impartial news program, which is called for in the amendment—leaves me in great doubt as to whether we could expect any jury to decide any criminal statute on the basis of whether a particular statement on a highly controversial political issue is impartial or whether the presenting of a news program is impartial.

I have appeared on labor union news programs, such as the one Mr. Edwards has. I do not know whether they were impartial. I was on it, and so was a Democratic Party Senator. I do not know whether that made it impartial, because often we agree.

So, for those reasons, because I think it is designed to prevent intraunion activity, and because I have great doubt whether it ought to be prevented, and also because the standards are hardly those that can be administered with due process in a criminal statute, I think the amendment is unwise.

There is another point to which I should also like to call attention. It is said the same rules are made applicable to corporations as are made applicable to unions. I have read the amendment very carefully. I do not find, with respect to corporations, there are these specific provisions as to whether they may or may not publish or whether they may or may not distribute. If there were doubt about whether statements of issues in news programs would be considered impartial, I would oppose it on that ground, because I feel many corporations are beginning to become interested in political affairs, and they ought to have the right to comment on them, so long as they do not run afoul of the contributions restriction.

In the statewide election, both for attorney general and the Senate, I was opposed by the trade unions. Nevertheless, I am interested in trying to see that when justice is administered it is administered in a fair way. I am sure my friend has that thought in mind.

It is for the reasons I have given in the analysis I have made that I oppose the amendment.

I thank the Senator for yielding.

Mr. McNAMARA. I thank the Senator from New York. I should like to ask the Senator if this is not an attempt really to amend the Taft-Hartley Act, which covers this subject pretty well.

Mr. JAVITS. I am a member of the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare. If it were felt that the Detroit case had made a loophole in this whole scheme of legislative control which is against the public interest, I would certainly join with the Senator from Arizona [Mr. GOLDWATER], who is the senior Republican on the committee, in seeking a review in the committee, by hearings, of an overhauling of section 610. I think that would be entirely germane and proper way it should be handled, if we found it needed to be done.

Mr. McNAMARA. I agree it is more desirable than doing it in the way now suggested.

Mr. JAVITS. The Senator from Michigan and I may find ourselves on opposite sides on many questions, but I think we agree that is the better way to do it.

Mr. McNAMARA. I find myself frequently in opposition to distinguished attorneys.

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. President, before the able Senator from New York leaves the Chamber, if he so intends, I should like to propound to him a question. I understood him to say, in the context of his very ably presented discussion of the amendment, that he believed there might be some question relating to constitutionality. Does the Senator think that this amendment of section 610 of the United States Code might transgress the provisions of the first amendment relating to free speech?

Mr. JAVITS. I should like to rest on my original concept, namely, that it raises the question, certainly in the ways I have mentioned. This is not the final way to deal with it. There should be an opportunity to go into the issue of amendment of the Taft-Hartley law. Because it does raise that question, I feel it would be the final and concluding point which would induce me to vote against the amendment. I feel this is not the final shot at the question. There is doubt of its constitutionality. I would not say it is unconstitutional. It raises a question in my mind. Therefore, for the reasons I have stated, I would vote against the amendment.

Mr. HENNINGS. May I inquire if the Senator does not think, being a diligent member of the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, this is the sort of legislation that should be considered and studied by that committee, and that it does not properly have its place in an elections bill which has as its primary design regulation of reporting and contributing in political campaigns?

Mr. JAVITS. Well, the great Senate can do anything it wants to whenever it wants to. I do feel, considering the legislative scheme which has been followed in reference to the matter, and considering the questions which this amendment raises, that would be the preferable way to approach the question. I would join the Senator from Arizona [Mr. GOLDWATER], who is the senior Republican member on the committee, and who is apparently in favor of the amendment, in seeking a proper exploration of the matter.

Mr. HENNINGS. I may point out to the Senator that on January 13, when I made my opening statement with respect to this proposed legislation, I said this. My remarks appear on page 392 of the RECORD of that date:

> I * * * remind Senators that the present bill does not deal with this provision of Taft-Hartley. I know full well that this statute and even the soundness of its underlying principles have been questioned and debated. Nevertheless, the issues raised have not been sufficiently investigated, and it is certainly my confirmed conviction that any legislation touching section 610 would be at this point premature. The administration of this statute by the courts has, up to now, satisfactorily resolved the controversies involved.

I think the amendment has no proper place at this stage of the proceedings, when the Senate has made substantial and constructive progress on a bill to regulate Federal elections. I have tried to make some analysis of the provisions to which my very good friend from South Carolina has adverted, such as the discriminatory treatments of certain labor organizations, like COPE. Such discriminatory treatment distorts the facts that were developed in congressional investigations; and I especially refer to the investigation by the Subcommittee on Privileges and Elections in 1956, under the able chairmanship of the junior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. GORE].

This investigation established beyond any reasonable doubt that labor organizations and corporations follow the same legal practices in the matter of participation in political campaigns. I would refer any who might desire further discussion of this to page 24 of the report of that committee.

Aside from that, I should like to say that none of the clean elections bills reported since 1955 from the Committee on Rules and Administration contains any reference to the Taft-Hartley provision, 610 U.S.C. 18. All of these bills have as their primary purpose the safeguarding of publicity in Federal elections, and bringing up limitations on expenditures to realistic limits.

These questions were fully investigated by different congressional committees, and, in my opinion, Mr. President, the time has arrived, perhaps, for well-considered legislation in this field.

The Taft-Hartley provision, however, as I am sure Senators know, deals with an entirely separate field—an outstanding field, I will say, which affects the economy and the political situation of the entire country. I do not believe that such matters of large compass and scope should be dealt with by amendments on the Senate floor.

The question raised by the able Senator from South Carolina was never presented to the Committee on Rules and Administration, and the ranking minority member, the able Senator from Nebraska, never raised the question during our discussion of this proposed legislation. I think it would be unseemly and unfortunate if the Senate were to try to legislate on the floor of the Senate on a serious matter such as this.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HENNINGS. I am glad to yield to the able assistant majority leader.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I agree with what the Senator from Missouri has said. This matter was not discussed in the committee, and it is something which should be considered upon its own merits. We should not attempt to pass such provisions based upon discussion on the floor of the Senate.

Mr. HENNINGS. I am glad the Senator, who is a longstanding member of the committee, is of that opinion. This matter is entirely too far-reaching and too serious in its impact upon the people of this country for us to undertake to amend a clean elections bill in this fashion.

For the time being, we have the Taft-Hartley provision, which, to my mind, is strict enough to cover any situation and to suppress any malpractice. However that may be, we know that several cases have arisen under this provision, and several times the question of its validity was presented to the U.S. Supreme Court. In the course of these cases it developed that serious questions may be involved in this sweeping prohibiting provision of the Taft-Hartley statute. This process of judicial construction of the statute has just begun. Last night the junior Senator from Arizona [Mr. GOLDWATER] very aptly stated that he would not suggest any amendments to the new elections bill becaues a new case is pending before the Supreme Court, which is a case that squarely presents the issue of constitutional validity of the Taft-Hartley provision.

I hope, Mr. President, that the Senate in its wisdom will reject the amendment.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MUSKIE in the chair). The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I wish to take a few minutes to speak in opposition to the amendments.

First, before I comment on certain provisions of the amendments, I submit that I do not think the bill now pending is a proper legislative vehicle for the consideration of the subject matter of the amendments now pending, when we look at the amendments from the standpoint of their obviously intended purposes.

Mr. President, if these amendments are at any time going to be considered by the Senate, they should go through hearings before the Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare. A report should be made by that committee, because basically these are amendments which seek to regulate the activities of unions. These amendments have not been before the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare.

As a member of that committee, I will say to the Senator from South Carolina that he can count on me to urge that the amendments be considered by the committee in connection with amendments to labor legislation, and to urge that a hearing be given for consideration of the subject.

I think we make a great mistake today, Mr. President, in attempting to incorporate in a clean elections bill a proposal which would have very widespread effects upon the activities of American unionism in the field of political education and activity.

So, I raise my first objection from the standpoint of legislative procedure. I think the objection to bringing the matter to the Senate without hearings having been conducted before the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare is enough to cause postponement of any action on the proposal.

Second, Mr. President, these amendments raise a very important question of public policy on which honest and sincere men can have differences of opinion, as we do.

This proposal is obviously one which seeks to further restrict and further limit the activity of American trade unionism in American politics. I hold to the view that it is in the interest of sound public policy, in the interest of our democratic system of government, to have more rather than less political activity on the part of trade unions; and I hold to the same point of view in regard to chambers of commerce, the National Association of Manufacturers, and other employer groups.

I am always at a loss to understand why, in a democracy, we should seek to restrict the acitivities of organizations of free men and women who have organized into trade unions or into business associations, and who seek to carry the point of view of those organizations on legislative issues to a free people. What are we afraid of?

When we think what is happening to the control of media of information, when we think of the expense that is involved in political activity on the part of a candidate for Federal office, in the field of radio, television, and newspaper advertisement, we had better face up to the fact that unless organized groups of citizens at the grassroots level, such as unions, farm organizations, chambers of commerce, and other types of organizations, proceed to carry out what I call their responsibilities of citizenship statesmanship, we may find ourselves living in a democracy only in form, not in substance, because political opinion will be, in effect, so controlled by the media of information beyond the availability of the candidate who is without funds that we shall weaken democracy rather than strengthen it.

I am always a little amused at the opposition of conservative elements in our country to the activity of workers banded together in a trade union, in a political campaign. Perhaps what we need is a reinstitution of a thoroughgoing investigation of what is happening in political techniques. It would be rather interesting, in such an investigation, to discover the subterfuges which American industry uses in order to funnel into political campaigns funds to support candidates to their liking.

It always seems preferable to me to adopt a straightforward legislative procedure, one which places the cards on top of the table. If anyone has stood for a full public disclosure of procedures affecting the public's business, it has been the Senator from Oregon. For years I have advocated greater activity by business and labor groups in politics. All I ask is that there be a full disclosure of their activities. What happens under the election system we now have is that some very interesting subterfuges are adopted by people in all types of organizations in order to get around what has been, at best, a very weak Corrupt Practices Act.

It is not difficult to raise the salary of an officer of a corporation with the undisclosed understanding that he personally will contribute to certain political campaigns. It is not difficult for business expense accounts to be rigged in order to be of assistance to political campaigns, both election campaigns and legislative campaigns. It is not difficult for leaders of industry to accomplish their purposes.

Very little attention is being paid to the tactics used by industry, but a trade union is fair game. So we already have restrictions in the Taft-Hartley law on unions in politics, to which I shall always be proud to point, by way of opposition to such restrictions in 1947 on the floor of the Senate, when I led the fight against that nefarious antilabor law.

I think we should face up to the issue here today—first, as to whether or not this is the proper legislative vehicle by which to enact legislation on the subject matter of the Thurmond amendment; second, if it is decided that it is—and I hope it will not be—let us come to grips with the substance of the proposal itself.

What the Thurmond amendments apparently do is to take the present section of law which prohibits labor unions and corporations both from making direct contributions to political candidates and reenact the same provisions for corporations, while treating unions separately, and applying much more far-reaching restrictions to them.

In other words, the language in the section headed "Contributions by National Banks and Corporations" appears to me to be the same as under existing law. It is further my understanding that the only new restrictions are found in the language under the heading "Political Contributions by Labor Organizations," where we have some interesting new restrictions. It seems to me that this language does not relate to corporations.

What is really proposed is simply to further limit unions, but not industry, in carrying out what I consider to be a great responsibility of the labor movement, and that is to take an active interest in the legislative process of our democracy.

Why should not a trade union, satisfied that a certain legislative program or proposal made in the Halls of Congress would not be in the interest of free working men and women, proceed, by a majority vote of the union, to make that issue an item of the business of the union, and try to defeat the measure? One of the purposes of a union is to seek to protect the economic interests of the members of the union. If a piece of proposed legislation, in the opinion of a majority of the union, would be detrimental to the interest of members of the union, what is wrong, in a free society, with their proceeding, by means of the application of the majority vote principle, to make that issue a legislative issue, and carry the fight to the American public? We should have more such activity rather than less.

So I move into another phase of that point. Suppose the members of a union are satisfied that a candidate for office stands for a legislative program detrimental to the welfare of free men and women organized into trade unions. Why should they not, as a union policy, proceed to make that a political issue and carry it to the public, and let the public decide at the ballot box?

We talk a great deal about one thing to adopt procedures that will make unions more democratic, yet we are presented with a proposal this afternoon which seeks to prevent them from following democratic procedures in connection with what I consider to be their obligations of citizenship statesmanship.

I oppose the amendments because of what I think are their clear underlying purpose, namely, further to strengthen the restrictions upon political activity on the part of unions.

NEW RESTRICTIONS AIMED ONLY AT LABOR

Next, I point out that under these amendments, the restrictions on corporations refer only to contributions or expenditures in connection with any election to any political office. However, the restriction upon unions refers to a contribution or expenditure for the purpose of influencing an election.

There is quite a difference.

Where would this language leave the new campaign of the National Chamber of Commerce to get young businessmen active in political affairs, its "political participation program," a campaign for which the Chamber is sending out a great deal of literature advising them how to participate in political decisions and organize political clubs and activities?

I am all for this campaign. It is a healthy thing in a democracy. I would place no restrictions on these business groups organizing such political organizations. It gets them out into the open. I am for getting labor organizations, farm organizations, cooperative organizations, and other organizations, which we know in fact participate actively, seeking to influence legislation and seeking to influence candidates of their own choosing, out into the open. I believe it would be healthy for democracy.

The way to keep it healthiest is to recognize its political reality, to put it on top of the table and require a full disclosure of their activities, full disclosure of the money they spend and for whom and to whom, and not try to adopt a prohibition against the activity at all. To do that is to be confronted—human beings being what they are—with the resort to subterfuge and a device of indirection, to carry on what they consider to be vital to their economic survival, in some instances.

TREATMENT OF ANTIPUBLIC-POWER CAMPAIGNS UNCLEAR

Also, where would these amendments leave the antipublic-power advertising of the private utilities? The private power companies have several associations which prepare advertising material for them, in opposition to public power projects. It has been estimated by the Federal Power Commission that some $2 million was spent in 1957 to place these ads in national magazines.

But beyond that, they send their material to individual power companies to be placed in local papers, and it is estimated that since 1940 these individual corporations have spent some $100 million for these ads. Does the amendment apply to either expenditure? In other words, unions would not be permitted to make expenditures to influence elections, but corporations and unincorporated trade associations would. Is that true?

Well, Mr. President, I have had to battle this matter of private utilities using funds to carry on an anti-public-power program, to carry on an expensive program in opposition to the position I have taken all through my public life in my belief that multipurpose power dams should belong to the people, and should be built by the people, and that the profits should flow into the Treasury of the United States for the benefit of all people; that the water of the rivers belong to the people of this country and that when they are used to run the generators of multipurpose dams they ought to have the profits from that water flow directly into the Treasury of the United States, to pay not only for the nonreimbursable cost of a multipurpose dam but also, as I testified this morning, in a statement which I filed with the committee in support of the basin account program, pay for other public need purposes, such as reclamation.

As the RECORD will show, the two Senators from Oregon, in the law that was adopted some years ago, established the first precedent for the basin account principle in the so-called Crooked River reclamation project in the State of Oregon, to be paid for in part by power revenues earned at the Dalles Dam at The Dalles, Oreg., a Federal dam.

The private utilities do not like it, and they have been spending a great amount of money in magazines and newspapers of this country in trying to carry on a campaign against that program. Certainly these amendments would not stop them, although the ads undoubtedly are intended to influence both legislation and elections. Yet similar activity by unions is proposed to be prohibited.

Of course, the Internal Revenue Service has recently reiterated that certain private utility advertising in opposition to public power projects may not be deducted as a business expense. That makes it pretty obvious that it is an expenditure to influence the public. Its rule states that the Bureau will not approve deductions as expense items of money spent "to promote or defeat or to influence the public with respect to the desirability or undesirability of proposed legislation—even though the legislation may directly affect the taxpayer's business."

As I read the amendments—and again this shows the need for a hearing on it and an opportunity to get the pros and cons before the committee, and to have evidence presented—I am fairly certain they would not apply to the private utilities but that they would apply to trade unions.

I think it is unfair. I think it is discriminatory. I have no objection—let me make this clear to the private utilities—to their running their ads, but I do object to their deducting the cost of those ads as a business expense, and including it in their rate bases. They are political expenditures, in essence.

That is what it adds up to. Every time they run those ads, it is a political contribution to every Member of Congress and every individual running for a seat in the House of Representatives or for a seat in the Senate who likewise is opposed to multipurpose dams belonging to the people of the United States. It is a legislative and election campaign being carried on. Is it fair to permit private utilities to do that but not permit trade unions to present their point of view against legislation, and in effect, against candidates?

UNEQUAL TREATMENT OF CONTRIBUTIONS TO OTHER ORGANIZATIONS

Third, it seems to me that the amendments provide that no contributions may be made by a union to an organization "whether political or nonpolitical in nature which makes contributions or expenditures for the purpose of influencing an election," with certain exceptions for distribution of "impartial statements" of issues to its members, and presentation of "an impartial news program on radio or television."

But, Mr. President, in the face of the realities of American politics, when a campaign is on, what is necessary on the part of a trade union, when it knows or feels that a piece of proposed legislation, supported by some activity, is going to be detrimental to its economic interest, to carry the facts to the voters, because they are going to decide the issue in the election? I am satisfied that under the amendments the union could not do it.

Yet the amendments do not seem in any way to restrict corporations or trade associations from making contributions to other nonprofit groups like the National Association of Manufacturers or a chamber of commerce or private utility associations, which in turn spend money to influence legislation and elections.

I am in doubt that the amendments restrict it. It is further evidence as to why I think we ought to have hearings on them, and further evidence as to why I believe witnesses ought to be called before the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare to testify in regard to the subject matter, rather than, in effect, turn the Senate into a Committee of the Whole, with individual Senators who speak on the amendment the only witnesses called.

In committee hearings, witnesses can be heard on the pros and cons, and can be subject to cross-examination of counsel for the committee and by the members of the committee.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MORSE. I should like to complete my statement first; then I shall be glad to yield. One Senator called me this morning and asked about references I have made to the Public Affairs Institute, a research group in Washington that has been a great help to many of us in the Senate. I have publicly given credit to this group time and time again for the great research help it has been to me in the past. It is headed by a very able research director, Mr. Dewey Anderson. Some of its financing comes from some of the unions of the country. Those of us in the liberal group in the Senate do not have research facilities of an extensive nature.

We do not have the backing of the research facilities of the Government departments—and, of course, the most effective lobby in Washington happens to be the Government departments downtown, with their large staffs of researchers. We need the help of such an organization as that headed by Dewey Anderson. As I have said to Mr. Anderson time and time again, the test is whether their research stands the analysis of being factual, subject to successful cross-examination.

Here again, as I did in Cleveland the other day, when I spoke to the convention of the Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen, I wish to express my public appreciation for the assistance I have received from the Public Affairs Institute. But I have doubts in regard to the effect of this amendment upon the work of that institute, in view of the source of some of its financial backing. I have doubts as to whether that institute might find itself placed under the restrictions of this amendment. I think we ought to have testimony on that point. I think we ought to have witnesses before us to discuss the operations of that institute and the extent, if any, to which this amendment might apply to it, although it in no way participates in elections.

I do not think we ought to proceed to adopt the amendment today without giving the people who might be affected by the amendment, whether they are aided by unions or corporations, their day in court, or, at least affording them an opportunity to come in and present their points of view as to the effects of the amendment on their operations.

RAISES QUESTION WHETHER ALL POLITICAL EDUCATION INFLUENCES ELECTIONS

It seems to me that this amendment, in effect, deals with the problem of money which is spent to lobby and to influence specific legislation, as well as to influence elections as such. Therefore, I think it is better, as I said in the beginning, to deal with this matter in a separate bill, rather than to have it connected with the clean elections bill. Otherwise, it seems to me, it would be necessary to distinguish between money spent to influence legislation and money spent to influence elections.

I know that many Members of the Senate do not share my point of view—yet—as to the importance of having various groups in our country, such as labor unions, chambers of commerce, farm groups, and cooperatives, participate more, rather than less, in American political life. But I would feel bad if I thought I did not have at least majority support for the proposition that when it comes to passing upon an amendment as broad in its scope and as broad in its implications as this amendment, we should not do so until it first was submitted to the full legislative procedure of the Senate, which calls for committee hearings, for witnesses, for cross-examination, and a final report by the committee. Therefore, on that procedural ground I would be willing to rest my case; but I offer, in addition, the objections to their apparent inequity which I have made to the amendments.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MORSE. I yield.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, I associate myself with the thinking of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE] in reference to the so-called procedural consideration of the pending amendment. It seems to me, as the Senator has so well said, that the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare should be the proper forum for a complete study of the provisions of the amendment. It seems to me, further, that the amendment relates more appropriately to the Taft-Hartley Act. It is implied, at least insofar as I have been able to ascertain from listening to the debate, and a study of the language of Senator THURMOND's proposal, that the amendment is discriminatory.

I feel, without reflecting upon the effort of my friend from South Carolina—a man for whom I have high personal esteem—that the proper procedure is as suggested by the Senator from Oregon. As a member of the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, I can assure him that I would join and I am certain other Senators would join with us, in seeing to it that a matter of this nature be accorded careful attention by that committee. Hearings should be conducted and witnesses should be heard—not only from labor but other groups which could be affected.

Mr. President, it is my considered opinion that the pending amendment is too technical and involved to be considered hastily in this Chamber in this manner without benefit of committee study and recommendation. These are far-reaching implications.

Neither, in my opinion, is there reason to write into this measure further straitjacketing provisions which would be directed principally at organized labor, a segment of our society which already has had placed upon it by this Congress a stringent reporting and disclosure procedure.

Unless and until an amendment of the type and scope of the pending one proposed by the Senator from South Carolina has had careful consideration by an appropriate committee I will oppose it.

Mr. MORSE. I am always glad when the distinguished Senator from West Virginia [Mr. RANDOLPH] shares my point of view on any proposed legislation. I thank him for supporting me on this question.

Mr. COTTON. Mr. President, I am impelled to say, at this time, a word or two which I have been waiting during the course of the debate to submit regarding the bill, and what I shall say is equally applicable to the pending amendments.

Emotionally—and we are all subject to the emotional appeals of those who have been our friends and those who have been our opponents—I would be impelled to vote for these amendments because they are offered by my dear friend, the distinguished junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. THURMOND], for whom I have a deep affection and because, philosophically and ideologically, I have found myself in accord with him more frequently than not.

Emotionally, I might wish to support the amendments, because certainly I am one Senator who will receive no credit whatsoever from the leaders of organized labor for any vote I might cast in this body which would appear to be favorable to them. It was only a week or two ago that the leaders of some labor unions from my State came to my office. We had a most pleasant conversation concerning the pending legislation. They expressed their feelings and went on their way. Then when I opened my mail, I found three letters from their organizations gratuitously warning me that under no circumstances could they ever support me for reelection, and reminding me that they never had supported me for election.

In spite of these things, I do not feel that I can support the amendments, or the bill itself in its present form.

My own State of New Hampshire has a Corrupt Practices Act which is vastly more rigid, restrictive, and inclusive than anything which has been presented either in the bill or in any amendment offered on the floor. I do not believe that anything which could be enacted by Congress would place any new limits on any candidate or any election in my State. The bill will not have a personal effect on me and I can approach it without prejudice.

I have consistently voted against every amendment which has been offered to the bill which would curtail in any way, shape, or manner the privilege and the freedom of any American to support and to contribute to the support of the party or the candidates of his choice, so long as what he did was done openly and above the table.

After voting against the amendments I have previously opposed, I would be highly inconsistent if I were to vote in favor of these amendments, which—although in a sense they have the same general purpose—are leveled at someone else.

Mr. President, it is my deep-seated conviction that if we wish to make a contribution to "clean elections"—to use that rather abused term—we should pass a measure which will require complete reporting, and thus turn the merciless light of publicity upon every cent contributed by any person, anywhere, to any candidate or any party in any State of the Union, insofar as the United States Constitution permits the Congress to legislate in that field. I believe we should stop at that point. When we try to fix the ground rules in regard to how much can be contributed, or whether contributions can be used across State lines, or whether the funds contributed can be used only by committees which operate within a State, or whether they can be used by committees whose operations are interstate in character, we find ourselves involved in conflicts with State statutes, bogged down in trying to legislate on the Senate floor and in danger of making no headway at all.

In an earlier campaign for election to a seat in the United States Senate Mr. President, I discovered that under a Federal law, I had certain privileges which presumably superseded the State law. But I also discovered that if I violated the State law, my name could be removed from the ballot, regardless of what the Federal law said. Of course, I think most Members of this body will agree with me when I say that in running for election to the U.S. Senate, it would be a decided handicap if the candidate's name were not printed on the ballot. So, regardless of what the court might later have decided as to whether the Federal law superseded the State law, my colleagues may be sure that I did what any person of average commonsense would do under those circumstances: I complied completely with the State statute. As it now stands, this bill will create a multitude of conflicts with State election laws all over the Nation.

Mr. President, I probably shall not be able to vote for the passage of this so-called clean elections bill in its present form—even though the term "clean elections" may be bandied about this Chamber until it sounds and resounds, and until those on the streets get the idea that Senators who vote for the bill are in favor of purity, and that Senators who vote against the bill are opposed to purity.

Mr. President, when the final vote is taken on this bill, I shall find myself unable to vote for it if it goes much beyond the matter of requiring the full, complete, and frank disclosure of all campaign contributions and expenditures.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, will the Senator from New Hampshire yield?

Mr. COTTON. I yield to my distinguished friend from Arizona.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, what the distinguished Senator from New Hampshire is saying is, in effect, the criticism which I have leveled at this so-called "clean elections bill."

If we are going to have reporting—and I agree that there should be reporting—then let us have complete reporting.

The object of the Thurmond amendments, as I understand them, is to clarify the question of whether committees such as the Committee on Political Education are political-action committees.

On yesterday, I tried to assemble language which would provide for this; but, unfortunately, I was unable to do so.

When we are talking about the Committee on Political Education, I might remind my friend, the Senator from New Hampshire, that that committee engages in the following activities: compiling and publishing voting records, conducting political training courses, getting voters registered, providing election-day workers, providing automobiles to take voters to the polls, and holding political meetings.

The Senator from New Hampshire knows, as do all other Senators, that to engage in those activities costs money. We have no idea how much those activities by that committee cost, because the committee does not report on the cost of those activities. But, although this committee ostensibly operates for educational purposes, actually it is probably the most political committee in the United States. Yet this bill would not in any way require that committee to report.

Previously I said that my fear, in connection with this field, is that today the trend in business and management corporations is toward the establishment of identical committees, and that that trend will continue and will grow. In that event, some day we shall find this situation getting out of hand, when we have, on one side of the political arena, management, and, on the other side of the political arena, labor, with both of them standing on the same principle of economics—namely, the public be damned.

Mr. President, if the Senator from New Hampshire will permit me to make one other observation—and I can well understand his deep feeling in connection with this matter—I shall state that I only wish he could help the Senate provide for complete reporting.

But as the bill now stands, it is a phony "clean elections bill" because by no means does it require the reporting of all political expenditures in this country.

I thank the Senator from New Hampshire for his courtesy in yielding to me, Mr. President.

Mr. COTTON. Mr. President, my friend, the Senator from Arizona, knows that I am in complete accord with his views as to the necessity of laying down ground rules with regard to campaign contributions made by so-called education committees of labor, and I am also in favor of laying down ground rules in regard to campaign contributions made by all other groups.

If the amendments of the distinguished Senator from South Carolina [Mr. THURMOND] required, first, rigid reporting, and, second, applied to everyone and every organization, even though such requirements might be redundant, I might vote for the pending amendments, even in connection with this bill.

But, Mr. President, I say to my friend, the Senator from Arizona that, first, I cannot vote for the final passage of a bill which would plunge us into the field of primaries and would go up that area and a host of others to Federal control and to conflicts with State laws; and, second, although I feel deeply and strongly about the necessity of seeing to it that organizations representing organized labor are no longer permitted to have, in supporting candidates and supporting parties, privileges that other organizations do not have, yet I am constrained to believe that the problems which exist in that field—which I believe must be met head on—should be the subject of careful hearings, careful consideration, and well-thought-out legislation which will apply to everyone alike.

Mr. President, I have taken more time than I intended to consume. But I merely wished to make these points crystal clear, and to reiterate that I wish we could pass a bill which did not plunge into all these collateral issues, and I wish that we would not pass a bill which has been patched together on the floor of the Senate. Instead, I wish the Senate would pass a bill which would permit the States to be free to go into such situations which need to be gone into, under their own corrupt practices acts; and I wish we would pass a bill which would not hamper the States or interfere with the actions of the States in these other fields.

I wish very much that we would pass a bill which simply would confine itself to the necessity, the obligation, and the Federal requirement of absolute, complete reporting and publicity both before and after elections, as regards every contribution made—directly or indirectly—by anyone, anywhere, to any candidate.

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, I wish to speak briefly about the amendments, because I intend to vote against them, but I should like to declare my reasons for voting against them.

I believe that the basic principle of contributions by unions or corporations is wrong. I think they should be prohibited, because I do not believe that leaders of business organizations or labor organizations, or any other type of organizations, which have as their constituent members citizens of the United States—sometimes in very large numbers—should be permitted to give away the money of those members without their consent or against their will, which is frequently done.

There is no evidence at all that in labor unions of considerable size the members all think one way or that there do not exist very large minorities who would oppose contributions that are sometimes made by the leaders toward one party or another.

The principle behind such a prohibition is one which I have always felt is a sound one. I believe, therefore, contributions by unions and by corporations should be prohibited, because permitting such contributions violates the principle that a citizen should be able to have his money used to support any candidate or political issue he himself favors.

However, I believe that the pending amendments go too far and are inequitable and unfair to the rank-and-file members of labor unions, inasmuch as on page 2, subsection (b), line 17, prescribes certain penalties which a labor organization must endure if it contributes funds of the union in an election campaign.

This provision appears to suggest that a violation is to be determined by administrative action, that no action of the court is needed to determine it. If it were determined by administrative action, the members of a union would lose all of their rights before the National Labor Relations Board, even though many members of the union were opposed to the very action taken by their leaders.

It seems to me that is a highly inequitable penalty to be imposed, especially when one contrasts it with penalties against corporations to be found later in the bill. In that case the stockholders of corporations would not lose any rights at all, but the officers and directors of the corporation would be subject to fine, imprisonment, or both, which I think is a suitable penalty for that particular offense.

If the penalties were to be made parallel, it would seem the officers, directors, and trustees of a union would be the ones who would be penalized for using the funds of labor union members in violation of their wishes or in violation of the law—if unions are prohibited by law from contributing money, as I thought they were—but it appears from court decisions that funds for education are exempt from the law. This holding has been interpreted by many union leaders as giving them almost unlimited freedom to use funds for political action, whether the members of unions like it or not.

So, because I think this provision of the amendments is quite discriminatory and unfair, I shall have to oppose the amendments for the reasons which I have attempted to outline.

I repeat, however, in closing, I believe the principle is wrong.

I listened to my good friend from Oregon, who espoused taking off the wraps all the way around. I do not agree with that, because it puts the leaders in a position of contributing money of members who may have an entirely different point of view from that the leaders have, thus violating the rights of citizenship of the union members. While I believe in the principle of the prohibition of contributions by unions and corporations to election campaigns, I shall oppose the amendments as not coming to grips with the situation fairly and equitably.

Mr. KEATING obtained the floor.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. President, will the Senator from New York yield to me?

Mr. KEATING. I yield to the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. The distinguished Senator from New York is recognized as a good lawyer.

Mr. KEATING. I thank my friend. That was sometimes open to question during my practice of law by both my own friends and those on the opposite side, but I appreciate the compliment.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. That certainly has been my experience in serving with the Senator, both as a distinguished Member of the Senate, and Member of the House of Representatives. I always found that he was held in a high degree of esteem as a good lawyer—although I did not rise primarily for the purpose of complimenting the Senator.

Mr. KEATING. I thank the Senator from South Dakota. But when I am paid such a compliment, I always fear what is coming next.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. My primary intent was not to compliment the Senator, but simply to buttress an opinion by the reply I expect to get from the Senator when I ask him a question I desire to propound.

Mr. KEATING. I thank the Senator.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Under the provision in the amendments relating to contributions by national banks and corporations, it would appear to be clear that no national bank or corporation organized by authority of any law of Congress could make a contribution or expenditure, and so forth. I do not know to what extent this is a repetition of existing law, but, in any event, since this describes a condition under which a national bank or corporation organized by authority of any law passed by Congress could be brought to court and charged with a violation of law, would it be fair to say this would establish a condition for a national bank which might apply to a State-chartered bank?

Mr. KEATING. I do not think so, because of the wording further down in section 304, lines 14 and 15, where it is provided that any corporation whatsoever is prohibited from making a contribution or expenditure in connection with any election at which presidential and vice-presidential electors or a Senator or a Representative in Congress are to be voted for. This provision does make a distinction.

By provision of the bill, which I think is not a change from national law, national banks are prohibited from making a contribution in connection with any primary election or caucus or convention held to select candidates, meaning both candidates for the Senate and the House of Representatives; and any corporation whatsoever, which would include State banks, is prohibited from making contributions or expenditures in connection not only with the election of a Senator or Representative, but also presidential and vice-presidential electors. There is a distinction, but I believe that a State bank would run afoul of the latter part of the language.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. As a corporation?

Mr. KEATING. As a corporation. There are a few private banking institutions left in this country now, where an individual or a group of individuals do business as a partnership as a private bank in a State, and are allowed to do so. I believe a few of those still exist. They would not be under the prohibition of this language, in my judgment.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I appreciate the Senator's opinion in the matter. His logic appeals to me. Not having before me the present statute, I was not exactly sure wherein the proposed language differed from the present law.

Mr. KEATING. I think the principal difference, and perhaps the only difference, is the raising of the fine for violation from $5,000 to $10,000. I suppose that is a recognition of the fact that when the statute was enacted the dollar was worth more than it is today, and if a corporation were fined $5,000 then a comparable figure might be $10,000 now.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I thank the Senator.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, I shall be able to state my objections to these amendments well within the so-called 5-minute rule under which I became so accustomed to speak in the House of Representatives, but from which with such great facility I am learning how to depart in this body.

Mr. President, my objections to these amendments are threefold.

First, I feel strongly that the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare should review this proposal. This matter deals with the labor field. It does not seem to me it properly comes within the province of the Committee on Rules and Administration. It was never considered by the Committee on Rules and Administration. While I would be the first to concede the great abilities of the members of the Committee on Rules and Administration, equal in every respect to those of the members of the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, I feel it would be proper to have this matter reviewed by the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare before bringing it to the Senate.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. KEATING. I am happy to yield.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I may say to the Senator that a member of the committee staff listened to our earlier colloquy and he now points out to me that in the amended section 304, to which we were previously directing our remarks, the language proposed by the amendment drops out the phrase "or any labor organization," that appearing at two or three points in the present statute, which would place it in the same category as a national bank or any corporation when it comes to Federal offices. The obvious reason for that is that the Senator, in offering his amendments, has set up a separate section to deal with labor organizations and, therefore, has removed them from this section.

Mr. KEATING. I will say he not only deals with them adequately but he deals with them rather sternly and rather fully, in the first part of the proposal.

My second objection to the amendments is simply that they would do at least two things of sweeping importance. I feel that before we enact them the representatives of organized labor and the representatives of corporations and national banks should have an opportunity to be heard before any committee which reports such a bill.

The effect of section 209(a)(2), which prohibits the making of a contribution by a labor organization to any committee, whether political or nonpolitical in nature, for the purpose of influencing an election or a primary, political convention, or caucus held to select candidates, by its terms would be to outlaw the Committee on Political Education of the AFL–CIO.

The Committee on Political Education in the seven times I have happened to be a candidate for Federal office has consistently supported my opponent, but I do not think that the answer is to outlaw this organization. I believe the way to meet that problem is to conduct ourselves by our votes and in other manner as Federal representatives in such a way that we make an appeal to the great men and women of this country who cast their votes, even though we may not be able to satisfy the leaders of organized labor that we are friendly to them. I would not be adverse to being able to convince the leaders of that fact, but I certainly do not feel that the proper manner of meeting the problem is by outlawing this organization which has been built up, which is the express purpose of subsection (2) of this section.

Conversely, with regard to corporations, we raise the fine which they might suffer for running afoul of the statute from $5,000 to $10,000. I apprehend that they might have objections, and representatives of corporations should certainly have every opportunity to present their objections before we enact such a provision.

Finally, my third reason for opposing this proposal is that I have serious doubts about the constitutionality of parts of it. On the second page, among the expenditures which we would permit are expenditures "for the purpose of disseminating impartial statements of the issues in the election, primary, convention, or caucus and the position of the labor organization on such issues."

I suppose that all of us who have had information disseminated which is adverse to our own position would be inclined to think it was scarcely impartial. We usually do not think anyone who so vigorously opposes us is impartial. He would be impartial if he were on our side, if he thinks the same way we do.

After saying that one who disseminates a partial statement or a one-sided statement of the issue runs contrary to the statute, then it is provided that any officer who consents to that or permits it is punishable by a fine of $1,000, or, if it is willful, $10,000, and he also can be thrown in the "clink."

Mr. President, those are penal provisions relating to the determination of whether a statement issued is partial or impartial. I would think that it might very well run afoul of the first amendment relating to freedom of speech and of the press, and it might also contravene the due process clause. I have serious doubts that we can sit here and say we are going to send somebody to jail because he disseminates a one-sided statement of the issues in Congress, or makes attacks upon Members of Congress.

For the reasons I have stated, Mr. President, I feel constrained to vote against the amendments. I hope they will be defeated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendments offered by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. THURMOND].

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I believe that my amendments are perfectly clear. The points which have been raised against them, I think, are entirely without merit. Many amendments have been considered in connection with this bill that did not come before the committee. Such a thing frequently happens in connection with bills considered by the Senate.

The amendments are not unfair amendments. They apply to corporations, and they apply to labor unions. The bill is a very important measure aimed at stopping the power of money in controlling elections in this country. But inasmuch as the principal opposition to the amendments centers around the point that it has not been considered in committee, I will withdraw my amendments and introduce a separate bill, which can be referred to the committee and receive full consideration.

For that reason, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the yeas and nays be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. THURMOND. I now withdraw my amendments.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Carolina withdraws his amendments.

The bill is open to further amendment.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I have an amendment which is not controversial. I have had some discussion with the chairman of the committee about it. It relates to the last section of the bill, with respect to the effective date of the bill if it should be enacted into law.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. President, may we have a little quiet? This amendment is not printed, and it is important that we be able to hear the discussion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will be in order.

Mr. DIRKSEN. The language in the bill now would make the bill effective as of January 1, 1960. It was not necessary to modify that date so as to bring it in line with the calendar. My amendment merely provides that titles I, II, and III, shall take effect on January 1, 1961, except that the provisions of this Act shall not apply to contributions and expenditures made prior to that date. So it would not have retroactive effect. "But nothing in this Act shall relieve any person from filing any statements or reports required under the law in force prior to the date of the enactment of this Act."

So my amendment would do three things. First, it would make the act effective on January 1, 1961. It would make it inapplicable to such things as contributions and expenditures which occurred prior to the effective date; and, third, it would relieve no candidate from his responsibility for making the necessary filings under existing law.

This amendment was arrived at in consultation with the distinguished chairman of the committee, and I understand that it is agreeable.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 1, line 4, it is proposed to strike "1959" and insert in lieu thereof "1960."

On page 19, it is proposed to strike lines 10 through 15, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

SEC. 401. Titles I and II and the amendments made by title III shall take effect on January 1, 1961, except that the provisions of this Act shall not apply to contributions and expenditures made prior to such date; but nothing in this Act shall relieve any person from filing any statements or reports required under the law in force prior to the date of enactment of this Act.

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. President, I had a similar amendment prepared several days ago, relating to the effective date of the act and the other language appearing in the amendment which the distinguished minority leader is offering on behalf of himself and me. We have discussed it, and we are in complete agreement.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I have another amendment which I send to the desk and ask to have stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment offered by the Senator from Illinois will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 3, lines 14 and 15, and lines 19 and 20, it is proposed to strike the words "or anything of value" and insert in lieu thereof the words "or any other personal or real property."

On page 6, line 6, following the word "cash," it is proposed to insert the words "and other real and personal property other than office fixtures and supplies."

On page 16, lines 14 and 15, it is proposed to strike the words "or anything of value" and insert in lieu thereof the words "or any other personal or real property."

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I address my remarks particularly to my distinguished friend from Missouri [Mr. HENNINGS]. If there is any objection I shall not press this amendment. However, I felt in duty bound to direct attention to the fact that in the definition of contributions are included gifts, subscriptions, loans, advances, deposits of money, or anything of value. Some years ago a rather interesting question arose in connection with a congressional race. There were donated services. There were people who typed letters. Even members of the Representative's staff went home to help him. Those are services; but who shall say that a service is not a thing of value?

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at that point?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. KEATING. It was even claimed here yesterday that a speech by the distinguished Senator from New Hampshire, made in behalf of a candidate in some other State, might be a thing of value. No one claimed it to be except the Senator, but it was asserted here that it would be a thing of value. I rise to say that it would be a thing of value. But I think perhaps those words are open to some objection.

Mr. DIRKSEN. That is the reason for offering the words "or any real or personal property" in place of the term "anything of value." The amendment provides a rather tangible and precise definition.

An accountant may donate his services. They represent a thing of value. An advisory committee may go into a campaign and donate its services. But those services are a thing of value. The definition can be spelled out in many forms. In a very close election, in connection with which this question might arise, who knows what the court interpretation might be?

Mr. KEATING Mr. President, will the Senator again yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I think it is the intention of the committee, when it speaks of anything of value, that it means something of real or tangible form. That is the reason for the additional words.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. CURTIS. Certainly individuals volunteer to do things. That is an exercise not only of their political rights, but their responsibilities. But suppose that some group were to hire 100 or 200 people to work for 30 days prior to an election, as has been done by certain groups, including COPE and others. What would be the effect of the Senator's amendment on that situation?

Mr. DIRKSEN. If it is a donated service, a voluntary service——

Mr. CURTIS. No; it is not a donated service. A political organization, or an organization prohibited from taking part in politics, hires 100 people and pays them daily wages and expenses to go out and work in a political campaign for a month before the election. Does the Senator's amendment take that out of the definition of a contribution or expenditure?

Mr. DIRKSEN. The amendment might very conceivably take it out; except, of course, that it is a hired service, and for the hired service there would be either an express contract or an implied contract that puts it on an entirely different basis. What I have in mind, of course, are the strictly voluntary services which so often are offered in a campaign and which can be defined as something of value.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. CURTIS. Would it be fair for the legislative history to show that what the distinguished Senator from Illinois is attempting to remove from the definition of expenditure or contribution is the rendering of voluntary services, and that if someone is paid wages for the purpose of doing campaign work the wages shall be regarded as a contribution?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Well, directly in point with the Senator's observation, we leave in the bill the language which says "and includes a contract, promise, or agreement whether or not legally enforcible, to make a contribution." Whether that comes within the illustration the Senator cites, I do not know, although I would rather gather it does.

Mr. CURTIS. I spoke at a political meeting in Lansing, Mich., an election or two ago, at a hotel. I was sought out by certain members of a labor union who were displeased because their dues money was being used to support certain activities. It happened to be for a Democratic candidate. They brought to me a copy of the minutes of a meeting. I photostated the minutes. I have the photostat. The Attorney General has it also. I do not know what he is doing with it, but he has it. Those minutes recite that they were hiring a certain number of people—I believe it was 100—for 1 month before the election, to do campaigning. This was done by an organization prohibited from engaging in politics. They were providing paid manpower. What I am afraid of is that the Senator's amendment will be construed to mean that providing paid manpower does not come within the purview of an expenditure or a contribution.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. KEATING. I am not satisfied with the words "anything of value." I should like to propose a suggestion which perhaps might be of interest to the Senator from Illinois. I have doubts abouts the words "anything of value." I do not believe they are precise enough. I would anticipate that it would be a matter of at least a week or 10 days, and perhaps longer, before the bill would be considered in the House. I wonder if it would not be better to have us devote some study to the matter and give the staff a chance to study the language of this section. I would suggest to the Senator from Illinois that he might withdraw his amendment, with the understanding that through the staff of the committee and in conference, consideration be given to the very point he has made.

Personally I entertain some doubt about the precision of the words "anything of value." I certainly want to do nothing that will interfere with the Senator from New Hampshire speaking anywhere he would like to speak in behalf of anyone.

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield to the distinguished chairman.

Mr. HENNINGS. I am sorry that I was divested during part of the colloquy between the able minority leader and the junior Senator from New York. I would hope that, since this matter relates to verbiage which has not been presented heretofore, except that the Senator did mention something to me about it last night, that the Senator might be content with striking "anything of value" without setting forth anything with reference to real or personal property, so that the language would be subject to interpretation upon the facts as to whether anything of value had been contributed, or whether the services were actually paid for or not.

Mr. DIRKSEN. If the distinguished Senator from Missouri wishes to offer those words, I shall be glad to withdraw the amendment.

Mr. HENNINGS. I, accordingly, offer the amendment. At lines 14 and 15, on page 3, I propose an amendment to strike out the words "or anything of value." Does that satisfy the Senator's purposes?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Yes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Illinois is withdrawn. The Senator from Missouri offers his amendment as he has stated it.

Mr. KEATING. I wonder if the complete elimination of those words takes care of a situation of the kind related by the distinguished Senator from Nebraska [Mr. CURTIS], with relation to the hiring of workers to do a great deal of work for a congressional candidate. The words "gift, subscription, loan, advance, or deposit, of money" would be left in the bill if we struck out the words "anything of value."

My initial impression is that that would go further than we intend to go. I think we should include within the definition of a contribution a situation such as was referred to by the Senator from Nebraska.

I would appreciate it if the Senator from Nebraska would address himself to that point, because, as I say, we are bringing this up on the floor for the first time. There is always some hazard when we try to legislate in this manner. If that is satisfactory to the Senator from Nebraska, I would not be inclined to press my objection. However, I do think he has raised a very legitimate case and we ought to try to come to grips with it. "Anything of value" was written into the bill for a purpose. I address myself to the Senator from Nebraska and ask him whether he thinks the complete elimination of the words "anything of value" would inhibit or prohibit the type of thing which he had in mind.

Mr. CURTIS. I do not know how to answer the Senator's question. Certainly any expenditure, regardless of its end result or how it is manifested, should be included.

Mr. KEATING. If we are to strike out the words "anything of value," perhaps we should include the reference to an express or implied contract, or words to that effect, which the Senator from Illinois had in his original amendment. I am not sure that striking out the words "anything of value" does what we want to do.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, if we strike out the words "anything of value," will it be a violation of law for a corporation to give a candidate $10,000 in postage stamps?

Mr. DIRKSEN. No; that is a gift.

Mr. KEATING. I would think that would be a gift.

Mr. HENNINGS. That is covered under the general definition of "including a gift."

Mr. KEATING. In order to make some legislative history, is it the opinion of the Senator from Missouri that, with the words "anything of value" stricken out, it is intended to include within the term "gift" the furnishing of substantial services for hire, other than voluntary?

Mr. HENNINGS. If those services are paid for, of course.

Mr. CURTIS. The language of the bill is:

> The term "contribution" includes a gift, subscription, loan, advance, or deposit, of money, or anything of value.

If one makes a gift of a postage stamp, that is something of value.

Mr. HENNINGS. "Or transfer of funds between committees, and includes a contract, promise, or agreement, whether or not legally enforcible, to make a contribution."

Mr. CURTIS. But it is a gift or a transfer of money. Strike out "anything of value," and the language is confined to money.

Mr. HENNINGS. That depends on what the Senator means by "money." Does the Senator mean cash?

Mr. CURTIS. It is in the bill reported by the Senator.

Mr. HENNINGS. If we strike that, it will mean one thing. As I understand, the bill reads "includes a gift, subscription, loan, advance, or deposit, of money, or anything of value, or transfer of funds between committees, and includes a contract, promise, or agreement."

Mr. CURTIS. But if we strike out "anything of value," nothing is left but money.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York will state it.

Mr. KEATING. Who has the floor?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri has the floor.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Missouri yield to me?

Mr. HENNINGS. I am glad to yield. I am not quite certain what we are trying to do, except to clutter up the language of what we thought was to be the last 10 minutes of the consideration of the bill. I do not think all this discussion goes to any essential point or factor of the proposed legislation, really, either way. If we say "anything of value," it will certainly be for the courts to interpret the nature of the services which are of value. I should assume that the language would require that those services be paid for.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Missouri yield?

Mr. HENNINGS. I yield.

Mr. KEATING. I fear that the Senator from Nebraska may have a point by raising the question of the punctuation. The language reads: "gift, comma, subscription, comma, loan, comma, advance, comma, or deposit, comma, of money."

That, as I understand it, makes "money" modified by "gift, subscription, loan, advance, or deposit."

If we strike out the comma following the word "deposit," the phrase will simply be "deposit of money."

Thereby, it would be open to the interpretation which the Senator from Missouri has suggested, that if services are supplied, then they come within the word "gift." Therefore, I offer as an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Missouri the removal of the comma after the word "gift" on line 19. But in offering my amendment, I renew my suggestion that the most appropriate and orderly way to deal with this question would be other than on the Senate floor, and in a conference. But if we are to legislate here, I think this comma might rise up to haunt us if it is left in the bill.

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HENNINGS. I should be perfectly willing, in the interest of trying to preserve some unanimity of thought and providing some degree of continuity of the discussion, to strike the commas. I do not think it will make any difference.

Mr. KEATING. It is one comma.

Mr. HENNINGS. To my untutored mind, we are now quibbling about words which are, in the last analysis, susceptible of interpretation. When we talk about "anything of value," I should assume that the holding of any court would be that services paid for would be something of value. I would not say that certain voluntary services would be something of value.

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from California will state it.

Mr. KUCHEL. Is the question now before the Senate the proposed amendment of the Senator from New York [Mr. KEATING], that a sole and single comma be eliminated from the bill on page 3, commencing on line 13, and more particularly the comma which is before the word "of" on line 14.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is advised that the amendment of the Senator from New York will have to be considered after the Senate has acted on the amendment of the Senator from Missouri, because the two amendments deal with different portions of the bill.

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri will state it.

Mr. HENNINGS. Who has the floor?

Mr. KEATING. Has the Senator from California yielded to me?

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I believe the Senator from Missouri has the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that the Senator from Missouri has the floor, but that the Senator from Missouri yielded to the Senator from California.

Mr. HENNINGS. I yielded for a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, will the Senator further yield?

Mr. HENNINGS. I shall be glad to yield for any purpose which would help to clarify language which has been in the act since 1925.

Mr. KUCHEL. My mind runs back to my freshman year in law school. I was enrolled in a class on contracts. I remember that my very scholarly law school professor in the class on contracts drummed into our ears that it was necessary to have a quid pro quo to create a valid and enforceable contract in the State from which I come, but that the quid pro quo could be anything of value no matter how little; indeed he said it could be ever so slight, even a single peppercorn.

I suggest that if we start now, here on the floor chopping up this section of the bill, after the words "of money, or anything of value," we might add, "even a peppercorn."

I remember another phrase from law school days; I am certain that the distinguished Presiding Officer will remember it too. It is the phrase "reductio ad absurdum." I suggest its relevance to the present debate in the Senate.

It seems to me that when we have a bill which uses the rather plainly understandable English word, "contribution," and goes on to enumerate some of the things it includes, we ought to consider that any reasonable-minded person or court ought to understand what a contribution is. When the bill says it includes certain specific things, it is simply by way of classification; it does not in any fashion limit its meaning; it does not exclude what, to a reasonable man, the Anglo-Saxon word "contribution" means.

I know what a contribution in a political campaign is. So do you, Mr. President. So do all Senators. I reported my contributions in my political campaigns for the Senate. So did you, each of you. They are on file in the office of the Secretary of the Senate.

I respectfully suggest that the time has come when, perhaps, we should not continue to waste time, to quibble over a poor, little, single comma; perhaps we should get along with the bill, so that some of us can devote the rest of the afternoon to other matters which we deem important.

Mr. HENNINGS. I can only say "amen" to the exceedingly sensible, illuminating, happily succinct, direct remarks of the distinguished acting minority leader.

Since we are talking about commas, at this stage of the proceedings, and discussing the meaning of certain words, I again point out that this is all well set forth in the old Corrupt Practices Act. This matter has been passed upon time and again. It is verbiage which appeals to the minds of reasonable men and is easily understood.

I regret that we find ourselves enmeshed in what now seems to be a purely legalistic discussion of something which, as I see it, has no real relevance whatsoever to the bill.

If we have to strike anything—and I would prefer not to strike anything—but if we have to strike anything, I will withdraw the amendment.

We might strike "anything of value," because preceding that the language is "gift, subscription, loan, advance, or deposit," and then "transfer of funds." But I cannot, for the life of me, understand how it makes any difference.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HENNINGS. I yield.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Commas have their place in the scheme of things. Some years ago a comma was omitted from a tariff bill between the words "fruit" and "trees." That cost the Federal Government a tidy sum in losses, for without that comma the tariff applied to fruit trees, but not to fruit and trees. So it can be seen that commas have a place in the universe.

As I have said, I do not care to press the amendment, but I do want to have some legislative history made.

Mr. President, a very scholarly treatise which I read some years ago in the Harvard Law Review began in this fashion:

> Congressional intent is a fiction; there is no such thing as congressional intent. Congressional intent is what the courts say it is.

So, Mr. President, in a close race, under a criminal statute the meaning of that provision might very well be ventilated; and then the use of the comma or the failure to use the comma, and the use or the failure to use those words, and the provisions included or the provisions excluded, would take on some real significance for some fellow citizens.

Mr. President, we have made the legislative history, and I am quite prepared to vote on this amendment. If some Senators wish to vote to eliminate that portion of the bill, that is their privilege. But I wish to be very, very sure that the whole story has been told and that the issue has been raised on the floor of the Senate.

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. President, I did not mean to belittle or demean in the least the suggestion which was made by my friend, the Senator from Illinois, nor, as one who has tried to understand the law, at least in some of its aspects, did I mean to say that at times a comma is not vastly important.

But, Mr. President, honestly I do not believe we would improve upon this proposed legislation if we were now to make substitutions in the language or changes in the wording or if we were now to strike out certain commas or certain words.

I would be willing to strike out some; but if that were to be done, we would get into difficulties in regard to other interpretations, which, so far as I know, have not been given consideration by those who have studied this field.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, let us proceed to vote on the amendment of the Senator from Missouri to strike out the words "or anything of value."

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. President, I withdraw the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Missouri is withdrawn.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Mr. President, I call up the amendment which I have at the desk.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, is not another amendment pending at this time?

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. I understood that the amendment of the Senator from Missouri was withdrawn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That amendment was withdrawn; and the amendment of the Senator from Louisiana is in order.

Mr. KEATING. Is not there pending an amendment to strike out a comma?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Such an amendment would not have then been in order, because there was then before the Senate an amendment, offered by the Senator from Missouri, to the language appearing on page 3, in line 14; and the amendment referred to by the Senator from New York applied to a different portion of the same page of the bill.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry——

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Mr. President, do I not have the floor? Or has the Chair recognized another Senator, to permit another Senator to discuss my amendment before I can even have my amendment read by the clerk?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York rose to propound a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. KEATING. My parliamentary inquiry is whether any question was raised about the amendment to strike out the comma, at the time when that amendment was offered.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Mr. President, I decline to yield. I do not have to yield for that purpose, if I have the floor; and I had the floor, and I called up my amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is correct; and the amendment of the Senator from Louisiana will, upon his request, be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. At the end of the bill, it is proposed to add a new section, as follows:

STATE PRIMARIES

SEC. 213. No person's name shall appear on a ballot or voting machine in any general election for a seat in the United States Senate or House of Representatives unless that person has been nominated in a primary election in which all registered or otherwise properly qualified members of his party shall have had an opportunity to vote: Provided, however, That such conditions shall not apply to names written by the hand of the voter: And provided further, That the regular nomination by primary election shall not be necessary for a candidate for Senator or Congressman whose party did not receive more than 10 per centum of the votes cast in the previous senatorial or congressional election for the office to which he aspires.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, will the Senator from Louisiana yield, for the purpose of the suggestion of the absence of a quorum, if it is understood that in yielding for that purpose he will not lose the floor?

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Yes.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that at this time I may yield for that purpose, without losing the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Then, Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Mr. President, I modify my amendment on page 2, by striking out the word "Congressman" and inserting the word "Representative."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The modification will be made.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Mr. President, if my amendment is adopted, I believe it will be the most significant portion of the entire bill.

This amendment is in the great liberal tradition of those who favored adoption of the constitutional amendment which provides for the popular election of Senators, instead of the previous election of Senators by the State legislatures.

The Senate will recall that the 17th amendment, adopted in 1913, provides that Senators shall be elected by the people of the States. But, Mr. President, unfortunately, in some respects the real, true intent of the popular election of Senators amendment, adopted as part of a great liberal movement early in the 20th century, never became fully effective, because in certain States there existed the so-called caucus system or the convention system, whereby certain party bosses were in position to deny the people an opportunity to express themselves, and primaries were not held.

Wisely, 47 of the 50 States have abolished the caucus system or the convention system in connection with elections to all major Federal offices—in other words, in connection with elections of Members of the House of Representatives, Senators, and Governors. As a result, the people of those States are able to make themselves heard.

But, unfortunately, the march of progress, at least in certain respects, has not reached three of the States. One of those States—and it is the most populous in the Nation—is the great State of New York, where any Senator or Representative can be chosen by convention, which may be subject to the control of the party bosses or the Governor, or subject to the control of various and sundry persons—which in many cases works out differently from the way the people want it.

We have seen from the newspapers how even a young man like Franklin D. Roosevelt, Jr., son of a former Governor, son of a fourtime President of the United States, was denied the opportunity to run for Governor, and denied the opportunity to submit himself to the people of his State, by a convention.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. I yield.

Mr. FREAR. Is the Senator from Louisiana attempting to deny the States the right of selecting candidates in the manner which they prescribe, rather than by Federal legislation?

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. I am trying to guarantee the people of the States the right to elect candidates of their choice, the most qualified men, and make them their Representatives and Senators.

Mr. FREAR. That is not the way I understood what the Senator just said. He was criticizing several States which have the convention system of selecting nominees for office. To me, that is a State's right. I think the States ought to retain that right. I am a bit amazed that the Senator from Louisiana is taking this position in opposition to that practice.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. I am glad the Senator has brought up that question in the debate. I believe I am going to persuade the Senator, before I conclude my 15-minute talk, that this is in line with a great liberal principle and does no violence to the historic principle of State rights.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Yes.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I wonder what the situation would be under a law such as we have in my State. We have a primary law, but it is provided that if there are enough candidates running so that no one of them gets 35 percent of the votes, then the choice of who will be the nominee rests with the State convention. There is first a primary, but, instead of there being a runoff, if nobody gets 35 percent of the votes, then the selection of the nominee goes to the State convention.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. I was not familiar with the South Dakota system, and doubt that this amendment would disturb it. This proposal merely requires that a person must have submitted himself in a primary in which there is had an opportunity to run and to have the party vote for a candidate.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. In my own case, the first time I was nominated for Congress, I ran in a primary, and there were four of us running. We were pretty well bunched. Nobody got 35 percent of the votes. The selection of the nominee went to the State convention. State conventions are held to select constitutional officers such as the State treasurer. Governors are nominated in the primaries, and unless they get 35 percent of the vote, as is true of every candidate for Member of Congress, the selection goes to the State convention. I received my nomination at the convention, after I had run in the primary, where nobody received 35 percent of the vote. The language of the amendment states, "Unless one has been nominated in the primary." I ran in the primary, but I got the nomination at the convention.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. I did not know the South Dakota system existed. It never occurred to me that a candidate could receive the greatest number of votes of the people and yet the convention could pick another person. That would have been unfortunate for the Senator from Wisconsin, who had the party bosses against him, but the people for him. The caucus or convention could advise the people, "We don't care how you voted. This is the man whose name will go on the ballot."

I do not care to modify my amendment, but if the Senator from South Dakota will prepare an amendment to prevent that undemocratic practice in the State of South Dakota, I shall be glad to consider it.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I would not say the practice is so undemocratic. It is the practice not only in the State of South Dakota; I know Iowa has a law that provides a certain percentage of the votes must be obtained or the nomination goes further.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. I regret that such a situation exists in South Dakota. I thought the New York system was bad enough, but the South Dakota system seems to be worse. There the caucus may reverse the judgment of the people of the State. How do Senators like that? One man may have received 34 percent of the votes, another man 2 percent, another man 1 percent, and the caucus can select the man who got the 1 percent. How do Senators like that? I did not know that system existed. Here is a book on government in front of me that failed to apprise me of that fact.

That would appear to be a most undemocratic procedure—one of these closed-room conventions, smoke-filled rooms, where politicians can meet and reverse the judgment of the people in an election, where everybody had a right to vote. I must say that is worse than I thought existed anywhere in the country.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I hope the Senator is not going to get in the position of casting reflection on another State, because if so, I shall have to invoke the rule, if he says my State is a horrible example. The practice in South Dakota is similar to that in other States where they do not get 35 percent or a certain percent of the votes.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. I want it clearly understood that if I read a history of party caucuses or conventions it does not mean I have disrespect for the States, because most of those States have corrected those practices.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I do not want the distinguished Senator from Louisiana to be permitted here to say that the practice in my State is undemocratic or that the practice in any other State is undemocratic. I resent any such implication.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. If the Senator wishes to make a point merely because I referred to an undemocratic practice, where the will of the people is reversed by a party caucus, he has a right to make an objection, and he can have me put in my seat, and I hope the Senate will then permit me to proceed in order and point out the history of these caucuses. I did not bring up South Dakota; the Senator did.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I know I did——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Louisiana has the floor. Does he yield?

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. I do not yield at this time. I wish to go further, and then I will yield to the Senator if he wants to discuss the South Dakota practices further.

First let me direct myself to the question of constitutionality. This amendment is about the only thing that has been offered on the bill which is clearly constitutional. Back in the olden days we had a Supreme Court which ruled that the Federal Government could not regulate a primary election. But, with the passage of time and with new judges being appointed and different pressures and situations existing, that decision was reversed. Nowadays the Court holds that the Federal Government can regulate primaries. Even though the Court has so ruled, I am not here to quarrel with it. I am arguing for the constitutionality of my amendment to require that the will of the people be respected. I am safe in relying on the old rulings.

Let me read from the Constitution. This is what it says.

Article I, section 4, reads:

> The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives, shall be prescribed in each State by the legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators.

Of course, that section referred to the days when Senators were elected by

State legislatures, which practice the people reversed subsequently by adoption of the 17th amendment.

Clearly the Congress had a right to select the time for the election of Senators and Representatives; Congress had the right to fix the time and the manner in which an election shall be held. That is the old law. As the law goes, the Federal Government can control the time and circumstances under which the election of Representatives and Senators shall be conducted.

Mr. President, I have yet to see any person who has read that section or looked at any of the decisions who would contest that this is clearly constitutional. It comes within section 4 of article I of the Constitution. It is clearly in the spirit of the 17th amendment. In fact, this amendment is necessary to make the spirit of the 17th amendment fully effective.

Look at that South Dakota situation, where the people can have an election of Senators or Representatives and the caucus can meet to reverse the judgment of the people. This would make the 17th amendment truly meaningful, because it would mean the caucuses could not meet to reverse the judgment of the people. Furthermore, a major party caucus could not select a candidate without referring the matter to the people.

Mr. President, I should like to refer to a few of the evils which I would seek to outlaw. I shall read from a book on government entitled "American Politics and the Party System," written by Bone.

Most of the weaknesses of the convention system in the 19th century were due to their unrepresentative composition and undemocratic organization and procedure. A basic part of any convention system is the choice of delegates to the convention. If the convention is to be subject to popular control, the basis of representation in that body is a matter of real importance. The unit of representation and apportionment of delegates is left to the party committees so that when delegate districts are drawn up by the party there is a tendency to resort to gerrymandering in favor of the faction in power. Many "packed" and unrepresentative conventions resulted from party gerrymandering.

Character of delegates: In practice, delegates were chosen to various town, district, or county conventions by a town meeting or caucus of party voters; the county and district conventions in turn selected delegates to the State, and later national, conventions.

Further on it says:

As always, the independent voters were not well organized and were often ineffective in the meetings called to select delegates. On the other hand, the factional and machine leaders were well organized and successfully chose either themselves or their own men as delegates to attend the convention. All too frequently the "best" persons failed to participate in the selection of delegates.

Let me make it clear I am not making an invidious reference to the State of Illinois when I read the next paragraph. I praise that great State for correcting the kind of thing to which I am going to refer:

The breakdown of the process of choosing delegates was shown in the low estate of the composition of the Cook County, Ill., convention in 1896. Of its unwieldy body of 723 delegates, over 150 either had criminal records or had been tried for crimes.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. I yield.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I think, upon investigation, the Senator will find that was a Republican convention. [Laughter.]

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. I ask Senators to listen to this, Mr. President:

Of its unwieldy body of 723 delegates, over 150 either had criminal records or had been tried for crimes, 148 were political employees, and over one-third were saloonkeepers.

Mr. KUCHEL. They must have been Democrats.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. I continue to read:

Conventions of this quality were easily dominated by corrupt bosses and the many delegates owing their jobs to the machine were expected to take orders. Underworld elements were in a position, through their men in the convention, to influence the choice of nominees. The buying and selling of places in the convention also was not unknown.

Not only was the composition of the conventions a mark against the device, but the procedures and behavior of those bodies themselves were even worse. Careful deliberations frequently gave way to indecorum, commotion, and emotion. The hidden managers prepared in advance both the organization and the agenda of the convention. Robert M. La Follette described one convention in these words:

"Away in some retired room behind locked doors the masters of the machine sit in quiet conference. They have issued their orders to those in nominal control. The program of the convention is all prepared. The temporary and permanent chairmen have been elected in advance. * * * These men have been selected by masters of the machine with considerate judgment. There will be no mistakes made. Men designated in advance will be recognized by the chairman for all important motions at the right time. All troublesome points of order will be decided in the right way."

[Laughter.]

Mr. President, I think it is well to point out that it was the great founder of the Progressive Party, who found, unfortunately, it necessary to leave the Republican Party in order to pursue his convictions, was picked by Senators as one of the greatest Senators of all time. His picture is in the Senate reception room to prove it—many of us attended that great ceremony—and honored the man who abolished that kind of corrupt machine control in his State of Wisconsin.

It was a wonderful thing he did. Where would that present great senior Senator from Wisconsin be if Bob La Follette had not done so? I can recall all too well when the machine in Wisconsin announced that ALEXANDER WILEY was no longer acceptable. Unfortunately for the machine, the people did not agree with that. They themselves had an opportunity, thanks to Bob La Follette, Sr., to go to the polls to make their will felt, and they refused to throw out a great U.S. Senator merely because the party "bosses" did not want him. Was it not a wonderful thing that we had such democracy? Thank the merciful Lord for Bob La Follette, who did this in Wisconsin.

Now all States but three have now abolished this system, with the qualified exemptions referred to here.

In addition to the need to correct evil I argue that it is morally proper to require what the great majority of States have already done.

Mr. President, we have been seeing this body make its decisions, under the leadership of that great junior Senator from New York, who has stayed on the floor religiously. I do not believe the Senator has left the Chamber for more than 30 seconds during the last week, even for so much as to get himself a sandwich.

The Senator desires to regulate the primary elections. I must say he made a diligent effort in that regard. Shortly after the elections last November I read in the newspapers that the Senator said he would go to the South to view the conditions, just like Eisenhower said he would go to Korea to study the conditions, so that he could regulate them better. And he did. He kept his word, like Eisenhower. I admire him and praise him for it.

How can one regulate well unless one knows from practical experience about that which he would regulate? The great Senator from New York—an intelligent, able, brilliant, experienced man—and I speak of the junior Senator from New York, though both of the Senators are great Senators—apparently did not realize that he would never be successful in regulating southern primaries the way he would like to do unless he had practical experience in running in primaries.

The Senator from New York quite correctly said he was not picked in a smoke-filled room. No. Nelson Rockefeller does not smoke. There were only two people in the room, he and Nelson Rockefeller. His statement appears in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of last Wednesday. Nelson Rockefeller called him in and said, "Would you not like to run on the Republican ticket?" and he said, "I think I would." Nelson said, "Fine. I will send word down to the convention, and if they will go along with me"—do Senators think there is any doubt that they would go along with Nelson Rockefeller—"if they will go along with me, you will be on the ticket." And he said, "Fine."

On the other hand, the Democrats have not always been satisfied with the procedures. A young man like Franklin D. Roosevelt, Jr., who wanted to offer himself for Governor of his State, ran into problems. Could he do that? No. Carmine DeSapio would not let him.

Why should we not let the people decide? That same young man, the son of the former Governor, the son of a four time elected President, from New York, wanted to offer himself for Congress, but he had to go out and walk the streets as an independent candidate, to get his name on the ballot as an independent.

He, as one of the most successful men in running the hard way, knew only too well it was hopeless to try the same thing in regard to the governorship or in regard to being a U.S. Senator. So he had to lose his opportunity to at least run for the job.

Mr. President, I want to call only one more witness for my amendment. I want to call one of the greatest witnesses I believe anybody could call, one of the most famous of all people:

Judge not, that ye be not judged.
For with what judgment ye judge, ye shall be judged: and with what measure ye mete, it shall be measured to you again.
And why beholdest thou the mote—

Mr. President, for those who may not be Bible readers, let me say that this mote means a mere speck of dust, not a cinder. It is only a mere speck of dust.

And why beholdest thou the mote that is in thy brother's eye, but considerest not the beam that is in thine own eye?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. I yield.

Mr. DOUGLAS. As I remember that passage, it did not say that one should not behold the beam in his neighbor's eye merely because one might have a mote in his own eye.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Let me read the rest of the passage, and I believe we can get together on it.

Or how wilt thou say to thy brother, Let me pull out the mote out of thine eye; and, behold, a beam is in thine own eye?
Thou hypocrite—

I am not referring to any Senator at this point. I am just quoting Jesus [laughter]— first cast out the beam out of thine own eye; and then shalt thou see clearly to cast out the mote out of thy brother's eye.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. I yield to my distinguished friend from Illinois.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Ought not one to cast out both the mote from one's own eye and the beam from his brother's eye?

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. I could not agree with the Senator more. Here we have a bill to regulate primaries. My amendment would provide that the regulator be regulated by his own regulation. What makes better sense, if we are to regulate primaries, to require that there be such elections, and let the will of the people be heard?

I believe this amendment would be very significant in guaranteeing free, honest elections. I am emphasizing the word "elections." How can we have free and honest elections if there are no elections at all?

Some time ago someone whom I always regarded as a party boss said that he never stole any ballots. I always had the impression that the person never stole an individual ballot, because he preferred to switch whole boxes of ballots. That particular individual had even a more effective tactic. He would file a lawsuit to take the candidate's name off the ballot, and occasionally such a suit might be successful.

Which is worse—to steal a dozen or 100 ballots, or to steal a whole election by taking a man's name off the ballot? That is in effect what happens in the caucuses. That is what Congress thought it was outlawing when it passed the 17th amendment and the States ratified it to make it effective.

Why should we not guarantee democratic procedures? If we are to say that one's own mother may not contribute a certain amount of money to his campaign fund, why not take one further step and guarantee democratic procedures which do not exist today?

We can do so merely by pursuing the spirit which was intended when the Congress voted and the people of the Nation agreed to require that Senators be elected by the people.

I hope this amendment will be agreed to.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, I offer an amendment to the Long amendment, and ask that it be stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 2, after line 6, it is proposed to insert the following:

And provided further, That no person's nomination in a primary election shall be valid if it shall be determined by a Federal court of competent jurisdiction that any duly qualified voter has been denied equal opportunity to register and vote.

THE OLD STONE HOUSE IN GEORGETOWN

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator from New York yield for an announcement before the firing starts?

Mr. KEATING. I am very happy to yield to my friend from Florida, provided I do not lose the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. HOLLAND. I appreciate the Senator's courtesy.

Mr. President, I am pleased that so many Senators are present. I invite the attention of Senators and of the people of Washington generally to the fact that quite a notable occasion will occur tomorrow afternoon from 3 to 6 o'clock when the National Capital Parks Administration will open for a preview the Old Stone House, in the 3000 block of M Street, NW., in Georgetown.

Many Senators in the Chamber were here when the authorization legislation was passed in the 81st Congress to acquire and preserve this historic edifice. I was happy to have an opportunity to join in that effort. Many Senators now present were here when we provided the appropriation for the restoration work, which I believe was in 1955.

This old house is probably the only pre-Revolutionary house standing in the District of Columbia within its original walls. It was built in 1764, of what is called field stone, that is, stone picked up in the fields and placed skillfully by the masons of that period in the walls in various shapes and sizes, but all fitted together very neatly.

The National Capital Parks Administration has done a fine job of restoration of the interior and of acquisition of furniture and equipment of the period from 1760 to 1810.

I am sure that everyone will enjoy going to look at this fine old building, restored as it is, remembering that it is even older than the Senate of the United States. It is older than this Republic. It is older than the ancient arguments on home rule, because it took its shape first in Old Georgetown, a small village standing on the bank of the Potomac, before the freedom of this Republic was won, and before anyone dreamed that this site would be the Capital of our country, and in many respects the Capital of the free world.

I believe Senators will find this house most interesting. I think this is a proper occasion to compliment the Citizens' Associations of the Georgetown area, which, for many years, have assiduously supported this effort, which comes to fruition tomorrow.

I wished to make this announcement for the RECORD. I hope I shall see many of our colleagues and friends present tomorrow enjoying this fine old building.

FEDERAL ELECTIONS ACT OF 1959

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 2436) to revise the Federal election laws, to prevent corrupt practices in Federal elections, and for other purposes.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. President, I wonder if the Senator from New York will yield to me in order that I may make an observation or two with respect to the colloquy which took place between the Senator from Louisiana and myself, with the understanding that he shall not lose the floor.

Mr. KEATING. I am happy to yield on that condition.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I am not sure whether the burden that was thrown on the reporter during the colloquy between the Senator from Louisiana and myself was within the capabilities of any reporter. Of course, we have extraordinary reporters; but in view of the fact that the Senator from Louisiana and I were both talking at the same time, I am not sure that the RECORD will be clear as to a few facts.

Therefore, I think I should make a few statements with respect to the South Dakota law and the general situation in which States have primaries, and have a requirement that if no one in the primary receives a certain substantial proportion of the vote therein, the choice shall be made by a State convention.

I yield to no one in my respect for the 17th amendment, which provided for direct election of U.S. Senators by the people of the States from which they are chosen.

I believe in the direct election of Senators. I believe in the primary law. My State of South Dakota was one of the pioneer States in establishing the primary as a method of selecting candidates for major offices, to wit, the Governor and Federal offices.

At one time we had a law in South Dakota which was known as the Richards' primary law. It was a transitional law. First it was provided that there would be a convention. If the people were not satisfied with the results of the convention, by petition or by resolution of the county committee, they could then enter candidates in a primary, and the result of the primary would overrule the convention. That had certain practical difficulties of application which eventually led our State, which was one of the pioneers in adopting primary laws, to provide that we would have the primary come first in nominating candidates for Governor and for the Senate and the House.

However, it was provided that if no one received as much as 35 percent of the vote in the primary, then the selection from among those who were candidates in the primary should be made by majority vote at the State convention. That is the law today.

Mr. WILEY. For the nomination, or election?

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. For the nomination, not for the election. As I said, the first nomination that I received for the House of Representatives was in a primary where there were four candidates. In that primary none of the four candidates received as much as 35 percent of the votes. So the duty of nominating the candidate went to the State party convention, and there I was honored by receiving a majority for the nomination.

Two years later there were six candidates in the primary. At that time, I received 40 percent of the vote, and there was no convention. Thereafter in six subsequent elections I had no primary contest, until I ran for the Senate.

Here again I entered a primary, and there were only two candidates and I was fortunate enough to receive a majority of the votes cast.

We have had other contests in which no one received 35 percent in the primary and the nomination was completed by the convention. I recall that the distinguished former Member of the House of Representatives, Representative Lovre, was first nominated at the convention which followed a primary as in the primary no one had received 35 percent of the vote.

Two or three times we have had close contests in nominating the candidate for Governor. In one contest there were five candidates, none of whom received 35 percent of the vote. Therefore the nominating of the candidate went to the convention, and the convention completed the nominating process. However, the convention is always limited to voting for those who had been candidates at the primary.

I therefore disagree with the assumption by the Senator from Louisiana that the will of the people was overruled. The people had an opportunity in the primary to express themselves. Under the law of the State any candidate whom the people give as much as 35 percent of the vote, or the one who receives the most above 35 percent, would be nominated, without any further action.

And South Dakota is not alone in having the 35 percent primary rule. I am under the impression that Iowa and other States have a similar plan to require a substantial vote in a primary and then use the convention to avoid expensive repeat runoffs, but limiting the convention to those who have shown substantial popular support in a primary. The Long amendment would upset the State's right in such instances.

I should like to make just one other observation. The 17th amendment to the U.S. Constitution itself, which provided for the direct election of Senators by popular vote, contains this provision with respect to vacancies:

> Provided, That the legislature of any State may empower the executive thereof to make temporary appointment until the people fill the vacancies by election as the legislature may direct.

Certainly no one will contend that the 17th amendment, which provides for the election of Senators by the vote of the people, was designed in any respect to defeat the will of the people. It was intended to give the people the right to express themselves. It was recognized that in connection with vacancies it may be the practical thing to let legislatures provide for filling vacancies by appointment until the people fill them by election, as the legislature might direct.

So, it is to be noted that in the 17th amendment itself, the right is accorded to the State to determine the manner of dealing with a marginal situation. In the same spirit, it would seem that the legislatures should have the right to use party conventions if none of the candidates receive as much as 35 percent.

In my State, the party's vote in the primary, and in other States which have the 35-percent rule, the legislature has merely provided that where the people do not arrive at a substantial vote for one of the candidates, one of them can get the nomination at the subsequent convention.

I have made these remarks in order to keep the record straight. It is not an undemocratic method. It is based on the primary in the first instance. If 35 percent of the people in South Dakota agree upon a candidate, that person is nominated.

I thank the Senator from New York for yielding so that I could make this statement.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, I thought we had set this matter at rest the other day when the distinguished Senator from Louisiana had the same amendment on the floor. It is still before us, with only the change of a word. The Senator from Louisiana offered his reasons, which were set forth at full in the previous debate. I am rather astonished that a stanch supporter of States rights, as the distinguished Senator from Louisiana is known to be, would offer an amendment which would have the effect of saying to the voters of every State how they shall nominate their candidates for Senator or Representative in Congress. However, surprises are not new in this Chamber, and the departure of the Senator from Louisiana from the time-honored practice of supporting States rights measures is entirely within his province and perfectly proper.

I do feel very strongly, however, that if a majority of the Members of the Senate wish to amend the existing statute in the respect suggested by the Senator from Louisiana, and desire to establish for every State the manner in which it shall nominate their candidates, it is certainly entirely in keeping with the wording of the Senator's amendment to provide that anyone who is found by a Federal court to have secured his nomination by reason of duly qualified voters having been denied the opportunity to register and vote, should not be eligible to hold his office.

Mr. ERVIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. KEATING. I yield for a question only.

Mr. ERVIN. The Senator from Louisiana has said that his amendment is in harmony with section 4, article I, of the Constitution. I should like to ask the Senator from New York how he can harmonize his amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Louisiana with section 5, article I, of the Constitution of the United States, which provides:

> Each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own Members.

I should like to ask the Senator how he can reconcile his amendment, which purports to give that power to the Federal courts, with this provision of the Constitution.

Mr. KEATING. I am very happy to respond to the question of the distinguished Senator from North Carolina.

The amendment which I have offered provides that no one shall be qualified to serve in this Chamber whose election has been obtained by reason of the fact that he was nominated in a nominating convention or in a primary in which duly qualified voters were denied the opportunity to vote. There is nothing in the Constitution, in my judgment, which requires that that question be passed upon in each and every instance. We have the power within this body to provide that no one shall serve here who has been nominated in a primary—and eventually elected—in which duly qualified voters were denied an equal opportunity with other duly qualified voters to register and to vote.

It is a fact—and I say it in entire compliance with the rules, and with no disparagement of any particular State—that the Civil Rights Commission has made findings that there are certain areas in our country where certain qualified voters have been denied the opportunity to register and to vote. That is a finding of fact which they have made after extensive hearings, and is based upon sworn testimony.

I was not there; I have no personal knowledge of the matter. The Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG] provides in his amendment in chief that in the primary, which he seeks to force upon every State, "all registered or otherwise properly qualified members of his party," meaning the nominee's party, "shall have had an opportunity to vote."

I very much hope that the Senator from Louisiana will be prepared to accept my amendment to his amendment. It seems so inherently fair. It is so clear on its face that everyone who is qualified to vote in this country should be permitted to vote.

I ask the Senator from Louisiana whether he would be prepared to accept my amendment; and if he would not, then I ask that his amendment be rejected.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. I believe there is not even a copy of the amendment which the Senator from New York has offered and which I hold in my hand. This is the original, written in longhand by the Senator from New York. It reads:

And provided further, That no person's nomination in a primary election shall be valid if it shall be determined by a Federal court of competent jurisdiction that any duly qualified voter has been denied equal opportunity to register and vote.

The Senator from New York provides in his amendment that if one person, for any reason whatsoever, was denied an opportunity to register for a primary election, that primary election would not be valid. How ridiculous can one get? That is unconstitutional in a half dozen different ways.

The Constitution provides that the States shall determine the qualifications of the voters. The Senator's amendment violates that provision of the Constitution, and it violates the provision that each House of Congress shall be the judge of the elections and qualifications of its own Members.

I must say that I am disappointed in the civil rights amendment which the Senator from New York is attempting to write; that he could not write one which had more merit to recommend it.

His amendment provides, in effect, that if one person—anybody—for any reason whatever, has been denied an equal opportunity to register and vote in an election, that election shall be invalid.

A person could be denied the equal opportunity to register and vote merely by virtue of the fact that he lived further away from the courthouse. That is how ridiculous the amendment is. I observed that the Senator from New York did not attempt to meet with any considerable effort whatever, except by a brief reference to it, the fundamental argument I made about the soundness of my amendment. The amendment which I have offered is clearly constitutional in pursuance of the 17th amendment and in pursuance of section 4 of article I of the Constitution. My amendment follows the democratic procedure which has been recognized and has been established and is in accordance with the trend in which this Nation has been moving throughout the years.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. Is it not true, under a strict interpretation of the amendment offered by the Senator from New York, that if a person 11 years old were refused the opportunity to register in a State, the nomination would not be valid?

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. The language reads:

And provided further, That no person's nomination in a primary election shall be valid if it shall be determined by a Federal court of competent jurisdiction that any duly qualified voter has been denied equal opportunity to register and vote.

If a taxicab in which a voter was riding was late because of a flat tire or a traffic accident, or for any other reason, and the voter could not be delivered to the polling place for the primary election, the election would not be valid.

My amendment is directed to the general election and provides that Congress shall make the regulations. Congress does that. Congress provides the time, the date, and various other rules pertaining to the Federal election laws.

The 17th amendment provides that Senators shall be elected by the people. My proposal is made in complete pursuance of the 17th amendment.

The amendment offered by the Senator from New York is probably the least logical of all the civil rights measures I have heard suggested.

It has been agreed that there will be a civil rights bill before Congress. I did not agree to it, but the majority leader has said that it will be called up about February 15. We will have an opportunity to consider matters of this sort and will have an opportunity to vote on them. It has been agreed by both parties that that will be the case.

So, Mr. President, I should like to have a vote on my amendment as I have offered it, and I propose to move that the amendment to my amendment be tabled.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. Does the Senator from Louisiana contend that the great State of New York, having 4 million or more voters, does not have any primary elections at all?

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. None whatever for Senator, Representative, or Governor.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. Do I correctly understand the Senator to mean that three or four persons speak for 4 million?

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. The party holds what is called a party convention.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. But is not that convention controlled, sometimes, by 3 or 4 persons?

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Yes; oftentimes it is controlled by a handful of persons. I should imagine that the Governor has power in most instances to determine pretty well who will be selected for statewide offices by his party. Carmine DeSapio also has much power in the Democratic Party in New York, and this might somewhat reduce the Governor's power in this respect when a Democratic Governor occupies the executive mansion in Albany.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. Then, do I understand correctly that the Senator from New York is criticizing the primaries in the Southern States, when New York does not have any primaries at all?

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Yes; he would seek to regulate our primaries, although New York State itself does not have any primaries.

Mr. ERVIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. I yield.

Mr. ERVIN. Do I correctly understand the Senator from Louisiana to say that the Senator from New York is criticizing us on the theory that somewhere in the South a colored man's right to vote in a primary might be denied, whereas in the State of New York such a right is denied not only to colored folks but to white folks and everybody else?

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Everybody. The Senator from New York seeks to regulate our primary elections. He says he wants to regulate how much a person can spend and the terms and conditions under which persons can run in the primaries.

Then when someone says, "All right; if that is fair, you run your primary as we do," the Senator from New York says, "I want it to be agreed that if any person is denied an equal opportunity with everybody else to register and vote, the primary will be invalid."

That shows how little the Senator knows about regulating primaries. Nobody would ever know whether a primary was valid until he had waited for months to see if a lawsuit would be instituted by someone who would say he had been denied the opportunity to vote. Only in that way could it be determined whether a primary was valid.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. McGEE in the chair). The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Mr. President, I shall withhold my motion to lay on the table the Keating amendment to my amendment until I make a statement.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum has been suggested, and the call of the roll is in process.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection——

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, let me ask the Senator from Louisiana whether it is his intention, if the order for the call of the roll is rescinded, to move that my amendment to his amendment be laid on the table.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. I would propose to do that in due course; yes.

Mr. KEATING. Would the Senator from Louisiana permit me to speak for about 2 minutes——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Debate is not in order at this time.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, further reserving the right to object——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York is out of order.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, I object to the request that the order for the call of the roll be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is heard; and the call of the roll will be continued.

The legislative clerk resumed the call of the roll.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, I now ask unanimous consent that the order for the call of the roll be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that at this time I may yield for 2 minutes to the Senator from New York [Mr. KEATING].

Mr. ALLOTT. Mr. President, reserving the right to object——

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, I should like to speak for 2 minutes in my own right, following completion of the remarks of the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. ALLOTT. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Mr. President, for the time being I withhold my motion to lay on the table the amendment of the Senator from New York to my amendment.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. ALLOTT. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Colorado will state the point of order.

Mr. ALLOTT. The point of order is that I have not heard unanimous consent given to the request to rescind the order for the call of the roll.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York made the request; and there was no objection, and the order for the call of the roll was rescinded.

Mr. ALLOTT. I thank the Chair for that information.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois will state it.

Mr. DIRKSEN. What is the pending question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending question is on agreeing to the amendment submitted by the Senator from New York to the amendment of the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, I merely wish to make abundantly clear—and I shall take less than 2 minutes to do so—that I am opposed to the amendment submitted by the Senator from Louisiana. I shall vote against that amendment, either with or without the amendment which I have sought to have attached to it, because I believe the amendment of the Senator from Louisiana violates the principle that each State shall determine in what manner the people of that State shall nominate candidates for election to the House of Representatives or the Senate.

However, Mr. President, if the amendment of the Senator from Louisiana is to be adopted, then by all means I believe the Senate should attach to it some protection of the right of every qualified citizen to vote, so that all qualified citizens will have an equal opportunity to vote.

My amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Louisiana is offered for the purpose of giving the Senate an opportunity to decide whether that determination will be made here.

Mr. President, I realize fully that the hearings which have been begun in the Committee on Rules and Administration should be completed, and I also realize fully that the issue of giving further protection to the right to vote will be before us on February 15.

However, that question is before us at this time, by virtue of the action taken by the distinguished Senator from Louisiana, who has brought the issue before the Senate by means of the submission of his amendment.

Therefore, Mr. President, if we are to vote on the amendment of the Senator from Louisiana, I believe we must meet this issue now.

I very much hope that at this time, before the Senate proceeds to vote on the pending amendment, the distinguished Senator from Louisiana will reach the same conclusion that he reached earlier in this debate—namely, that his amendment should be withdrawn.

However, Mr. President, if the Senate is to vote on the amendment of the Senator from Louisiana, then I ask for the yeas and nays on the question of agreeing to my amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Louisiana.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DODD in the chair). Is there a sufficient second?

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Mr. President, the amendment which the Senator from New York has submitted to my amendment was drawn up hastily, obviously, for it is written in ink on the bottom of my printed amendment.

The amendment offered by the Senator from New York to my amendment reads as follows:

And provided further, That no person's nomination in a primary election shall be valid if it shall be determined by a Federal court of competent jurisdiction that any duly qualified voter has been denied equal opportunity to register and vote.

Let us apply the effect of the proposed amendment to every State in the Union. Not a Senator here or any Member of the House of Representatives would know whether he had won the primary election or not, because who on earth would know whether a single person in his State had been denied an equal opportunity to vote? It does not tell how he had to be denied that right. He could be denied the right because he had had a flat tire on the way to the polls. He could be denied it because he had sent for a taxicab, but the taxicab driver had gone to the wrong house. He could be denied it because he had been in the hospital. He could be denied it for any one of 50,000 reasons.

As I pointed out previously, this matter is clearly unconstitutional, for half a dozen reasons I could give. There is no reason for going into them. This is only an attempt to divert and to avoid a vote on the true purpose of the amendment, which is whether we should stand by the 17th amendment, whether we should vote for the right of the people to select their Representatives and Senators, to have primaries, and to prevent the political bosses from selecting the major party candidates.

My proposal is clearly constitutional. It is clearly in pursuance of the articles of the Constitution. It is clearly in pursuance of the 17th amendment.

I think the Senator should withdraw the amendment to the amendment as I did when I withdrew my amendment and permitted the Hennings-Keating amendment to be voted upon, so that my amendment can be voted on its merits.

Therefore, Mr. President, I move to table the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question, before he makes his motion?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion to table.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Will the Senator yield for just a single question?

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may withhold my motion long enough to answer the question of the Senator from South Dakota.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. How would the distinguished Senator from Louisiana say that his amendment would deal with a vacancy, when the 17th amendment, to which he alludes, provides that the legislature of any State may empower the executive to make temporary appointments until the people fill the vacancies by elections as the legislature may direct? How could we insure having primary elections in the event of a vacancy, without violating the 17th amendment?

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. All the Senator has to do is read the amendment. All it provides is that no person's name shall appear on a ballot or a voting machine in any general election unless the person has been nominated in a primary election. It has nothing to do with an appointment by the Governor.

Mr. President, I now renew the motion to table the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. ALLOTT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator withhold his motion?

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. I withhold my motion.

Mr. ALLOTT. I have been trying to get the floor for about an hour and a half now, in an attempt to discuss this matter. If it is necessary, I shall at least ask unanimous consent to have an opportunity to discuss it.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Is the Senator referring to my amendment or to the amendment to the amendment?

Mr. ALLOTT. I refer both to the Senator's amendment and to the amendment to the amendment.

Is the Senator from Louisiana aware of the situation in Colorado and the method by which we select Senators and Representatives in the State of Colorado?

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. No. I imagine Colorado has a primary system, however, because most of the States do.

Mr. ALLOTT. In the State of Colorado we have a primary system which is a combination, actually, of the convention system and the primary system. Anyone who has been a member of either a major political party or a political party for 1 year prior to the time of the convention may go into the convention, and if he or she receives 20 percent of the vote in that convention, whether it is to a county, judicial, legislative, senatorial, or State office, or whatever the office is, he or she is enabled to go on the primary ticket. The primary election is held the second Tuesday in September, and anyone who receives 20 percent of the vote of the regular party convention—assembly, as we call it—and that fact is accepted by the secretary of state, then goes in the primary election.

I am opposed to the Senator's amendment, but I would first ask him whether or not, in his opinion, his amendment includes the State of Colorado.

In other words, to paraphrase my question for the Senator, does the primary in the State of Colorado, under the circumstances I have enumerated, in his opinion, comply with the use of primaries as the Senator has defined it in his amendment?

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. I did not have the practice of the State of Colorado in mind, and therefore I cannot tell the Senator with certainty whether the amendment covers it. If the Senator from Colorado would like to offer any clarifying language to permit the Colorado practice to be continued, it would be satisfactory with me.

What the Senator from Colorado is saying is that if a person gets 20 percent of the votes in the party system, that person can then have his name put on the ballot and run against someone who may have received 75 percent of the votes in the convention?

Mr. ALLOTT. Yes.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. It seems to me that is a fair proposal. If my amendment would outlaw the Colorado practice, I would not insist upon that result. Perhaps the insertion of a word or two in the amendment could accomplish the Senator's objective.

However, we do not have to decide that point at this moment, because we are dealing with the amendment to the amendment. While we are voting on the motion to table, perhaps we can get together and work it out.

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Louisiana yield for a question?

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Yes.

Mr. HENNINGS. I am addressing myself especially to the able and diligent Senator from Louisiana, who has taken great interest in this proposed legislation and has addressed himself to it during the course of its progress through this body. I would like to, if I am not presumptuous in so doing, most respectfully, and in friendly spirit, urge the distinguished Senator from New York and the distinguished Senator from Louisiana to yield on this point and to withdraw this matter of controversy from this bill.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. If the Senator from Missouri is trying to get to a vote on this amendment, I am not going to yield to him at this time, and I do not believe I am going to yield on it at all.

Mr. HENNINGS. I have no amendment pending——

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. I think the amendment I have here is more significant and important than anything in this bill. I would like a vote on mine. Everybody else has had a vote on his amendment.

Mr. HENNINGS. May I complete my statement? What I say is not in any spirit of anxiety. The Senator has stated I am anxious to get a vote. I think many of us think it is highly desirable to get to a vote. I am fully appreciative of the Senator's right to have a vote on his amendment.

This is a bill relating to campaign contributions and expenditures. I believe appropriate legislation relating to this matter might be offered by the Senator at some other time. We can get into endless and, I think, unprofitable debate, now that we have come near the conclusion of action on this bill, by offering one amendment after another, none of which were submitted to the Committee on Rules and Administration, and none of which have been the subject of study by that committee.

In the interest of orderly procedure I have made this plea to the Senator. I have already been assured it will be of no avail. Having made it, I shall not further express myself on the subject, except to express the wish, which I think is the consensus, perhaps, of the Members of this body, that we get down to the business of voting on the bill or to the third reading of the bill, at least, whether we vote tonight or not, so that we can dispose of an elections bill.

There are many other matters, such as amendments to the Taft-Hartley Act and its provisions, which have been offered and subsequently withdrawn by those offering them. I appreciate the spirit in which Senators have done that, because they have recognized the relevance of certain amendments. I make no point of technical germaneness, of course, but there is such a matter as relevance, and there is such a matter as conducting this body in an orderly procedure.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Mr. President, I believe I have the floor.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. If I have the floor, I want to make it clear that the junior Senator from Louisiana has been around here since Congress met. I have not told anybody when we would meet or when we would not meet. I have accommodated myself to all other Senators. I have waited until I am the second from the last Senator to offer an amendment. I have only one amendment. I have let everybody else go first.

It does seem to me that a Senator has a right, in good conscience, if he has waited until every other Senator has offered his amendment, to take enough time for the consideration of the one I am offering. It is said that everyone is getting tired—"We are tired of hearing everybody else, so we ask you to withdraw your amendment."

SEVERAL SENATORS. Vote! Vote!

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr President, I demand the regular order.

Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. I yield.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, it appears that we cannot finish consideration of the bill tonight, or even get to the third reading of the bill. Since consideration of this amendment and the amendment to it may take considerable time, and in view of the fact that to the best of my knowledge there is only one other amendment to be offered, the amendment which will be offered by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. KEFAUVER], which I understand will not require much time, and in view of the fact that many Senators already have left and others have commitments to attend to, I was wondering if it would be agreeable to set aside for the time being the proposals by the Senator from Louisiana and the Senator from New York, to take up the Kefauver amendment, and, on its disposition, recess until 12 o'clock noon Monday. I should like to make that in the form of a unanimous-consent request, because that is the only way the action can be taken. I make such a request, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Montana?

Mr. PASTORE. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MANSFIELD. I yield.

Mr. PASTORE. How long will it take for consideration of the Kefauver amendment?

Mr. MANSFIELD. I understand it will take 5 minutes.

Mr. PASTORE. I am wary of "5 minutes" in the Senate. In justice to this new amendment it should have adequate time and attention which it is evident that the earlier amendments are not going to be able to get under the conditions prevailing at this hour.

Mr. KEFAUVER. I can assure the Senator that it will not take me more than 5 minutes. I think the Senator from Oregon [Mr. NEUBERGER] and the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLARK] may want to make brief statements.

RECESS

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I move that the Senate stand in recess until 12 o'clock noon on Monday.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 24 minutes p.m.) the Senate took a recess until Monday, January 25, 1960, at 12 o'clock meridian.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

A Crusade for Decency

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WALLACE F. BENNETT OF UTAH
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Friday, January 22, 1960

Mr. BENNETT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD an address given on October 11, 1959, in Salt Lake City, Utah, by Secretary of Agriculture Ezra Taft Benson before the general conference of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints. Secretary Benson is an apostle of the Latter-day Saints—Mormon—Church, and was speaking on this occasion as a member of the governing body of the church, and not in his official capacity as member of the President's Cabinet.

The comments of Secretary Benson are very timely inasmuch as Congress will be considering legislation during this session to strengthen existing laws regarding the dissemination of pornographic literature.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A CRUSADE FOR DECENCY

(Address by Elder Ezra Taft Benson, apostle of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, given at general conference of the church held in Salt Lake City, October 11, 1959)

We live in a choice land. But we live in a time of anxiety—a time when the basic concepts and values of a free society, which we cherish, are being seriously challenged. This challenge is not only from godless, imperial communism abroad, but also from dangerous ideologies and practices here at home.

It is true that outwardly everything seems prosperous. More people are working at higher wages and enjoying a better standard of living than ever before in the history of our country. More of our people are enjoying travel, cultural, and educational opportunities than any time in our history. New churches are being erected at a rapid rate, and an increasing number of people are church-affiliated. Our Nation is at peace.

All these things should give a feeling of stability, inner assurance, and a sense of satisfaction, but they do not seem to do so. Discontent among our people, nationwide, seems to be high. We view with alarm the ever-raising level of public and private debt and the threat of inflation. We note with fear the increase in crime, juvenile delinquency, alcoholism, drug addiction, and sex offenses.

We pay lip service to the principles embodied in the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution without realizing what they are and the danger of ignoring them. We demand more and more of Government, so Government grows larger all the while, marking the stampede away from personal responsibility which occurs at all levels of life. We passively contribute to the spirit and demoralizing philosophy of something for nothing.

Because sin is rampant and increasing, I make bold enough to call this Nation to repentance. Only through righteousness is there safety for our beloved country. There is no other way.

Today I speak out against one of the insidious and rapidly increasing threats against our young people.

As a church we have always placed great emphasis on youth. Our young men, if worthy, receive the priesthood at 12 years of age. We enlist a higher percentage of our young boys in scouting than any other group. We have a comprehensive program, combining Sunday school, primary, M.I.A., priesthood activities, and weekday seminary classes, to guide the activities of our youth, instill within them a testimony of the Gospel, and help them to grow up to be good citizens and faithful members of the church. Yes, we recognize full well that our boys and girls, our young men and women, are our greatest asset. They are our hope.

The youth of today are the trustees of the future. Sooner than we think the leadership of the church and the future of our country will rest in their hands. It is our grave obligation to help prepare American youth to be worthy trustees, to help them fit themselves for their coming responsibilities. This is the obligation of every adult citizen.

We have confidence in our youth, yes. But we know they face troubled times. They are beset by man temptations—temptations, which, if not new, are certainly more blatant, more prevalent, than ever before.

We know how important it is for our youth to possess clear minds in healthy clean bodies. "Be ye clean that bear the vessels of the Lord." Moral purity is an eternal principle. The Spirit of God "cannot dwell in an unclean tabernacle." Purity is life-giving; impurity is deadly. God's holy laws cannot be broken with impunity. Great nations have fallen when they became morally corrupt, because the sins of immorality left their people scarred and misshapen creatures who were unable to face the challenge of their time.

I speak about one aspect of this question of morality which affects all our youth. There are forces at work in this country today which are victimizing many thousands of our youth, undermining their moral fiber, poisoning their minds. There is being spread about in this land a veritable flood of obscene photographs, movie films for private showings, filthy books, and so-called comics that drip with depravity and obscenity.

Every day some 200,000 circulars are flooding our cities and towns, seeking to sell obscenity and filth to the American people. It is a $500 million a year business and growing fast. The sales volume of mail-order obscenity has doubled in the last 5 years.

Who are the targets of this drive? Three-fourths of these circulars are sent to our youth. Our schoolchildren are the targets, our boys and girls, particularly between the ages of 11 and 16.

The U.S. Post Office Department estimates that between 700,000 and 1,000,000 children in American homes will receive unsolicited obscene and pornographic literature through the mails this year.

Our boys and girls need not have shown any interest in this vile stuff. It is thrust into their hands by racketeers who go to great lengths to get the names of our children. They buy mailing lists from standard sources. They get names from high school yearbooks and classbooks. They set up fake business fronts. A boy sends away for a model airplane, a baseball bat, a toy automobile, a stamp collection, often advertising at bargain prices—and the muck merchant has his name and address on his list.

Then the solicitations begin.

The smut dealers last year mailed out an estimated 50 million sales circulars under the protection of first class mail. Some of these circulars are in the form of pseudo personal letters in girl's handwriting, signed with a girl's name.

The smut dealers go further. They even seek to involve our youth as salesmen of their trash. One scheme is to sell our youngsters playing cards decorated with lewd pictures for perhaps $3 per deck—to be resold at 25 cents or 50 cents per card.

Many children fall into the trap of ordering obscene material. Traffic with children is a major and growing part of the filth merchants' business.

Postal inspectors in New York City recently raided one dealer in pornography. They confiscated 17 tons of highly obscene printed and filmed materials. They found mailing lists containing the names of thousands of high school graduates taken from high school yearbooks.

Some parents are almost frantic because of their inability to keep this unwanted material out of their homes. A mother in a midwestern State writes to the Post Office Department as follows:

"Enclosed you will find the filth that has been sent to my son for the past year. He is 14. Think what this could do to him, and how many other innocent boys and girls he could corrupt by passing this literature on to them. Can't you do something to stop it?"

Another parent in the East writes:

"Ads like this come to my minor son at the rate of one or two a week."

A lawyer tells how his son answered an innocuous appearing ad in a national magazine and received a batch of obscene pictures and an order blank for more. His name is on the mailing list and nearly every week an ad for pornographic material comes in the mail. The lawyer says, "My wife and I are beside ourselves as to how to stop this flood of mail."

Now, what are the effects of this material on our youth?

Juvenile delinquency has become a blot on our country. Gangs roam the streets of some of our big cities. Arrests of juveniles for major crimes rose about 10 percent last year. Authorities have observed on repeated occasions that the obscenity racket is a prime contributor to the increase in juvenile delinquency.

FBI figures show that more boys of 18 and 19 are now committing the heinous crime of rape, then males in any other age group. The percentage of convictions of boys under 20 has grown substantially in recent years.

Now of course some people will argue that many children exposed to these pictures and books never become delinquent. This argument has no merit at all. Your child may be exposed to tuberculosis or polio and never contract either disease. In this a reason for deliberately exposing children to infection? Of course not.

It is true that people go wrong for many reasons. Children become delinquent in part because of such factors as broken homes, drinking parents, indifferent parents, and bad companions. But the wish is father of the deed. Thought precedes action. We cannot help but be influenced by what we read and what we see. A dirty book, a filthy picture, may be the trigger that sets off a terrible crime.

Reports from police chiefs and sheriffs indicate the tieup. Here are typical statements from city officials in Massachusetts, Colorado, and Pennsylvania:

"Teenager criminally assaults 16-year-old girl. Search of his room revealed 50 pornographic pictures beneath his mattress."

"Student molesting two teenage girls found to have pornographic literature in glove compartment of his car."

Let me quote from a report of a Senate subcommittee that has studied this problem. The report says in part:

"There is a peculiar resemblance to narcotics addiction in exposure of juveniles to pornography. There is the same pattern of progression. Once initiated into a knowledge of the unnatural, the impressionable young mind with the insatiable curiosity characteristic of those reaching for maturity inevitably hunts for something stronger, something with more jolt, something imparting a greater thrill.

"The dealer in pornography is actually aware of this progressive facet; his array of material to feed this growing hunger is carefully geared to the successive stages. Like the peddler of narcotics, his only interest is to insure that his customers are hooked. He knows that once they are hooked they will continue to pay and pay."

These are some of the direct results of the smut campaign. There are indirect results, too. Our children, our wives, our friends, may be the horrified victims of criminals who are triggered by obscene materials.

Well, what is the response of the smut publishers and dealers to these facts?

Their attitude is summed up in some such sentiment as this: My job is to make a dollar, not to look out for unstable children or adults. No wonder J. Edgar Hoover has said:

"The activities of the muck merchants are national in scope. Your child can easily become one of their victims."

What are we going to do about it? Shall we fold our arms, shake our heads dismally, and do nothing?

Shall we permit organized crime to continue and extend the obscenity racket—already a half billion dollar a year business—and make it really big and immeasurably more vicious?

Shall we allow more and more of our children to be victimized, allow them to be hooked by this menace to clean and right living, this threat to moral purity?

Shall we sit by and watch sex crimes grow and grow in number and violence?

Shall we permit these cheap peddlers of filth to undermine the moral fiber of our youth, the moral strength of our Nation?

I believe I know what our pioneer forefathers would have answered to these questions.

And I think I know what you and other responsible citizens will answer. They would have said, as we say today: "Forbid it, Almighty God. We shall not sit by any longer. We shall act in defense of decency and order and in the name of our country."

Our Government is striking with all the weapons it possesses against the obscenity menace. Until last year, purveyors of filth had to be prosecuted at the point from which they mailed their smut. This was a severe handicap to prosecution. Courts, notably in Los Angeles and New York, where the great bulk of the mail order business in obscenity originates, handed down soft rulings on obscenity. Few offenders were convicted and these usually paid a small fine and began operating again.

Legislation passed by Congress last year has now made it possible to prosecute where the mail is received.

The first case prosecuted under the new law was in Boise, Idaho. A man and his wife, who were mailing extremely obscene material from the west coast, were given 10 years in jail, plus a heavy fine.

A Virginia man and his wife dealing in obscenity were sentenced to a year in the Federal penitentiary and fined $2,000. In Louisiana, two more dealers in filth were given a year and 18 months in jail respectively.

This is a good start. But it is only a start.

If Government is to make full use of the new legislation, it needs and must have the cooperation of all our citizens and especially of all our parents.

The privacy of the mail is a basic American right. It will not be violated. The Post Office cannot open first-class mail even if it is certain the envelope contains obscene materials. The Post Office can act only if parents supply the evidence after the mail has been delivered. Here is what we as parents can do, what we must do:

1. If mail coming to your home is obscene, or solicits the sale of obscene materials: save all the material, including the covering envelope; put it promptly in the hands of the local postmaster either personally or by mail.

2. Do not wait for this danger to strike your home. Join with other parents, teachers, local law enforcement officers and civic groups in drawing public attention to the menace of this traffic in filth.

3. Work closely with teachers in your community to detect obscene materials in the possession of children and to determine the origin of such material.

4. Join with other parents and teachers in making a special effort to impress upon the community the fact that even children who are never exposed to the obscene material may be victimized by sex criminals.

5. Cooperate with the schools in taking positive, long-range steps to help children develop wholesome interests in good literature and art—making it readily available to them at home, in the classroom, through literary and library clubs, and through student groups.

6. Help civic groups bring about the establishment of a decent literature committee, broadly representative of the interested civic organizations in the community.

7. Get local judges, law enforcement officers, and representatives of the police force to talk before civic groups telling what they, as guardians of the community's laws, know of the relationship between the traffic in obscene literature and juvenile delinquency and sex crimes.

We must defend our youth, in the interests of this Nation which God has blessed above all others. We must rise to this task, stand up and be counted on the side of decency. We must show by our lives and actions that we possess the virtues that made America great.

There will be those who will cry censorship and suppressing of freedom of information. To these people there does not seem to be any difference between liberty and license—but there is a real difference. It is not a denial of liberty to forbid the sale of narcotics or alcohol to children, and neither is it a denial of liberty to ban the distribution of filthy, obscene, character destroying materials.

There has developed in this country, I am sorry to say, a species of so-called broadmindedness which tolerates anything and everything. It is high time right-thinking citizens showed they are fed up with such false broadmindedness. I for one fail to see where this so-called tolerance of evil has made society any better or individuals any happier. We cannot steer a safe course without a compass. We cannot build an enduring society except on principles of righteousness.

As Dr. Daniel A. Poling recently wrote in the Christian Herald, "it's time for a new crusade," a crusade for decency.

The youth of the church and of America deserve that we parents live up to our responsibilities in this regard.

Many centuries ago, a celebrated Roman matron, Cornelia, was asked by an acquaintance to display her jewels. Cornelia called to her children to step forward. "These are my jewels," she said.

The youth of the church and of America are our jewels. Let us prize them as they deserve. A clean America will be a strong America, a secure America, a prosperous America, a peaceful America, a free America, an America that will continue to merit God's blessings in the future as it has in the past.

God grant it may be so, I humbly pray in the name of Jesus Christ. Amen.

Address by Hon. Wright Patman, of Texas, at East Texas Baptist College

OF
HON. STUART SYMINGTON
OF MISSOURI
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Friday, January 22, 1960

Mr. SYMINGTON. Mr. President, last October I had the great honor of participating in ceremonies at East Texas Baptist College in Marshall, Tex., honoring our distinguished colleague in the House of Representatives, WRIGHT PATMAN, of Texas.

It was a moving occasion, and the highlight of the ceremonies was the address by Representative PATMAN. In it he expressed some of the ideas and principles that have guided him during his long and distinguished career of public service.

I commend this able address to all my colleagues.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the address by the Honorable WRIGHT PATMAN, of Texas, delivered at the special convocation at East Texas Baptist College of Marshall, Tex., on October 6, 1959, be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ADDRESS OF WRIGHT PATMAN, MEMBER OF CONGRESS, TO EAST TEXAS BAPTIST COLLEGE, MARSHALL TEX., SPECIAL CONVOCATION, OCTOBER 6, 1959

President Bruce, trustees of East Texas Baptist College, members of the faculty, distinguished guests and alumna, you have been most kind and generous.

I can think of no greater honor that could come to any man than to be singled out as having made an effort on behalf of his fellow man which this great educational institution considers to be worthy of its notice and commendation.

It would be difficult to know how to reply to the extremely kind personal remarks that have been made here today.

It is not difficult, however, to know what to say to the teachers and the administrators of this great college. You have remained close enough to the sweep of history to know that, whatever doubts may have been raised by new and threatening physical forces, the humanizing principles of liberal education are still civilization's brightest and best hope.

About 30 years ago H. G. Wells wrote: "Human history becomes more and more a race between education and catastrophe."

He was not speaking of education in the sense of training more technicians and specialists to harness new and more powerful physical forces, though, of course, civilization badly needs more specialized training too—more scientists and technicians of all kinds. He was observing—as one must when reflecting upon the course of human history—that the race is between mankind's rapidly accumulating knowledge about the physical universe and his learning how to organize his society and better govern himself. He was talking about education in the liberal sense—education which forms the cultural bridge between the past and present and links the specialists of our own day into a common bond for civilization's advancement.

Few educated people doubt that the great problem of our age is to obtain more liberally educated people—people who have learned how to join together in voluntary associations to define and extend the common good. The problem of our age is not so much to extend further the frontiers of science, to discover new physical laws, but to bring about better law and order in the human society. In short, our problem is better government at all levels of human association, whether we happen to call the governing unit a government, an association, the United Nations, or just the family.

Making this commonplace observation does not mean that I share a view sometimes expressed that civilization is on the downgrade, or that we are witnessing an all-around moral decline.

They say that when you get to the point where you think the country is going to the dogs, that is a sign of old age. And they also say that being an incurable optimist about the future of mankind is a sign of muddleheadedness.

Admitting only to mature optimism, I would have to say that the progress in man's ability to govern himself which I have been able to observe has been marked with some notable advances.

Consider, for example, that discussions of scientific truths, and even conflicts of scientific truths, now observe very high moral standards. This achievement must be ranked among the priceless human freedoms. It has become almost unthinkable that any question in the realm of physics or biology would be answered by appeals to political authority. It is unthinkable that a scientist would try to establish a thesis by deliberate fraud, or that a scientific finding would be censored or distorted by the newspapers and other commercial media of communication. This has not always been so.

Nor does it explain this advancement in the scientific fields to say that science is especially concerned with discovering the truth and, therefore, it is only natural to be extremely careful of the truth in matters of science. Men are seeking to find the truth in other fields, no less so than in science.

The explanation, I think, is to be found in two developments.

First, the people who make up the scientific professions are educated, almost without exception, not merely in techniques, but in the origins of their science and its contributions to the human culture. Being educated people, they are well aware of the long struggles that were waged to win freedom for scientific investigation and expression, and are no less zealous of this freedom than of the science itself.

Second, I would attribute the high moral standards being observed in the scientific fields to the voluntary associations that are the governing bodies of the people working in these fields. These associations would most certainly frown upon fraud, misrepresentation, and the like, if such were used in describing scientific matters.

Wouldn't it be a wonderful thing if our civilization were advanced to the point that discussions and controversies over political truths observed moral standards as high as those observed in scientific controversies?

Perhaps there has been progress in this direction, though I am not sure of it. The slambang assertion and the flamboyant claim have largely died out. But they have largely been replaced by the more subtle techniques of mass propaganda. So it may be that here improvement has been in form, while in substance there has been retrogression. Yet, I have no doubt, if I may be so bold as to make a forecast, that there will come a day when both politicians and those responsible for the machinery of mass opinionmaking will be as careful to distinguish between truth and innuendo, between hope and fact, as are the scientists.

As to the very difficult field of relationships, among nations, there have been some recent and unmistakable advances in man's ability to govern himself. We have now, in the United Nations, an organization for bringing the peoples of the world together in common support of common causes—most particularly to resolve differences by peaceable means. True, the United Nations has not lived up to the high hopes that many first held for it. But at least the nations of the world have found it possible to remain in association for orderly discussion of their common problems and their individual differences. Even this was not possible only a generation ago, despite the horrible lesson of the First World War.

Within my own lifetime there have also been quite notable advances in our country in recognizing and fulfilling our responsibilities for the common good on the national scale. There was time, within my memory, when it was widely believed that the people of this country could not, and should not, be mutually responsible for their common economic good. When I first went to Washington, the prevailing view then was that the economic condition of the people was a matter of no proper concern of the Federal Government. The great ebbs and tides of the business cycle were regarded as the workings of a mysterious force, almost sacred, not to be meddled with or controlled by the collective intelligence of people. Yet within a decade such beliefs and superstitions were discarded and a newly recognized responsibility for intelligent control of the economic climate was embraced. Indeed, following the last great war, we wrote this newly found responsibility for the common economic good into statute, declaring our national policy to be that of using all the plans, programs and agencies of the Federal Government to promote maximum employment, production and purchasing power.

To assure each man a job, no. To tell any man what his job shall be, how he shall try to satisfy his instinct for workmanship, no. But to an assured general prosperity, yes. To pledge opportunity for earning a livelihood, yes. To pledge economic freedom—meaning that each man shall have a wide and practical choice of ways in which to earn his livelihood, also yes. These thing we now recognize to be our responsibility on a national scale.

We have not acquired the best techniques for accomplishing these objectives as rapidly as we might like. And what may be more serious, responsible officials of government have not seemed to hold steadfastly to the objectives themselves. But this is to be expected. In human progress, some faltering steps seem always to follow a long forward step. But I do not see in this any fatal rhythm of history. Notable progress toward economic freedom has been achieved, and few people are so thoughtless as to entertain notions of abandoning this progress.

So much for the recent advances, as I see them, in our ability to govern ourselves.

At all levels of government—national, international, and so on—there seems to have been some advancement, and at least no serious retrogression, in all cases except one. But as I see it, the most important governing unit of all has been, and is now, undergoing a serious breakdown. I am referring to the individual family, which has, of course, been the basic unit of government in our civilization for as long as we have had a civilization.

Indeed, the family is an integral part of our religious heritage, and considering the values which are at stake, it is a wonder that our whole society does not cultivate and nourish this unit of government above all.

Yet we are today witnessing premature separations and splitups of so many families, and with such consequences, that we are witnessing in our own time a partial return to barbarism. It would be difficult to imagine any development more productive of present cruelty or more threatening to civilization's future.

There seem to be almost countless instances where grandparents—the old folks—have been separated from the family and set apart to spend their declining years in lonely surroundings and conditions of essential uselessness. Furthermore, these people are frequently being separated from their families at the very time their families most need the stabilizing influence, the wisdom, experience, and, in short, the whole cultural heritage which is theirs to hand down. And they are being separated from their families at the very time that they, too, are most in need of an opportunity to be of service to their families.

In almost countless instances, too, young children and teenagers are being turned into the streets, with little guidance, with hardly an introduction to our cultural heritage, and left to try to work out a culture and a moral code in association with other dispossessed children. This is most disturbing.

If I may be so bold as to suggest causes, I believe that there are two factors at work contributing to the breakdown of so many units of family government.

First, too many people are forgetting the ancient truths while learning new dogmas.

We are, as a nation, too often neglecting the Lord's commandments while seeking moral guidance from psychological theories.

If I have correctly learned from my very wise and very wonderful pastor, Dr. Coggin, then I am right in thinking that when the Lord gave Moses the commandment, "Honor thy father and thy mother." He meant this commandment was to be taught to his children and his children's children for all time, and not just until such time as a Dr. Spock or a Dr. Gesnell might present added things that children should be taught.

A second cause of this wide-scale breakdown of family government seems to be, without question, that so many families are being split up because the younger people especially in the farm and smalltown areas of the country, such as ours, are being forced to migrate over long distances to find economic opportunity.

Thus, I believe, we must take prompt steps to expand economic opportunities here at home for the young people—and for the older people, too, as for that matter. It is not enough that the Federal Government does its part to maintain a general prosperity in the Nation. We must work through all of our associations—at the regional, State and local levels—and form new associations if need be, to see that economic opportunities are expanded.

This suggestion involves no new principle. In practice, it would be a renewal of our traditions of neighborliness. In the old days, when the country was young, our grandfathers gathered to help newlyweds clear a patch of land and establish a homestead. And they helped new settlers in similar ways, by all pitching in to build a barn and helping to plant the first crop. Both our State and Federal Governments also helped expand economic opportunities, such as by helping build the railroads to open new frontiers for settlement.

As I see it, we must today apply the same kind of group effort and shoulder the same kind of community responsibilities to expand the new forms of economic opportunity as they exist, or can be made to exist.

Nature has smiled on us and on the region in which we live. Our five talents are our bountiful land, our equitable climate, our pure water, our good people, and the unique community spirit which we have inherited.

Fortunately, our parents and grandparents have left us all these resources in good repair. The land is none the poorer for having provided sustenance for many offsprings. The water is still plentiful, and we are taking steps to conserve it. Our people have better education, plus the same stout hearts and willing hands.

We have good markets and growing markets here in our own area; and we have some of the basic industrial materials we need, not the least of which are iron and steel. We are close to favorable energy sources, especially natural gas and oil. Our transportation is on the whole good, and someday we will have, in addition, water transportation.

Providing more economic opportunity here at home will mean finding ways to bring about more industry to use our resources. Admittedly, attracting industrial settlers today is somewhat more difficult than attracting farm settlers in generations gone by. Traditions of neighborliness are different. Farmers have never regarded other farmers as competitors. It has never been the custom of farmers to discourage others from farming, nor to withhold information as to how others might produce more by better methods. Not so among industrial and commercial rivals.

Witness the fact that when efforts were being made to establish the Lone Star works—first the iron works and then later the steel works, which now comprise the Lone Star Steel Co.—these efforts were met with both discouraging advice and outright resistance. In fact, if we had not been so fortunate as to have the guiding genius of Mr. E. B. Germany in helping to establish a steel industry here in our area, our success might have been retarded for another generation.

We were told, among other things, that we could not make steel in this area because our people did not know how to make steel and that they could not learn for a generation to make steel as good or as skillfully as workers in the great steel centers. As it turned out however, our people did learn very quickly how to make steel, and to make the best steel, and they learned with the help of only a few imported workers and technicians. This achievement is a tribute to the native abilities of our people, both to produce and to manage large enterprises. Such achievements can be repeated.

One of our economic problems today is that we are losing farm population very rapidly. Productivity on the farm, that is to say, actual farm output per man-hour of work is increasing at a phenomenal rate. The technicians figure it at about 8 percent a year, which is several times the productivity increase in industry. We are still going through another technical revolution in farming. More mechanization, more fertilizer, more miraculous chemicals to control insects, fungus diseases, and so on, more plant hormones, new plant and animal breeds, and in all-around advancement in understanding and controlling the life processes of plants and farm animals.

All this means that a smaller and smaller percentage of the population is needed on the farm to turn out all of the food and fiber required by the whole country, plus much of that required abroad.

And, of course, farm people are not the only people who are moving away. We are also losing population from the towns and villages—people from the families who have performed the service, trade, and professional functions for the farmers. I do not mean that we are losing population in an absolute sense; of course not. But failing to provide for the normal growth of an area means an economic drain on the whole area.

And what is much more important, the whole Nation is losing the benefit of family government as a result of premature separation of family groups. The Nation is losing in moral fiber by reason of its irrational cruelty to its older people, and by reason of its turning its younger people into a generation of juvenile delinquents.

We need have no fear that the graduates of East Texas Baptist College will ever become juvenile delinquents—or adult delinquents either, for that matter. By the time the young people have completed their education here, they have drawn a large measure of wisdom from the great teachers, past and present. They have been made acquainted with our cultural and religious heritage sufficiently well to be able to mark their own guideposts when they leave here. But what about the children set loose to mark their own guideposts who are not so fortunate as to have the kind of education and training that young people receive here?

I happen to share the belief that there is no such thing as a basically bad boy—or a basically bad girl either. It is a belief which has received considerable support from some of the recent studies of juvenile delinquency.

Specialists who have made quite serious and competent investigations now report that what seems to us highly nonconformist conduct on the part of the juvenile delinquent is actually highly conformist conduct as related to the rules and ethics which have grown up within the juvenile gang. The youthful delinquent, we are told, is in reality guided by public opinion, but by a public opinion of small society that has somehow gotten out of the main stream of opinion in developing its ideas as to what is proper and improper conduct.

Since mankind has been given the means of accumulating knowledge over the whole span of the human experience, we might wonder why it is that some people seem to expect that each individual child might become civilized by some kind of divine intercession, rather than by education and training.

I do not suggest that all of the ideas and customs which have been embodied in the ethical codes of the past, or even in the best body of religious thought, were necessarily correct and suitable for all times. Obviously, many were not. And no doubt some of the ideas in our best body of ethics today will be changed with time and experience. That changes will be made is not so important as how they will be made, and this, I think, is the main significance of the family unit in our civilization.

Revisions to the ethical and moral codes are best made in a society of liberally educated individuals, living together under family government. In this kind of society revisions to the moral code will be made in the light of accumulated human experience and religious wisdom. In this kind of society the test of the ethical and moral code is not how well it accommodates individual, selfish interest, but how well it contributes to the continued well-being and happiness of the family.

OF

HON. ALAN BIBLE

OF NEVADA

Friday, January 22, 1960

Mr. BIBLE. Mr. President, on Saturday afternoon, January 23, 1960, there will occur an event of unique significance in the long and cherished history of the District of Columbia. I refer to a showing by the National Park Service of the Old Stone House at 3051 M Street, in Georgetown.

Through the interest and generosity of several Georgetown citizens, period furniture of the 18th century has been loaned for this building. On the following day, Sunday, the restored structure will be officially opened to the public, and there will be no charge for admissions.

The Old Stone House has many traditions, Mr. President, many of them legendary. In 1934 an architectural survey determined conclusively that it was built between the years 1764 and 1766, which makes it the oldest known house in the District of Columbia. When this fact became known, interest immediately began to generate. The 2d session of the 81st Congress held hearings on H.R. 7722 and testimony brought out the fact of the age of the prerevolutionary building and the fact that it had witnessed many events in the Nation's Capital stamped it with inescapable historical value.

On September 25, 1950, Public Law 836 gave the United States title to the building and the Department of the Interior was authorized to administer it and exhibit it as a public museum.

Since that time architectural restoration has been completed, and we have an attraction that is bound to add to the many charms of Georgetown and the District of Columbia.

SENATE

(Legislative day of Friday, January 22, 1960)

The Senate met at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

The Chaplain, Rev. Frederick Brown Harris, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Eternal God, to whom all hearts are open and from whom no human secrets are hid, save us from the fallacy of using what we call prayer to build, with comfortable phrases, a shelter around our own shortcomings.

As from a world rife with sham and deceit we turn to Thee, God of all truth, let us be solemnly conscious that all pretense is unavailing when we talk with Thee.

As chosen leaders of the Nation in a time of challenge and peril, give Thy servants here the fidelity, the candor, and the courage to warn this wayward generation that the road of safety, comfort, and repose is the straight path to the loss of the precious birthright bequeathed to us by those who endured hardness and spurned ease that we might live in freedom.

We ask it in the dear Redeemer's name. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

On request of Mr. JOHNSON of Texas, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of the proceedings of Friday, January 22, 1960, was dispensed with.

COMMITTEE MEETINGS DURING SENATE SESSION

On request of Mr. NEUBERGER, and by unanimous consent, the Subcommittee on the North American Regional Broadcasting Agreement of the Committee on Foreign Relations was authorized to meet during the session of the Senate today.

TRANSACTION OF ROUTINE BUSINESS

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there may be the usual morning hour for the introduction of memorials, bills, and the transaction of other routine business, and that there be a 3-minute limitation on statements.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further proceedings under the quorum call be dispensed with.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

INQUIRY REGARDING YEAS AND NAYS ON UNFINISHED BUSINESS

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. KUCHEL. Have the yeas and nays been ordered on Calendar No. 571, S. 2436, the so-called clean elections bill?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The yeas and nays have not yet been ordered on the bill.

Mr. KUCHEL. I thank the Chair.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following letters, which were referred as indicated:

REPORT OF GENERAL SALES MANAGER, COMMODITY CREDIT CORPORATION

A letter from the Assistant Secretary of Agriculture, transmitting, pursuant to law, a report of the General Sales Manager on Commodity Credit Corporation sales policies, activities, and dispositions, dated October 1959 (with an accompanying report); to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

REPORT ON REAPPORTIONMENT OF APPROPRIATIONS

A letter from the Director, Bureau of the Budget, Executive Office of the President, reporting, pursuant to law, that the appropriation to the Treasury Department for "Salaries and expenses, Office of the Secretary," and the appropriation to the Veterans' Administration for "Inpatient care," for the fiscal year 1960, have been reapportioned on a basis which indicates the necessity for supplemental estimates of appropriation; to the Committee on Appropriations.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

Petitions, etc., were laid before the Senate, or presented, and referred as indicated:

By the VICE PRESIDENT:

The petition of Jerome C. Mietchen, of Ogden, Utah, praying for a redress of grievances; to the Committee on Armed Services.

A resolution adopted by the board of supervisors of the San Joaquin County Flood Control and Water Conservation District, relating to flood control work on the Mokelumne River, Calif.; to the Committee on Public Works.

RESOLUTION OF FAIRLINGTON METHODIST CHURCH, ALEXANDRIA, VA.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a resolution adopted by the official board of the Fairlington Methodist Church, of Alexandria, Va., endorsing the "Visit the United States of America" program.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas the President of the United States has proclaimed 1960 as "Visit the United States of America Year," and has thereby extended a cordial invitation to the people of the world to visit our country; and

Whereas travel is an important element in the development of greater international understanding and thus tends to promote world peace; and

Whereas visitors from other lands have traditionally found in the United States a friendly welcome from a people whose primary concern is for peaceful accomplishments in their economic, social, and cultural life; and

Whereas the members of this church are desirous of sharing with our world neighbors the spiritual as well as the material satisfactions which we enjoy in our everyday lives;

Therefore, the official board of the Fairlington Methodist Church endorses the "visit the United States of America" program as an opportunity to demonstrate the transcendent quality of the Christian principles which are the very fabric of our Nation, and urges its members to examine ways in which they, individually and collectively, can use this opportunity to strengthen the bonds of friendship between our country and the international community of nations, and in so doing to make this world a better place in which to live.

To implement this resolution, the official board recommends that leaders of various organizations within the church familiarize themselves with the 1960 program and discuss within their respective groups specific ways by which they may participate, especially in hospitality phases of the program to insure the proper reception of visitors from abroad to this area.

Further, it is recommended that copies of this resolution be transmitted to all churches of this district in the hope that they will initiate similar activities.

RESOLUTION OF THE NASSAU COUNTY AMERICAN LEGION

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a resolution adopted by the Nassau County, N.Y., American Legion, favoring the enactment of legislation to establish a veterans hospital for Nassau and Suffolk Counties.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas Nassau County now has a population in excess of 1,700,000; and

Whereas there are at present many veterans who are unemployed or working on reduced salaries, who cannot afford to pay for medical and hospital treatment at private hospitals, although they need hospitalization; and

Whereas said veterans must, therefore, be treated as charity cases; and

Whereas the present nonveteran hospitals are very overcrowded; and

Whereas the President of the United States, the Governor of the State of New York, and the county executive of Nassau County have all expressed the need to have more public works started to take up the slack in employment; and

Whereas Nassau County and Suffolk County veterans find it extremely difficult to gain admittance to the presently available veterans hospitals due to the congestion and heavy demands thereon; and

Whereas the Suffolk County American Legion organization is on record by resolution, calling for the erection of an addition to the Northport Hospital for veterans: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Nassau County American Legion organization go on record as favoring the establishment of a veterans hospital for Nassau and Suffolk Counties.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

The following reports of committees were submitted:

By Mr. BYRD of Virginia, from the Committee on Finance, without amendment:

S. 2779. A bill relating to the election under section 1372 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 by the Augusta Furniture Co., Inc., of Staunton, Va. (Rept. No. 1040).

By Mr. BYRD of Virginia, from the Committee on Finance, with amendments:

H.R. 7588. An act to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 with respect to the treatment of copyright royalties for purposes of the personal holding company tax (Rept. No. 1041).

By Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina, from the Committee on the Judiciary, without amendment:

S. Con. Res. 81. Concurrent resolution proposing observance of week beginning January 31, 1960, as National Junior Achievement Week (Rept. No. 1042).

EXECUTIVE REPORT OF A COMMITTEE

As in executive session,

The following favorable report of a nomination was submitted:

By Mr. RUSSELL, from the Committee on Armed Services:

Joseph V. Charyk, of California, to be Under Secretary of the Air Force.

BILLS INTRODUCED

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

LONG-TERM LOANS TO CERTAIN FARMERS IN HAWAII

Mr. FONG. Mr. President, on behalf of my colleague the junior Senator from Hawaii [Mr. LONG] and myself, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill which would make available long-term Government loans to farmers in Hawaii who farm on leased land.

This bill is designed to meet a unique situation in Hawaii which does not exist in the other 49 States. Because of the widespread prevalence of leaseholds in Hawaii, farmers there have been unable to qualify for farmownership loans and farm housing loans. This bill would correct this inequity.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 2891) to amend the Bankhead-Jones Farm Tenant Act, as amended, and title V of the Housing Act of 1949, as amended, so as to authorize the Secretary of Agriculture to make financial assistance available under such acts to persons holding leasehold interests in lands in the State of Hawaii, and for other purposes, introduced by Mr. FONG, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

GREAT SALT LAKE NATIONAL PARK

Mr. MOSS. Mr. President, during adjournment, I had the pleasure of conducting hearings on two of the specific coastal areas to be set aside in the so-called save-our-shorelines bill—Cape Cod in Massachusetts and Padre Island in Texas. I was very much impressed with the magnificence and charm of these areas, and came back to Washington, D.C., with the deep conviction that they must be preserved both for the wonder and enjoyment of this generation, and those to come after us.

There exists, however, in the State of Utah a shoreline area that is more unique than anything I saw this fall. I am referring to the shoreline of the Great Salt Lake.

I therefore introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill today to set aside certain areas and shorelines of the Great Salt Lake as a national park.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 2894) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to establish the Great Salt Lake National Park in the State of Utah, introduced by Mr. Moss, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs.

Mr. MOSS. Mr. President, Great Salt Lake is perhaps the best known of the many natural wonders of Utah. This vast inland sea is the only thing of its kind in the Western Hemisphere. Americans everywhere are intrigued by the lake and want to see it.

In the hope that we might find an attractive access to Great Salt Lake, I asked the National Park Service to make a survey of the area, which they did last summer. Their survey included the entire lake and the surrounding shoreline, as well as the south, east, and north shores of Antelope Island. Among the conclusions the Park Service reached were these:

First. Great Salt Lake illustrates outstandingly significant scientific values worthy of preservation and interpretation by either the Federal or State Government.

Second. No existing area in the national park system duplicates to any substantial extent the significant values of Great Salt Lake.

Third. The north end of Antelope Island was the most impressive site on the lake visited.

Fourth. The proper development of Great Salt Lake is an extremely complex matter of concern to all levels of government as well as to corporate and private interests.

The report also points out that many of the problems which must be solved are the responsibility of local municipalities and industrial concerns. The bill I am introducing today will facilitate hearings on these problems.

In one respect I disagree heartily with the National Park Service report. It indicates a lack of local interest in developing the lake and its shorelines. The interest is there—it is only that the problems are complex, and there is need for a rallying point.

Great Salt Lake and its shoreline are both unusual and infinitely worth saving. A few more years and it will be too late. I ask unanimous consent to enter into the RECORD at this point an editorial from the Salt Lake Tribune of January 11, which makes a far more eloquent case than I could for the preservation of one of the best-known natural phenomenons of the world.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A save-our-shorelines bill, designating 10 specific coastal areas for national park administration, is expected to be the object of a major drive in the new Congress.

The original plan is modest, including Cape Cod and other Atlantic coast strips plus some additional remnants of unspoiled shoreline on the Pacific, gulf, and Great Lakes coasts.

We believe the Great Salt Lake should be given national park recognition and protection. This world-famous inland dead sea, with salt content as high as 28 percent, is one of the unique attractions in America. Its scientific, historical, and recreational importance have long been recognized but it has been allowed to deteriorate to an ugly cesspool.

Last spring, Senator Moss, of Utah, asked the National Park Service to study the potentialities of Great Salt Lake, and a team of experts spent considerable time reconnoitering the area. In a recent report, the Park Service said the lake has significant scientific values worthy of preservation and interpretation. No existing area in the national park system duplicates these values, the report said.

The report stated, however, that there was no evidence of any substantial public support for including Great Salt Lake in the National Park Service.

This matter should be promptly corrected. An unspoiled strip of shoreline needs to be given official protection while there is still time. From present indications, the Utah State Park Commission, now engaged in an ambitious program throughout the State, cannot afford this undertaking.

National Park Service experts believe a national monument would be adequate to tell the Great Salt Lake story and suggest Antelope Island as a logical site. The rugged, mostly barren island, 15½ miles long and 5½ miles wide, with a total acreage of 23,175, is connected with the mainland by a rough road. It is owned privately by the Island Improvement and Ranching Co. and four other interests and is used mainly for grazing. Obtaining the island for public use and preservation at a reasonable price is the first consideration.

Gently sloping beaches ideal for recreation exist on the north and west shores. A national monument here would supplement a project planned by the Utah State Park Commission for facilities on the lake's south shore. The old Saltair resort was given the State commission about a year ago but funds are lacking so far for any more than maintaining the property. The U.S. Army Corps of Engineers soon will begin a survey to determine the feasibility of rebuilding the old Salt Lake County boat harbor nearby and of dredging that part of the lake.

Great Salt Lake also is tremendously important commercially and these values should not be damaged.

The flexible rules of a State park would not interfere with normal industrial undertakings on the south shore.

Meanwhile, the feasibility of protecting in its natural State all of Antelope Island certainly should be thoroughly studied. Recently the commissioners of Davis County, which embraces the island, took steps to zone it. All projects involving the island depend on halting the practice of dumping raw sewage from Salt Lake City and other communities into the area. Plans are progressing on these long-needed sanitation programs.

The save-our-shorelines program has met with local opposition in some areas because of commercial and residential developments in suggested park areas. This plus the increasing national demand for expanded outdoor recreational facilities emphasize the need to set aside a small area on Great Salt Lake for public information and enjoyment before commercial exploitation blocks the way. Let's get busy.

LIMITATIONS ON USED-CAR DEALERS AND AUTO FINANCE COMPANIES IN DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Mr. BIBLE. Mr. President, I introduce for appropriate reference, a bill designed to provide needed protection for the District of Columbia's car-buying public who have been the target the last several years of a teamplay by certain unscrupulous used-car dealers and finance companies.

A pattern of growth complaints about the unethical practices of this small minority of District used-car dealers and some fly-by-night finance companies has resulted in this proposed legislation.

It is apparent that the laws of the District do not meet the fair business standards imposed by other States to curb these sharp practices whereby every last dollar is sought to be pried from low-income families, and others who patronize the used-car lots.

The Commissioners of the District of Columbia have examined this matter at considerable length and have proposed the curbs set forth in this bill.

The proposed legislation will fix a fair ceiling on finance charges which may be made for motor vehicles sold on a time-installment basis. It further will give to the Commissioners of the District authority they do not now have to regulate more effectively the conduct of persons engaged in the business of selling motor vehicles. This bill will require bonds of persons engaged in the business of selling motor vehicles and those engaged in financing the sale of motor vehicles. Presently, only licenses are required.

I can promise that the Committee on the District of Columbia will schedule early hearings on this proposed legislation.

I believe strongly that the unsuspecting public must be protected from the fast-talking salesmen who prey on the service men and women particularly, and the public in general. This proposed legislation will impose curbs that are long overdue to the Nation's Capital City.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 2895) to provide for the regulation of finance charges for retail installment sales of motor vehicles in the District of Columbia; to provide the Commissioners of the District of Columbia with additional authority to carry out the purposes of section 7 of the act approved July 1, 1902, as amended; to authorize the said Commissioners to impose certain requirements on persons licensed under the said act of July 1, 1902; and for other purposes, introduced by Mr. BIBLE, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

REMOVAL OF DISABILITY PAYMENTS AGE LIMIT UNDER SOCIAL SECURITY LAW

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, I send to the desk a bill removing the 50-year age limit for persons receiving disability payments under the Social Security Act and permitting the payment of such benefits from the beginning of an individual's disability.

An identical bill has been introduced in the House by Representative OSTERTAG, of New York. A very similar bill has also been introduced by my successor in the House, Representative WEIS. Other New York State Representatives who have introduced bills on this subject are: Messrs. FINO, DOLLINGER, and HOLTZMAN. Many other Members of both the Senate and House have introduced proposed legislation along these lines.

Mr. President, I earnestly hope that Congress will thoroughly examine and evaluate the social security program during the present session of Congress. It is apparent to a great many Americans that measures such as the removal of the disability age limit are urgently needed to improve and update Federal programs for the assistance of aged, disabled, and needy persons in our Nation.

Mr. President, there is no reason that a person should have to wait until he is 50 years old before he can qualify for disability relief under the social security program. Such relief should begin when it is needed most; namely, immediately upon determination that a person who has been paying into the social security trust fund has become totally or permanently disabled. This to me is the only fair and just approach to the overwhelming human problems involved in a person being injured or becoming so seriously ill as to prevent him from pursuing his regular line of work.

Mr. President, in introducing this bill today, I add my voice to those calling for fairer and better treatment of the disabled.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed following my remarks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the bill will be printed in the RECORD.

The bill (S. 2897) to amend title II of the Social Security Act to eliminate the requirement that an individual must have attained age 50 to qualify for disability insurance benefits, and to permit the payment of such benefits from the beginning of the individual's disability, introduced by Mr. KEATING, was received, read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That (a) subparagraph (B) of section 223(a)(1) of the Social Security Act is amended by striking out "has attained the age of fifty and".

(b) The last sentence of section 223(c) of such Act is amended by striking out all that follows "1957" and inserting in lieu thereof a period.

SEC. 2. (a) Subparagraph (C) of section 223(a)(1) of the Social Security Act is amended by inserting "while under a disability (as defined in subsection (c)(2)" after "benefits".

(b) Subparagraph (D) of section 223(a)(1) of such Act is amended to read as follows:

"(D) has been under such disability throughout a period of at least six consecutive calendar months, or dies as a direct result of such disability,".

(c) Section 223(a)(1) of such Act is further amended by striking out "beginning with the first month after his waiting period (as defined in subsection (c)(3)) in which he becomes so entitled to such insurance benefits" and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "beginning with the first month in which he satisfies subparagraphs (A), (B), and (C)".

(d) Section 223(a)(2) of such Act is amended by striking out "in the first month of his waiting period" and inserting in lieu thereof "in the first month in which he is under the disability described in paragraph (1)(C)".

(e) Section 223(c) of such Act is amended by striking out all that follows paragraph (2).

SEC. 3. The amendments made by this Act shall apply only with respect to monthly benefits under section 223 of the Social Security Act, or based upon the wages and self-employment income of an individual entitled to such benefits, for months after the month in which this Act is enacted.

OREGON COAST NATIONAL SHORELINE RECREATION AREA

Mr. NEUBERGER. Mr. President, by request, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill which has been forwarded to me by the Governor of the State of Oregon, dealing with a proposed national shoreline recreation area in the general vicinity of the famous Oregon Dunes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 2898) to establish the Oregon Coast National Seashore Recreation Area, and for other purposes, introduced by Mr. NEUBERGER, by request, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs.

Mr. NEUBERGER. Mr. President, I originally sponsored proposed legislation for such a park on March 25, 1959. That bill was S. 1526. On May 20, 1959, I introduced S. 2010 at the request of the Secretary of the Interior, to authorize three seacoast national parks in the United States, to be chosen administratively by the Secretary.

Gov. Mark O. Hatfield, of Oregon, and his State natural resources committee then criticized, at considerable length, my original proposals dealing with the national shoreline park on the Oregon coast. On October 26, 1959, I introduced a modified bill, which I had prepared with the assistance of the National Park Service and which represented a vigorous effort by me to meet many of the criticisms voiced by Governor Hatfield and his associates.

SOME FEATURES DISTURBING

On January 18, 1960, I received from the Governor a bill prepared by him and his committee. This bill contains a great many of the provisions, almost word for word, which I had included in my amended Oregon shoreline park bill October 26, 1959. The Governor's bill also contains a considerable number of rather drastic departures from my bill. Despite this fact, it is the bill sent to me by Gov. Mark O. Hatfield, of Oregon, which I am introducing by request in the Senate today. I ask that it be referred to the appropriate Senate committee, so that hearings may be scheduled and departmental and administrative views obtained.

I wish to note that, in accordance with the Governor's suggestion, there is included in the bill a legal description of the park and the Sea Lion Caves stating the exterior boundaries of each area. These are the boundaries suggested following congressional hearings in Oregon and referred to in my revised park bill of October 26, 1959. Located within the periphery of the park would be Umpqua Lighthouse State Park and that area to the south bordered by U.S. Highway 101 and Tenmile Creek, together with Tahkenitch Lake to the north. The addition of the legal descriptions was the only change made in the Governor's draft.

Candidly, Mr. President, there are some features of Governor Hatfield's bill which disturb me. I think it would be better if he and his associates had not included them. Yet I also fully realize that the legislative process is one of compromise, cooperation, and mutual agreement. I am aware of the difficulties involved in establishing a new national park in a State where the Governor of that State is hostile to such a development. In my opinion, Oregon's magnificent and scenic seacoast merits the national shoreline park which has been proposed by the National Parks Advisory Board in the Oregon Dunes, within the general vicinity of the communities of Florence and Reedsport.

DIFFERENCES AND DISTINCTIONS CITED

I think the best way to get that park is for Governor Hatfield and me to reach all possible agreement on the details of the legislation authorizing such a national park. Many years from now the important and essential thing will be the existence of a great national park along America's most majestic shoreline; it will not be what politician salved his vanity or pride by feuding with another politician over whether or not the park should be established. My goal is not political warfare; it is to bring Oregon its first new national park since Crater Lake was set aside in 1902.

In this speech of introduction I am going to cite the principal differences and distinctions between the bill sent to me by Governor Hatfield and the revised Oregon Shoreline National Park bill which I presented to the Governor last October 26, 1959. However, before I do this, I again want to emphasize that there are many major features of my bill which are contained without substantial change in Governor Hatfield's bill.

Obviously, this bill will be dispatched by the distinguished chairman of the Senate Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs [Mr. MURRAY] to the Department of the Interior for a rpeort and comments. It is my firm intention to accept whatever changes made by the Governor and his natural resources committee that are likewise acceptable to the Department of the Interior and the National Park Service. What they accept I will accept. I believe this is a fair and nonpartisan attitude on my part, Mr. President.

WILL SUPPORT PARK SERVICE JUDGMENT

If the Department of the Interior and the National Park Service should find some of the Governor's changes unacceptable from the standpoint of basic national park policies, then I have every confidence and hope that Governor Hatfield will join with me in acceding to the wishes of this great conservation agency which must administer any park which is created by Congress.

In his budget message submitted last week, President Eisenhower recommended the establishment of three new shoreline national parks to be chosen administratively as provided for in the bill S. 2010, which I have introduced at the request of the administration. In other words, the President of the United States would rely completely on the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior and his advisers in deciding which three seashore realms would be formed into parks. I likewise have faith in the ability of the Interior Department to pass upon the details of the legislation which I am introducing today at the behest of the Governor of Oregon. I again wish to reiterate that what details the Department of the Interior and the National Park Service find acceptable in this bill, will be acceptable to me also; if there are any features or provisions which these agencies determine to be unwise, then I also will be disposed to conform to their judgment, because I realize that, without departmental support, any new national shoreline park in Oregon would be highly unlikely to be authorized.

RESERVATIONS OUTLINED

Mr. President, I would like now to outline briefly those features of Governor Hatfield's bill which cause me particular concern.

Section 2(c), providing that "there shall be no further extension of the Oregon Coast National Seashore Recreation Area except for the concurrence of the Oregon Legislative Assembly and the Governor of Oregon" would take traditional authority away from the Congress of the United States and vest it in the Legislature and the Governor of the State of Oregon. It seems doubtful that a Congress of the United States would so restrict the action of future Congresses. It may not even be constitutional.

Section 3(a) would eliminate the provision contained in my modified bill which would authorize the Secretary of the Interior to enter into exchange agreements in order to acquire land for the seashore park.

I had included such a provision originally so that an equivalent amount of BLM cutover forestland might be exchanged for the 10,600-acre tree farm of the Crown Zellerbach Timber Co. along Tahkenitch Lake.

While I do not necessarily approve of such exchanges as a general rule, I felt it was justified in this situation so as not to jeopardize any of the log supply which makes possible the sizable employment and economic activity at the West Linn, Oreg., pulp and paper mill of the Crown Zellerbach Co. I regret that Governor Hatfield did not see fit to retain this exchange authority in the legislation.

DIVIDED JURISDICTION TROUBLESOME

Section 5 concerning the use of water resources within the proposed Oregon Coast National Seashore Recreation Area—as well as section 9 concerning wildlife within the proposed area—appear to establish divided or dual jurisdiction as between the Secretary of the Interior and the State.

There is reason to question the wisdom of dividing jurisdiction over important resources in the proposed area when the purpose of the act is "to effect a coordinated method of conserving and developing for the benefit, inspiration, and uses of the public certain ocean shoreline, sand dunes, forested areas, fresh water lakes and recreational facilities, the combination of which comprises a total recreation area of scenic, scientific, recreational and historic significance."

Section 6 of the Governor's bill would authorize payments in lieu of taxes for lands acquired in fee by the U.S. Government for a period of 25 years, using a descending scale after the first 5 years. While this is generally similar to the solution of the problem of payments in lieu of taxes authorized by the Congress when Jackson Hole was added to Grand Teton National Park, the Bureau of the Budget under this administration is known to be opposed to it as a general practice.

Accordingly, the better part of wisdom might well be to reduce the authorization for payments in lieu of taxes to a period of 3 years for lands acquired in fee by the Government of the United States, as proposed in my bill drafted after the Senate hearings at Reedsport and Eugene last September.

I am, of course, fully in sympathy with adequate compensation for loss of taxes to cushion the changeover from private to public use of the proposed recreational area. Such a cushion, I believe, would be provided adequately by the provision for payments in lieu of taxes for a period of 3 years after private properties are acquired in fee.

TIES SECRETARY'S HANDS

Section 7 would tie the Secretary of the Interior's hands in the conservation and management of the proposed national seashore recreation area by binding him to "the present program planned by the U.S. Soil Conservation Service" for the stabilization of the moving dunes.

The present program of dune stabilization has been formulated with other uses of the area as the objective. It seems questionable whether, in view of the stated objectives of the national seashore recreation area, the Secretary's hands should be tied in such manner that he would be prevented from formulating a program of dune stabilization that would best fit the purposes of the proposed national seashore recreation area and its relationship to adjacent communities.

We might provide for consultation with the Soil Conservation Service, and the Secretary of the Interior ought to have reasonable latitude in drawing up a program for dunes stabilization.

PARK SERVICE ANALYSIS AUTHORITATIVE

This, Mr. President, summarizes some of the reservations which I have about the Governor's bill. However, I believe the basic determination should be made by the Department of the Interior and the National Park Service, whose officials have had long experience in the establishment and operation of national parks.

The first national park was set aside in 1872. It was Yellowstone National Park in Wyoming. If the Oregon National Seashore Recreation Area is created it will be the 181st unit of the national park system. This means that a vast body of experience exists for determining operating policies of the National Park Service. I am quite willing to abide by the judgment of those who possess this experience. I feel certain that Governor Hatfield will likewise trust the judgment of the Department of the Interior and the National Park Service.

I again want to repeat that whatever in the Governor's bill is acceptable to the Secretary of the Interior and his associates will be acceptable to me. Conversely, I want to follow any recommendations which they might make for reasonable changes in that bill.

Mr. President, in the January 1960 issue of American Forests magazine there appeared an excellent discussion by William B. Morse of my proposal for creation of a national seashore recreation area among the Oregon Dunes. I ask unanimous consent that this article be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks, together with an editorial entitled "Seashore Parks" and a column on winter recreation on the Oregon coast, both from the Oregon Statesman of Salem; an editorial entitled "New Elements in Sand Dunes Issue" from the Oregon Journal of Portland; and an editorial from the Astorian Evening Budget headed "New Hope for Dunes Project." These thoughtful editorials are commended to my colleagues of the Senate and the House, who are the ultimate arbiters on this proposed legislation so vital to Oregon and to the Nation.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From American Forests, January 1960]

THE OREGON DUNES

(By William B. Morse)

The lines are forming on a proposal to create a national seashore in the Oregon Dunes area. Proponents, including Senator NEUBERGER and the late Robert Sawyer, claim these dunes are superior to Cape Cod's. However, opposition to a new Federal installation has already been voiced by Governor Hatfield, Assistant Secretary of Agriculture Peterson, and others. This article presents the story as seen by the Oregon representative of the Wildlife Management Institute.

The State of Oregon has been blessed with 312 miles of seacoast, considered by many people to include some of the most beautiful ocean frontage in the world. There are only four other States with a longer coastline, nevertheless the proposal to dedicate a 23-mile strip as a national seashore area has created a hornet's nest of opposition within the State.

The American Forestry Association should have a vital interest in the proposed Oregon Dunes. It is similar to the Atlantic seashore areas supported by the association, and also involves national forest and private tree farmlands within the overall boundaries.

Opponents of the dunes national seashore area have been extremely active; proponents, as yet unorganized, have not joined the battle for publicity. The project area is complex, as are the issues. It is difficult to strip emotional factors from consideration and look at the fundamentals involved; however, it can be done. It must be done to view the area in perspective, or at least in the perspective of what is most desirable for the long-range benefit of all the people.

The National Park Service published results of a privately financed survey early last year in a comprehensive volume called the "Pacific Coast Recreation Area Survey." The report classified four areas on the entire west coast as possessing unique qualities of national significance, one each in Washington and Oregon, and two in California. Soon after publication of this report, Senator RICHARD L. NEUBERGER introduced S. 1526 to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to acquire not more than 35,000 acres in the Oregon Dunes-Sea Lion Caves as a national seashore recreation area. Since then, two more Senate bills have been introduced, S. 2010, the administration bill authorizing three areas and naming one of them; and S. 2460 naming and authorizing 10 seashore areas, including the Oregon Dunes-Sea Lion Caves.

The Senate Interior and Insular Affairs Committee has ordered two public hearings in Oregon on the Oregon Dunes proposal in early October. These hearings will provide an opportunity for all interested people to submit their views for the records and will make public that factual information vitally needed to properly assess the proposal for a national seashore.

That is the legislative situation for the Oregon Dunes. What, then, of the land? The 23 miles of coastline involved are located between the mouths of the Siuslaw and Umpqua Rivers. That section of the Oregon coast is characterized by easily eroded sandstones, and, as a result, large quantities of sand have been formed. For thousands of years, these sands have blown in shifting dunes, creating lakes, killing vegetation, and forming new vegetated areas and lakes. The dunes present an unexcelled example of nature's battle for individual survival, but some species do survive, and the forested areas on the east of the active dunes grow on ancient stabilized dunes. Geologically, the western coast is rising, and some of the older stabilized dunes reach a height of 450 feet above sea level.

There are three distinct land forms within the study area. The ocean front is a wide, fine-textured sandy beach. Inland is a large desertlike expanse of moving sand, swept by the wind into dunes, and farthest from the sea are the ancient dunes, now forest covered.

Many lakes are found on the area, but three are large enough to be significant: 130-acre Cleowox; Woahink, about 800 acres; and 3,200-acre Siltcoos Lake. The latter two are located east of Highway 101 and are the major protrusion of the study area to the east. The remainder of the project lies between the highway and the ocean, averaging only 1½ miles in width.

Land cover, use, and ownerships are best listed in tabular form:

TABLE 1.—Landownership

These figures do not include the area of the Sea Lion Caves which will be discussed later.

The land owned by the United States is of special interest as it includes 11,260 acres of the Siuslaw National Forest.

Much of the land classified as timberland has been cut over and now is covered by brush, reproduction, and immature second growth. An estimated 1,600 acres of uncut commercial timberland remain in the area, a substantial portion of which is on lands near Siltcoos and Woahink Lakes that have been subdivided for homesites. The largest single private timberland ownership is in a Crown Zellerbach Corp. tree farm, and involves about 3,000 acres.

The two larger lakes provide mixed fishing for warm-water species, and sea runs of cutthroat trout, steelhead, and silver salmon. Waterfowl utilize all the lakes in the area during the fall and winter months. Barley and grasses are planted for waterfowl food under a cooperative State-Federal project north of the Siltcoos Lake outlet.

The 522 acres owned by the State of Oregon are all in Jesse M. Honeyman State Park. This park contains Cleowax Lake, portions of the Woahink Lake, timber, beautiful rhododendrons, and striking sand dunes. The unique combination and intensive development make it one of the finest parks in the Oregon system. The stature of Honeyman Park is well shown by the increase in use from 222,687 visits in 1955 to 344,256 visits in 1957.

The Forest Service management plan for lands within the proposed seashore lists recreation as the primary use. Timber harvest will be confined to salvage of head and dying timber. Present forest recreation developments include three forest camps and one Girl Scout camp. An estimated 107,000 visits were made to these units in 1958. New Forest Service developments proposed include enlarging one camp, constructing five more camps, and building seven miles of road for beach and recreational access. Access to the beach and the dunes area is difficult. Parking space on the highway is restricted, and the only good roads into the dunes area are at Siltcoos Forest Camp and at Honeyman Park.

In general, the attitudes of residents in the two closest towns to the proposed Dunes seashore are worlds apart. People living in Reedsport on the south end are generally favorable, while some from the town of Florence at the north end are actively opposed. Leadership in Reedsport is favorable. William M. Tugman, in an editorial in the Port Umpqua Courier, June 11, 1958, said, "There is every reason to believe that the national seashore will bring millions of tourists to this area the year around, that it will provide a balance to our economy we cannot achieve any other way. It will put an end to many real estate promotions and speculations. Over a period of time, which we will not live to see, it will restore to this area much of its primitive beauty and glory. * * * The national seashore will not make everybody rich. But if it provides a balance to our economy, it will reduce some of the staggering poverty that exists in all our communities today."

Some leaders in Florence take the opposite tack and are unalterably opposed to the project. Much of the opposition stems from residents within the study area who are concerned with losing their homes. Most newspapers in Oregon, however, editorially support a national seashore.

Charges and countercharges have filled the air. Park Service officials on the original survey have been accused of snooping almost to the point of being "Peeping Toms." All such charges have contributed to creation of an emotional climate which may require years to correct. Some level heads prevail, and it is worth noting that the Courty Court of Douglas County, where 40 percent of the seashore is located, has approved the project by resolution. The county park boards of both Douglas and Lane Counties have done likewise. The entire area is located in these counties. The State of Oregon has yielded to local pressure, sidestepped the issue, and withheld decision pending further information.

There is little question that the Oregon Dunes are magnificent. Dr. Ira N. Gabrielson, president of the Wildlife Management Institute says, "In my opinion, it is the finest dune area in North America."

Most of the opponents recognize that development of the dunes themselves would be desirable. It is the lake area to the east, location of residences and business, that is controversial. The Park Service says there must be space for camp grounds, picnic areas, and water-type recreation in the project. The present boundaries will give a good cross section of the entire ecology from beach to ancient dunes.

Much of the present trouble stems from lack of information. The boundaries set up now are only boundaries of a recommended study area. Until some legislation authorizes the Park Service to make a detailed and complete survey, they will not know where the final boundary of a national seashore should be. A great deal of the opposition would not exist if a final recommendation for the Dunes seashore boundary could have been made initially. The Park Service has some economic studies under way and boundaries of the study area have been changed, but this information has not yet been released.

One great advantage to be gained by a national seashore is money. Conservative estimates by the Park Service indicate that in the long run, a national seashore would bring twice as much money into the immediate area as would use of the existing resources without a national seashore. Some conservationists, author included, believe the seashore would add at least $40 million per year in increased tourist business to the entire Oregon coast. Recreation development can bring immense amounts of money to an area. Douglas County's Salmon Harbor Park, just south of the dunes area, brought an additional $2 million into the immediate area last year. Proponents point out that if a small regional development can do this, a large national area would accomplish much more.

Residents of the area fear loss of tax revenues, particularly local school taxes. Every group in favor of the seashore would help secure amendments to any pending legislation providing for Federal payment to local taxing districts of money in lieu of taxes, such payments to be on a diminishing basis for a stated term of years. As payments decreased, the local tax base would increase by construction of tourist-serving businesses near the area. Precedent exists for this in the Grand Teton National Park.

Local residents feel that their homes will be condemned and confiscated. This belief still persists in spite of assurances by the Park Service that they rarely condemn real property, and, in many cases, they can make life tenure agreements to allow the people to use their homes rent free for life.

Another criticism is that dune stabilization programs will cease and rolling dunes will inundate the entire area. Again, the Park Service has promised to protect river harbors, lakes, campgrounds, and the major highways. After all, much of that part of the coast consists of ancient dunes, so dunes, moving and stabilized, are a geological process.

Forestry and timber production are a basis for other criticisms of the project. The timber on the homesite and State park areas is, and will continue to be, unavailable. Forest Service land produces little merchantable timber and because it is now classed as a recreation area, will contribute little toward regional timber production. That leaves the lands in the Crown-Zellerbach Tree Farm, most of which are at least 70 and 80 years from another harvest. Crown-Zellerbach is opposed to the project and believes that any additional park development should be undertaken by the State. These lands are rough and presently have limited scenic values, although they do border the south end of Siltcoos Lake. Some proponents feel that the bulk of this tree farmland could be excluded from the project, although it might be necessary to acquire a buffer strip along the lake for scenic purposes. A few small tracts of other commercial timberlands are in or adjacent to the study area, but their small size will cause little impact on the regional wood-using industries.

The Forest Service has not officially released their views of the project. It is likely that they will oppose placing any of their land in the project. They have done a good job of recreational development and hope to do a better one in the future.

The Sea Lion Caves portion of the dunes project has been noncontroversial. This 180-acre unit is located 6 miles north of Florence and is not contiguous with the large Oregon Dunes unit. The caves are large, natural, seaswept caverns in a rocky promontory and are of national significance as the only known mainland rookery of Stellar's sea lion. The caves are privately developed as a tourist business. No one, including the owners, has objected to the proposal to include the caves in a national seashore. The State game commission feels that any recognition given sea lions will make it more difficult to control their numbers in spots where they feed on salmon. Some Oregon fishermen have long blamed sea lions for decimating salmon runs and have been vociferous in demands for control measures. Overfishing, pollution, dams, and destruction of spawning areas kill countless salmon, but it is convenient to blame much of it on the sea lions.

The concept of a national seashore is new, but national parks are familiar to all. It is difficult for many people in Oregon to understand the great difference between the two. There are many recreational uses that may be permitted on the national seashore, although prohibited in a national park. The State may be allowed to manage fishing and waterfowl hunting on a seashore. Boating, water skiing, and beach buggies can all be permitted on a seashore. The seashore emphasis is on recreation, not on preservation as in the national parks.

There has been some question as to the future of Honeyman State Park if a national seashore is established. The Park Service says it could remain under State operation if the State desired. It would be illogical to have two park agencies operating in one area, and Oregon would be wise to turn the park over to the Dunes National Seashore if it is established and spend their operational money on another coastal park.

A most important element of the dunes problem is water. Industrial development in coastal Oregon has been handicapped by lack of water, particularly in the late summer when river flows are low. It has been known for many years that dry looking sand dunes store vast amounts of rain water; European cities have tapped this source for many years. Federal experiments showed high water potential in Oregon's sand dunes several years ago, and recent tests by an electric company were so successful that a new pulp and paper mill will be constructed about 20 miles south of the proposed seashore and will secure the necessary industrial water solely from dunes.

The water potential on the Oregon Dunes is seldom mentioned by opponents, but is always in the background. Many people agree with the Oregon Journal, which said editorially on July 15, 1959: "* * * The Florence area dunes have tremendous value for recreational purposes probably outweighing what worth they might have as an industrial water supply. Nobody knows, for instance, what effect the pumping of water from these dunes would have on adjacent fresh water lakes, which are prime recreational attractions."

The leader of the dunes opposition organization, called the Western Lane County Taxpayers Association, has described his group as a very fluid organization. This is an apt description; an observer or investigator gains an impression that one of the real issues behind their opposition to the dunes is like their organization—fluid. The fluid is potential water development, and the devil take lake levels and recreation.

Those are the major valid criticisms of the Oregon Dunes seashore. Why should an area like this be proposed where there is already much Federal land and some recreational development? Senator RICHARD L. NEUBERGER says of the Oregon dunes, "Within a comparatively brief span of years, our Nation's population will soar to the 300 million mark. We cannot afford to delay decisions which ultimately must be made to preserve unique secenic areas for the recreation and enjoyment of our citizens. The dunes area of the Oregon seacoast is one section of America's shoreline which is worthy of national recognition and preservation. This is the objective of the legislation I have introduced to establish the Oregon Dunes and Sean Lion Caves national seashore area. Its exact boundaries and the portions of adjacent land, water, and forest areas which should be included can only be determined after thorough study and review. One step in such determination occurred last fall when the Senate Public Lands Subcommittee, of which I am a member, held congressional hearings in the immediate vicinity of the proposed park development. I hope that this will lead to early action giving park status to the Oregon Dunes so that citizens of Oregon and the entire Nation can share in the benefits."

Other proponents also believe that the area possesses such unique and magnificent attractions of national significance that it could be best developed, operated, and interpreted by the National Park Service. They believe that it will be of financial benefit to the State and of cultural benefit to the Nation if an Oregon Dunes National Seashore is established. The agencies developing and managing the lands now have done a fine job, but the Oregon Dunes are worthy of a coordinated development by one agency, rather than a piecemeal development by many. These same conservationists know that every national park and national seashore was established against strong local opposition, and every one has been an economic asset to the surrounding area and a cultural asset to the Nation.

WINTER AT THE COAST

[From the Salem Oregon Statesman, Jan. 15, 1960]

The Oregon coast saves some of its choicest secrets to reveal to those who visit the shore in the winter.

Those who saw the new year in at our section of the beach in Lincoln County were treated to pounding waves which left long lines of foam for children to kick their way through at the high water mark.

The spouting horns at Depoe Bay and Boiler Bay were gathering points for hundreds of brightly clad beachcombers, willing to take a ducking in chilly spray for the privilege of getting close to the source.

Winter's high tides alter the landscape and seascape so that summertime visitors hardly recognize some of the coast. They fill every corner of Siletz Bay with water, crowding in on the low-lying houses at Cutler City.

The waves at Taft cross the bar and pound against the seawall of rocks next to the streets of the city. The long line of logs which normally divides that beach into hundreds of little picnic spots bob resignedly in Siletz Bay waiting to be thrown into different abstract patterns along the sand for next summer's visitors.

Further down the coast, the waves surge through the mouth of the Devil's Punch Bowl at Otter Rock. The summer tourist who has looked into that yawning hole on a dozen different occasions finally sees the swirling waters about which he heard others talk.

With a steady wind blowing from the west, the glass ball hunters are out in full force. As early as one gets to the beach in the morning, there is always one or two sets of footprints ahead on the sand. Back they come, early birds, stick in hand, poking into each pile of drifting sand, eyes on the lookout for that glint of green which betrays the hidden glass float.

For those who were willing to risk a climb on ice-coated rocks, the waves put on a splendid show of violence over the new year's holiday. The sun was warm enough in midday to permit sitting on the beach or rocks to watch the display. Schools of whales frolicked offshore, although the usual clusters of fishing boats were absent.

The wintertime recreational uses of the coast will increase as people come to recognize that sunshine isn't much harder to find there in the winter than in the summer, and in many ways it is even more enjoyable in the off season.

SEASHORE PARKS

President Eisenhower threw his support behind the Interior bill to establish three seashore recreational areas. While he does not specify locations for the three it is known that the National Park Service is favorably disposed toward the Oregon Dunes as one choice. The President in his budget message declared these areas "would be of national significance because of their outstanding natural and scenic features, recreational advantages and other public values."

The Interior bill was introduced by Senator NEUBERGER at the last session. He also introduced a bill to establish the Oregon dunes as a national seashore recreational area. The latter measure has been undergoing revision in an attempt to satisfy Oregon's committee on natural resources. It is still uncertain whether this bill will be pressed or support centered on the Interior bill which leaves the selection of areas to an administrative agency.

It looks as though the country will get three seashore parks, and one of them may be on the Oregon coast.

[From the Oregon Daily Journal, Jan. 21, 1960]

NEW ELEMENTS IN SAND DUNES ISSUE

One can be both encouraged and confused by recent events in relation to the proposal for creation of a national seashore recreation area in the dunes of the Oregon coast.

Encouragement comes in the offering of a bill by Governor Hatfield's committee on natural resources for the establishment of such a park but with certain safeguards for the State and the people of the area. The committee had previously voiced strong opposition to proposals of Senator RICHARD L. NEUBERGER and Representative CHARLES O. PORTER.

But the new bill is not an extreme departure from a compromise measure prepared last fall by Senator NEUBERGER, and the Senator now says that he will attempt to go along with every provision of Governor Hatfield's bill which is consistent with traditional National Park Service policy. Representative PORTER says he is encouraged by the State committee's action and believes that it forms the basis of compromise legislation which can be passed.

Perhaps the most startling development is the endorsement of the Hatfield bill by leaders of the Florence area fight against previous sand dune legislation. If this produces something which the Western Lane County Taxpayers Association, NEUBERGER and PORTER can all support, a modern miracle will have been performed.

A new element in the whole picture was the recent endorsement by President Eisenhower of the previous Department of Interior bill, which had been introduced by Senator NEUBERGER, authorizing the establishment of three national seashores and empowering the Park Service to select the three by administrative action. At this stage, the Park Service favors this approach and is opposed to specific legislation on any particular park.

But there is considerable sentiment in Congress against this method. It seems likely that specific legislation will be presented on individual parks, including the Oregon Dunes. The Park Service may have to accept this approach. On the other hand, if Congress should authorize three parks without naming them, NEUBERGER is confident that the Oregon Dunes would be one of the three and that the Park Service would give the utmost consideration to providing the safeguards wanted by State and local interests.

The whole situation is in such a state of flux that nobody can predict what will develop. But the spirit of compromise which has permitted contending forces in Oregon to get together has enhanced Oregon's prospect of having a park.

The chances that three such areas will be established, whether through the one piece of legislation or through separate bills, are good. Oregon is in competition with other States in this matter. Whether we succeed may depend on how well we state our case in the future.

And we ought to speak from an attitude, not that we will grudgingly do the National Park Service a favor, but that we will gladly accept something which will prove to be of great value to our State, as well as the Nation.

[From the Astorian Evening Budget, Jan. 21, 1960]

NEW HOPE FOR DUNES PROJECT

President Eisenhower's endorsement of the Oregon Dunes National Seashore project, coupled with a reversal of opinion by Gov. Mark Hatfield who now looks favorably upon the plan, certainly seem to enhance the prospects for a development that last week appeared moribund.

This project seems to have merit. It provides Federal participation to supplement the efforts of the State in providing more and improved attractions for tourists on the Oregon coast.

The local opposition has seemed shortsighted and the State administration's chilly attitude toward it has been hard to understand.

EXTENSION OF CERTAIN HEALTH BENEFITS TO EMPLOYEES OF AGRICULTURAL STABILIZATION AND CONSERVATION COUNTY COMMITTEES

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill to extend the benefits of the Federal Employees Health Benefits Act to employees of county agricultural, stabilization, and conservation committees.

I am sure that every Member of the Senate is familiar with the vital work carried out by these employees. The exacting task of administering our complex, and many times confusing, farm programs falls on the shoulders of these dedicated employees. Their responsibilities are great and their compensation is small. Although they are paid almost entirely with Federal funds, they are not considered as Federal workers for purposes of employee-benefit programs.

These conscientious public servants work side by side with regular civil-service employees, who enjoy all the standard privileges and benefits accorded Federal workers. It is difficult for ASC employees to understand why they are treated as unwanted stepchildren for benefit purposes. Recognition of their contributions to the farmers of this country is long overdue. This bill would extend only one of the standard civil-service benefits to ASC employees. I realize this matter was considered by the Senate committee last year and was rejected because of supposed difficulties in administering a health program for ASC employees. I am confident that suitable means can be found to eliminate this objection. I hope the Department of Agriculture and the Civil Service Commission will consider this bill with a positive approach rather than come up with a reiteration of their previous unsubstantial objections.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 2899) to extend the benefits of the Federal Employees Health Benefits Act of 1959 to employees of the agricultural stabilization and conservation county committees, introduced by Mr. FULBRIGHT, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service.

SCHOOL ASSISTANCE ACT OF 1960—AMENDMENTS

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, on behalf of myself and Senators MURRAY, LONG of Hawaii, NEUBERGER, MANSFIELD, MORSE, CHAVEZ, BYRD of West Virginia, MOSS, MARTIN, KEFAUVER, WILLIAMS of New Jersey, JACKSON, McGEE, GRUENING, MAGNUSON, KERR, HUMPHREY, HENNINGS, RANDOLPH, CHURCH, MUSKIE, and MONRONEY, I submit amendments, intended to be proposed by us jointly, to Senate bill 8, the education bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendments will be received, printed, and lie on the table.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, the purpose of the amendments is twofold: First, to include among the permissible uses of Federal funds aid to teachers' salaries, if the States elect to so use the funds; secondly, to increase the amount of the authorized appropriation from half a billion dollars to $25 for each child of school age, which for the first year would total $1.1 billion, and to authorize the aid for an indefinite period rather than for 2 years only.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a brief digest of these amendments may appear at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the digest was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A DIGEST OF THE TEACHERS' SALARY AMENDMENTS TO S. 8 TO BE OFFERED BY SENATOR CLARK AND OTHERS

The amendments would make the following changes in S. 8:

1. Increase the authorization from $500 million a year to $25 per child of school age, which amounts to $1.1 billion during the next fiscal year.

2. Authorize the aid for an indefinite period rather than for a 2-year term.

3. Authorize the States to use the Federal and either for school construction or for teachers' salaries, with each State's having freedom of choice as to the proportion it would devote to each purpose.

Other provisions of S. 8—including the prohibition against Federal control, the maintenance-of-effort provisions, and the equalization formula—would be applied to the grants authorized in the amendment just as they would to those authorized in the bill. The requirement in S. 8 that Federal funds be matched is adapted to conform to the broader purposes of the bill.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, in connection with these amendments, I ask unanimous consent to have a series of quotations from statements by President Eisenhower, by Secretary Flemming, by the Committee for the White House Conference on Education, by Commissioner of Education Derthick, by the Public Affairs Institute, by the Educational Policies Commission, by the Carnegie Foundation for the Advancement of Teaching, and by the Rockefeller Bros. Fund appear in the RECORD at this point in my remarks. These authorities all stress the importance of raising teachers' salaries in order to improve the standard of education in the United States.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

President Eisenhower, commenting on report of Science Advisory Committee: "One subject discussed in the report warrants special emphasis—the importance of raising the standard of our teachers in their communities. Higher salaries are a first requirement." (May 24, 1959.)

Committee for the White House Conference on Education: "We recommend that greater inducements of all kinds be offered to attract and retain enough good teachers. * * * Practical steps must be taken to change the concept of teaching as an impoverished occupation. Teaching must be made a financially comfortable profession. * * * Present salary schedules have the effect of discouraging many able people from entering the profession. * * * Salary schedules and preparation courses should be reexamined and changed where necessary to make the teaching profession more attractive to the most able young men and women." (April 1956.)

Secretary Flemming:

"DOUBLING TEACHERS' PAY IS URGED BY FLEMMING

"Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare Flemming today called for doubling teachers' salaries as a reasonable national goal." (Washington Star, Feb. 10, 1959.)

"I think the most serious weakness in our total educational system today is our salary structure. I don't care whether you are talking about elementary or secondary education, or whether you are talking about higher education. I think that as a nation we should be ashamed of the compensation that we pay those who are willing to serve us in what is certainly one of the most important areas in which people can serve the society of today." (November 1958.)

Commissioner of Education Derthick on the Soviet educational system: "We saw no evidence of any teacher shortage. Teacher workloads and other working conditions are advantageous. Teacher prestige is high. Salaries are at the levels of those of doctors and engineers * * * Only the best are chosen to teach—one out of six who apply."

"What we have seen has amazed us in one outstanding particular; we were simply not prepared for the degree to which the U.S.S.R., as a nation, is committed to education as a means of national advancement. Everywhere we went we saw indication after indication of what we could only conclude amounted to a total commitment to education. Our major reaction, therefore, is one of astonishment * * * at the extent to which this seems to have been accomplished."

Study by F. J. Seidner for the Public Affairs Institute: "The average income of teachers is far below that of most other professional persons. Only the income of clergymen, librarians, and dietitians is less. It is lower than the average income of all employees in manufacturing as well as the average income of all the civilian employees of the Federal Government. It is only slightly higher than the average income of all persons working for wages or salaries.

"Beginning salaries offered teachers are also far below those paid to college graduates in other fields. Graduates in teaching could expect an average starting salary of $3,650 in 1958. Average beginning salaries paid college graduates—both men and women—in all fields was $4,758, over $1,000 more. For graduates with a scientific background starting salaries averaged well over $5,000. With differences of this magnitude, the prevailing shortage of teachers becomes easier to understand. * * * And Dr. Arthur Flemming, Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare, said recently that a 100 percent increase in teachers' salaries within the next 5 or 10 years was a reasonable national goal."

Educational Policies Commission: "Every major study of the status of American education tells the same story of neglect. It is a story of crises in education, of teachers poorly paid and in inadequate numbers, of poor communities struggling to pay mounting school bills, of classroom shortages. * * * These problems are not entirely monetary, but lack of money is the major element. * * *

"The conclusion is inescapable that hundreds of thousands of American children at every level of education are denied competent teaching.

"The highest single priority, therefore, in responding to the contemporary challenge to American education is the recruitment, education, and retention in the profession of qualified teachers. * * *

"At the minimum, expenditures on education should be doubled within a decade, as proposed by the White House Conference on Education. Realistic programs which will bring about such levels of spending should be developed without further delay.

"Called for are important increases in teachers' salaries, in school construction and equipment, in financial assistance to students and prospective teachers."

Carnegie Foundation for the Advancement of Teaching: "The teaching profession is slowly withering away."

Report of the Rockefeller Bros. Fund: "The root problem of the teaching profession remains financial. * * * Until we pay teachers at least as well as the middle echelon of executives we cannot expect the profession to attract its full share of the available range of talents. Salaries must be raised immediately and substantially."

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, the sum and substance of these quotations is that, in terms of priorities, teachers' salaries should head the list in determining what should be done first to rehabilitate our educational system; school construction should come second; and scholarships and fellowships should come third.

In my judgment, and in the judgment of many of the educational leaders of our country, we in the Congress have the cart before the horse. We have already passed the national defense education bill, with the elaborate provision for student loans and fellowships—which is fine. It is now proposed that we pass the school-construction bill. That is fine, too. But the highest priority of all should be for aid to teachers' salaries, and it is this inadequacy which my amendment attempts to remedy.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that at this point in my remarks there may be printed in the RECORD a copy of a letter written on January 7 by the Honorable David L. Lawrence, Governor of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, to Dr. William G. Carr, executive secretary of the National Education Association.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

COMMONWEALTH OF PENNSYLVANIA,
GOVERNOR'S OFFICE,
Harrisburg, January 7, 1960.

Dr. WILLIAM G. CARR,
Executive Secretary, National Education Association, Washington, D.C.

DEAR DR. CARR: I have reviewed the statement of the National Education Association on Federal support for education proposals. This statement agrees with the perspective we have regarding education needs in our Commonwealth of Pennsylvania.

World demands and national needs have moved us from the concept that we are investing in education for the future, to the realization that we must invest in education for national survival now. This requires a full utilization of our financial potential, which precludes an unbalanced situation of strong local and State support for education and weak Federal support.

In the process of striving for national survival, we do not want to lose the democratic principles that make our cause worth the sacrifice and effort. Therefore, we must devise a manner of Federal participation in shoring up the education framework without jeopardizing local control and determination of policy.

Since the principles of the Murray-Metcalf bill support our requirements, I endorse the National Education Association's fight on its behalf and will lend my help whenever possible.

Very truly yours,

DAVID L. LAWRENCE.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, this letter places Governor Lawrence squarely behind the effort to provide Federal aid for teachers' salaries, as was originally proposed in the Murray-Metcalf bill, which he endorses.

There is a current shortage of 195,000 teachers, as reported by Commissioner of Education Lawrence Derthick. This is an increase of some 8 or 9 percent over the teacher shortage of a year ago.

We will not be able to attract and retain a sufficient number of teachers to meet the needs of a growing population—and certainly not a sufficient number with the training and competence that are needed—unless we pay salaries which signify our recognition of their worth to our society.

To pass a bill which is limited only to construction would be to close our eyes to the true scope and nature of the problem of financing education which faces our country.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

ASSISTANCE IN CONTROL OF JUVENILE DELINQUENCY—AMENDMENT

Mr. CLARK (for himself, Mr. HENNINGS, Mr. CARROLL, Mr. HART, Mr. MORSE, and Mr. KEFAUVER) submitted an amendment, intended to be proposed by them, jointly, to the bill (S. 694) to provide Federal assistance for projects which will demonstrate or develop techniques and practices leading to a solution of the Nation's juvenile delinquency control problems, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

REGULATION OF THE ALASKA RAILROAD UNDER INTERSTATE COMMERCE ACT—AMENDMENTS

Mr. BARTLETT submitted amendments, intended to be proposed by him, to the bill (S. 1508) to provide for economic regulation of the Alaska Railroad under the Interstate Commerce Act, and for other purposes, which were ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

AMENDMENT OF TARIFF ACT OF 1930—AMENDMENT

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I submit an amendment, intended to be proposed by me, to the bill (H.R. 4384) to amend paragraph 1774 of the Tariff Act of 1930 with respect to the importation of certain articles for religious purposes. This amendment, if adopted, would carry out the program suggested some time ago by the President's Advisory Council on International Travel.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be received, printed, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

MAXIMUM RATES OF PER DIEM ALLOWANCE FOR EMPLOYEES TRAVELING ON OFFICIAL BUSINESS—AMENDMENT

Mr. PROUTY. Mr. President, on January 14, I submitted an amendment to be proposed to the bill (H.R. 5196) to increase the maximum rates of per diem allowance for employees of the Government traveling on official business and for other purposes.

The purpose of this amendment was to increase the maximum rate of compensation for the use of private automobiles from 10 to 12 cents per mile for U.S. marshals and their deputies.

Since I submitted this amendment, it has come to my attention that other personnel of the judicial system, including Federal judges and other personnel, are paid under regulations of the Director of the Administrative Office of the U.S. Courts.

In order to insure that these court personnel, including the judges, court clerks, probation officers, employees of the administrative office, and similar personnel, shall receive the benefits of the bill H.R. 5196, I submit an amendment to this bill, which directs the Director of the Administrative Office of the U.S. Courts to put into effect such regulations as he may deem necessary to give the increases provided by the bill to this class of court personnel.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be received, printed, and referred to the Committee on Government Operations.

OFFICE OF COAL RESEARCH—ADDITIONAL COSPONSOR OF BILL

Under authority of the order of the Senate of January 22, 1960, the name of Mr. BYRD of West Virginia was added as an additional cosponsor of the bill (S. 2885) to establish an Office of Coal Research within the Department of the Interior, and to provide for and encourage research to determine improved means of producing and utilizing coal, introduced by Mr. CLARK (for himself, Mr. MURRAY, Mr. MCGEE, Mr. CARROLL, Mr. RANDOLPH, and Mr. DOUGLAS) on January 22, 1960.

PERMANENT MEMORIAL TO MEMORY OF WOODROW WILSON—ADDITIONAL COSPONSOR OF JOINT RESOLUTION

Under authority of the order of the Senate of January 21, 1960, the name of Mr. CHURCH was added as an additional cosponsor of the joint resolution (S.J. Res. 152) authorizing the creation of a commission to consider and formulate plans for the construction in the District of Columbia of an appropriate permanent memorial to the memory of Woodrow Wilson, introduced by Mr. WILLIAMS of New Jersey (for himself and other Senators) on January 21, 1960.

MEMBERS OF BOARD OF VISITORS TO COAST GUARD AND MERCHANT MARINE ACADEMIES

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, I wish to announce that, as chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, I have appointed the Senator from Alaska [Mr. BARTLETT] and the Senator from Kansas [Mr. SCHOEPPEL] as members of the Board of Visitors to the U.S. Coast Guard Academy.

I have also appointed to the Board of Visitors to the U.S. Merchant Marine Academy the Senator from California [Mr. ENGLE] and the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTT].

"IF COEXISTENCE FAILS"—(S. DOC. NO. 78)

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. Mr. President, the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. DODD] has written an outstanding analysis of our cold war position with relation to the Soviet Union. Under the title of "If Coexistence Fails" this notable study of one of the most important issues of our time has been printed in the Quarterly Journal of the Foreign Policy Research Institute of the University of Pennsylvania. This is an excellent publication but of somewhat limited distribution. I am confident that the great amount of research which has gone into Senator DODD's study, the keen insight he has brought to the subject, and the clear and incisive language in which he has couched his article, make it a matter of great interest to all the Members of the Senate, as well as something of lasting historical value. I therefore ask unanimous consent, Mr. President, that the text of this article by the Senator from Connecticut may be printed as a Senate document.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from South Carolina? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

ADDRESSES, EDITORIALS, ARTICLES, ETC., PRINTED IN THE RECORD

On request, and by unanimous consent, addresses, editorials, articles, etc., were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

By Mr. ROBERTSON:

Address delivered by Senator JOHNSTON of South Carolina, in Statuary Hall, the Capitol, on the 153d birthday of Gen. Robert E. Lee.

UKRAINIAN INDEPENDENCE DAY

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, there is no limit to the number of forces which motivate and put in motion humanity's forward march. Many are the aspirations and ideals of man, differing under different climes and in different ages, that drive him on, keep him going, in his eternal quest for a better life. Among all these forces and factors, among all spiritual aspirations, the spirit of freedom has a place by itself, holding perhaps the highest of all positions. We are often told that the human being is differentiated from all other living beings by his capacity and ability to think. To that one may add also his insatiable desire for freedom, for that, too, sets him apart from all other living creatures. And we consider his willingness to sacrifice his all for the attainment of that supremely noble goal as one of his finest virtues.

The Ukrainian people have possessed many fine virtues throughout their long and turbulent history, and they have clung to them steadfastly. During most of their modern history, they have suffered under alien rulers. During the times of their oppression, their sole spiritual sustenance has been their unwavering hope for freedom. Both under the autocratic czars of Russia, and under the tyrannical Communists of the Soviet Union, they have shown this characteristic tenacity, and thereby they have merited our admiration. The Communist totalitarian regime in the Ukraine has been, and I am afraid still is, terribly cruel toward these helpless and innocent Ukrainians. In the not too distance past, when there was no cold war and, therefore, no thawing or relaxation of the existing relations between the free West and Communist East, they suffered under Stalin's heartless agents. Since the end of the last war, and especially since Stalin's death, we hear much of freedom, of relaxations, of peaceful coexistence and brotherly love, all these soothing expressions emanating from the Kremlin. To what extent and in what degree the oppressed Ukrainians have benefited from such moves, by the Soviet regime, it is difficult to say. Unfortunately, and for good reason, we cannot vouch for everything we hear about the way things are in that proletarian paradise. We can only hope that a part of the good of what we hear is true, and in that we all rejoice. We ardently pray that the unbroken spirit of freedom of the Ukrainian people will live in their unfree land, and that eventually they will once more regain their rights. That is my cordial message to the Ukrainians on their 42d independence day.

Mr. HART. Mr. President, last Friday, January 22, marked the 42d anniversary of Ukrainian independence. At a time when the many unresolved issues of conflict between the Soviet Union and the West are to be reexamined at the highest level, it is important that we not overlook the history and aspirations of such freedom-loving people.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a statement of the Ukrainian Congress Committee of America, as it appeared in the Ukrainian Bulletin of December 1–15, 1959.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT OF THE UKRAINIAN CONGRESS COMMITTEE OF AMERICA TO THE UKRAINIAN COMMUNITY IN THE UNITED STATES IN THE MATTER OF INTENSIFIED ATTACKS OF MOSCOW ON UKRAINIAN LIFE

The free world can permit itself to conduct a hot or a cold war with Moscow, or live with it in peaceful coexistence, inasmuch as it has freedom and can avail itself of it accordingly. Its sole solicitude is the safeguard of its freedom against Russian aggression. But the enslaved Ukrainian people are compelled to live in a state of permanent struggle with Moscow, a life or death struggle. This protracted struggle can end either in full victory over the aggressor, which victory would restore freedom and independence to Ukraine, or in capitulation, which would mean the inevitable destruction of the Ukrainian people. If the Ukrainian people want to avoid destruction, they must continue their struggle for the national liberation until full victory is attained.

There can be no compromise in this struggle, inasmuch as the slightest retreat or the slightest manifestation of submission or agreement to coexistence in slavery will only strengthen the Russian enslaver and further the encouragement to aggression.

This maxim is well known to Moscow and it never can forget it. By its policies of ruses and deceit it tries to lull the vigilance of the Ukrainian people and to weaken their moral strength, and at the same time to strengthen its positions by mendacious promises of easing the regime and by suggesting the hope of a better life to be attained by peaceful development. On the other hand, Moscow at the same time systematically prepares and effectuates heavy blows against those Ukrainian forces which strive for independence.

Moscow conducts its planned and cruel attacks, directed at destroying the leading elite of the Ukrainian people, not only on the land occupied by it, but also on the territory of the free world, where Ukrainian political exiles live. Moscow is destroying the Ukrainian people on the occupied territory of Ukraine by mass famines, in concentration camps, in prisons and by deportations to Siberia and to virgin lands, and outside its own borders by man hunts and assassinations. In the 18th century Russian Czarist agents kidnaped from Hamburg, Germany, Andrew Voynarovsky, great adherent of Mazepa and one of the first Ukrainian political exiles. From the bullets of a Russian agent Simon Petlura, supreme commander and head of the Directory of the Ukrainian National Republic, perished on a street of Paris; and on a street in Rotterdam Col. Eugene Konovalets, leader of the Organization of Ukrainian Nationalists and commander of the Ukrainian Military Organization, was killed by a bomb planted on his person by a Soviet agent. Just recently, while the Russian enslavers were propagating their peaceful intentions to the world, Moscow committed a heinous crime: It assassinated Stepan Bandera, head of the Supreme Council of the Organization of Ukrainian Nationalists.

By its terroristic acts against Ukrainian patriots both in Ukraine and in the free world Moscow proves to us that it knows no respite in its march toward the destruction of the Ukrainian nation. Therefore, there should be no respite in the struggle of the Ukrainian people for liberation from the Russian yoke.

Against strengthening attacks by the enemy on every sector of life, we must respond by strengthening and solidifying our reaction, by strengthening and solidifying our work for the liberation of Ukraine.

Let us intensify the liberation struggle of the Ukrainian people by our moral and material support of the Ukrainian Congress Committee of America in all its activities, as well as by our own initiative.

The heroic struggle of the Ukrainian Insurgent Army, sanctified by the death of its first commander, Gen. Taras Chuprynka, and thousands of officers and men who fell in the struggle, the revolutionary struggle of the Ukrainian underground and the indestructible resistance of the Ukrainian people under various forms against the Russian invader, attest to the dignified stand of the Ukrainian people in the native land.

Let all Ukrainian emigration, as a unit and as individual members, prove that we stand honorably in a united front of the liberation struggle of the Ukrainian people.

Our firmness, unity, activity, and durability—constitute our best reply to the enemy for his stealthy and sneaking murderous attacks.

AIR SAFETY

Mr. HARTKE. Mr. President, late last week, I called attention of this body to the steadily worsening record of safety on our airways. As I pointed to the rising toll of crashes and mechanical failures of this new year and the year just ended, I suggested that bold steps might be considered. Among these steps, I listed comparing the methods used by airlines with excellent safety records, including MATS, with those of lines which have had less good records. I still feel that the administration should give serious consideration to grounding all planes for a few days while making an exhaustive check of equipment, crews, and methods. I know that all Americans will understand that we think in terms of lives rather than dollars.

Since then there have been no new crashes. But there have been at least four incidents of mechanical failures on domestic airships which forced these ships to undertake emergency landings.

The distinguished and well-informed chairman of our Aviation Subcommittee, while continuing hearings on the crash whose cause may have been a bomb, has suggested that concentration on jets has resulted in neglect of piston airplanes. A reporter for the Washington Daily News has written that equipment to prevent fires resulting from airplane accidents could now be in use except for the fact that no one seemed to push for safer airplanes.

An agency of our Government, the FAA, has the vital mission in this field. Its Administrator has been silent. The entire administration has been silent.

Are our airplanes safe? Do all carriers operating in this country follow the rules of common sense, safety, and the FAA? Are our airports safe? Is the latest safety equipment in use? Is everything possible being done to insure the safety of the public using the airplanes? Do we need more inspectors? New regulations?

I think these are fair questions. I think these questions and, perhaps, others are on the minds and lips of many Americans. I wish the administration would give us the answers. I wish the FAA Administrator would assure us that all equipment is safe.

Over the weekend, I read with interest that Deputy Administrator Pyle said a check is being made of older planes to see if there is credence to Senator MONRONEY's suggestion that these are being neglected in favor of jets. Mr. Pyle also told a television audience that, within 5 years, major airports would be equipped with the most modern electric and electronic equipment for safety.

This recalled to me the comments made after I had spoken of the need for more air safety. The great and learned colleague, the senior Senator from New York [Mr. JAVITS], told us he agreed with my sentiments and that he knew we would provide whatever money was needed to save lives.

Last year, we had an excellent airport modernization bill before this body. I was pleased to have joined with Senator MONRONEY in its sponsorship. Yet, we were forced to scale it down because the President had sent word he would veto it in its original form.

I hope Mr. Pyle or the President or General Quesada will now tell us whether appropriations could speed up the modernization of airport equipment. Are our airports as safe as possible? Must we wait 5 years to make the installations the FAA apparently believes we need?

I hope that the administration will give us these answers, the assurances that the public demands. I hope the heads of the FAA will advise our Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee in complete frankness the state of our airports and airlines and airplanes. If Congress can help, we should be told how. I am sure that every Member of Congress will support safety programs and not put dollars before lives. I am sure the airlines and airplane manufacturer will.

Flying has become a virtual necessity in this day and age. We Senators fly to keep engagements as often as any group in the country. Fortunately most of our airlines have posted excellent safety records. I believe we should be told by the people responsible in this Government whether things could be safer and why we are seeing our safety record getting steadily worse.

This is not a matter of fixing blame. It is an attempt to do what needs to be done now to prevent further useless accidents and deaths. While we are doing so we can help set at ease the minds of those of us who must travel by air.

SUPPORT FOR OPTIMISTIC PICTURE OF U.S. DEFENSES

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, I am sure there are some who want to believe there is a missile gap and who do not want to believe Secretary Gates was doing his duty and was talking perfectly sincerely when he testified, as he did last week, before the Senate Committee on Armed Services and elsewhere. However, I am sure even those who would recognize that Hanson W. Baldwin, of the New York Times, is one of the outstanding critics of our military posture, one of the best informed, and most able writers on military subjects.

Accordingly, for the information of all who doubt and for the information of those who do not doubt but who may need some fortification in their thinking, I ask unanimous consent that two articles written by Hanson W. Baldwin, which were published in the New York Times of January 22 and 23, 1960, be printed in the RECORD following these remarks. The first one is entitled "The 'Missile Gap,' I" with a subtitle "Hardheaded Appraisals Support Gates in Optimistic Picture of U.S. Defenses." The second is entitled "Data on Missiles Support Optimism Over U.S. Defenses," with a substitute of "American Weapons Prove Accuracy—Soviet Might Is Found Exaggerated."

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE "MISSILE GAP," I—HARDHEADED APPRAISALS SUPPORT GATES IN OPTIMISTIC PICTURE OF U.S. DEFENSES

(By Hanson W. Baldwin)

Moscow's claim yesterday of a one-and-a-quarter-mile circular error in a 7,766-mile rocket flight caused raised eyebrows but no excitement in the Pentagon.

The first of a number of Russian missile shots into a new impact area in the central Pacific, whether or not it was as accurate and as successful as the Russians asserted, is unlikely to influnce materially the vigorous and aggressive presentation of the administration's defense policies just initiated.

Secretary of Defense Thomas S. Gates, Jr., Gen. Nathan F. Twining, Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, and Under Secretary of State Livingston T. Merchant, tipped the administration's hand in their opening testimony in Congress this week.

Their composite testimony totaled, in the opinion of some Congressmen, the rosiest picture of the U.S. defense posture presented to Congress for a long time. "The balance of military power is still heavily in our favor," Secretary Gates said. Even a Soviet surprise attack with all available missiles could not eliminate our nuclear retailiatory capability.

THE MISSILE GAP

Mr. Gates even cast considerable doubt on what has come by dint of constant repetition to be accepted as a fact by many in the Nation: A missile gap between the United States and the Soviet Union in the next few years. He indicated that if the Russians produced intercontinental ballistic missiles at our present maximum estimate of their potential capabilities they might have moderate numerical superiority in the next 3 years. But the United States has many other nuclear weapons systems, which, collectively, tip the balance of deterrent power heavily in our favor.

This is an election year. The Democratic opposition is already attempting to make a campaign issue out of the deficiencies in our military posture and is emphasizing particularly the alleged missile gap. The Republican administration, on the other hand, has been aroused and stung by the opposition attacks. The President, in particular, is known to have been greatly angered by the criticisms voiced in "The Uncertain Trumpet," a book recently published by Gen. Maxwell D. Taylor, U.S. Army, retired, who completed 4 years as Army Chief of Staff last June. The President's mood, particularly about defense matters, is typified by his recent heated response to a somewhat pointed news conference question about defense:

"I've spent my life in this and I know more about it than almost anybody I think in the country."

Is, then, Mr. Gates' testimony rhetoric, the opening guns of the defense in an election year; or is it solidly based on factual appraisal?

A COMPOUND ANSWER

The answer to this question is almost certainly compound. Mr. Gates has too much integrity—he is a public servant who is no politician and owes no man anything—to give other than his honest opinion. But he is aware, as is the White House, that the Pentagon case has not been put skillfully or forcefully in the past.

The administration feels that the public image of relative American weakness that has been created—partly by Communist propaganda, partly by undoubted Communist achievements, partly by the special pleading of the individual services, partly by opposition criticism, partly by inept administration presentations of our strength—is grossly exaggerated. Mr. Gates, therefore, is certainly determined to put his best foot forward, not only for domestic political reasons but also because he is keenly aware that a strategic deterrent is no stronger than the enemy thinks it is.

But at the same time his optimistic statements are based on hardheaded comparative appraisals of our own and of Soviet strength. The Secretary spoke of new intelligence estimates of Soviet missile strength, which he described as "very significant."

These estimates were not made public, but in an explanatory conference later, the Secretary got onto slippery ground when he admitted that the new estimates took into account what the Russians intended to do in missile production, rather than, as in the past, merely estimating their capabilities.

In the intelligence field this issue of intentions versus capabilities is one of the oldest of pitfalls, and many experts have come a cropper by trying, in effect, to read the enemy's mind.

Nevertheless, the new intelligence reports do include an estimate of current Soviet long-range missile strength and of current Soviet missile production that, in comparison with our own current status, is by no means discouraging.

[From the New York Times, Jan. 23, 1960]

DATA ON MISSILES SUPPORT OPTIMISM OVER U.S. DEFENSE—AMERICAN WEAPONS PROVE ACCURACY—SOVIET MIGHT IS FOUND EXAGGERATED

(By Hanson W. Baldwin)

The factual, rather than the political, motivation for the administration's new public relations policy of aggressive optimism about the Nation's defense posture has some firm foundations.

Our own missiles have demonstrated amazing accuracy, and widely published reports of tremendous Soviet missile strength are not supported by substantiated intelligence information. Here are some of the reasons for the newly expressed optimism:

Despite reports of 100 or more Soviet missile bases, there is still solid factual proof of only two long-range missile-launching sites—those long used by the Soviet Union for its test launchings at Kapustin Yar, near Stalingrad, and Tyuratam, near the Aral Sea.

Until this week's 7,762-mile rocket shot from Tyuratam to an impact area in the Central Pacific, only one Soviet missile had been tracked to a full 5,000-mile flight to land in the Northern Pacific. All the rest of the long-range shots—and there have not been many—have impacted in the Sea of Okhotsk or near Kylucki, the Soviet impact area on the Kamchatka Peninsula, a distance of 4,300 miles from Kapustin Yar and 3,850 miles from Tyuratam.

PROBABLE CIRCULAR ERROR

The approximate probably circular error of these Soviet intercontinental ballistic missiles has been estimated as possibly 7 to 10 miles, a much greater error than the Soviets claimed this week for their 7,762-mile shot.

It is quite possible that their new and more powerful rocket now incorporates an improved inertial guidance system that permits greater accuracy. On the other hand a CEP (circular error probable) for any weapons system cannot be determined except as an average of numerous flights.

The average circular error of the Atlas D missile, which is now being delivered to the Air Force as an operational missile, has been for the last eight 5,000-mile range shots considerably less than half of the 2-mile error the President revealed in his state of the Union message. The D-missile, with radio-inertial guidance, has demonstrated phenomenal accuracy, sufficient if it can be continued to destroy any point target (as well as an area target, like a city).

The Atlas E, scheduled for first flight shortly after midsummer, is a "bird" that will have complete inertial guidance as well as a lighter engine and longer range. This means that a whole salvo of 9 or 10 missiles can be fired simultaneously from the same base, whereas the radio-inertial system, because of possible mutual interference by radio transmissions, is limited to about 3 simultaneous firings from 1 base.

The new E-missile may not develop the same accuracy as the current model and it must be stressed that all the firing, except one performed by a Strategic Air Command crew at Vandenberg Air Force Base on the Pacific coast, were by experienced missileers down an instrumented range at Cape Canaveral, Fla.

Nevertheless, U.S. missile experts are confident that the problem of accuracy with the ICBM has been solved and available facts indicate we are equal to or ahead of the Russians in this field.

The Navy's Polaris missile, designed for launching from submerged submarines, registered equally phenomenal accurracy in one recent flight (with guidance equipment installed) of more than 900 miles. (The full 1,200-mile-range missile has not yet been tested and none has yet been fired from a submarine.) It landed almost on top of the target, in fact almost within the length of a city block from bulls-eye.

There is some evidence to suggest that the Soviet air defense system is not so effective as it had once been credited with being. The Hound Dog missile, now operational, launched from B–52 bombers in flight, adds considerably to the problems of the defense. To the admitted U.S. superiority in manned bomber strength, has now been added the first small nucleus of intermediate range and intercontinental range ballistic missiles.

All this collectively adds up to a reassuring reappraisal of present U.S. deterrent strength relative to that of the Soviet Union and to a short-term future that appears to be less black than had been painted in many quarters.

Many officers agree with the statement by Secretary of Defense Thomas S. Gates, Jr., that "there is no deterrent gap" and is not likely to be one within the foreseeable future.

Others go further and say they doubt that a missile gap, a Soviet superiority in numbers of long-range missiles, will, in reality, develop. There is, however, no unanimity on this point. Most officers from all services are worried about the long-term future and would like to see our calculated risks today and tomorrow reduced.

More funds for defense and a reallocation of the defense budget are urged by many.

THE BOND INTEREST CEILING

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, another favorite subject in this Chamber is the interest rate ceiling. I invite the attention of Senators who are seriously interested in this matter—and everyone should be—to an article published last week in Barron's National Business and Financial Weekly, entitled "Flaws in the Ceiling," with a subtitle "Congress Should Stop Tinkering With Interest Rates." This article is a very able argument for the President's request that the interest rate ceiling be lifted on the long-term Treasury bonds.

I also invite attention to an article which was published in Time magazine, January 25, 1960, entitled "The Treasury Squeeze," and subtitled "The Bond Interest Ceiling Is Too Low." This article in turn shows the fallacy of the policy of Congress in refusing to yield on the question of the interest rate ceiling.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the articles be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From Barron's National Business and Financial Weekly, Jan. 18, 1960]

FLAWS IN THE CEILING—CONGRESS SHOULD STOP TINKERING WITH INTEREST RATES

On an ordinary business day, commercial banks in New York City are models of efficient decorum, where interest compounds quietly among the IBM machines and occasional masked bandits pass polite withdrawal slips to tellers. Early last week, however, their dignified premises resembled nothing so much as a bargain basement. From near and far an astonishing number of small investors, many of them less than expert in the arcane ways of high finance, came flocking to Wall Street. The lure: a new offering of 1-year Treasury bills, the yield on which, so rumor had it, was likely to exceed 5 percent. Despite its widespread lack of know-how—shared, evidently, by a few embarrassed bankers—the public did not go away emptyhanded. On the contrary, out of a total issue of $1.5 billion, small buyers accounted for an unprecedented $350 million.

In view of the great debate over interest rates which has burst out again in Washington, the episode cited above is vastly revealing. Despite cogent and repeated pleas by the administration, Congress in its wisdom has refused to raise the 4¼-percent ceiling on long-term Treasury bonds. In so doing the lawmakers, to judge by their oratory, have sought to keep a tight lid on money rates generally. If this in fact has been their aim—to some skeptics the whole issue smacks less of theoretical economics than of so-called practical politics—they plainly have missed the mark. Instead of lowering rates, the absurd restraint has served instead to raise them, especially at the short end of the yield curve, to the highest level in a generation. Thereby it also has wreaked havoc with thrift institutions, which have lost depositors and deposits, as well as diverted the flow of savings away from home finance, housing, and other traditional channels. Far from furthering the national interest, political intrusion in the money market, as in so many others, has done it harm.

The trouble began last spring, when interest rates, spurred by a record-breaking demand for funds, climbed to heights not scaled since the twenties. Under the Liberty Loan Act of World War I, the Treasury is prohibited from paying more than 4¼ percent on any security maturing in over 5 years (there is no ceiling on short-term issues). When this obsolete provision suddenly loomed as a threat to its financing operations, the Department, backed by the Federal Reserve, urged Congress to rescind it. The defiant lawmakers, however, smarting from a series of political defeats, chose instead to keep it on the books. Last week the President renewed the fight. In a special message to Capitol Hill, the first of the new session, he urged "the removal of this archaic restriction on flexible debt management." Failure to do so in the past, he added, has led to an unduly rapid increase in short-term debt, pushed borrowing costs to the highest level in decades, and in other ways worked against the Nation's welfare.

Mr. Eisenhower did not bother to document his charges, nor did he have to. The evidence is all too plain. Since July, the hard-pressed Treasury, effectively barred from access to medium- and long-term funds, has been compelled to cram some $36 billion of borrowing into the short end of the market. As a consequence, yields on 90-day bills have spurted to over 4¾ percent. An offering of 4-year, 10-month notes, subsequently christened the "magic 5s," gave investors a 5 percent return. Last week, as noted, a special issue of 1-year bills was sold at a discount rate of 5.07 percent, a figure comparable to simple interest of over 5¼ percent. Thus, by seeking to keep an artificially low ceiling on long-term interest rates, Congress merely has succeeded in pushing short-term rates through the roof.

By and large, the results of this misguided policy have not been happy. To be sure, some good, though plainly unintended on Capitol Hill, has come of it. A number of private investors have enjoyed a windfall, and the market for Government securities, once confined largely to institutions, has gained in depth and breadth. Within the past 12 months alone, to illustrate, individual holdings of marketable U.S. issues seem to have risen by a whopping $9 billion, to an alltime peak. Such unexpected gains, however, fail to outweigh the untoward effects. To begin with, the distortion of the yield curve has played hob with commercial banking. Instead of depositing liquid assets with the banks, corporate treasurers have tended to invest them in high-yield, short-term issues, which are the nearest thing to cash. Hence, tight money has been made still tighter and bank liquidity, none too plentiful at best, has been placed under greater strain.

Hardest hit of all have been the Nation's thrift institutions. In order to pay for their acquisitions of Treasury notes and bills, many buyers simply have drawn on their savings. In October, for example, when the "magic 5s" went on sale, U.S. savings banks, which usually report a substantial gain in assets in the month, actually showed a sharp decline. Last week's offering of bills gave them a similar jolt. Even the fast-growing savings and loan associations have been hurt. Savings banks and savings and loans, of course, are leading sources of mortgage credit, and, in turn, prime movers in home construction. The loss of deposits which they already have suffered, and the fear of further losses—"We are living under a sword of Damocles," complained one savings bank president—cannot fail to curtail the supply of home finance and impair the prospects for housing.

In sum, Congress has set in motion stresses and strains which, 6 months ago, it scarcely could have imagined. Whether the lawmakers will have the candor to admit their mistake and mend their ways remains to be seen; at the moment, the outlook is none too hopeful. However it may be resolved, the silly affair, while certainly damaging to U.S. finances and prestige, has not been a total loss. The Nation has been given an object lesson in roughshod partisan politics. Equally instructive, it has had a chance to observe the deplorable results of Government meddling in the marketplace. Long after the interest rate ceiling has been scrapped, these lessons may endure.

THE TREASURY SQUEEZE—THE BOND INTEREST CEILING IS TOO LOW

The biggest demagogic campaign issue of 1960 revolves around the U.S. Treasury and the mandatory 4¼ percent interest ceiling on all Government bonds of 5 years or longer. Last year President Eisenhower asked Congress to remove the limitation, imposed in 1918, and Congress turned him down. Last week Ike asked again, and once more a Democratic Congress seems determined to make political capital out of an economic problem.

Every economist agrees that the U.S. Treasury is in a tough spot to refund Government issues that are constantly coming due. With top-grade corporate issues bringing more than 5 percent, the Treasury cannot sell long-term bonds limited to a 4¼-percent ceiling. The Treasury is forced to get its money by short-term issues, has to keep going to the market to raise cash, thus disrupting short-term borrowing for business and helping to drive up rates.

Nevertheless, a loud and powerful group of Congressmen, including Illinois Senator PAUL DOUGLAS and Texas Congressman WRIGHT PATMAN, refuses to grant the Treasury any relief, crying that interest rates are already too high. "The only inflation we have today," says PATMAN, with more emotion than economic reason "is inflation caused by high interest." The critics blame the Treasury for the rising cost of servicing the Nation's debt, argue that any further boost in interest rates would cost the taxpayers additional billions. They argue that if the Treasury wants to sell long-term bonds, it has the power to (1) sell them at a discount to increase the effective yield without changing the historic 4¼ percent coupon, or (2) ask the Federal Reserve to support the Goverment bond market as it did prior to 1951. (In 1953 the Federal Reserve decided to buy only relative short term notes and bills). Says DOUGLAS: "The abandonment of the bills only policy would add another weapon [to use] to help prevent economic fluctuations."

Against such adamant Democrats stand most economists and monetary experts, including such Democrats as House Speaker SAM RAYBURN and House Ways and Means Committee Chairman WILBUR MILLS. The plain fact, as they are well aware, is that a boost in Treasury long-term rates is probably the most effective way of holding overall interest rates down. By borrowing exclusively in the short-term market, which is the area where business gets its money for temporary or seasonal needs such as carrying inventories or financing sales, the Treasury has sopped up much of the money normally available. The scramble for the remainder has driven up short-term rates, eventually also forced up long-term borrowing costs.

So competitive is the short-term market that the Treasury's newest 91-day bill sells for nearly 4.6 percent. The effect of short-term borrowing, according to Government estimates, has been to drive overall interest rates up one-half percent in a year, and cost the Government an extra $700 million to carry its debt. The cost to private borrowers has run into the billions, is growing so worrisome that even housebuilders, who once opposed raising the ceiling, are now having serious second thoughts. The Treasury's medium-term magic 5 of last fall drew some $200 million out of New York savings banks alone, money that ordinarily would have gone for mortgages.

The problem is getting worse with each passing month. It is true, as some Congressmen say, that no long-term debt comes due for 10 months. But there will be almost $80 billion in short- and medium-term borrowing. By November of 1961, so much debt will drop down into the 1-year-and-under category that the figure will top $92 billion, up from $81 billion in December 1959, in itself equal to the alltime record. The Government's only recourse will be more short-term financing, probably at higher rates.

Administration economists are dead set against trying to sell long-term bonds by gimmicks, meaning discounts, or by trying to force the Federal Reserve to support the market. They argue that this is simply funny-money financing. By supporting Treasury bonds, the Federal would, in effect, be pumping money into the economy, would lose control over the monetary system, and take the United States down the road to real inflation. Says Federal Reserve Board Chairman William McChesney Martin: "The world now knows that, as the night follows the day, inflation follows any effort to keep interest rates low through money creation."

The best argument against keeping the historic 4¼-percent interest ceiling is that it has not kept interest rates down. The best argument for removing the ceiling is that it will give the Treasury enough flexibility to lessen its reliance on the short-term market. By taking the pressure off these rates, the United States will have a good chance of stopping the rise in interest and the squeeze on money that, historically, has almost always ushered in a recession.

GEN. DOUGLAS MacARTHUR

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, January 26 marks the 80th anniversary of the birth of General of the Army Douglas MacArthur, a great general and a great American. MacArthur was born on January 26, 1880, in Little Rock, Ark., where his father, Arthur MacArthur, at that time a captain in the Army, was stationed. Although he has spent little time in Wisconsin, he is considered a native son by that State. His Scottish-born grandfather, Arthur MacArthur, who arrived in Milwaukee in 1849, was elected Lieutenant Governor on the Democratic ticket and later served 5 days as Governor in 1856. Douglas MacArthur's father, also named Arthur MacArthur, joined a Wisconsin regiment in the Civil War, became a colonel, and was awarded the Congressional Medal of Honor. Later he fought in the Indian wars in the West and Southwest, and participated in the Philippine campaigns. He advanced to become Chief of Staff and the 11th lieutenant general in Army history.

Following in his father's footsteps, young Douglas chose a military career. He entered the U.S. Military Academy on June 13, 1899. Graduating on June 13, 1903, with a scholastic average of 98.14, the highest ever achieved by a cadet, he was commissioned a second lieutenant of engineers.

It seems prophetic that MacArthur's first assignment was in the Philippines. In October 1905, after a year in California, he was detailed as an aide to his father, the American military observer in Tokyo. Next came a year as aide to President Theodore Roosevelt until August 1907. During the 10 years following, there were assignments to Milwaukee, Fort Leavenworth, the Canal Zone, Washington, and Vera Cruz.

When the United States entered World War I, 37-year-old Maj. Douglas MacArthur was a staff officer. Together with Newton D. Baker, the Secretary of War, he conceived the idea of the famous Rainbow (42d) Division, composed of National Guard units from 26 States and the District of Columbia. As chief of staff to the division commander, Maj. Gen. William A. Mann, and later to his successor, Maj. Gen. Charles T. Menoher, MacArthur was largely responsible for the organization and training of the division. In August 1917 he was promoted to a colonelcy in the infantry in the National Army, and in October he arrived in France with his division. He was with the division through all the fighting and his record for gallantry was conspicuous. Twice wounded and twice gassed, he refused to be sent to the hospital. Despite illness and wounds he kept going. He was promoted to brigadier general on June 26, 1918, and "actually commanded," an official report said, "larger bodies of troops on the battleline than any other officer in our Army, with, in each instance, conspicuous success." He was given command of the 84th Brigade, and for a brief period at the close of the war he commanded the entire division.

Back in the United States after the war, MacArthur spent 3 years as Superintendent of the Academy at West Point, winning a bitter fight against those who sought, in the interest of economy, first to abolish the Academy and then to reduce its term to 2 years. He also fought the entrenched and reactionary Academic Board and succeeded in liberalizing and modernizing the curriculum to include a full collegiate education.

The 3 years spent in Philippine commands, from 1922 to 1925, contributed to his understanding of the islands which was to prove so valuable in World War II.

In November 1930 he became the seventh Chief of the General Staff. His efforts for preparedness in this post caused him to be regarded, in a time of pacifism, as a warmonger and a militarist. Acting on orders of the President to evict the "Bonus Marchers" from Washington, he accomplished the assignment without firing a shot and without serious injury to soldiers or civilians. Sympathy for the ragged veterans resulted in widespread feeling against MacArthur, but unpopularity never caused him to swerve from his duty.

Most of MacArthur's term as Chief of Staff—1930–35—was spent trying to make Congress understand that the United States could not afford to strip itself entirely of military power. He proceeded to the modernization and mechanization of our Armed Forces and reorganized them on the four-Army plan.

At the conclusion of his term as Chief of Staff he became head of a military mission to the Philippines to draft a 10-year defense plan which the National Assembly enacted into law. Two years later he retired from the U.S. Army and accepted the position of field marshal of the Philippine forces. Although his critics derided the title, the Filipinos were inspired to patriotic fervor by the thought of having a field marshal at the head of their little army.

The clouds of war were gathering. MacArthur was recalled to active service as a major general in July 1941; he was advanced to temporary lieutenant general the next day, and to temporary general 11 days after Pearl Harbor. He was given command of the U.S. forces in the Far East. But those forces were pitifully small and planes and torpedo boats were not forthcoming in any quantity; the fighting on Bataan could be only a delaying action. In March 1942, under orders from the President, MacArthur with his family and staff officers escaped to Australia. From Australia under his brilliant leadership, his forces invaded New Guinea, New Britain, New Georgia, and Bougainville. At last in October 1944 began the liberation of the Philippines. He had returned as he had promised.

Advanced in December 1944 to the new five-star rank, MacArthur was named to command all U.S. Army forces in the Pacific, and also six Marine divisions.

Following the Japanese surrender, MacArthur served in Japan as Supreme Commander for the Allied Powers. His execution of a program for the enactment of widespread legal reforms and the establishment of constitutional government has attracted universal respect and admiration.

When North Korean forces invaded the South Korean Republic on June 25, 1950, MacArthur was given command of U.S. and U.N. forces with orders to repel the invaders. His grasp of military strategy was again demonstrated by the conception and execution of the landing at Inchon, which led to a precipitate retreat of the North Koreans.

On April 11, 1951, General MacArthur was dismissed by President Truman from his United Nations, Allied, and American commands in the Far East.

How well I remember the thunderous ovation he received when he returned to address a joint session of Congress, an ovation which registered the unalloyed confidence of Congress in their great soldier despite the strange and inexplicable action of the Commander in Chief.

I remember also his appearance before the Senate Committee and how eloquently the transcript spoke of his wide grasp of the problem before this country.

Even more vividly I remember the reception and ovation he received in the city of Chicago and the unrestrained acclaim he received from his fellow citizens.

He was not merely a great soldier but also a great philosopher; he was not merely a great commander but also a great statesman. It will be a long, long time before his contribution to the cause of freedom and the success of American arms will fade from the memories of his fellow citizens.

NOMINATION OF JAMES DURFEE TO BE JUDGE OF THE COURT OF CLAIMS

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, this morning I had the unfortunate duty of opposing the nomination of James Durfee, a man from my own State of Wisconsin, to be a judge of the Court of Claims. I made this decision with great reluctance, after very careful consideration. I ask unanimous consent that my statement before the Judiciary Committee this morning be printed in the RECORD at this point as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT OF SENATOR WILLIAM PROXMIRE BEFORE THE COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY REGARDING THE NOMINATION OF JAMES DURFEE FOR THE COURT OF CLAIMS, JANUARY 21, 1960

Mr. Chairman, I oppose the confirmation of James Durfee to be a judge of the Court of Claims. I do so with reluctance and deep regret.

SUPPORT FOR DURFEE

Mr. Durfee is a Wisconsin man. He served as a district attorney and practiced law in my State for some 25 years. He has also served as chairman of the Wisconsin Public Service Commission. He has been a very popular man throughout our State. This is not only evident in his election as head of the Wisconsin American Legion, but in the many friends of his throughout our State in both political parties who have written and talked to me urging his confirmation. Some have even traveled to Washington from Wisconsin for this purpose.

Two months ago I was in Mr. Durfee's hometown of Antigo, Wis. I spoke at the high school, and talked informally with well over a hundred citizens of Mr. Durfee's hometown, including the fine newspaper editor of the Antigo Daily and a number of prominent businessmen and lawyers. Mr. Durfee is as popular in his hometown as any man I know. And the nominee is an honored man in our State. Our great university in Milwaukee, Wis., selected Mr. Durfee 3 years ago as alumnus of the year in recognition of his service in government.

Support for James Durfee is not confined to Wisconsin. I have had more visits and phone calls in connection with this nomination than with any other matter I have dealt with since I came to the Senate. I have had delegations of airline executives who have had an opportunity to observe the nominee's administration of the Civil Aeronautics Board at firsthand call on me and plead for his confirmation. National leaders from both parties have talked to me to ask I approve and support him.

REASON FOR OPPOSITION

In spite of all this I have decided that I must oppose James Durfee for this nomination for two reasons. First, I believe his qualifications for the position for which he has been nominated are at best minimal, and fall far below the standard established by the men who now serve on the court. Secondly, I oppose the nominee because his conduct as Chairman of the CAB shows a lack of the judicial behavior that is essential for the proper performance of the duties of the office to which he has been nominated.

QUALIFICATIONS FOR THE COURT OF CLAIMS

It has been said that as a matter of history the growth in power of the Supreme Court and the respect in which it is held by the people has been due largely to the legal ability and the force of character of the men who have composed that Court. This is particularly true of the Court of Claims. It is my understanding that there have been some 38 judges who have served on this court since its establishment in 1855. Almost all of the men who have been appointed to this court have before their appointment demonstrated competence relevant to the kind of work they would do on the court—on the bench, in Congress, or at the bar.

A man who has been a member of the Court of Claims bar for over 30 years recently wrote me in part as follows:

"The largest and most technical civil cases in America are decided in the Court of Claims. Individual suits against the United States sometimes involve millions of dollars. They are brought by railroads, aircraft companies manufacturing war planes and missiles, etc. A judge of the court should have an extensive background in this work. Tax refund cases, government contracts, employee pay cases, etc., require the highest degree of experience and legal skill.

"You cannot expect the lawyers who actually practice in the court to come forward on this matter at this late date and express their views. That would be putting one's neck on the block in case Durfee was confirmed. The District of Columbia bar, of course, has more lawyers who practice in the court than all the rest of the country put together. It has consistently refused to endorse Mr. Durfee. It did propose through its Court of Claims Committee the names of three competent and experienced lawyers to the Attorney General."

DURFEE AND THE DISTRICT BAR ASSOCIATION

On Monday, January 18, a member of the committee from the District of Columbia Bar Association on relations with the Court of Claims, called with the following information:

When Judge Littleton, who had an extensive tax background, retired, leaving the vacancy to which Durfee has been named, the bar association committee on relations with the Court of Claims considered the best possible replacement for the judge and submitted three names to the Attorney General. Mr. Durfee was not among the three named. The three named were a Commissioner of the Court of Claims, and two local lawyers, one with great experience in tax cases before the Court of Claims and the Tax Court of the United States, and the other experienced in claims involving Government contracts. Both practice before the Court of Claims.

The bar association committee on the Court of Claims is composed of 20 members, 15 of whom are private practitioners before the court and 5 are members of the staff of the Justice Department's Civil Division who defend these cases before the court. So the vote for the three nominees was a vote by lawyers on both sides of the fence.

An official of the Court of Claims stated that at least three-fourths of the court's work is in the field of tax law and Government contracts, including the Federal wage cases, which are treated as implied contracts. These include disability and retirement pay for military personnel and retirement and overtime compensation for civilian employees.

It is the general consensus of the knowledgeable practitioners before the court—and a large number of them have called me, some as recently as this morning—that Durfee is just not qualified for this job.

RESPONSIBILITY OF COURT OF CLAIMS

Mr. Chairman, I call attention to the dimensions of the responsibility of the Court of Claims. For the year ended October 3, 1959, the Court of Claims had disposed of 2,636 cases.

Amount of money claimed was $402,137,897.30.

Judgment for the plaintiffs totaled $11,434,127.65.

Amount of above judgments carrying interest—$1,881,929.45.

Judgments on defendant's counterclaims amounted to $535,889.78.

The tax cases handled by the court are all for refunds on almost any kind of tax—personal income, corporation, transportation, documentary stamp, excess profits, excise, etc.

Some of the larger money cases for the year were:

Plaintiff	Amount claimed	Amount awarded or disposition	Claim
Hingham Management Corp	$6,000,000.00	Case dismissed	Contract for lease of certain facilities, Naval Industrial Reserve Shipyard, Hingham, Mass., Navy Department.

Henry M. and Murray W. Garsson	18,500,000.00	do	Compensation for use of manufacturing methods, designs, process, and engineering developments of war materials, War.
Mississippi Valley Generating Co	3,543,778.45	$1,867,545.56	Dixon-Yates power contract, AEC.
Chicago, Burlington & Quincy RR. Co	21,008,304.42	Case dismissed	Refund of income and excess profits tax.

From report submitted to Congress on Jan. 6, 1960, by the clerk of the Court of Claims on all judgments rendered by the court for the year ended Oct. 3, 1959.

Mr. Chairman, I submit that the fairest standard for evaluating Mr. Durfee's qualifications is to compare them with those of the men who now serve on the court and the retired judge, the Honorable Benjamin H. Littleton, whom Mr. Durfee has been nominated to succeed.

Here are brief résumés of their biographies:

Marvin Jones, chief judge of the U.S. Court of Claims

Born near Valley View, Tex.

Received bachelor of arts degree from Southwestern University, Georgetown, Tex., in 1905.

Received bachelor of laws degree from the University of Texas in 1907.

Admitted to the Texas bar in 1907; practiced at Amarillo.

Was appointed chairman of the board of legal examiners for the seventh supreme judicial district of Texas in 1913.

Reelected Chairman in April 1929.

Commissioned judge of the Court of Claims on November 6, 1929.

[1] Now called the Tax Court of the United States.

(NOTE.—The present Tax Court of the United States was formerly the U.S. Board of Tax Appeals. The Board was created by the Revenue Act of 1924 and continued by the Revenue Act of 1926, the Internal Revenue Code of 1939, and the Internal Revenue Code of 1954. The change in name to the Tax Court was made by the Revenue Act of 1942.)

To summarize the qualifications of these men to serve as judges on a court that is concerned with claims against the Government and particularly with immensely large tax claims, these men have the following qualifications:

Judge Laramore had served for 12 years as a judge on the bench in the 44th judicial circuit of Indiana prior to his appointment.

Judge Jones had served as chairman of the board of legal examiners in a judicial district in his State and had devoted some 24 years of his life to the Congress of the United States including 9 years as chairman of the House Committee on Agriculture.

Judge Whitaker had prepared for the Court of Claims by serving as an attorney of the Bureau of Internal Revenue, and in turn as an attorney in the Department of Justice, as special assistant to the Attorney General of the United States and finally for 2 years as Assistant Attorney General of the United States.

Judge Madden's experience for the Court of Claims included special assistant to the Attorney General of the United States, professorships of law at the great Universities of Oklahoma, Ohio State, West Virginia, and Pittsburgh, as well as visiting professorships at the Universities of Chicago, North Carolina, Cornell, Stanford, Yale, and Vanderbilt. He had been an adviser on property and torts to the American Law Institute and coauthor of a casebook on property.

Judge Littleton who would be replaced by Mr. Durfee had served as assistant U.S. attorney in Tennessee, a special attorney in the Treasury Department, a member of the Board of Tax Appeals (now known as the Tax Court) for 5 years and chairman of the court for the last 2½ years of his term.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I submit that each of these men had had a far broader and deeper and more relevant experience to qualify them for the Court of Claims than Mr. Durfee whose background and experience has been confined to the practice of law in Wisconsin (with no evidence of substantial experience in any kind of Government claim work), and service on two regulatory commissions, one State and one national, neither one of which provided a single day's experience or training in the kind of complex, highly technical work that would immediately confront Mr. Durfee on the Court of Claims. Mr. Durfee has had no visible experience in any of the three areas which have been the classic background for this important court. He has not served in Congress. He has not served as a judge on the bench. He has not had any substantial experience in handling claims cases of any kind either for the public or for the Government.

RECORD OF JUDICIAL BEHAVIOR OF NOMINEE

It might be said that as Chairman of the CAB, Mr. Durfee has enjoyed a kind of judicial experience. The CAB is a quasi-judicial agency, of course. It has judicial as well as rulemaking and administrative functions. The behavior of the nominee in his judicial role is for this reason particularly pertinent to his qualifications for this nomination.

Mr. Chairman, there are three incidents which are the most troublesome to me in the consideration of this nomination. Each of these incidents constitute a serious demerit in the fitness of the nominee for the Court of Claims. In each incident it is the contrast between the behavior of the nominee and the judicial code of the organization which he served as chairman which disturbed me. For this reason I call the careful attention of the committee to the "Principles of Practice of the Civil Aeronautics Board," sometimes called the code of ethics. I present herewith the pertinent regulations in full, from which I will read the sections that pertain especially to judicial conduct and the behavior of the nominee:

"REGULATIONS, SERIAL NO. PR-10—UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, CIVIL AERONAUTICS BOARD, WASHINGTON, D.C.—PROCEDURAL REGULATIONS, PART 300

"(Effective, March 30, 1951; adopted, March 27, 1951)

"Principles of practice of the Civil Aeronautics Board

"Although the standards and principles which usually govern the proceedings of judicial bodies have always been applicable to the Board in the conduct of its quasi-judicial functions, the Board has not previously reduced to written form those principles of practice by which the Board and the persons appearing before it should be governed. In December of 1950 the Board requested a representative committee of industry counsel established as the Civil Aeronautics Board Advisory Committee on Practices and Procedures to assist and to advise it in formulating procedures and practices with respect to proceedings before the Board. As an initial phase in its activity, a statement of rules of conduct which will serve as a guide for all parties and the Board and its staff in relation to proceedings before the Board has been recommended by the Committee and as modified is being adopted and promulgated by the Board as a guide to all parties in relation to matters pending before the Board.

"In consideration of the foregoing the Civil Aeronautics Board hereby makes and promulgates a new part 300 to the Board's procedural regulations to read as follows, effective March 30, 1951:

"'Part 300. Principles of practice of the Civil Aeronautics Board

"'300.0 Applicability of part: The principles of practice set out herein to the extent applicable shall govern the relationships between the Board, its staff, and all other persons.

"'300.1 Judicial standards of practice: In many respects the functions of the Board are similar to those of a court and parties to cases before it and those who represent such parties are expected to conduct themselves with honor and dignity. By the same token, the members of the Board, and those of its employees who participate with the Board members in the determination of cases upon a record, are expected to conduct themselves with the same fidelity to standards of propriety that characterize a court and its staff. The standing and effectiveness of the Board are in direct relation to its observance, that of its staff, and the parties and attorneys appearing before it, of the highest standards of judicial and professional ethics.

"'300.2 Hearing cases—Improper influence: It is essential in cases to be determined after notice and hearing and upon a record that the Board's judicial character be recognized and protected. In such cases—

"'(a) It is improper that there be any private communication on the merits of the case to a member of the Board or its staff or to the examiner in the case by any person, either in private or public life, unless provided for by law.

"'(b) It is likewise improper that there be any private communication on the merits of the case to a member of the Board or to the examiner in the case by any members of the Board's staff who participate in the hearing as witnesses or as counsel.

"'(c) It is improper that there be any effort by any person interested in the case to sway the judgment of the Board by attempting to bring pressure or influence to bear upon the members of the Board or its staff, or that such person or any member of the Board's staff, directly or indirectly, give statements to the press or radio, by paid advertisements or otherwise, designed to influence the Board's judgment in the case.

"'300.3 Conciseness of presentation: Persons practicing before the Board should endeavor to present their cases in concise form avoiding cumulative and repetitious evidence, since the members of the Board participating in the decision of a case, after notice and hearing and upon a record, must familiarize themselves with the evidence in the record and with the arguments made on behalf of the parties orally and in written briefs, and must base their decision solely on the record.

"'300.4 Unusual hospitality: It is particularly improper that persons interested in the business of the Board should provide unusual hospitality to the Board or its staff; nor should such hospitality be accepted.

"'300.5 Attorney-client relationship: Persons practicing or appearing before the Board, whether or not members of the bar, should have due regard for the standards of professional conduct applicable to the lawyer-client relationship and to the relationship between a lawyer and a judicial tribunal.

"'(a) The nontechnical nature of the Board's procedure calls for special adherence, by practitioners, to scrupulous standards of fairness, candor, and consideration for the rights of others in the pleadings filed, evidence submitted, conduct of the hearing, and briefs and arguments made. In appearing for a client, the practitioner thereby vouches on his honor that in his opinion the client's cause is one proper for determination, and in presenting pleadings and offering evidence he represents that the same are not offered for unwarranted delay and that in his opinion the content thereof is not misleading. Nor should he indulge in offensive personalities, unseemly wrangling, or intemperate accusations or characterizations.

"'(b) A practitioner, moreover, should advise his client to observe the law according to his conscientious belief as to its permissible meaning and should use his best efforts to restrain his client from improprieties in dealing with the Board or its staff. If a client persists in such improprieties, the practitioner should terminate their relationship.

"'300.6 Violations: The Board may disqualify and deny temporarily or permanently, the privilege of appearing or practicing before it in any way to any person who is found after hearing by the Board to have engaged in unethical or improper professional conduct. Violation of any of the foregoing principles shall be deemed to be such conduct.'

INCIDENTS INVOLVING CODE OF ETHICS BY MR. DURFEE

Now, Mr. Chairman, there had been reports in the press that Mr. Durfee while Chairman of the CAB had accepted hospitality from airlines which had cases pending before his Board. The charge was further made in the press that in this alleged action, Mr. Durfee had violated the code of ethics, as the press put it—the regulations—which I have just finished reading.

In order to determine whether these press accounts were true or false, I wrote directly to the head of each airline which had allegedly entertained Mr. Durfee when he was the Chairman of the CAB.

Pinehurst, N.C.—October 19–21, 1956

I shall present my replies from these airlines in chronological order. The first letter is from Mr. L. C. Burwell, Jr., who was vice president of the Flying Tiger Airlines during the period October 19 to 21, 1956, when Chairman Durfee is alleged to have been the guest of Flying Tiger and Overseas National Airlines at a golfing party at Pinehurst, N.C.

Here is the letter, in toto. I shall read pertinent parts of the letter.

DECEMBER 4, 1959.

DEAR SENATOR PROXMIRE: I apologize for not answering your letter of November 25 until today, but I was away from the office practically all week. I am glad of the opportunity to set the record straight with regard to the Pinehurst golfing party, since there has been a considerable amount of rumor and distortion about this in the press.

When the reporter for the Capital Times called me, he implied that his paper was anxious to correct certain derogatory rumors relative to Mr. Durfee's participation. This was a misrepresentation on his part because his article as it came out was extremely antagonistic and not factual.

At the time of this outing I was vice president of the Flying Tigers. I did not associate with Overseas National Airways until July 1, 1957. My home is at Pinehurst, and I am a Democrat. I am a colonel in the Air Force Reserve and have been personally extremely interested in airpower, and officially concerned with the role of the Military Air Transport Service in the general air transportation scheme of things.

The Flying Tiger line, at that time, operated a business amounting to about $6 million a season in transatlantic commercial charters. The two largest competitors in this business were Pan American and, potentially, Overseas National. However, there was one thing on which the management of these three companies could agree, and that was a plan to curtail the competition of MATS in moving routine line haul traffic that rightly should go by commercial air carrier.

I conceived the idea of a golfing weekend and of inviting not only airline officials, but persons in the Government who represented both sides of the argument, plus the Chairman of the CAB and the Federal Communications Commission, whom we wished to persuade to our point of view, but only with advocates for both sides on hand.

We invited, in addition to those that did attend, Lieutenant General Smith, commander of MATS (who sent his alternate, General Wilson); General Twining, Chief of Air Staff; and Senator Symington. Neither of these could come. However, we did have Mr. Frank Pace, formerly Secretary of the Army; Mr. Juan Trippe, president of Pan American, and one of its directors, Mr. Mark McKee; Col. Hammar Denny, member of the CAB; Mr. Eugene Zuckert, formerly Assistant Secretary of the Air Force; and several others who are not important at this time. Mr. Prescott, president of the Flying Tiger Line, and I were there as well as Mr. George Tompkins, president of Overseas National. In order to avoid any appearance of impropriety, I asked Mr. Tompkins if he wished to share the cost and be cohost, which he agreed to do.

As many of the guests as I could accommodate stayed at my house. All of the guests were from time to time entertained at my house. This was entirely at my personal expense. Those who were accommodated at the Carolina Hotel had their bills paid by the two airlines. The transportation was by rail, and this was paid by the two airlines, using a chartered pullman car. There never was but one outing so that the reference to similar excursions being paid alternately is incorrect. The costs were borne jointly on a 50–50 basis.

Now answering your questions specifically:

1. Mr. Durfee was present.

2. The two airlines bore the costs jointly and the approximate figure per person was $85.

3. Mr. Durfee, to my knowledge, has not accepted any other hospitality, service, or any other consideration from either the Flying Tiger Line or Overseas National Airways.

I would like to add that in addition to the golf and good fellowship, we had serious, and I believe fruitful, discussions as to possible ways and means of allocating logically and fairly certain airlift missions of MATS to the civil industry. When I invited Mr. Durfee, I pointed out that under the act Congress had charged him with the responsibility of fostering the growth of civil aviation and here was a good chance for him to strike a blow for freedom.

We got far more accomplished in 2½ days than we had in the past 2½ years, or would have gotten in the next 2½ years through uncoordinated random efforts. The CAB, MATS, and the airlines, I believe, saw each other's positions clearly and without prejudice. I think much good has come out of the meeting.

I hope this answers your questions.

Sincerely,

L. C. BURWELL, Jr.

I would call particular attention of the committee to two sections of this letter which I will read in connection with the regulations or code of ethics of the Civil Aeronautics Board.

Mr. Chairman, I refer to section 300.4 of the Principles of Practice of the CAB which reads and I quote:

"300.4. Unusual hospitality: It is particularly improper that persons interested in the business of the Board should provide unusual hospitality to the Board or its staff; nor should such hospitality be accepted."

On this point I refer the committee to the following statement in the Burwell letter on the Pinehurst outing and I quote:

"In order to avoid any appearance of impropriety, I asked Mr. Tompkins (that's George Tompkins, president of Overseas National) if he wished to share the cost and be cohost, which he agreed to do.)

"As many of the guests as I could accommodate stayed at my house. All of the guests were from time to time entertained at my house. This was entirely my personal expense. Those who were accommodated at the Carolina Hotel had their bills paid by the two airlines. The transportation was by rail and this was paid by the two airlines, using a chartered pullman car."

And a little later in the Burwell letter, I quote:

"Now answering your questions specifically:

"1. Mr. Durfee was present.

"2. The two airlines bore the costs jointly and the approximate figure per person was $85.

"3. Mr. Durfee, to my knowledge, has not accepted any other hospitality, service, or any other consideration from either Flying Tiger Line or Overseas National Airways."

Did this constitute a violation of section 300.4?

In the first place, there is no question that both Flying Tiger and Overseas National were deeply interested in the business of the Board, before, during, and after this outing.

I call attention to the following applications of Flying Tiger and Overseas National pending on October 19, 20, and 21, 1956, which I received yesterday from the CAB:

TIGERS

"Docket 6893, temporary exemption: transport ships crew from Lisbon to Baltimore for Mystic Steamship Co.

"Docket 8255, temporary exemption: 4 round trip charter, American Legion Post from Frankfort to New York.

OVERSEAS NATIONAL

"Dockets 4233, 5302, 5303, 5304, applications for various atuhorities in the Large Irregular air carrier case, which involved supplemental air carriers the scope of their operations and the type of authorization to be issued.

"Docket 8056, United States to various points in Europe, route application.

"Docket 7838, temporary exemption: From certain tariff filing provisions in connection with military charters (later dismissed as moot.)"

In the second place there is no question that hospitality was offered by these interested persons and no question that it was accepted. The only question remaining is: The reference in 300.4 to "unusual" as the description of the kind of hospitality that is forbidden. I ask the committee to consider what type of entertainment might be considered unusual if this were not. Is there one man in a thousand who would not consider it unusual hospitality if he were taken on a golfing outing to Pinehurst, N.C., in a chartered pullman car for 2½ days of golfing and entertainment? Frankly, I think I've enjoyed my share of entertainment, but I can recall no occasion in my life where the entertainment was as unusual as this weekend. My own opinion is that this was a direct and flagrant violation of section 300.4 of the CAB Code of Ethics.

Mexico City incident

The second letter I received in reply to my inquiry concerning the conduct of the nominee was from Mr. Eddie Rickenbacker, chairman of the board of Eastern Airlines. I will submit the letter in toto and then read pertinent parts of the letter as they seem to relate to Principles of Practice of the CAB, section 300.4, "Unusual Hospitality," which I repeat provides:

"It is particularly improper that persons interested in the business of the Board should provide unusual hospitality to the Board or its staff; nor should such hospitality be accepted."

Now let me say that on August 14, 1957, the CAB, headed by Mr. Durfee had approved the award of a nonstop route from New York to Mexico City for Eastern Airlines. On September 13, 1957, Pan American Airlines petitioned the CAB to reconsider the allocation of the route to Eastern. From September 15, 1957, to September 18, 1957, Mr. Durfee was alleged to be the guest of Eastern Airlines on a special trip to Mexico City and back. On October 23, the CAB upheld the award of the route ot Eastern Airlines and denied the petition of Pan American.

Let me also add for the record that on September 30, 1957 (the nearest date to the alleged trip for which statistics were available), there were no less than 76 applications by Eastern Airlines pending before the Civil Aeronautics Board according to information recently furnished me by the CAB, as follows:

If ever an airline had an interest in the business of the CAB in September of 1957 it would seem to be Eastern.

Here is the Rickenbacker letter:

EASTERN AIR LINES, INC.,
New York, N.Y., December 21, 1959.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I have received your letter of November 25, 1959, addressed to our vice president, Robert Ramspeck, and we are happy to give you the information requested concerning the participation of Mr. James R. Durfee, Chairman of the Civil Aeronautics Board, on the ceremonial preinaugural flight conducted by Eastern Air Lines between New York and Mexico City, September 15–18, 1957.

In order to answer the specific questions you asked, we requested, and your office kindly supplied, copies of the articles you referred to, as published in the Capital Times, of Madison, Wis., under the dates of March 31 and April 30, 1958.

The following are the facts:

1. The ceremonial introduction of new international air services has long been an accepted tradition between the countries and the airlines involved.

Representatives of the Government, including officials responsible for aviation, are customarily honored guests on these important get-acquainted occasions.

In this case, the successful conclusion, after nearly 11 years of effort, of the first bilateral air agreement between the United States and Mexico, was of unusual interest on both sides of the border. It made possible the first direct U.S. air services between New York and Washington and the capital city of Mexico over the New York-Mexico City direct route which, until September 1957, had been monopolized by a government-owned European-flag airline.

This final check flight over the new route, preparatory to inauguration of regularly scheduled service, therefore, presented an exceptional opportunity for aviation officials of both countries to meet and exchange views, to make proper response to the invitation to attend the President of Mexico's official reception, and to encourage, through press and other public channels, a better understanding of the common interests of both countries.

2. There was nothing unusual about the program carried out by Eastern Air Lines. The food and beverage service on the preinaugural flight was identical with the standard set for the subsequently established regular service on this route and is competitive with the paralleling continental service of Air France.

3. All details of the preinaugural program and the list of invited guests were publicly announced, in advance, in Washington and Mexico City and the information was publicized throughout the United States and Mexico.

4. The schedule of the flight was as follows:

Southbound, September 15, 1957: Leave New York, 10 a.m., e.d.t.; arrive Washington, 11:03 a.m., e.d.t.; leave Washington, 11:30 a.m., e.d.t.; arrive Mexico City, 4:15 p.m., c.s.t.

Northbound, September 18, 1957: Leave Mexico City, 11 a.m., c.s.t.; arrive New Orleans, 2 p.m., c.s.t.; leave New Orleans, 3 p.m., c.s.t.; arrive Washington, 8:20 p.m., e.d.t.; leave Washington, 8:50 p.m., e.d.t.; arrive New York, 9:48 p.m., e.d.t.

5. The program of entertainment for the preinaugural guests from the United States was purposely limited in order to enable them to devote maximum time to informal activities with their official counterparts in Mexico.

6. The trip to Acapulco (where President Eisenhower and President Lopez Mateos subsequently met) was at the invitation of Mexico's former President Miguel Aleman. Aeronaves de Mexico (now owned and operated by the Government of Mexico), which was designated to operate the reciprocal service on the Mexico-New York route, was the participating host. There were no hotel accommodations required in Acapulco.

The 1-day trip was scheduled to allow for sightseeing and a luncheon at the home of Mr. Aleman. The party was to return to Mexico City at 5 p.m. the same day, to attend a dinner given in their honor by the national airline of Mexico, Aeronaves.

Due to inclement weather, the trip to Acapulco was canceled and a sightseeing trip around Mexico City and outlying areas was substituted.

7. The preinaugural party was accomomodated at the Hotel Del Prado in downtown Mexico City.

8. For more than 13 years Eastern Air Lines has maintained, in Mexico City, the largest and best located city ticket office of any U.S.-flag airline, located on the plaza of the corner of Reforma and Morelos Avenues. It also has one of the major locations at the airport terminals.

9. On July 18–21, Eastern also operated preinaugural flight over the New Orleans-Mexico City route. This route was certificated to Eastern by the Civil Aeronautics Board and the President in 1946, but, until conclusion of the bilateral air agreement with Mexico in 1957, could not be implemented.

The purpose of this New Orleans introductory program was to introduce, to Mexico, civic and other representatives of the principal cities to be served on this route.

A guest list of those who participated on these flights is also attached.

10. The personal expenses, paid by Eastern Air Lines, were limited to individual hotel accommodations and the nominal charge for continental breakfasts which are served in the rooms, according to custom.

11. Attached are documents, publicly distributed at the time these flights were being planned and carried out, including the flight schedule, itinerary, and list of guests.

The only other occasion on which Eastern Air Lines was host to Mr. Durfee was during an introductory program for the first Golden Falcon-type Douglas DC–7B aircraft. This consisted of a 45-minute luncheon flight, circling Washington. Members of the Civil Aeronautics Board and some 55 members of the staff were guests on this educational flight, one of a series conducted in the principal cities of the eastern half of the United States.

If there is any further information you desire, we would be most happy to try to locate it for you.

Sincerely,

E. V. RICKENBACKER,
Chairman of the Board.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in the first place, Mr. Rickenbacker confirms the fact that Mr. Durfee did take the flight. In the second place, Mr. Rickenbacker asserts that Mr. Durfee was the guest of Eastern Air Lines. He says that Eastern provided food and beverage service which he describes as "identical with the standard set for the subsequently established regular service" on the route and Rickenbacker says it's no better than Air France continental service. Rickenbacker says there's nothing unusual about the program in this sense. He also points out that the entire program was publicly announced throughout the country, and says the entertainment was deliberately limited to enable guests from the United States to devote maximum time to informal activities with their official counterparts in Mexico.

Mr. Rickenbacker also said and I quote:

"The personal expenses, paid by Eastern Air Lines, were limited to individual hotel accommodations and the nominal charge for continental breakfasts which are served in the rooms, according to custom."

Mr. Rickenbacker did not answer my request for the approximate value of this trip. Unaccounted for, at the least, were air transportation and several items listed in the itinerary, such as reception and cocktails, Sunday evening, September 15 at the Del Prado Hotel, where the group stayed; cocktails and luncheon in the chandelier room of the Del Prado the following day where the party reviewed the Independence Day parade; and later the same day, from 9:30 to midnight dinner and entertainment at El Rancho del Artista.

An industry source told me that the excursion cost Eastern Air Lines in his opinion $2,000 per person or $110,000. Even if the cost was only half this much, a 4-day excursion to Mexico City and back on Eastern Air Lines with cocktail parties, midnight dinners and entertainment, would be considered by most persons as unusual entertainment. Certainly any judge of any court would consider such entertainment by any litigant to be unusual at the least. And I remind the committee that if the code of ethics of the CAB serves any purpose at all it is to place the Board of the CAB in a judicial posture.

For these reasons the Mexico City trip constitutes in my judgment a second flagrant violation of the CAB code of ethics by Mr. Durfee. To construe it any other way would make the code of ethics a pious and ridiculous affirmation that in fact limits no one in any sense. It would mean the code of ethics is a meaningless mockery.

Rome, Italy, incident

The third letter I received in reply to my inquiry concerning the conduct of the nominee was from Mr. Charles S. Thomas, president of Trans World Airlines. Once again I refer to the CAB code of ethics and the section which provides, and I repeat:

"It is particularly improper that persons interested in the business of the Board should provide unusual hospitality to the Board or its staff; nor should such hospitality be accepted."

Did TWA have any interest in the business of the CAB during the period October 2 through 6, 1957, when Mr. Durfee is alleged along with his wife to have been the guest of TWA on a 4-day trip to Rome, Italy?

The CAB has informed me that as of September 30, 1957, the nearest date to the Rome trip for which figures are available, the TWA had 15 applications pending before the CAB, 5 of which were regarded as of major importance. I submit the list of applications which TWA had pending at the CAB on September 30, 1957:

"Docket 5065, Transpacific Certificate Renewal case, docket No. 5031 et al. (deferred portion).

"Docket 7378, transfer Cincinnati-Detroit route.

"Docket 8216, TWA versus Northwest—Capital's family fare plan.

"Docket 7209, Seven States Area case.

"Docket 8997, complaint re Southwest's EX-2, CAB 15; PR-4, CAB 43; PF-5, CAB 44.

"Docket 7831, St. Louis-Southeast Service case.

"Docket 7268, Great Lakes-Southeast Service case.

"Docket 8235, control of TWA and Northeast by Howard Hughes.

"Docket 7157, extend route 2: Albuquerque-Houston, via Fort Worth and Dallas.

"Docket 8061, Hughes Tool Co. and TWA.

"Docket 7703, eliminate restriction on route 2 re Las Vegas-Los Angeles.

"Docket 7797, Las Vegas on segment 5 of route 2; Las Vegas-Phoenix service.

"Docket 7957, remove restriction, Los Angeles-San Francisco/Oakland service on route 2.

"Docket 3473, include Kuwait between Basra and Dhahran.

"Docket 4546, include Madrid, Spain on international route."

Certainly TWA qualifies as a concern which had an obvious and vital interest in the business of the Board.

Secondly, did Mr. Durfee in fact accept unusual hospitality from TWA during the period?

I submit for the committee's information the letter in toto from the president of TWA, Mr. Thomas.

TRANS WORLD AIRLINES,
New York, N.Y., December 1, 1959.

HON. WILLIAM PROXMIRE,
U.S.Senate,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR PROXMIRE: In reply to your letter of November 25, TWA was host on a 4-day trip to Rome in October 1957, to approximately 100 Americans who were representative of their many respective fields, which included education, religion, the arts, sciences, sports, business, government, and finance. The purpose of the trip was a meeting in Rome with their counterparts from European nations in furtherance of the President's people-to-people program.

As TWA's contribution to the program, our company helped to ararnge the Rome meetings and transported representatives under International Air Transport Association authority as part of our polar route and our New York-Rome nonstop inaugural flights.

Mr. and Mrs. James Durfee were guests on one of these flights and Mr. Durfee was an honored guest on the dais at the people-to-people dinner of all nations as a representative of American civil aviation. The dinner and preceding people-to-people meetings were attended by representatives from all over Europe, particularly NATO countries, and it was the consensus that the meetings made a positive contribution to the cause of better understanding between the United States and nations abroad.

Three groups—one each from Los Angeles, San Francisco, and New York—departed from the United States on October 2 and arrived in Rome on October 3. They departed from Rome for the United States on October 6.

Mr. and Mrs. Durfee were in the group departing from New York. The cost of their transportation, if paid for at 1957 fare levels, would have been $1,776. The approximate cost of their accommodations in Rome was $100.

In reply to the second part of your question, Mr. Durfee, to the best of my knowledge, has not accepted any hospitality, services or other consideration of value from TWA.

Sincerely,

CHARLES S. THOMAS.

In this letter Mr. Thomas flatly asserts that Mr. and Mrs. James Durfee were guests on a New York to Rome round trip flight. He also writes and I quote:

"The cost of their transportation, if paid for at 1957 levels, would have been $1,776. The approximate cost of their accommodations in Rome was $100."

Did the chairman of the CAB—Mr. Durfee—accept hospitality from this airline which had such a massive interest in the business of the CAB?

The answer of course is "Yes," on the testimony of the president of TWA.

Was this hospitality "unusual"?

Mr. Chairman, any time anyone will provide a trip from New York City to Rome and return for any man and his wife with $25 a day hotel room in Rome for 4 days, that hospitality would be unusual for the most jaded millionaire.

Is there any lawyer anywhere who wouldn't call such hospitality "unusual" for a judge who enjoyed it at the expense of a litigant before his court?

Once again, Mr. Chairman, the nominee for the Court of Claims flagrantly violated the code of ethics of the agency he served as the responsible chief. Any contrary view must assume that there is nothing unusual about hospitality that would fly a man and his wife half way around the world and back.

SUMMARY AND CONCLUSION

I must oppose Mr. Durfee for two principal reasons.

First, he wholly lacks the technical training and experience required for a court that annually passes on hundreds of millions of dollars of claims against the Government. He has no congressional experience, no tax nor Government-claim experience, no actual judicial experience. As compared to the high technical qualifications of the man he would succeed and the present judges of the Court of Claims, Mr. Durfee is just not adequately qualified.

Secondly, in the only Federal quasi-judicial experience Mr. Durfee has enjoyed, he has on three distinct occasions flagrantly violated the code of ethics of the agency which he himself heads. On every one of these occasions it is clear: first, that he accepted "unusual" hospitality; and second, that the hospitality was provided by persons who had an intense and obvious pecuniary interest in the business of the Civil Aeronautics Board, his agency.

It is true of course that on every one of the three occasions cited at length above, there was an apparent public purpose of sorts. The trip to North Carolina was to lend the authority of the head of the CAB to achieve a more cooperative relationship between MATS and the commercial airlines. The trip to Mexico was a ceremonial inaugural flight to encourage "a better understanding of the common interests of both countries." The purpose of the Rome trip, another ceremonial inaugural flight, was to advance the "people to people" program for greater international understanding.

It can be argued that these are all laudable purposes designed to advance the public interests. And the participation of the head of the CAB in such good ends should be encouraged and praised rather than castigated.

But who determined that the head of the CAB should lend the prestige and authority of his position to these purposes? The answer of course is that it was certain commercial airlines that have an intense and pecuniary interest in the business of the CAB. On no occasion was there any sanction in law, congressional resolution, or any other public action for achieving these laudable purposes by commercial airline hospitality for the head of the CAB.

This is a free country. Any group of men can decide to advance any worthwhile purpose they desire. But it is good public policy for a judicial officer to lend his office to such a group for a public purpose determined by them, if the group are litigants before the official at the time and if in the process they entertain him? I think not. Is it justification for violation of the explicitly stated code of ethics of the office he serves for such a public official to accept the kind of hospitality we have described at length above to help such litigants achieve ends they deem laudable? My answer is "No."

Is there any possible justification in "good motives" for the action of Mr. Durfee in accepting this entertainment?

The answer to this is apparent when we ask: What did the airlines spend their money for when they entertained Mr. Durfee? Did Flying Tiger fundamentally want greater freedom for civil aviation and smoother working relations with MATS, or did they want MATS routes so they could make bigger profits while cultivating the Chairman of CAB, the Board that determines the allocation of routes? My answer is frankly that they wanted all three. The CAB Chairman while unusually entertained enabled them to achieve all three.

Did Eastern want better "understanding between Mexico and the United States" or a slick promotional job to increase the air traffic on their new run so that they could improve profits and entertain and win better acquaintance with Jim Durfee, the head of the CAB, in the process? The answer again is "Yes" three times and the "unusually" entertained CAB Chairman helped them achieve it.

Finally, did TWA want to advance the President's people-to-people program or did it want to curry a little better relationship with the head of the CAB and increase profits by letting the world know about their new New York-Rome nonstop flight?

Once again, they probably wanted all of these things and the nominee for judge of the Claims Court helped them achieve all of them.

If this hospitality does not redound to the profit of the airline it would be interesting to know how the corporate officers of TWA and Eastern Airlines justify those costs.

Finally, let me say that I feel sure that the nominee did not look at these entertainment occasions as coldbloodedly as I have described them. I presume he was chiefly interested in the public purpose on all these occasions. But is there any man who can doubt what realistically happened? Can any man tell me what the purpose of the "unusual hospitality" clause of the CAB Code of Ethics is if it isn't to prevent exactly what I have described? And is there any doubt in anyone's mind that a judge—and certainly a judge on the Court of Claims—who is intelligent enough and realistic enough to serve the public should recognize this?

Mr. Durfee is not being prosecuted for removal from office. He is not being disciplined for misconduct. He is being considered for elevation to a judicial position that has been graced and is now graced by eminent jurists: a lifetime appointment at $25,500 a year to the Court of Claims.

The President, would-be-Presidents, and Senators today make impassioned speeches decrying the sagging moral fiber of too many of the American people. Such practices as radio and TV disk jockey payola and rigged TV shows, for instance, have shocked our moral sensibilities. But let us not forget that disk jockeys and quiz-show participants were not entrusted by their Government with responsibility for their conduct. They are not enjoined with a specific and direct code of ethics. And yet guilty disk jockeys have been fired and subjected to a lifetime blackball by their industry. Rigged quiz show participants are in disgrace.

Today's nominee has been entrusted by his Government with a heavy responsibility. He has been enjoined by an explicit code of ethics. He has violated that ethical code. What has been the consequence for him? It has been elevation, subject to the approval of the Senate, to a very high lifetime judicial office.

Approval by this committee is a moral issue. Mr. Chairman, I feel it is my sad duty as Senator from Wisconsin to ask that the nomination of Mr. James Durfee to the Court of Claims not be confirmed. I want to make it clear that in good conscience I cannot say that the nominee is "personally obnoxious" to me. I have absolutely no personal antipathy toward Mr. Durfee and indeed no reason to have any. I oppose him solely for the reasons I have stated above.

FEDERAL AID FOR EDUCATION

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, this morning's Washington Post carries an excellent editorial pleading for this Congress to consider an adequate Federal aid for education bill. The Post pleads for this Congress to pay its debt to the future of our country by acting where the administration has shown it will not act, to do something significant and decisive about the shortage of teachers and classrooms. This teacher and classroom gap is more serious to America's future than the missile gap.

I ask unanimous consent that this editorial be printed in the body of the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FOUNTAIN OF YOUTH

The Senate's Democrats, in caucus assembled on Wednesday, are reported to have expressed strong sentiment for a broad Federal aid to education bill—including aid for teacher salaries, college classrooms and school construction. "There is nothing more vital to America and nothing more important," Majority Leader LYNDON JOHNSON told reporters, "than passage of education legislation." If the Democrats really believe this—and there is good reason for them to believe it since it happens to be incontrovertibly true—they ought to act on it. They could devote themselves to no more useful—and no more politically profitable—issue in this presidential election year.

The public schools of this Nation suffer today from a shortage of 132,400 classrooms. The number of pupils enrolled in excess of normal classroom capacity rose from 1,850,000 in the fall of 1958 to 1,883,000 this fall. These figures are taken from a statement by Arthur S. Flemming, Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare in a Republican administration. "We have made very little progress over the years," Mr. Flemming said, "in dealing with the huge backlog of need for classrooms which developed during the war years, when school construction was virtually at a standstill." A press release issued simultaneously by the Commissioner of Education, also a Republican, says that "State departments of education reported in the survey that 98,800 full-time teachers have not met full certification standards for teaching. This total is an increase of 5,900 or 6.3 percent over that of last year."

But it is now perfectly apparent that the Republican administration which recognizes and presents this problem is not going to do anything to solve it. The President's school aid proposal is so meager, so niggardly, so inadequate as to amount to no more than an empty, mocking gesture in the school crisis. "The administration has been up and down the hill on this issue," Senator HUBERT H. HUMPHREY told newsmen, "but never in the schoolhouse. This is the time to put them on the line." He is abundantly right. Perhaps, as Senator FULBRIGHT predicted, the President would veto any real school bill passed by Congress. The Democrats could choose no firmer, more advantageous ground on which to take their stand.

For all Americans are touched by the public schools. All Americans can see their decay. All Americans can understand that the schools are the essential source of the Nation's security and strength—that the quality of the schools today will determine the quality of scientific and industrial and political performance in the United States a decade hence. All Americans know that from the earliest days of this Republic, the public schools have been its fountain of youth. And they will not choose to let that fountain run dry.

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. NEUBERGER in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

NAME CALLING DURING POLITICAL CAMPAIGNS

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, in the Washington Sunday Star of January 24, 1960, appears the following headline: "Top Democrats Join in Attack on NIXON."

The subhead is: "Two Thousand Five Hundred Hear Seven Hopefuls and Truman."

That is quite a favorite indoor sport in the political arena. Everyone fully understands that that is a part of the American tradition. The fact that we shoot at the other side and they shoot at us is an accepted technique.

I am reminded a little of the uninitiated bombardier who landed in Korea. On his first mission, when the antiaircraft guns first shot at the plane and flak began to tear through the fuselage, this boy, not only bewildered, but frightened to tears, turned to a grizzled old sergeant and said, "Sarge, they are shooting at us." The old sergeant said, "Yes; they are allowed to."

So there is plenty of shooting. But it seems to me that there are limits beyond which the shooting should not go in a political war.

I read a paragraph from the article in the Sunday Star, written by feature writer David S. Broder, of the Star staff, as reported on the front page of the Sunday edition of the Star:

The assembled Democrats cheered happily as various speakers assailed the Vice President as a "juvenile delinquent," "a slicker," and "a man about whom too many questions remain to be answered."

Mr. President, perhaps that is a manifestation of an inferiority complex. Some people manifest that complex by wearing loud neckties. The beatniks satisfy their inferiority complex by going around in dirty underwear, unshaven, reading poetry that no one understands, and carrying on in an amazingly crass fashion.

Then, of course, there are some who register their inferiority complex by dipping into Roget's Thesaurus to find what other terms they can use as they assail someone who is a contender for public office.

I think it is a great testimony to the Vice President that he does not shoot back in kind, and stoop to such procedures.

In my second campaign for Congress I took an oath that I would not mention my opponent from that day on. I think, as I go back and examine the history, I did not mention him. I let him saw his own wood, carry his own water, and peddle his own merchandise. I have never sought to downgrade a man on the other side of the fence in terms that were not printable on every possible occasion.

If this is a preview of what we are to have in the 1960 campaign, we might as well know it first as last. I have a leather-bound copy of Roget's Thesaurus, and I shall dust off all the favorite synonyms; perhaps we shall do some swapping on that basis. However, I think the kind of nomenclature used is uncalled for. I believe that if such a term as "a juvenile delinquent" is meant to be applicable to the Vice President of the United States, then indeed we have fallen from grace in our political decorum, and it is about time to take a little inventory.

Thank God, the Vice President is a man of stability, character, and restraint. He does not employ terms of that kind in a campaign.

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, I wish to support the remarks of the minority leader. I was shocked to read in the press yesterday accounts of the dinner to which the minority leader has referred, and the language which was used in discussing the Vice President of the United States.

Certainly, in recent years no man has ever carried our flag into foreign countries, under greater difficulties, and at times great danger, than has Vice President NIXON. He has earned the respect and admiration of Americans all over the United States, and of other free peoples throughout the world.

To speak of him in the terms which were applied to him at the Democratic dinner last Saturday night, I believe, is a disgraceful performance. It reminded me to some extent of a group of little schoolboys who meet after school to think up names to call the captain of the opposing team when he appears on the athletic field. The whole picture had some very juvenile aspects of its own.

I believe that this kind of performance and this kind of name calling applied to a man in high public office who has demonstrated his patriotism, his ability, and his willingness to run great risks in serving the people of the United States is a thoroughly disgraceful procedure, and I am very glad to have the opportunity to add my remarks to those of the distinguished minority leader.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. BUSH. I do not have the right to yield. If I may have unanimous consent to do so, I shall be glad to yield.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Mr. President, who has the floor?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Connecticut has the floor. He has 1 minute remaining.

Mr. BUSH. If I may do so, I am glad to yield.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. I do not in any way endorse any criticism of the Vice President. I had nothing to do with making any of the speeches referred to.

Does the Senator not recall that on other occasions important persons have been criticized? For example, a distinguished lady representative from the great State of Connecticut who was nominated to be our Ambassador to Brazil. She was criticized because she had once suggested that a former Democratic President lied the country into war. Many of us felt that that type of thing should be considered along with many other things said in campaigns, in which perhaps everyone overstates his position somewhat in the heat of the campaign.

After all, this dinner was regarded as something of a kickoff dinner for the presidential campaign.

Mr. BUSH. Nothing the Senator from Louisiana has said changes in the slightest the view which I have previously expressed.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. Mr. President, I do not have much to say on this question, except to observe that what has been said will no doubt make others feel they will have plenty of time in which to answer it. I rather think that what is complained of now will be very mild, indeed, compared with what will be said by the time the campaign is over. So we need not get excited about it at this time, because we will find that many more names, and stronger names, will be called before the campaign is over. I recall, Mr. President, that we have had some names called in past campaigns, and that is true on both sides of the aisle. I am sure the coming campaign will be carried on in the same way. Perhaps the name calling was caused by something that had been said before, which led up to the name calling. Perhaps those who did the name calling had a good reason for calling names. Perhaps that happened at the meeting on Saturday evening. I was not present. I am not defending anyone. However, I do feel that during the coming campaign other names will be called. Let us remember, also, that this is not necessarily a party speaking, but, rather, individuals speaking. We will find, during the approaching campaign, that many individuals throughout the United States will be calling their political opponents all kinds of names. That will be true of candidates of the Republican Party and of the Democratic Party. Therefore, I do not believe we should become too excited.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. Mr. President, I wish to join the minority leader and the Senator from Connecticut at this time in expressing regret at the remarks which were made concerning our Vice President. Although I very much regret those remarks, I cannot join my colleagues in their concern as to their effect.

The fact is, as I read those remarks in yesterday's newspaper, I was reminded of a story I heard a few years ago about a farmer who had an old mule. The mule had outlived its usefulness and generally was unpleasant to have around the farm. The farmer kept putting off disposing of the mule. He always intended to do something about it but kept putting off the action.

Also on the farm the farmer had an old well which he had been promising to fill in. His wife one day insisted that he could no longer put off filling up this well but must do so as soon as possible.

The farmer got the idea that he could do both jobs at one time, fill in the well and dispose of the mule. He led the mule to the well, and got on its blind side, gave it a shove, and the mule landed about 40 feet down the well. The farmer then rounded up all his friends, and they all began shoveling dirt down the well. As the dirt was shoveled it landed on the old mule's back. The old mule in the well just kept shaking his back and stepping on top of the dirt, and finally he walked out of the well safely.

All I can say to my friends on the other side of the aisle is that if they will keep on shoveling dirt, Vice President NIXON will walk into the White House in 1960. [Laughter.]

Mr. KEATING subsequently said: Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that what I am about to say may follow the remarks of the distinguished Senator from Delaware [Mr. WILLIAMS].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, what candidates for high office may say at a big political rally is, to a degree, excusable. One does not get very many cheers from the faithful by dealing with issues; he gets great cheers from those who are dedicated to one philosophy only by calling the opponent names. We can expect much of that kind of conduct. The course was charted by the chairman of the Democratic National Committee on a nationwide television program a couple of weeks ago, when he said that this campaign would be the roughest in history, that all attacks would be centered on Vice President NIXON, that there was much in his past which would be dredged up, and so forth and so on.

We will hear much of that kind of talk, but in my judgment none of those things can be made to stick. They will not stick. Our distinguished Vice President will emerge on top. The story related by the distinguished Senator from Delaware [Mr. WILLIAMS] is, indeed, very pointed.

It is significant that on the same day those candidates for high office were taking the low road, the distinguished Vice President was taking the high road and was dealing with one of the great issues which face our country. On the day of the debacle at the Sheraton Park Hotel, the Vice President released a very interesting letter to Mr. Alexander F. Jones, known to many of us as "Casey" Jones, of Syracuse, N.Y. Mr. Jones is the executive editor of the Syracuse Herald-Journal and is widely known as an independent thinker and writer.

In his letter, the Vice President set forth in some detail his views on the recent steel dispute and his ideas as to possible future action. Because his vigorous and helpful participation in the settlement of the steel impasse was so successful, the comments of the Vice President deserve the close attention of every Member of Congress. The Vice President, in cooperation with Secretary of Labor Mitchell, performed a great service in getting the parties together and in working out an agreeable solution.

I noted with particular interest the Vice President's call for legislation to deal with future national emergencies resulting from labor-management disputes. I suggest that it might be appropriate for some of those who excoriate the Vice President so severely on the basis of personalities to join him in the effort to promote such legislation. I agree wholeheartedly with the Vice President's view that we should not simply sit back now that the steel situation has been cleared up, and wait for another crisis. In my judgment, Congress has a solemn obligation to come to grips with this problem and to provide the President with flexible and workable means for helping to settle future labor-management disputes.

Certainly, the Vice President's expertise must be recognized by all of us. I am hopeful that his feeling that legislation is needed will be heeded.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Vice President's interesting letter to Mr. Jones be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

OFFICE OF THE VICE PRESIDENT,
Washington, January 21, 1960.

Mr. ALEXANDER F. JONES,
Executive Editor,
Syracuse Herald-Journal,
Syracuse, N.Y.

DEAR CASEY: I greatly appreciated your letter of January 5 and particularly the candor and frankness with which you discussed the steel settlement.

I realize that a number of questions have been raised as to the settlement and the role that Secretary Mitchell and I played with regard to it. I think perhaps the best way to answer those questions is to review the factors which led to our mediation efforts and the alternatives which confronted us.

As you will recall, just before the President left on his trip abroad, he said in his television address to the Nation: "It is up to labor and management * * * to adjust responsibly and equitably their differences * * * what great news it would be if, during the course of this journey, I should receive word of a settlement of this steel controversy that is fair to the workers, fair to management and above all fair to the American people."

The first question the Secretary and I undertook to explore was whether the President's expressed desire for a settlement could be realized without some new mediation action on our part. Our preliminary discussions with representatives of both sides convinced us that there was no chance whatever for a settlement unless some new initiative was undertaken to bring them together.

We, therefore, asked Mr. Blough and other top management representatives and Mr. McDonald and other representatives of the union whether they wished us to attempt to mediate the dispute. While both sides indicated that they did not feel there was too much hope that they could reach a negotiated settlement, they agreed that such a procedure was worth trying and that they would cooperate to the extent possible. This was the origin of the meetings which took place in my home in which Secretary Mitchell, Mr. Blough, Mr. McDonald, Mr. Goldberg, and I participated.

At the beginning of these negotiations, the possibilities of settlement seemed hopeless. The companies' offer was for a wage-benefit package which the companies estimated would add 31 cents to their costs over a period of 30 months. In addition, the companies asked for revision of section 2B of the contract so that management would have more control over local work practices which they felt was essential for increased efficiency.

The union completely opposed any changes in the work practices provision of the contract. On the economic side, Mr. McDonald at our first meeting bluntly stated, "I cannot settle with the steel companies for less than the amount that I received from Can and Aluminum without a strike." I think it is important at this point to recall that our negotiations began the week that he had completed his negotiation of the Aluminum contract. And the companies' computation of what McDonald contended was the Can and Aluminum pattern was an increased wage-benefit cost of 52 cents for 30 months.

In other words, at the beginning of the negotiations, the companies were offering a 31-cent increase over 30 months as against 52 cents demanded by the union and the parties were in complete disagreement on the local work practices issue. During our first few meetings we made very little progress. At a meeting in my home 2 days before Christmas, the negotiations reached a point where both sides refused to move any further in the direction of an agreement and there seemed to be a hopeless deadlock.

It was at that point that the Secretary and I talked to Mr. Blough and Mr. McDonald separately and asked whether they thought it might be useful if we were to consult individually with each party and recommend an amount in between their two positions which each would be completely free to accept or reject if he saw fit.

Both agreed that this course of action might be helpful and after 2 days of intense negotiations and discussions and consultation with the President, we recommended the figure of 41 cents which both the union and management voluntarily accepted. As far as the work practices issue was concerned, the best that we were able to get the union to agree was to set up a study commission with a neutral chairman.

I realize that a number of questions have been raised as to why we recommended the amount that we did. I think the answers to those questions can be found when we examine the bargaining position of each party.

Mr. McDonald came to these negotiations in a stronger position than the companies. He had just won from Aluminum and Can without a strike higher settlements than the one he eventually agreed to accept with the steel companies. Polls that he had taken (and incidentally, the polls the companies had taken substantiated his claims in this respect) indicated that the union members would vote down the companies' last offer by a majority of over 90 percent. He also believed that if the dispute were not settled and had to be sent to the Congress by the President he would do better in a Congress heavily dominated by Members elected with union support in an election year than would the companies. Considering the strong bargaining position of the union, their agreement to a settlement which was less than the pattern that they had been able to negotiate with Can and Aluminum was, in my opinion, a major achievement.

Looking at the settlement from the standpoint of the companies, no one questions but that they agreed to an amount which was greater than they thought could be absorbed by increased worker productivity, though it is entirely conceivable that the rising efficiency between now and 1962 could offset the increase in labor costs during this period. In addition, the companies failed to win substantial concessions on the work rules issue. But company representatives have pointed out some of these positive factors which led them to agree to the recommended settlement.

1. The amount they settled for was lower than any offer they had been able to get from the union during the course of their negotiations up to that time.

2. It was less than one-half of the postwar pattern in wage-benefit increases in the steel industry. For example, in the last steel contract the wage-benefit increase was 81 cents for 3 years as compared with 41 cents for 30 months on this occasion.

3. As Conrad Cooper, the chief negotiator for the companies, has stated, the amount of this settlement was 30 percent less in company costs than would have been the case had the Can, Aluminum, and Kaiser patterns been applied to steel. In other words, this settlement rather than setting off a new pattern of higher wage increases was actually lower than the pattern in wage settlements already established in 1959 and checked, rather than increased, the so-called ripple of increased wage costs.

4. The cost-of-living escalator provision, which had resulted in a 17-cent wage increase over the 3 years of the previous contract, was finally limited in this contract to a maximum of 6 cents over 30 months. In addition, it is provided that if the insurance costs which the company has assumed under the contract prove to be greater than the amount estimated, the excess costs will be deducted from any cost-of-living increases which may have accrued.

A basic question which many have raised is whether a better result in the end would have been achieved had the Secretary and I not offered our good offices for mediation of the dispute at this time. This, of course, is a matter of judgment on which there can be an honest disagreement of opinion. I can only indicate my own appraisal as to what would have happened had we not acted as we did.

In my opinion, the price the union would have insisted upon would inevitably have gone up rather than down. It seems only logical to conclude that after the union had won an overwhelming victory rejecting the companies' last offer they would have insisted on an even higher settlement than they accepted at the present time. I also believe that if the parties had failed to agree after the union rejected the companies' last offer and the President, as required by law, had submitted the dispute to Congress any Government-imposed settlement that the Congress would have brought about through compulsory arbitration, plant seizure, or some other Government device, would have been higher than the one agreed upon at this point.

I recognize that there are those who have suggested that it would have been better in the long run to allow the issue to go to the Congress so that the Congress could meet head on the whole question of too much power in the hands of the union as well as management. I can only say that any objective observer would have to agree that there could be nothing more irresponsible than to place before the Congress in an election year the complicated and potentially explosive issue of labor-management relations.

In my opinion, the result would not only have been a Government-imposed settlement of this dispute but a real possibility of the enactment of permanent legislation which would have provided for some form of Government-imposed compulsory arbitration in all major labor disputes. I don't need to tell you that Government arbitration means Government wage fixing and that Government wage fixing inevitably means Government price fixing. Once we get into this vicious circle not only collective bargaining but the productive private enterprise system, as we know it, is doomed.

I would be the last to contend that there could not be honest differences of opinion as to the wisdom of the course of action the Secretary and I followed in mediating this dispute. But after weighing all the factors involved, we concluded that our failure to do everything possible to bring about a voluntary settlement at this time would have been highly detrimental to the public interest.

As chairman of the Cabinet Committee on Price Stability for Economic Growth, I am acutely aware of the dangers of inflation which can arise from wage increases that consistently exceed increases in productivity. But on the plus side it should be noted that while the wage-benefit increase was greater than the companies wanted to pay, this was the first contract since the war in which the increase was such that the companies did not find it necessary to increase prices at the time the contract went into force. Whether price increases can be avoided in the future will depend to a great extent upon how the union and the companies carry out the President's injunction in his state of the Union message that "the national interest demands that in the period of industrial peace which has been assured by the new contract, both management and labor make every possible effort to increase efficiency and productivity in the manufacture of steel so that price increases can be avoided."

Incidentally, I believe that one of the constructive results of the long fight the companies made on the work-rule issue was that it focused nationwide attention on the critical necessity of increasing our efficiency and productivity if we are to maintain our competitive position in the world.

As I told the representatives of the major companies and the union at a dinner in my home after the settlement, the people of the country will not tolerate another massive struggle of this type in the steel industry. Their interest, as well as that of the country at large, will be at stake as they explore every possible means of increasing productivity, reducing costs, and improving relations between union and management during the period of this contract.

For my part, I intend to continue my studies of this problem with a view to determining what legislative action might be taken which would provide better protection for the public interest in the settlement of labor-management disputes and at the same time not impair the basic strength of our private enterprise economy.

With every good wish.

Sincerely,

RICHARD NIXON.

THANKS, MR. VICE PRESIDENT

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, people in all parts of the Nation breathed a sigh of relief when the long and costly steel strike was settled. We have the Vice President and the Secretary of Labor to thank for bringing together the opposing sides so that free collective bargaining could be resumed toward the end of settling the strike.

I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the body of the RECORD an editorial from the San Diego Union which thanks Vice President NIXON, as well as a column by Mr. David Lawrence which clarifies some of the provisions of the strike settlement, and, finally, a column by Mr. John M. Cummings in the Philadelphia Inquirer.

There being no objection, the editorial and columns were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the San Diego Union, Jan. 5, 1960]

A BURDEN LIFTED—THANKS, MR. VICE PRESIDENT

With powerful leverage by Vice President NIXON and Labor Secretary James P. Mitchell, the burden of the longest steel strike in the Nation's history has been lifted from the back of the economy. The Nation marches into the new decade relieved and confident it can master the economic and defense challenges that lie ahead.

The acceptance of Mr. NIXON's formula for settling the strike brought an orderly and harmonious conclusion to a dispute that has defied the best efforts of arbiters since May. The fact that the settlement was achieved voluntarily indicated that when free collective bargaining is prosecuted in good faith no labor-management issue is too big to resolve.

The offices of Mr. NIXON and Mr. Mitchell were instrumental in accentuating the positive in the negotiations. As Mr. Mitchell pointed out yesterday, the differences between the parties had narrowed to a point the Government-recommended settlement was accepted voluntarily.

The agreement, when ratified by the USW membership as expected, will give the workers an estimated 39 to 40 cents an hour increase in pay and benefits over the next 30 months. It is estimated that the steel industry's costs will increase by $600 million a year.

In the compromise nailed down by Mr. NIXON the union won more wage increase than management had been willing to give. But this concession was balanced off by the union's agreement to submit the acrimonious work rules issue to a union-management committee. This was recognition that the issue needs a thorough airing, and it was a major concession on the USW's part.

It had not been determined whether the settlement will result in steel price increases. However, it is noteworthy that Mr. NIXON acted in his capacity as chairman of the President's Cabinet Committee for Price Stability and Economic Growth, Mr. NIXON hardly would author a settlement that contributed to the very thing—inflation—that this committee is fighting.

Every corner of our land will feel the relief stemming from the settlement of the steel strike. Individual workers, cities, States, and the Federal Government are out from under a crushing burden that threatened to flatten them and their pocketbooks.

Mr. NIXON's stature as a national leader, already great, is further enhanced. He put the economy back on the track and restored labor peace with tact and skill. Those who benefit from his efforts—and that includes everybody—have reason to remember and to say, "Thanks, Mr. Vice President."

THE STEEL PACT IN "GRAY AREA"—EXECUTIVES OF TWO MAJOR FIRMS AGREE STRIKE SETTLEMENT WAS NOT "ALL BLACK"

(By David Lawrence)

Executives of the various steel companies have been reviewing what really happened in the settlement of the steel strike, and most of them have come to the conclusion that maybe the final agreement reached was not as bad for them as it has been painted.

There is a tendency to agree with what President Eisenhower said about the pressure of circumstances, rather than the pressure of Government, as the paramount influence in bringing about the settlement.

The head of one company put it this way:

"We have been in this wage-price spiral for 20-odd years. You can't stop a great wave of that kind dead in its tracks all at one crack. We've made a great effort in the steel business to try to stop it. We made some mistakes as we went along but, by and large, we tried our best to slow the thing down.

"Now, the settlement, as actually made, gives an advance of about half in the next 3 years of what we've had in the past 3 years. That's a pretty fair step forward. The thing that really ended the matter—really what finally made us capitulate—was the politicians in Congress.

"The real pressure that developed was the fear of a Democratic Congress and what they would do if they had to meet an emergency. If there was a threat of a resumption of the strike, Congress would be proposing all kinds of laws to prevent it, and these laws would not be the kind that would be carefully considered or thoughtfully discussed. They would be emergency laws passed in order to force a settlement of the strike. It was the fear of that kind of law, as well as the threat of the steel strike being resumed, which most of us thought would do a lasting damage to our employer-employee relations and to the whole country. We would have had a difficult time ever getting repeal of the drastic, ill-considered legislation that would have been passed."

The head of another steel company believes the adverse nature of the settlement has been overemphasized. He says:

No one, of course, could ever say this settlement was a victory for the steel industry, for we did not accomplish our main objectives of a noninflationary settlement and change in work rules which would promote efficiency. Nevertheless, as Mr. Blough of United States Steel pointed out, we did reduce the rate of increase in employment costs to about 3¾ percent as compared with an average of 8 percent throughout the postwar period. This is no mean accomplishment. In addition, we alerted the public, including the steelworkers, to the importance of the work-rule issues, and one may hope that this could bring some fruitful results as time goes along.

Some writers contended, for one thing, that if the industry had settled on the union offer of 15 cents an hour prior to the strike, this would have meant 37½ cents for a 30-month period as compared with 41 cents in the actual settlement. The kind of 15-cent-an-hour offer made by the union prior to the strike was the same as the 1956 settlement which resulted in an employment cost of 81 cents an hour for the 3-year period. This is exactly what would have happened had we accepted the original so-called 15-cent offer. The union never counts the related costs of wage increases for overtime, holiday pay, vacation pay, and so forth—nor did they at that time look with favor at any limitation of the cost-of-living clause.

"In addition, some writers painted the picture of the Kaiser settlement as being more favorable than the industry settlement. This is not true. The Kaiser settlement cost about 5 percent per annum as compared with 3.75 percent for the industry settlement. The Kaiser wage increase becomes effective July 1 as compared with December 1 for the industry. Furthermore, the industry has an offset against the 3-cent cost-of-living clause in excess insurance costs; Kaiser has no such offset. In addition, the industry is settled for an extra year which is in itself an advantage. A settlement which was better than the Kaiser, can industry, aluminum or copper settlements also was quite a remarkable achievement.

"So what am I saying? Simply that this deal was not 'all black' nor 'all white.' It was in the gray area. If those who believe in this cause keep at it, additional progress can be made with the hope that intelligent people can truly arrest inflation over a reasonable period of time."

Both the foregoing expressions from executives of two important steel companies were spontaneously made, independently of one another, in an informal review of the controversy. It is conceded that, while the industry paid a heavy price in the cost of work interruption, the drawing of public attention to the basic issue of work rules was a gain in a long-range sense for management.

Just what the political gains or losses will be remain yet to be determined. The administration's position is that it acted as an informal mediator and that it made no promises about future legislation and gave no sanction to any agreement on prices. The steelmen say privately that each company will have to decide for itself whether or not to increase prices and when such prices would go into effect.

PRESIDENT'S PRESTIGE, POPULARITY INCREASE

(By John M. Cummings)

President Eisenhower enters on the last year of his second and final term with his popularity undiminished, his prestige unmarred, and fully confident in his mission of peace.

He has weathered serious illness, brushed off political opposition. Mr. Eisenhower has a firmer hold on the hearts of his countrymen than at any other time in his 7 White House years. He is stronger than his own Republican Party as the returns of two presidential elections testify.

The "loyal opposition," or Democratic Party, hesitates to come to grips with this man who openly professes his unfamiliarity with the devious ways of politics. In marking the seventh anniversary of the Eisenhower administration the other day, Democrats joined with Republicans in the Senate in singing the praises of the President.

Some observers see President Eisenhower's great popularity as resembling that enjoyed by former President Franklin D. Roosevelt at the height of the New Deal. There is, however, a significant difference.

In the Roosevelt heyday the President enjoyed the support of a strongly Democratic Congress, a Congress of his own party. During most of the Eisenhower regime the Congress has also been Democratic, while the President himself is a Republican.

In this connection the Weekly Review of the Times (of London) recently observed:

"There is a theory that after 6 years of divided government Americans are coming to regard the Presidency as something apart from partisan politics and are prepared to return a Republican to the White House and Democrats to Congress as a regular thing. But this is yet to be proved."

Most Americans, we believe, will disagree with this theory. They feel progress in Government is best assured when the President—be he Republican or Democrat—and the Congress are of the same political faith.

In the opinion of the London publication, President Eisenhower, termed "an exception to many rules," has strongly affected the personality and the politics of Vice President NIXON.

"What is self evident," says the Times, "is that Mr. NIXON has succeeded in transforming the idea which the public had of him and that he has identified himself, under Mr. Eisenhower, with the passionate longing of Americans for peace."

This seems to lend support to the new Nixon idea, a rainy-day brainstorm of the more superficial Washington commentators forced by the inclemency of the weather to forego their late afternoon foraging in the cocktail lounges of the Capital.

Mr. NIXON, destined to be nominated as President Eisenhower's successor at the coming Republican National Convention, has improved over the years as a campaigner.

As the running mate of Mr. Eisenhower in two campaigns, Mr. NIXON fought hard and consistently. The Vice President was never known as a punch puller; he was never distinguished as the champion of the pillow fighters or of the cream-puff heavers. He is a fighter, an aggressive fighter, one who goes into combat as if he meant it.

Fighters don't last very long if they become lax in their training and fail to show improvement. President Eisenhower, trained in the art of war, knows a fighter when he sees one. Which helps to an understanding of why he said of NIXON: "He's my boy."

There has been some intimation of late that the President, at the proper time, will take the stump in behalf of Mr. NIXON. This is to be expected from a man who appreciates how NIXON stepped into the breach at critical periods when the President really needed assistance.

The only President to claim Pennsylvania as his home since the day of James Buchanan goes into his last year in office admired and revered by Republicans and Democrats alike. It may be left to history to determine whether he belongs among the greats of the White House. Certainly no man has done more to advance the cause of world peace.

Under the 22d amendment to the Constitution, a President is limited to two terms. Ike has had it. When he retires a year hence our much-traveled President, our apostle of peace, will carry with him the well done of Americans regardless of party.

THE ROSE

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I should like to call the attention of my colleague to a discussion which has been proceeding about the rose, a flower in which the people of my State take great pride, a pride which is shared by many Members of the Senate who love beautiful flowers.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD as a part of my remarks an article in Parade magazine of January 24, 1960, entitled "The Nation Picks a Flower," which shows that the rose, which is the State flower of the State of New York, in a nationwide poll of more than a million citizens, obtained two-thirds of the vote. The details of the vote are recorded in the article. I am very pleased to be able to submit this article for the RECORD showing the finding of the popularity of the rose.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE NATION PICKS A FLOWER

WASHINGTON, D.C.—At left (illustration not printed in RECORD) is the flower that Americans apparently love best—the rose. In a nationwide poll of more than a million petal-loving citizens, florists learned that the rose was a 2 to 1 favorite over its nearest rival, the carnation.

Below are the complete results of the poll, announced exclusively in Parade. Tomorrow these official returns will be handed over to congressional committees, which for some time have been raising a tempest in a hothouse over a thorny issue: our national flower.

It seems we have none, a national blot we share with Russia. Last year nine flowers were nominated in Congress, but none ever got out of the ground. Trying to be helpful, the Florists' Telegraph Delivery Association put ballot boxes in 11,000 florist shops, then listed 20 flowers on the ballots, including the nine suggested in Congress. There also was write-in space for personal favorites.

The rose won in a landslide, getting more than two-thirds of the votes. Only one State, Colorado, was out of step, going carnation.

Reason for the rose's popularity, said voters in Waynesboro, Va., are fourfold: Everyone knows a rose when he sees one; roses are easy to care for; they stand for purity; they grow everywhere.

News of the victory will delight at least two rose-picking Senators. Pennsylvania's HUGH SCOTT has stoutly contended that the rose is "a solid tradition in America." Using softer tactics to influence votes, Maine's MARGARET CHASE SMITH simply wears a rose corsage every day.

With the people apparently agreeing with these two Senators, the big question in Washington now is: Will Uncle Sam soon sport a rose in his buttonhole?

Voting in flower race

1. Rose	386,841
2. Carnation	171,591
3. Chrysanthemum	75,729
4. Lily-of-the-valley	60,033

19. Corn tassel	12,788
20. Marigold	10,741
21. All others	30,093
Total votes	1,055,629

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JAVITS. I yield.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, I join my colleague from New York in expressing gratification over the selection of the rose as being by far the most popular flower in our country. The rose, according to the poll referred to by my colleague, received 386,000 votes. The next flower in popularity, the carnation, received 171,000 votes. None of the other flowers came anywhere near the vote for the rose, the rose receiving about 38 percent of the total vote cast.

The result of the poll demonstrates overwhelmingly that the rose is a flower Americans love best. Over two-thirds of the votes went to this finest of all flowers, and that vote provides added evidence of the desirability of selecting the rose as our national flower.

The solid vote for the rose comes as no surprise to me. For years I have advocated its designation as our national flower symbol, because I feel it embodies the fragrance, beauty, and identity with America which should characterize the national flower.

Furthermore, the rose is one of the finest products of my State of New York, where the best of all roses are grown. I am confident that the results of this poll will add greater impetus to the forces working for the rose's selection as the national flower.

I appreciate my colleague yielding to me at this point.

Mr. JAVITS. All of us in New York are honored by the fact that this beautiful flower is grown particularly in the area from which my colleague comes, and which he represented in Congress as a Representative—Rochester, N.Y. He and I had some pictures taken in connection with our advocating the rose as our national flower.

It is gratifying to both of us that the American people have given the rose this vote of popularity.

Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. YOUNG of Ohio in the chair). The Senator from New York.

GRAND STREET BOYS RECOGNIZE DEDICATED TEACHERS

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, in the discussion of ways and means to aid our schools and teachers, not enough attention is being given to the role of civic organizations in supplementing the services provided by the local, State, and Federal Governments.

The need for providing incentives leading to an increase in teacher's salaries, which is one of the features of the school construction bill introduced by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. COOPER] and myself, is recognized in another fashion by the Grand Street Boys' Association and Foundation of New York, of which I have the honor to be a member. I am a member of that organization in the full meaning of the word, because that is where I was born—that is my origin. The president of that fine organization for many years was Judge Jonah B. Goldstein, a very distinguished New Yorker and one time candidate for mayor of the city of New York.

This is one of the most noteworthy local organizations in New York City, and its tribute to the dedicated school teachers of that city should be widely recognized. I call attention to the fact that the organization has given 100 awards to teachers, each of whom received an illuminated scroll, and 10 of whom were awarded, in addition, a prize of $500 each.

This is a noteworthy example of what citizens can do in recognizing the high calling of the profession of teaching, which we want to see not only better paid but also ennobled by citizen recognition.

I ask unanimous consent that the editorial entitled, "Dedicated Teachers," published in the New York Times of January 18, be printed in the RECORD at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DEDICATED TEACHERS

The Grand Street Boys' Association and Foundation has called fresh attention to the thousands of dedicated teachers in our New York City school system, men and women who work far beyond the call of duty, who through wise and friendly guidance inspire their pupils and who successfully mold the character of the youngsters who will be the voting citizens of tomorrow.

A committee of 35 prominent retired and active educators carefully screened more than 1,000 nominations made by principals, assistant superintendents, faculty councils, parent-teacher organizations, alumni associations, and community leaders. One hundred were selected to receive an illuminated dedicated teacher scroll, and in addition 10 of these were awarded a prize of $500 each.

This expression of appreciation, we are told, should not be interpreted as a substitute for adequate increases in the salary schedules of our teachers. In fact, the Grand Street Boys' Association and Foundation looks upon this project as a starting signal for a general campaign in which all citizens will participate in an effort to improve our schools by providing attractive salaries for our teachers. This will not only help solve the serious problems of our teacher recruitment program, but will also assure us that the effectiveness, the spirit and the morale of our 40,000 New York City instructors will bear the hallmark of the dedicated teacher.

RACIAL BIAS IN UNIONS

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I wish to call to the attention of the Senate a very remarkable development in the labor union field which has resulted in the Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen, who recently met in convention, eliminating discrimination on grounds of race or color. It has erased from its charter, its organization, and its operation this racial ban.

This action comes following considerable debate on this subject at the annual convention of AFL–CIO. At that time a pledge was made that great efforts would be undertaken to bring about this advance in trade unionism. It has resulted in this action by the Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen. I am delighted to see that this has been accomplished. In that connection I ask unanimous consent that there may be printed in the RECORD at this point in my remarks an editorial entitled "Racial Bias in Unions" published in the New York Times.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

RACIAL BIAS IN UNIONS

The erasure of the color line from the constitution of the Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen, by the overwhelming vote of the delegates to its recent convention, deserves unqualified applause. It marked a notable step forward in the efforts of the American Federation of Labor and Congress of Industrial Organizations to wipe out race discrimination, for the brotherhood had been admitted to the federation on condition that this action be taken. But this step also raises the question of how far the federation still has to go.

There can be no question as to its commitment to racial equality in its own ranks. Its constitution pledges it to encourage all workers without regard to race, creed, color, or national origin to share in the full benefits of union organization. And its civil rights department is dedicated to redeeming that pledge.

Great advances have been made in that direction—many beginning long before the merger of the AFL and CIO. A conspicuous measure of that progress is the fact that there were bars to Negro membership in the constitutions of 26 AFL affiliates 20 years ago, while only 1 remains—in that of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Enginemen. Positive guarantees of racial equality are common in union constitutions and bylaws.

But there are still wide divergencies from these principles in the practices of local unions, largely in the building trades. Some locals go so far as to refuse admission to colored applicants—especially serious where jobs themselves depend on union membership. There is also wide exclusion of Negroes from apprentice training programs, which has the same effect.

During the past 2 years the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People has made a special effort to prod the AFL–CIO into taking more aggressive action to limit these practices. But the federation has been hampered by a lack of punitive power, except for expulsion, which it is increasingly reluctant to use. And persuasion takes time, especially when deep-rooted customs are involved. Undoubtedly, however, more pressures could be applied. The need for them should be given high priority at the meeting of the federation's executive council next month.

A LOSS FOR JIM CROW—TRAINMEN'S VOTE TO SCRAP RACIAL BAR SHOULD EASE FRICTION IN AFL–CIO

(By A. H. Raskin)

The merged labor federation has just scored its most dramatic breakthrough in its fight to eliminate racial discrimination in its affiliated unions. The victory took the form of an overwhelming decision by a special convention of the 200,000-member Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen to scrap the color bar in its constitution. The action should do much to temper the bitterness that erupted in a floor fight over the race issue at the biennial convention of the American Federation of Labor and Congress of Industrial Organizations in San Francisco last September.

The debate had left in the minds of many Negro workers doubts about the sincerity of the federation's desire to wipe out Jim Crow rules and to give meaningful expression to the antibias guarantees embodied in the merger compact 4 years ago.

The unhappiest aspect of the bitter exchange was that it created the outward appearance of a rift over principle between the two men who had been most conspicuous in the implementation of the no-discrimination drive. They were George Meany, the federation's president, and A. Philip Randolph, its only Negro vice president.

DIFFERENCES OVER SPEED

Actually their differences have never been over which way the federation should go, but over how fast its progress should be and how much pressure it should exert to make it faster. One of their specific points of disagreement at San Francisco was whether the parent organization should set a 6-month deadline for action by the trainmen to erase their whites-only clause. Mr. Randolph said "Yes"; Mr. Meany said "No." Mr. Meany's view prevailed.

The topheavy vote by which the brotherhood's convention put its constitution in line with the federation's policies of racial equality vindicated Mr. Meany's belief that more could be accomplished by moral suasion than by using the big stick of an expulsion ultimatum.

He labored quietly, but with typical bluntness, to make certain that the constitutional issue would be put before delegates to the special convention, which had been called primarily to deal with problems raised by the passage of the Landrum-Griffin Act.

He reinforced his behind-the-scenes activity with a telegram to the convention, urging that the brotherhood's basic law be brought into compliance with the general labor ban against racial discrimination. Yesterday, his wish fulfilled, he sent another telegram, in which he said:

"True trade union brotherhood knows no racial distinction—a fact which your brotherhood has now underscored. The trade union movement cannot and will not rest until the civil rights battle hase been won."

NAACP PRAISES MOVE

The National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, which has been sharply critical of the federation's performance in the civil rights field, also registered its gratification.

Roy Wilkins, the association's executive secretary, called the action a heartening reaffirmation of the American principle of equal opportunity for all.

He expressed hope that the decision would spur laggard unions to move forward in ending bias.

The National Urban League and the National Labor Service of the American Jewish Committee urged business organizations to match labor's zeal in promoting fair employment practices.

The trainmen's move leaves only one federation affiliate, the 87,000-member Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Enginemen, with a constitutional wall against the admission of Negroes. This contrasts with 26 unions in the AFL alone that had such keep-out clauses in 1940 when Mr. Meany first went to Washington as the federation's secretary-treasurer.

However, it is fanciful to pretend that the mere setting right of constitutional language has opened union gates to Negroes everywhere. There are many union locals, especially in the building trades, that are as opposed to integration as any member of the White Citizens Council.

At its midwinter meeting in Miami Beach next month the federation high command intends to strengthen the enforcement machinery that is designed to back up its standing committee on civil rights. Whenever the compliance efforts of the regular committee prove unavailing, a special committee of AFL–CIO vice presidents will be appointed to demand that discrimination cease.

No one expects labor to achieve perfection in this field overnight. The same problems, real and imagined, that block headway in education, housing and most other aspects of community life operate to retard union leaders and rank-and-file members. But Mr. Meany has given new proof that he and his associates are dedicated to the proposition that bias must go.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, in this connection I wish to say that we have been told—those of us who are fighting so hard for civil rights legislation—"just give education a chance, and it will do the job. Don't try to pass laws." I point out to those who advocate that position that it is a fine position if something happens, but that it is a very bad position if nothing happens. Here is a perfect example of that.

No one seeks to pass laws about this matter because it is obviously an action being taken which is consonant with the safeguards of the Constitution. This encourages us to feel that measures of self-regulation and self-discipline in terms of the Constitution will be observed. But when there is a flouting of the law, as there has been in many areas, such as that relating to desegregation in the public schools, and when citizens are denied the right to vote—and there has been a finding by a Federal Commission composed half of Southerners and half of Northerners that citizens are being denied the right to vote—what are we to do but to pass legislation?

I think this is an object lesson to those who would have us take some other course, because it enables us to show a record of performance in compliance with the Constitution. I think we should all realize that there is very much more to these arguments than appears to be the case.

TRIBUTE TO THE LATE C. G. WELLINGTON

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. President, Mr. C. G. Wellington, one of the most important contributors to American journalism, died last week. Mr. Wellington, better known as "Pete" to the Nation's reporters and editors, was executive editor of the Kansas City Star. He was a newspaperman's newspaperman—a friend of mine of many years. I ask unanimous consent that two editorials dealing with Mr. Wellington be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Columbia Missourian, Jan. 22, 1960]

LIFE OF TALENT, TRUTH

American journalism lost one of its really great men last Wednesday when C. G. Wellington, for many years an editor of the Kansas City Star, died suddenly of a coronary occlusion. He would have been 70 years old in about 2 months. He had been city editor, managing editor, and executive editor of the Star; but it was as night editor from 1925 to 1942 that he left his greatest impress on the paper.

"Pete" Wellington did more than anyone else in his generation to maintain the tradition of the Kansas City Star as a paper interested in the man on the street, in the common life of its readers, in the small incidents—amusing, pathetic, entertaining—which go to make up the lowly history of our streets, our homes, our everyday living. These are what we sometimes call "human interest" stories—stories that are interesting not because they deal with so-called "important" events and personages, but because they give back to us bits of our own ordinary life.

"Pete's" activity in this kind of journalism was not limited to setting his reporters on the search for such stories and hunting them out, but he was determined that they should be written simply and effectively. It is easy to overwrite such material, to sentimentalize, to sensationalize. "Pete" taught his boys the values of simplicity, directness, and brevity. That is the reason that Hemingway (to cite but one famous Wellington trainee) has always acknowledged generously the help he received from the great editor during his short term as a Star reporter.

The Star owes much to the work of "Pete" Wellington, and so do the paper's hundreds of thousands of readers throughout the Middle West for the last 40 years.

[From the Kansas City Times, Jan. 22, 1960]

C. G. WELLINGTON

To more than a generation of newspapermen C. G. Wellington has been known as one of the great technicians of his profession. Quiet of manner, unerringly considerate of people who worked under him, he kept up a constant pressure for top performance.

His professional life was a continuous drive for perfection. Of course he knew that in the massive, fast-moving production of a metropolitan newspaper there could never be absolute perfection. Few persons outside a newspaper office could have any conception of the task. As executive editor, Pete Wellington headed a day-and-night operation in which 12 separate editions roll off the presses every day. It requires assembling and evaluating news ranging from the danger spots of the world to a human interest episode on Charlotte Street. Many stores must be rushed to the copydesk a few lines at a time as they are written. Through the many departments and features the operation covers the full range of human activity.

Pete Wellington presided over this operation with an apparent calm and a constant vigil. In this he worked through many people in Kansas City and in the bureaus at the State capitals and Washington. Far more than most staff members realized, he followed their individual work. He maintained a close association with many of the reporters for the press services and other agencies who covered the world.

To some newcomers, perhaps, his quiet and reserved manner was interpreted as aloofness, which was far from his real nature. Persons who knew him realized that Pete Wellington was deeply concerned for the welfare of all the people in the Star operation. He wanted to hear about individual problems. He recognized that in a large organization talent varies widely and he went to strenuous lengths to find the work that would bring out the best in each person.

In the production of the Star, Mr. Wellington was the man in the background. Of course he was known intimately to a very large number of personal friends. But the city as a whole seldom heard his name. He was an editor, not a writer. He was the man behind the bylines of many fine reporters and thousands of stories. He seldom made speeches and was seldom found in the spotlight. The nerve center of his world ranging news interest was at his own desk.

The Wellington reputation as a perfectionist was made as assistant city editor and city editor, jobs that put him in the closest direct contact with reporters and copy readers. He was known for the high standards of Star style that have become familiar to many newspapers. But his conception of fine writing went much deeper than anything that could be specified in a style book.

Ernest Hemingway credits him with bringing a concept of flexible narrative writing to a profession that was then tied to a cut-and-dried dogma of leads and secondary leads. From afar he could sense the drama of a big story. But in his book the fundamental was absolute integrity of facts. A sloppy piece of reporting called for an item-by-item grilling that many a seasoned newspaperman can remember even to this day.

Wellington was a newspaperman's newspaperman. Through his leadership in national professional associations he had friends in the key posts of hundreds of papers. For him a convention of editors was like old home week. And from the delightful visits with friends he brought home a wide range of ideas.

Friendships were extremely important to the exacting Pete Wellington, friendships and his closely knit family. Those of us at the Star, especially, realize that we have lost an extremely warmhearted and devoted friend. We are confident that the professional standards of excellence set by him have left an imprint on "The Star" that will last for many years.

JUVENILE DELINQUENTS

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. President, the Senate Subcommittee To Investigate Juvenile Delinquency, of which I am chairman, has held hearings in widely separated sections of the country during the past year.

Our job, as defined by Congress, is to visit communities and inquire into local programs and problems in the delinquency field in order to determine the national scope of juvenile misbehavior and suggest areas in which action by the Federal Government may be required.

I might say that we have yet to visit a community in which the presence of our committee was not welcomed by the press, by public officials, by professional personnel working in the delinquency field and by citizens alarmed at the ever-rising tide of juvenile misbehavior and crime.

Examples of this local concern with the national problem of juvenile delinquency are to be seen in two newspaper editorials—one from the New York (N.Y.) Journal-American, entitled "How United States Can Help," and the other from the Wilmington (N.C.) Star, entitled "Juvenile Crime Is Everyone's Business." I ask unanimous consent that these two editorials be printed at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the editorials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

HOW UNITED STATES CAN HELP

The image of rampant juvenile crime, which the Senate Committee on Delinquency saw in its first New York hearing, clearly established that local and State authorities will need Federal help to fight teenage terrorism.

How can the Federal Government help New York City and every other American community plagued by juvenile hoodlumism?

The answer lies in two areas: (1) the allocation of sufficient funds to insure establishment of necessary work camps and detention facilities; (2) enactment of effective

Federal legislation to outlaw the interstate traffic in lethal weapons.

Obviously an action program is needed. Such a program, looking to a utilization of the Federal resources, should embrace:

The process of setting up youth work camps, operated on semimilitary lines, could be greatly speeded up if the Government ceded some of the many camp sites it has available to New York State and local authorities. These camps would permit the authorities to weed out the hard core young hoodlums and remove them from circulation. Thus, more effort could be given to reclaiming the salvageable remaining delinquent groups.

Uniform Federal legislation is necessary to dry up the source of firearms, daggers, stilettos and other dangerous weapons now easily available to teenage killers. New York City, according to Supreme Court Justice John E. Cone, has become the dumping ground of vast shipments of foreign weapons of all types because of loopholes in existing weapons laws.

The United States could cede presently vacant Ellis Island, with its numerous buildings, to the city for use as a boys town. This would provide desperately needed custodial facilities. At present, convicted offenders are frequently sent home because there is no place left for them in corrective institutions.

The war on the international and national traffic in narcotics must be stepped up. As Mayor Wagner pointed out, the tie between narcotics and juvenile crimes becomes stronger each day.

Consideration should be given to enactment of more realistic child labor laws to permit youngsters to work rather than being forced to remain in school for which they have no aptitude or interest.

Undoubtedly, there are many other areas where the Federal Government can be of tremendous help in trying to stamp out juvenile gang terrorism.

The assistance of the Government would ease the strain on local and State finances caused by a mobilization of forces to cope with the outbreak of teenage warfare.

Such an action on the part of the Federal Government would in a way be a repayment of some of the $15 billion which the citizens of New York contribute annually to the U.S. Treasury.

Such funds, if wisely expended, could return enormous dividends by saving some of our presently wayward youths from themselves.

[From the Wilmington (N.C.) Star, Sept. 22, 1959]

JUVENILE CRIME IS EVERYONE'S BUSINESS

A casual observer may think Congress is stepping beyond its bounds in beginning a series of nationwide hearings on juvenile gangs in New York, scene of recent widespread teenage violence, tomorrow.

But that, we believe, is not the case.

Senator THOMAS C. HENNINGS (Democrat of Missouri) chairman of the Senate committee, explained the situation well when he said "this is not a problem unique to New York City. It transcends State and even national boundaries. He cited cities other than New York which have reported youthful violence and added, "The past decade has seen a sharply yearly rise in unprovoked attacks by juveniles, especially of the 'rat-pack' or gang-type assaults."

This committee, if it fulfills its responsibility, will give official recognition to a type of crime that, so far, has been recorded only in police records and the daily newspapers. It deserves that recognition. The problem simply is too large to ignore on the national level. This is a move against terrorism. What Congress can do about it remains to be seen. But this much can be expected from the committee—an overall picture of the ugly situation with possibly definite recommendations for its correction. In fact, it would be far better if Congress did not attempt any legislation but leave that step to the States and localities. After all, this is a local problem and successful solutions may vary in keeping with the peculiarities of the situation.

Meanwhile, it is logical to expect that any community, including Wilmington, may benefit from the congressional findings. At the least, the fact Congress has made this problem its business emphasizes it should be of concern to every law-abiding citizen, here, or elsewhere.

EDUCATION—INVESTMENT IN AMERICA

Mr. HARTKE. Mr. President, the Senate soon will begin debate on legislation affecting our educational system. Much has been said about the educational needs of our Nation. Statistics from my own State of Indiana indicate that Indiana has a serious shortage of classrooms and qualified teachers. This situation exists throughout the Nation. As we begin discussing this problem I would like to call to the attention of my colleagues a good expression of one of the major prevailing viewpoints. This was made in a speech by one of the members of the Indiana delegation to Congress, the Honorable JOHN BRADEMAS of the Third Congressional District. In a speech at the seventh annual National Conference on Federal Legislation of the National Education Association in Washington last month, Congressman BRADEMAS discussed this problem ably and intelligently. It deserves the serious attention of Members of the Senate. It is printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of January 18, 1960, on pages 717–718.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there further morning business?

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, has morning business been concluded?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate is still conducting morning business.

Is there further morning business?

THE BATTLE OF THE BUDGET

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, one of the most important questions facing this country today is whether or not the Federal budget should be balanced. My own unequivocal answer is "Yes." Last week, as a part of a personal campaign to emphasize the need of balancing the budget, I mailed to thousands of Marylanders a questionnaire entitled "The Battle of the Budget." The letter asked each constituent to indicate whether he would increase or decrease the basic items of the Federal budget, estimated for the coming fiscal year at $84 billion. My purpose was twofold: To stimulate a general interest and understanding of how tax funds are spent, and to use the results in my fight to hold back Government spending, for I am confident that the people of Maryland and the entire country understand that if a nation spends more than it has, it risks bankruptcy and disaster.

It has since occurred to me, Mr. President, that a more general dissemination of the questionnaire might be helpful, and so I ask unanimous consent to have "The Battle of the Budget" inserted in the body of the RECORD following my remarks, extending an invitation to everyone who reads it to send his answer to me. It is my firm conviction that this battle is everyone's fight.

There being no objection, the questionnaire was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

JOHN MARSHALL BUTLER PRESENTS THE BATTLE OF THE BUDGET

As a taxpayer who pays—I invite you to join me in the battle of the budget. There is but one rule—the basic law of economics—to avoid economic ruin, keep your expenses within your income. As a nation of individual, if you spend more than you have, you risk bankruptcy and disaster.

Below are the basic budget items and amounts the President recommends be spent to meet our Nation's needs, and yet achieve a balanced Federal budget for the coming year. What items would you decrease or increase?

Basic budget items	President's recommended expenditure in billions	Your suggested expenditure in billions
Defense:
Army	$9.4
Navy	11.7
Air Force	18.6
Missiles ($3,500,000,000 included in the above 3 items)
Office of the Secretary of Defense	1.3
Military assistance to friendly foreign nations	1.8
Atomic energy	2.7
Stockpiling and defense production expansion	.1
Foreign aid	2.2
Space exploration	.6
Commerce and housing:
Public housing and community development	.4
Business aids, regulation, and postal service	1.7
Agriculture:
Price supports	4.0
Other programs	1.6
Natural resources:
River development and public power	1.4
Conservation	.5
Labor and welfare:
Payments to needy and unemployed persons	2.1
School lunch and vocational training programs	.4
Health, education, scientific and medical research	2.1
Veterans benefits	5.5
Interest on public debt of $290,000,000,000 (a "must" item)	9.5	$9.5
General Government expenses	2.0
Allowance for contingencies	.2
(Surplus revenue available for debt or tax reduction)	(4.2)
Total	84.0

To meet these expenditures, the Government is expected to collect about $84 billion in taxes. If the total of your suggested expenditures is not more than $84 billion, you have won the battle of the budget.

But the real victory lies in taxpayers like yourself maintaining a general understanding of how our tax funds are spent. In detail, the Federal budget is incredibly complex. It is more than 1,000 pages long. Congress will require many months of study before deciding upon next year's expenditures. However, this complexity should not discourage taxpayers from a more general interest in budget affairs nor obscure the desperate need for a balanced budget. This is why every American should concern himself with the Federal budget and why I have sent you this letter.

Furthermore, as your Senator, your views on Government spending, high taxes, and inflation as reflected by your suggested expenditures will be of considerable value to me as Congress examines the Federal budget and new spending proposals.

So, may I respectively urge you to join the battle of the budget and return this "scorecard" to me. Remember, every Federal tax dollar is partly your own.

JOHN M. BUTLER,
U.S. Senator, Maryland.

FEDERAL ELECTIONS ACT OF 1959

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there further morning business? If not, morning business is closed, and the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 2436) to revise the Federal election laws, to prevent corrupt practices in Federal elections, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from New York [Mr. KEATING] to the amendment of the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG].

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Mr. President, I should like to modify my amendment on page 1, line 2, by striking out the word "No," and inserting this language:

Except in the cases of elections held to fill vacancies, no.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has a right to modify his amendment.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, will the Senator from Louisiana yield for the purpose of my suggesting the absence of a quorum, without his losing the right to the floor?

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. I do not have the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No Senator has the floor at the present time.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further proceedings under the quorum call be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, I modify my amendment to the amendment of the distinguished Senator from Louisiana in accordance with the memorandum, which I send to the desk and ask to have stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The modified amendment will be stated for the information of the Senate.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

And provided further, That no candidate's nomination in a primary election shall be valid if it shall be determined by a Federal court of competent jurisdiction that any otherwise qualified person was denied the right to register or vote in the primary on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, I have asked that copies of the amendment be placed on the desks of Senators. It is in effect the same as the amendment I offered shortly before we concluded our business on Friday. It effectuates the purposes which I had in mind more accurately, and does follow the language of the 15th amendment in precise terms.

I concede, Mr. President, that my original amendment, which was written on the floor, was inspired by the very moving speech made by the distinguished Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG] in support of his amendment to require all candidates for the Senate and for the House of Representatives to be nominated by a primary. In his speech the Senator spoke very eloquently about the need for extension of the suffrage, in the "great liberal tradition." He described as "undemocratic" any system in which a political convention can reverse the judgment of the people in an election "where everybody had a right to vote," and he concluded with a question, which I should like to quote, "Why should we not guarantee democratic procedures?" I think no one could help being moved by such a stirring appeal as that made by the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. President, I know the deep conviction with which the Senator from Louisiana speaks on this subject. I have only recently reviewed the discussion of the voting problems in Louisiana, which appears in the report of the United States Commission on Civil Rights. I am sure the distinguished and able Senator from Louisiana has also read the report.

I sensed, in listening to the Senator's brilliant advocacy of his amendment, a keen awareness on his part of the problems discussed in the report of the Civil Rights Commission. I interpreted the Senator's amendment as an attempt to deal with these problems wherever they might exist in the Union, including the great State of New York.

In an effort to strengthen the Senator's proposal by the addition of a sanction for violating its proscriptions, I offered my own perfecting amendment. I had hoped the Senator would welcome my amendment but apparently he is not willing to accept it as an amendment to his amendment.

Mr. President, it may be that some Members of the Senate are unaware of the discussion in the report of the Civil Rights Commission which has bestirred this interest in guaranteeing elections under "democratic procedures," to use the words of my distinguished friend from Louisiana.

It seems, according to the report, that there are four parishes in Louisiana in which voting-age Negroes far outnumber voting-age whites. Those are the parishes of East Carroll, Madison, Tensas, and West Feliciana.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. KEATING. I am happy to yield to the Senator.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. I would like to know if the Senator from New York knows that the junior Senator from Louisiana was one to take the attitude in Louisiana that all qualified persons are entitled to vote. In those parishes to which the Senator from New York makes reference, most of the parish officials met and unanimously signed a declaration condemning the junior Senator from Louisiana for his position.

Furthermore, I want the Senator to know what the situation will be under his proposed amendment, assuming that the candidate runs for election and is denied the benefit of having the votes of those people who would otherwise vote for him.

If such a person were successful, notwithstanding the fact that many people who would like to vote for him did not have that privilege, he would nevertheless not have the benefit of being elected, under the Senator's amendment, even though those people would have voted for him had they had the opportunity.

Mr. KEATING. In the first place, in answer to the distinguished Senator, I commend the Senator without reserve for the fine attitude which he took with reference to the revelations in these four parishes. The Senator's reiteration of the right of every qualified voter to vote is highly commendable. I cannot praise him enough for that assertion and the reassertion of it here on the floor today. It is to insure that right that my amendment is proposed.

I cannot see why the amendment would be objectionable, if it will insure what the Senator from Louisiana has so vigorously fought for and as to which he has taken issue with the people in these very parishes.

What the Civil Rights Commission found was that not a single Negro has been registered to vote in any one of these four parishes.

When the Commission attempted to inquire into this situation, what was the result? The Commission was met immediately with a demand from the counsel for the joint legislative committee of the Louisiana Legislature that the Commission disclose the names of the Louisiana citizens who had complained. It seems this State official wanted to restore democratic procedures in Louisiana by presenting the complainants' names to a grand jury so that they could be charged with perjury and duly prosecuted by the Louisiana authorities. Is there any wonder that after an experience like that even as firm a believer in States rights as the Senator from Louisiana calls upon the Federal Government, as he does by his amendment, to protect democratic procedures in elections?

The Civil Rights Commission has thus far been stymied in its efforts to hold public hearings in Louisiana. However, the Commission's field investigations indicated three major tactics of voting denial in Louisiana, which are worth recounting here.

First, an effective bar to Negro registration is the so-called voucher requirement exacted by registrars, under which the registrar requires that each prospective registrant obtain two registered voters to swear to his identity. Since no Negroes are registered in four parishes, and since no white person, with only one exception, indicated in the Commission's report, would vouch for a prospective Negro registrant, prospective registrants are rather effectively discouraged.

The second method is by preliminary questioning on the part of the registrars. This has become very widespread since the initiation of a campaign by the joint legislative committee of the Louisiana Legislature in December 1958 to reduce Negro regstration in Louisiana from 130,000 to 13,000 out of 481,000 eligibles.

A typical tactic in this preliminary examination is to ask the applicant for registration to explain the meaning of the clause in the Louisiana constitution which reads as follows:

> The legislature shall provide by law for change of venue in civil and criminal cases.

That would be rather hard for anyone other than a lawyer to explain, and would be hard for many of the voters in this county to explain.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question at that point?

Mr. KEATING. I ask the Senator to permit me to finish my sentence.

There is another clause about which applicants are asked, according to the report. They are asked to interpret the clause which reads:

> Proscription shall not run against the State in any civil matter.

That, likewise, might be difficult even for lawyers to explain, as a basis for obtaining the right to vote.

I am happy to yield to the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Is the Senator familiar with the fact that the attempt to which he refers, to disenfranchise 126,000 Negroes, occurred about 18 months ago, and continued for a period of 7 or 8 months, and that there are still about 139,000 Negroes registered, notwithstanding the effort by some persons to reduce the number of Negroes registered to 13,000?

Mr. KEATING. As I pointed out, this occurrence took place in December 1958, and I hope the situation has been corrected to some degree since that time. But I shall point out in a moment that in another case representations were made to our committee by the Attorney General of Louisiana—never by the Senator from Louisiana—which were not borne out when further investigation was made. I shall deal with that question in a moment.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. The Senator is talking about reducing the number from 130,000 to 17,000. I suspect he will find that the number registered now is greater than it was at the time to which the Senator refers.

Mr. KEATING. I hope so, because the Commission found that there were 481,000 who were eligible.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. The Senator refers to 481,000 who were eligible. Does he mean that that number are eligible, all factors being considered?

Mr. KEATING. Four hundred and eighty-one thousand were deemed eligible by the Commission on Civil Rights, made up of the six men to whom reference has been made. I am sure the Senator feels, as I do, that they are distinguished citizens.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Can the Senator tell us the percentage of white voters deemed eligible who are registered?

Mr. KEATING. I cannot do that, but I am sure that there is a greater percentage of white eligible voters who do vote than of Negro voters.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. The Senator will concede, will he not, that in Louisiana, and in many other States, a substantial number of white persons eligible to vote simply have not gone to the trouble to register and qualify?

Mr. KEATING. There is no question about it, and it is a national shame. I believe that in our last Presidential election only 60 percent of the eligible voters voted. That is regrettable. There is no question that that is true.

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator from New York yield for a question?

Mr. KEATING. I am happy to yield.

Mr. HENNINGS. Let me say, by way of preface, that no one has been more diligent in the furtherance of a clean elections bill which has as its primary objective reporting, limitations, and full public disclosure of contributions, than has the distinguished Senator from New York.

The able Senator from New York is aware that the Committee on Rules and Administration reported the bill, which has been amended, and which is sought to be further amended.

The bill has as its primary objective the things I have mentioned. The Senator is also aware that for several days last past hearings have been held, which will continue until February 5, on the so-called Federal registrars bill, and that the civil rights issue will be drawn in the Senate on February 15, less than a month hence.

Bearing in mind that all Senators who have supported the registrar bill have a keen interest—indeed, an overriding interest—in the primary purposes of this elections bill, which is a reporting bill, a disclosure bill, and a limitations bill, does the Senator not believe that at this time he could withhold his discussion of civil rights? I think the Senator need have no question as to my views upon that subject. That question could be brought before the Senate in connection with civil rights legislation.

This is not a civil rights bill, any more than I think—most lamentably—the amendment of the Senator from Louisiana to require primaries relates to the two basic issues of the bill.

I believe that the amendment of the Senator from Louisiana is a sweeping measure. Bearing in mind, of course, that democratic government has its foundation in free elections of the people's representatives, I believe that, as a matter of broad principle, any proposal which extends and builds up the application of elections is substantially good.

In the past few days, as I have tried to point out, we have almost reached the point of final passage of the bill. A number of amendments have been offered, many of which have been withdrawn. They were not directed to the subject matter of the pending legislation.

On Friday last the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. CASE] and the Senator from Colorado [Mr. ALLOTT] demonstrated that the adoption of the amendment offered by the Senator from Louisiana would raise innumerable questions as to its effect on various State laws. I do not believe that these issues are so simple as they appear to be on the surface. Neither of the questions now presented was suggested to the committee when the bill was under consideration there.

I am glad the Senator from Louisiana voted for one of the amendments, the so-called reporting amendment, relating to the many committees which it has been possible heretofore to set up within the limits of a State. I think it would be most unfortunate if we should continue the discussion of the bill by constantly offering amendment after amendment which bears no relation, really, to the essence of the bill, any more than to the purposes of the bill.

The Senate has voted, by two record votes, by a very satisfactory majority, that it wants intrastate committees included, and that it wants primaries included—primaries, as defined in the bill, also to include caucuses and conventions.

This is not a bill designed to compel the various States to proceed in a given manner with respect to their own conduct of elections. Now we find ourselves off on the civil rights issue, which I had hoped might be properly debated—and I am sure it will be thoroughly and extensively debated—following the 15th of February.

I make these suggestions, I hope, without presumption, but in all good spirit. If the bill can be voted upon by the Senate as an elections bill, stripped of extraneous matters which do not relate to the heart and soul and purposes of the proposed legislation, we shall all be better off. The other questions could be reached in some other way, at some other time.

I think it is very distressing that, after almost 2 weeks of discussion and voting on various amendments, we should be faced with a situation in which amendment after amendment is offered and debated. I do not mean to say that Senators do not have the right to offer amendments. However, if we are to have a cascade of amendments upon all manner of subjects and questions which could be raised in connection with some phase of an election, we may encounter greater difficulty than I presently anticipate in the House of Representatives. I know that we have very strong support in the House of Representatives for the pending legislation. Many Members of the House have so expressed themselves to me, without any solicitation on my part.

I entreat Senators to bear in mind that this bill is the product of a great deal of work and consideration, and that undertaking to write legislation of this importance on the floor of the Senate is not in the interest of good legislation. We might have another amendment, and another so-called retaliatory amendment offered, ad infinitum, far into the night, far into the week, and far into the Lord only knows where.

Civil rights is one question to be considered. I believe that the question of the States proceeding as they decide to proceed under their electoral procedures is another sort of question. The bill does not set forth electoral procedures. It sets forth reporting procedures. It sets forth limitations, under the amendment which has been adopted; and it sets forth what a candidate may do with respect to his own expenditures, and other matters which are germane.

I recognize that in the Senate no point of germaneness can properly be raised and upheld by the Chair. But I find it very disappointing that we are now going so far afield in connection with all these matters which have not heretofore been considered. We may find ourselves in a state of exceedingly great confusion if we go beyond the point where the essential elements of the bill agreed to by the process of amendments relate only to the strengthening of the 1925 Corrupt Practices Act and the extension of that act. That was my primary purpose in the bill of 1955, the bill of 1957, and the pending bill which was intended to have been acted upon in 1959.

I hope Senators may find it in their judgments and consciences a matter of consideration, if we really wish to pass the basic and fundamental measure which is before the Senate at this time.

I thank the Senator from New York for yielding to me. He has been exceedingly interested in this proposed legislation and has been exceedingly diligent with respect to it. I would say the same certainly of the Senator from Louisiana.

I do not undertake in any way to sit in judgment upon the consciences or the inclinations of Senators with respect to the offering of amendments. That is not my province and not my intention.

I believe the membership of the Senate is ready to vote upon the heart and soul of the pending bill as it now lies before us. We have had amendments proposed relating to extraneous matters, such as labor and various inhibitory and extensive applications of the bill. Many of them have been withdrawn, and I am very grateful to the proponents of those amendments who have done so.

I hope—and I know many other Members of the Senate also hope—that we may, within the confines of free and unlimited debate, as is the right of every Senator, to come to some termination of the proposed legislation before us, and not to wander so far afield that we will be unable to recognize exactly what it is we are trying to say at the end of the period of discussion and the adoption or failure of adoption of the several amendments here proposed. I thank the Senator from New York for yielding to me.

Mr. KEATING. In reply to the rather extensive question of the distinguished Senator from Missouri, I would say that I share to a very great degree the views the Senator has expressed. I recognize a civil rights debate, so-called, will take place on the floor starting February 15.

I said on Friday evening—and I renew the statement now—that I am perfectly willing to withdraw my amendment provided the Senator from Louisiana withdraws his amendment. I do not believe the Senator from Louisiana, when he attempts to impose upon all States a specific method of nominating candidates, is keeping within the primary purpose of the pending bill, which is to place a limit on expenditures in elections and primaries and to provide reporting procedures. That is the essential purpose of the bill.

We now have before us an amendment which provides that every State must hold primaries to select their candidates. A few States do not hold primaries for candidates either for Members of the House or the Senate, or both. All my amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Louisiana provides is that every qualified person shall have the right to vote in the primaries which he wants to require. If we are to require States to hold primaries, then I believe the States should be required to permit all qualified persons to vote.

I differ in one particular with the implications of the Senator from Missouri. My amendment involves a question of civil rights, but it is by no means a civil rights measure. It is only one facet of it. It is one of the protections which we should afford to every qualified voter in this country. It does not open up by any means the whole field of civil rights legislation; it does not guarantee our citizens the equal protection of the laws in many other areas, which, I hope, before this session of Congress adjourns, we will take care of. In light of the fact that the Senator from Louisiana is disinclined to withdraw his amendment and desires to press it, which is entirely his right and privilege, I believe we should deal with the entire implications of this subject.

I have just finished describing the second method used in the State of Louisiana for disenfranchising Negro voters.

The third method of disenfranchising Negroes is by massive challenges under the auspices of the White Citizens Councils.

One of the most common bases for such challenges was alleged errors in spelling on the application forms, although some of the challengers seemed to have a little trouble with their own spelling, since they spelled the word "s-p-i-l-l-i-n-g." These challenges were timed so that it would be impossible to obtain relief in time to vote in the next election.

Mr. President, is it any wonder that the Senator from Louisiana is shocked and dismayed by the absence of democratic procedures in Federal elections? Who can help but be shocked and dismayed by these conditions? I would be shocked and dismayed if any Senator was unshocked and undismayed by such revelations.

Of course, there are some of us in this body to whom the Commission's findings are not exactly revelations. I remember well a colloquy I had with the attorney general of Louisiana in 1957 when he was a witness before the House Committee on the Judiciary, of which I was then a member. He was asked about a purge of thousands of registered Negro voters in Ouachita Parish in Louisiana in 1956 at the behest of the white citizens councils. He assured the committee that this was an isolated incident, expressed his own regret at its occurrence, and in answer to a question from me stated that 99 percent of the persons involved had been restored to the rolls. When these facts were checked by the Assistant Attorney General of the Department of Justice, it was reported to the committee that the purge was widespread, and in specific reference to the situation in Ouachita Parish, that over 3,000 out of a total of 4,000 registered Negroes were prevented from voting in the general elections as a result of the purge. This same attorney general by State law serves as counsel for the State registrars. Is it any wonder these conditions still persist in this State?

Mr. President, now that I have acknowledged the inspiration for my amendment, I want to make it clear that I am perfectly willing to withhold discussion of the problem of democratic procedures in elections until the date of February 15 previously announced for this purpose. If the Senator from Louisiana is unable to restrain his desire for electoral reform until that date, however, then I see no reason for not dealing with the issue he has raised in the most effective way possible and that is all my amendment seeks to do.

There was some talk in this Chamber on Friday of hypocrisy. I do not want to deal with motives in this debate, only with facts. And anyone who will face the facts will admit, first, that the two-party system in New York guarantees greater political choice to the electorate of that State than any direct primary does to the electorate of a one-party State; second, that the elimination of discrimination on account of race and color in elections is the most important step the Congress can take in guaranteeing democratic procedures in Federal elections; third, as indicated by the distinguished Senator from Missouri, that this whole subject is unrelated to the Corrupt Practices Act, which is the pending business; and finally, that, if we are going to have forced primaries in each State of the Union, then we should see to it that every qualified voter is accorded the right to vote in those primaries.

I would be happy to join in the request of the Senator from Louisiana that he withdraw his amendment, so that I may withdraw my own amendment. If he is unwilling to do so, then I shall be forced to ask for a vote on my amendment.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Mr. President, I had prepared a memorandum with regard to the amendment which was offered on the floor on Friday, pointing out several things which demonstrated the complete ridiculousness of it. Some of the obviously ridiculous things in it have now been eliminated.

For example, the amendment offered on Friday would have caused an entire primary election to be invalidated in any of the States which hold them—that does not include New York, but includes 47 other States—if a person had failed to vote because there was a snowstorm. In other words, the amendment of the Senator from New York would have thrown out the entire election because an act of God had prevented someone from going to the polls.

The Senator from New York has now more or less corrected that situation by pinpointing his amendment on the race question, which I assumed he would do over the weekend, once he discovered that he had failed to pinpoint his proposal on the race question. But now he has pinpointed his amendment more on the race issue.

Even so, the memorandum to which I have made reference contains several points which are equally valid to show how ridiculous the proposal of the Senator from New York remains. For example, the Senator from New York had said that if one qualified person had been denied the right to register or to vote, an entire primary election would be thrown out. Now he pinpoints his amendment on race, color, or previous condition of servitude.

The junior Senator from Louisiana has been criticized in a resolution signed by practically every official in every parish in Louisiana where no Negroes are registered because he has said that Negroes have the right to vote. Those officials got together and signed a resolution stating that the junior Senator from Louisiana was not representing his people because he took the attitude that Negroes do have that right.

If an election were held in Louisiana without Negroes voting in those parishes, and if the junior Senator from Louisiana should be elected notwithstanding that fact, and even if it were established that those people would have voted for him had they been accorded the opportunity, nevertheless he would be denied the privilege of having his name on the general election ballot.

Moreover, the amendment of the Senator from New York overlooks the fact that even if we pass a so-called Civil Rights Act providing that the Federal Government should take over the registration and attempt to regulate the procedures thereunder, if the Federal agency might not be successful in seeing to it that every colored person who was qualified had an opportunity to register and to vote. If the Federal registrar should fail to do that, if he should fail to make certain that someone who was entitled to vote was on the rolls, then the entire election would have to be thrown out regardless of how those people voted. The election would be void even if the disenfranchised voter would have voted for the same result as occurred in the election.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. I yield.

Mr. KEATING. The Senator did not mean to imply that there was anything in my amendment about a Federal registrar, did he?

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. No.

Mr. KEATING. My amendment leaves it to a Federal court to determine the question.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Yes; but I have no doubt whatever that when a proposal is offered to set aside State registration procedures in favor of a Federal registrar, the Senator from New York will vote for it.

Mr. KEATING. I have not proposed that we set aside State election machinery. To that I would be opposed. The Federal registrar would supersede the State election machinery in a State election only when the State machinery broke down or failed to function. Only under those circumstances would the Federal registrar function.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. All I am saying is that if the Senator included everything recommended by the Civil Rights Commission, including the so-called Federal registrar proposal, and if the Federal registrar should fail to register someone who was qualified to vote, then the whole election would have to be thrown out, regardless of whom the person might have voted.

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. I yield for a question.

Mr. HENNINGS. With the Senator's indulgence, I should like to refer to both his amendment and to that of the Senator from New York. Irrespective of any attempted influence by the candidate, or by any of his agents or others, under the language of the amendment of the Senator from New York, a man could be nominated, but if one person, otherwise qualified, was denied the right to vote because of his race, color, or previous condition of servitude, the nomination would be invalid. Is that correct?

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. That is correct.

Mr. HENNINGS. That would not be constitutional.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. No; it would not be.

Mr. HENNINGS. Now we come to the Senator's amendment. The Senator is a firm believer in States rights.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HENNINGS. I will yield as soon as I have finished.

Mr. KEATING. The Senator disposes of these things rather cursorily.

Mr. HENNINGS. I do not want to dispose of them cursorily, because obviously there has been no desire to consider these amendments cursorily during the past several days. So I am certain that none of them will be disposed of very quickly.

I do not know whether the amendment offered this morning by the Senator from New York has been changed from his amendment which was under consideration on Friday.

Mr. KEATING. The amendment I offered this morning differs from the one which was offered last week.

Mr. HENNINGS. The one offered today reads:

And provided further, That no candidate's nomination in a primary election shall be valid if it shall be determined by a Federal court of competent jurisdiction—

I presume that could be a Federal district court, sitting in that capacity, irrespective of other appellate jurisdictions, such as the court of appeals and the Supreme Court of the United States, and a judgment by that tribunal of the first instance would, of course, be controlling.

Now we come to the amendment of the Senator from Louisiana. There are various laws in the different States which regulate the process of nomination. Does the Senator from Louisiana believe that we should as a matter of legislative policy reach into the State of Louisiana, for example, and say that Louisiana is not entitled to have runoff primaries? Would the Senator say that one primary election shall be sufficient, and that it shall be determining as to which nominees shall appear on the ballot in the general election?

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. It had never occurred to me that the Federal Government should seek to require primaries by legislation until an amendment was agreed to on the floor of the Senate to regulate primaries.

This is a bill which, in its present form—and the Senator himself was a sponsor of an amendment which made it such—regulates primary elections. It seems to me that it is putting the cart before the horse to try to regulate primary elections without first requiring that primary elections shall be held.

The Senator from Missouri asked about the constitutionality of the Keating amendment. I think most of the difficulty could be corrected by a modifying amendment; therefore, I make no particular point of it. However, article I, section 5, of the Constitution provides:

Each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own Members.

It would be my judgment that that in itself would prohibit a Federal court from taking jurisdiction of a primary election.

Mr. HENNINGS. I thank the Senator for yielding. I simply point out the unfortunate position in which we find ourselves when we try to legislate by amendments offered on the floor of the Senate, and which I am sorry to say seem to bear certain patent defects.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. I shall be willing to vote on the amendment in short order, and then in short order to vote on the amendment I have offered.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Louisiana yield so that I may answer the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. I yield.

Mr. KEATING. The Senator from Missouri rather cursorily said that this amendment is unconstitutional. I should like to know what provision of the Constitution the Senator from Missouri thinks this amendment violates.

It has been drawn to come expressly within the provisions of the 15th amendment.

My reply to the Senator from Louisiana is that it is true that we are the judges of the qualifications of our own Members. We, by this amendment, will continue to be the judges of the qualifications of our Members.

We would, in turn, after such an election had been held, have to apply the amendment to each specific instance. But there is nothing in this amendment, which, in my judgment, violates the provision of the Constitution to which the Senator from Louisiana has referred.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. The Senator from New York will find a number of cases which hold that the courts will not take jurisdiction of election cases, because of the constitutional provision that each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own Members.

Mr. KEATING. That is true. I am familiar with those cases. I served several times on the House of Representatives committee which conducts investigations of elections under the present state of the law. If this amendment were written into the law, in my judgment, the court would then take jurisdiction of only such cases as came within its terms.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. It seems to me that the particular defect of the Senator's amendment could be eliminated by modifications to achieve the same effect. But the earlier studies I have made indicate this his amendment is not subject to correction so long as it is in the form in which it is: First, on the basis that this is an attempt to justify a denial to all people of the right to vote, merely because one person has been denied the right to vote, notwithstanding the fact that that one person might have voted the same way as the prevailing majority, had he had the opportunity to vote.

The 15th amendment itself guarantees to all persons the right to vote. It provides that they shall not be denied the right to vote on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude. By virtue of that provision, the so-called white primaries in the Southern States have been declared unconstitutional. By virtue of that same provision, colored people barred from the rolls have been ordered restored to the rolls. A Federal court in New Orleans, La., recently ordered a number of persons restored to the rolls, after their names had been removed because they had been challenged. This was done on the basis that they had been discriminated against.

In addition to this, the Senator from New York stated on the floor last Friday:

> I am opposed to the amendment submitted by the Senator from Louisiana. I shall vote against that amendment, either with or without the amendment which I have sought to have attached to it.

So does the amendment offered by the Senator from New York represent a sincere attempt to benefit those who might have been discriminated against in the election proceeding. Oh, no. It is not an effort to assure their right to vote. This is apparently merely an attempt to have withdrawn an amendment which would give members of all races, in the most populous States of the Union, the right to choose who their nominees shall be, rather than have them chosen by party machinery, or by politicians of the major parties.

Here is an amendment I have proposed to protect all minorities and all majorities, and give them an opportunity to vote. They have that right, and it is protected by the 15th amendment, to which I have made reference. Furthermore, there is to come before the Senate a civil rights bill, in which attempts will be made to make sure everybody will have an opportunity to vote by sending into certain areas Federal registrars who will see to it that everyone will enjoy the right to register and vote. The Senate will vote on it.

But I say that if we are to regulate primaries, the first thing we should provide for is to make sure that the people have the right to see that a candidate of their choice is selected. Forty-seven out of the fifty States have that system.

We have heard of undemocratic practices in other States. For example, it has been contended that the South Dakota procedure should be permitted. What is that procedure? We are told that if, in an election for Representative, and I assume for Senator, less than 35 percent vote for the leading candidate, that man's name can be taken off the ballot and he can be denied the opportunity for nomination in favor of someone who may have received only 1 percent of the votes.

How would that apply to the great State of Louisiana? We recently had the election of a Governor. The high man received about 33 percent of the votes. The second man received 26 percent. The third man had 19 percent, and so on down. It went down to a number of candidates who had less than 1 percent. If the procedure which is in effect in South Dakota had existed in Louisiana, then the democratic governing body—which is elected by the people, by the way—could have picked any one of those 10 candidates and put him on the ballot as the Democratic nominee, notwithstanding the will of the people as expressed for the high man and the second man.

My amendment does not require second elections or runoffs. The States can use high-man systems if they desire. The amendment I have proposed applies only to Federal officers; it does not apply to State officers. It requires that in Federal elections there shall be an election in primaries if it happens that one of the major parties is involved. I have provided that that does not have to take place if one has received less than 10 percent of the votes in previous elections. I would be willing to provide 20 percent. In some States that may apply to the Democratic Party or Republican Party. Certainly, the Republican Party may in the South get 10 percent, or even 20 or 25 percent. But certainly, insofar as the nomination is concerned, it means one of two persons is going to be selected.

It seems to the junior Senator from Louisiana, and I am sure it seems to others, that the election system should let the people speak for themselves in determining who the candidate shall be.

I believe the amendment I have offered has great merit, because it embodies the way 47 of the States have decided the election should take place. The argument that it is more democratic to select party nominees for the office of Senator or Representative by those who represent the Republican or Democratic Party is completely without reason.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. I yield.

Mr. KEATING. Let me make one minor correction. In the State of New York, candidates for Representatives in the House are now selected in primaries. Candidates for the Senate are chosen at a convention, the delegates to which are elected. There is that distinction. I wanted to clear the record on that point.

The Senator has challenged my statement in which I said that I would vote for this amendment to the amendment, but would vote against the Long amendment, whether or not it had this amendment attached, as a lack—I know he did not mean it as such—of sincerity on my part in offering my amendment to his amendment. I consider that there is no inconsistency whatever in my position. I feel that the effort of the Senator from Louisiana to impose a primary system and to supplant the State legislatures in prescribing how a candidate shall be chosen is an invasion of the rights of the States to determine their own method of electing their public officials.

However, I would say that if that amendment is to be adopted, then really we should provide that every qualified person shall have the right to vote and that none shall be denied the right to vote because of discrimination on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude.

I would vote for that language in a civil rights bill. I think it should be in the law of our land. But I recognize that there are other methods more orderly than this of incorporating such a provision in our law. I am offering it at this time only because, if we are to adopt the Long amendment, then certainly this simple amendment should be added to it.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I seek the floor only for one purpose, of attempting, as a matter of duty, to make it clear that the pending bill is not a civil rights measure. I think the Senator from New York and the Senator from Louisiana have made it clear that in the case of the Senator from Louisiana, he is seeking to make the primary system applicable to all States as long as primaries are going to be regulated by this proposed law. In the case of the Senator from New York, he says that if we are going to make primaries universal, they should be made so to the extent of including the right of everybody to vote in them.

I agree with the junior Senator from New York, and say that I shall vote for his amendment to the amendment, but shall vote against the Long amendment even if the amendment to it should be adopted. I say that because some idea has gotten abroad that a civil rights bill is being attached to the pending bill. I do not believe anyone is looking at this bill as a civil rights bill, nor does anyone have any desire to introduce into this bill the Federal registrars proposal, which I as well as others advocate, to secure the right to vote, in view of the disclosure of the very deplorable conditions which have been set forth by the Civil Rights Commission.

Mr. President, what presents itself is one of the situations we meet in parliamentary experience. Mine is no greater or less than that of other Members, but legislative bodies have a handy way of dealing with this problem.

I will say to my friend from Missouri [Mr. HENNINGS] that I sympathize with him in his effort to have this amendment withdrawn—I, too, would hope to have it withdrawn—but it does not seem probable or even possible. However, I know that the Senate in its wisdom will dispose of this particular matter. I think it would be a great mistake to have the proposal touch a civil rights bill. I think it would be unfair. I think those opposed to civil rights legislation do not consider me a friend of their position, but I think very sincerely it would be unfair to have this civil rights matter touch this bill. I hope it will not happen.

Finally, on the issue of primaries, I will say to my friend from Louisiana, I have no particular preconception of whether a primary system is better than our system in New York. As a matter of fact, as the junior Senator from New York [Mr. KEATING] has pointed out, we do have primaries for Members of the House of Representatives and presidential electors within each congressional district. As a matter of fact, when I ran for office in 1956, at the convention candidates for the House were chosen by primaries in the congressional districts. They are survivors of a primary. Everybody knows what functions they will perform when they are elected. They might even qualify within the definition of the Senator's amendment, if our legislature chose to call such processes primaries.

Nevertheless, laying that point aside, I think what the Senator from Missouri is trying to do, because of varying State laws or the question of morality in parts of the country, due to the problem of contributions, is to have the Congress do its duty according to article I, section 4 of the Constitution, and to amend or alter regulations otherwise made by the States.

I respectfully submit to my colleagues that on the issue of universal primaries no such case has been made. Therefore, no matter how we may feel about States rights, we are responsible. Sixty percent of us in this body are lawyers. We do not want to go into an area where there has been no proof, no demonstrable case made, that the Federal Government should impose its power.

I can understand the logician's position in terms of what we passed, and now of what the Senator from Louisiana says we should add to it. That same logic extends, with the greatest sincerity, to my very distinguished and learned colleague from New York.

All of this leads me to two propositions. First, no case has been made with respect to Federal intervention in respect to ordering universal primaries. Secondly, I do not think it is to the interest of anybody—and it is certainly not to the interest of the country—to have this matter touch off the civil rights debate.

Mr. PASTORE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JAVITS. I yield.

Mr. PASTORE. Does the Senator not think a service would be done in regard to the clean elections bill if both amendments were withdrawn?

Mr. JAVITS. I said that earlier, before my dear friend, with whom I have had many spirited debates on this subject, came into the Chamber. I said exactly that. I think all of us have in a way agreed on that.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, I join the Senator from Missouri, the Senator from Rhode Island, and other Senators in expressing the hope that both of the proposed amendments will be withdrawn.

First, I should like to address myself for a moment to the position taken by my learned friends from New York, the gist of which is that theirs is not a civil rights amendment. We know perfectly well that this amendment is not addressed to the general elections because it is sought to be limited to the primaries. That means, of course, it is limited to the States in which the primaries are the elections.

I have not heard any expression of passion upon the part of my friends as to protecting the civil rights of even the lowliest single voter in their State in the general elections. It is rather evident that the Senators are adopting a procedure which is well known on the floor of the Senate, as well as in military life, which is that the best defense is a good offense. They have evidently taken over that position in offering the amendment.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, will my distinguished friend yield to me on that point?

Mr. HOLLAND. I am glad to yield.

Mr. KEATING. I think the Senator is entitled to an explanation as to why the amendment is limited to primaries. That is the limitation in the amendment of the Senator from Louisiana, to which this is an amendment. In other words, the amendment of the Senator from Louisiana relates only to primaries, and therefore this amendment also is so limited.

I would of course contend that the same rule should apply in general elections as in primaries, but the injection of the primaries into the picture was not the work of the Senator from New York, but was the work of the Senator from Louisiana, whose amendment is drawn only to that point.

In the light of what has been said here, I renew my complete willingness to withdraw my amendment provided the Senator from Louisiana is willing to withdraw his.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, if we are to take at face value the statement of my learned friend from New York—and I am sure we shall—it means that if his amendment is agreed to and is attached to the amendment as it relates to primaries, he will immediately offer an amendment, if he is to be logical, which will apply to general elections. I am sure the Senator is going to be logical, because the Senator from New York is always logical, and I compliment him upon that fact.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, will my friend yield on that point?

Mr. HOLLAND. I yield.

Mr. KEATING. I appreciate those fine compliments. They are what I would expect from the generous Senator from Florida. However, I think it would be very illogical at this point, as has been indicated, to go further into the civil rights field.

The junior Senator from New York never stated that this particular amendment did not relate to civil rights. It does relate to civil rights. I say that affirmatively. However, it is limited only to the confines of the amendment of the Senator from Louisiana. I shall not offer such an amendment in regard to the bill, nor do I think it would be appropriate in regard to this proposed legislation to deal with civil rights generally or civil rights in general elections.

So, logical or illogical, I shall not do that, much as I contend that the same rules which apply in primaries should apply in general elections.

I think the proper time to deal with the subject of general elections is on or about February 15, when we consider the bill dealing with civil rights.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, if I correctly understand, this bill does deal with general elections. The primary matter was injected on the floor. My learned friend must admit, I think, since he now states that the same degree of protection in the civil rights field should be allowed with reference to general elections as is allowed in the case of primary elections, if he is going to be logical at all that we must assume that if his amendment is agreed to and if the amendment of the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG] as amended is agreed to, it would then be his very clear duty to offer the same amendment as applicable to the general elections.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, will my friend yield to me?

Mr. HOLLAND. I yield gladly.

Mr. KEATING. I appreciate the effort of my good friend and generous colleague to point out my duties in this regard. Advice from him is always welcome. He is sound. He is constructive. He is, I believe, my good friend, and I really sincerely appreciate his guidance. But I shall not offer an amendment relating to general elections. I do not consider I am violating my duty in that regard. I do not think that we should get into a general civil rights debate on this particular bill. I think it would be harmful to what the Senator from Missouri is seeking to accomplish, and what many of the rest of us are seeking to accomplish.

I think so long as we have before us the Long amendment we are more or less required to assure that all the people have an equal opportunity to vote in the primaries he seeks to force on us all over the country.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, I appreciate the kind remarks of the Senator from New York. I think it becomes increasingly apparent that the Senator is following the tactic which is always permissible, that the best defense is a stern offense. I say that he is a good strategist and a good tactician.

Mr. PASTORE rose.

Mr. HOLLAND. Did the Senator from Rhode Island wish to have me yield?

Mr. PASTORE. I should like to ask a question of the distinguished Senator from New York, through the distinguished Senator from Florida, if I may.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may be allowed to yield to the Senator from Rhode Island without losing my right to the floor, in order that the Senator may address a question to the Senator from New York, and that the Senator from New York may answer.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Florida? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. PASTORE. Do I correctly understand that in any case where we have the process of the primary, if in one instance an individual were to be denied the right to cast a ballot in the primary because of race, color, or previous condition of servitude, immediately the candidate himself would lose the nomination?

Mr. KEATING. In the event that such was determined by a Federal court, the candidate who was nominated would be held to have been invalidly nominated.

The question has been raised in the debate whether this body or the other body would have a further opportunity to pass on that question. I believe under the terms of the Constitution they would. If that person sought his seat again, we would vote on that in one of the bodies.

However, this amendment would apply to one person being denied the right to vote. If that is considered to be too stringent, I would be perfectly willing to accept any reasonable amendment which the Senator from Rhode Island would care to suggest. The number suggested in the report of the Civil Rights Commission, for some reason, was 9. I do not know why the Commission picked the number 9. Perhaps it should be 9, or 2, or 3, or some other number.

The wording here, in all candor, would apply if one person were found by the court to have been denied the right to vote on that ground.

Mr. PASTORE. I desire to make a further point.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, I yield further.

Mr. PASTORE. This is a negative way of approaching a very important subject. The Senator from Rhode Island wants it clearly understood that under ordinary circumstances he would be in favor of voting for civil rights, as the distinguished Senator from New York well knows.

Mr. KEATING. I am well aware of that, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. PASTORE. But I could not possibly in good conscience vote for an amendment such as this. First of all, it is unduly punitive as against an individual—a candidate—who exercises no discretion one way or the other, and who can be completely without fault.

Let us assume that we have a primary system in the State of New York, which of course we do not have, but which we do have in Rhode Island.

Mr. KEATING. We have some primaries in New York.

Mr. PASTORE. I know, but they are not held for the office of Senator.

Mr. KEATING. No.

Mr. PASTORE. Let us assume that the distinguished Senator has gotten together the proper number of qualified signatures and has become eligible as a candidate, and a well-qualified candidate in the primary. If some one individual in some precinct in New York is denied the right to vote because of his race, does the Senator think the candidate ought to lose the nomination because of that fact? That is what the amendment would provide.

Mr. KEATING. That is correct.

Mr. PASTORE. It seems to me in order to cure one little injustice we would be doing a tremendously greater injustice.

Mr. KEATING. As I have said, it may be the number should be enlarged. I debated whether we should use the figure of "nine" instead of "one," or some other figure. My conclusion was that the amendment would then be attacked on the theory that we were allowing a little discrimination but did not want any widespread discrimination. I do not stand for that principle.

However, if it would be helpful to the adoption of the amendment to change "any qualified person" to "two or more" or "five or more" or "nine or more," I would say that would have my approval.

Mr. PASTORE. That is not the objection I have. The objection is made to the principle, not to the number.

I think a man who is a candidate and who deports himself honorably and does not do anything to encourage the denial of the right to vote to an individual because of race, color, or previous condition of servitude should not be punished because such denial occurs.

I would be against the incident occurring at all, as the Senator well knows, but one thing which I do not like in regard to the amendment is that it might be characterized as being a frivolous one. I am not getting into the question of motives at all. I know how the Senator from New York feels about civil rights. When the Senator is ready to fight for civil rights he will have the Senator from Rhode Island standing by him shoulder to shoulder to fight for the same cause. But I do not think we should do anything which might label our cause as a frivolous one. I am afraid that is what this amendment would do.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, I know that the Senator from Rhode Island is a stanch supporter of meaningful civil rights legislation. My amendment is offered, and must be read, in conjunction with the amendment offered by the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG], which seeks to impose primaries on every State of the Union. If we are to have them, it is my conviction that everyone qualified should have the right to vote, and not be denied the right to vote because of race, color, or previous condition of servitude.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, is the Senator from New York through making his response?

Mr. KEATING. I am through.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, the Senator from Rhode Island has entered upon a subject which I was about to discuss briefly, but I thank him for having started so well to discuss it. I wish to go a little further into it.

There are several lawyers in this body who have had experience in election contest cases. I know a little about them myself.

I know that one of the fundamental rules in election contest cases is that one must show that a sufficient number of persons were deprived of the right to vote to have changed the result of the election. Furthermore, in my State, one must show that if they had not been deprived of the right to vote, they would have voted in a way which would have changed the result of the election. I think that is rather fundamental law, generally accepted all over the Nation, because it would be extremely idle for a court to go into an election contest in which the contest was over such a handful of votes that it could not possibly have changed the result of the election.

Let us go to the State of New York, for example, which has primaries in connection with elections to the House of Representatives. Under the terms of the pending amendment, if it should become law, a candidate in the Republican primary in a certain congressional district who had a majority of 30,000 over his opponent could be eliminated by the disqualification of 1 voter, as found by the court, regardless of whether that voter would have voted for the candidate who won or for the candidate who lost. On the very face of it, that situation shows how completely unsound, from any practical legal standpoint, this amendment would be.

I do not believe that we need to blame anyone for that fact, but I think we can all see that this amendment is based upon the understandable desire of our friend the Senator from New York, who was nominated without benefit of primary, to offer a sterling defense to the amendment of the Senator from Louisiana by offering a good offense against it—whether sound or not, a good sturdy offense against it.

I hope the amendment of the distinguished Senator from New York will not be favorably received, because on the very face of it, if adopted, it would put the Senate in a rather ridiculous position, in view of the established law in connection with election contests, and in view of the absence of any requirement in the amendment that a sufficient number of persons must have been disqualified to have changed the result of the election, and that if they had been allowed to vote they would have voted in such a way as to have actually changed the result.

I do not expect to speak again on this question. I wish to make it clear that although I greatly sympathize with the Senator from Louisiana in offering his amendment because I feel, as he does, that it was very unwise to bring primaries into the bill, and I shall vote against the bill because that amendment has been brought in, I think he would be asking those of us who have very sturdily opposed the inclusion of primaries and the inclusion of Federal control over State and county political committees to reverse ourselves and run at high speed in the opposite direction by taking the position that we would force States which, in their own judgment, in part or in whole—in the case of New York it has been only in part—have not adopted the primary system, to adopt such a system.

I soberly and seriously request both Senators to withdraw these amendments, so that we may get on with the vote on the bill. Let me make it very clear that I shall not vote for the bill with the provision now engrafted upon it on the floor of the Senate, after a committee headed by the distinguished Senator from Missouri [Mr. HENNINGS] had decided otherwise in committee, and after the bill had been reported as applicable to general elections alone. Because of the forensic eloquence of the Senator from Missouri, and for other reasons beyond my comprehension, the committee has reversed itself and the Senate has reversed the committee. All I can say, in the most friendly way, is that the Senator from Missouri has proved to be a vastly more powerful leader on the floor of the Senate than he was able to be in his committee, because his committee did not make this particular elections bill applicable to primaries.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for the purpose of allowing me to defend the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. HOLLAND. I yield.

Mr. KEATING. The vote in the committee, I point out, was 5 to 4. So the vote in the committee was very close. Personally I am delighted that the Senate agreed with the 4 rather than with the 5. But the vote in the committee was by no means one-sided.

Mr. HOLLAND. I understand that the Senator barely lost in his committee, by a vote of 5 to 4, and that on the floor of the Senate he prevailed by a vote of 50 to 39.

The point I am making is still the same. The Senator from Missouri has been very much more effective on the floor of the Senate than he was in the committee. I bow to his effectiveness, eloquence, and persuasiveness, and to his ability to get done the job of inclusion of the primary amendments on the floor of the Senate, though I very seriously question the wisdom of that course, not only with reference to the philosophy of including the primary elections, but also with reference to the opportunity to obtain beneficial legislation which is needed.

I am one of those who believe that we must modernize the Corrupt Practices Act, and make it realistic, and that it is in the interest of all the public that that be done. I believe all of us can now see how hopeless it is to expect the House to take up and pass a bill with primaries included.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. President, first I wish to express my appreciation on behalf of those who are especially interested in this proposed legislation. Some of us have been at this task for 7 long years.

I would be the first to disclaim that the result of the vote in connection with the primary amendment was due to any superior ability of my own, or any forensic attributes.

As the Senator from Florida has well indicated, we lawyers have a phrase in the trial of cases which applies to arguments. As we know, argument before a jury must be predicated only upon the evidence. However, if counsel on one side or the other goes beyond the evidence, in many States and many jurisdictions the courts have held that retaliatory argument is permissible, even though it goes beyond the bounds of the evidence, and may even be improper argument.

I do not wish in any respect to condemn anyone. I think it would be flagellating a dead horse to say that I am for civil rights. I happen to have been chairman of the subcommittee which held hearings for 3 months last year. I am now chairman of a committee which is holding hearings in connection with Federal registrar legislation.

The statement may be made that a vote for or against this amendment is a vote for or against civil rights. Of course, it has no bearing upon civil rights legislation. In my judgment, with all due respect, and with kindness and appreciation to my friends from New York, it has no bearing upon the essential purposes of this legislation, and, indeed, might tend to jeopardize its effectiveness and its ultimate enactment by the House of Representatives.

I am not especially sanguine about what the House may do, nor am I discouraged. I have read many editorials and pronouncements by learned soothsayers and clairvoyants, to the effect that the primary amendment, the amendment relating to the requirement that all committees in a State must report what they receive and spend, and the amendment relating to individual contributions, were all doomed to failure and defeat. I do not hold that view. I believe that the people of the country, through this legislation, will have an increased sense of reliance upon the integrity and the wisdom of this body.

I believe that the votes taken in the Senate were not the result, as the Senator from Florida has very graciously suggested, of any ability or talent which I have, and which I often feel I indeed lack. I believe that the Senate reflected the will of the country.

There has been a great deal of labor in connection with this bill, and in connection with successive bills which I have undertaken to present, and which have been reported to the Senate, in 1955, 1957, and again in 1959.

As we stand on this floor, we are being judged by the country and by our people, as to the extent to which we want to do the right thing, and the extent to which we are willing to regulate ourselves—indeed, the extent to which we are willing to have the spotlight of merciless publicity shine with respect to what goes on behind the scenes.

Let me say, parenthetically, that it is my conviction that one of the reasons why only 60 percent of the American people entitled to vote in the country do vote is that they feel that politics is a dirty business, that it is none of their business, and that the big boys in the backroom handle the money bags and control the nominations and, indeed, the elections.

Many a voter has said to me—and I daresay has said to other Members of this body as well—"What is the use of my voting? My vote does not count for anything." I believe that passing the pending bill will send word to the people of the country that their votes will count for something and that their modest contributions will mean something.

There are those who contribute large amounts of money. Money in itself is not an evil thing, but money controlled in secret by subterranean methods and by devious means, which are resorted to by many candidates who would like to be honest, must be dealt with, so that the American people will be encouraged to a fuller and more complete participation in our great system of Government by the people, and so that we may continue to live under a republican form of government as expressed by the will of the people.

We have heard it said often in the Senate, "Why do we not stand up and be counted on these matters," and thereby not give anyone an opportunity to say, "Oh, well, I did not vote for the clean, full-disclosure elections bill because I did not like this amendment or that amendment, which had something to do with civil rights or caucuses or conventions."

There are many escape hatches in these matters. It has been asked why we keep these means of egress available to those who would for one reason or another not like to face up to these questions. I do not indicate any lack of sincerity on their part or any lack of integrity on the part of those who believe we should revert to the essence of the Corrupt Practices Act of 1925, except that we should raise the limitations on expenditures to more realistic figures.

At a time when America occupies a position of great importance in the world and in the preservation of free institutions, indeed a position of primacy in the free world, as Mr. Churchill once said in one of his great addresses, "With primacy goes responsibility."

Therefore, Mr. President, I hope that the Senate will assume its responsibility and speak upon these issues in a clear and unmistakable voice, so the country may know that the Senate has done its duty as it sees it. I am not disturbed by discussions about whether the House will vote for the primary provision of the pending bill, any more than I am disturbed—as many have been disturbed—by the many Cassandras and prophets of disaster, who have said this cannot possibly work, or that cannot possibly happen, or cannot be done.

Mr. President, it can be done. I believe that by the grace of the people of America and the Senate and the House, acting in the fullest measure in their capacity as the elected representatives of the people, it will be done. I know of no reason that we should not face up to this problem, and I hope the Senate will reject the amendments and come forth with a bill which embodies those things upon which the Senate has come to agreement, and not be diverted day after day by motions which, in my opinion, after many years of work and study of election contests do not relate to the business at hand. I say that after having been on the subcommittee for 6 years and chairman of it for 3 years, and having had great experience with the subject matter of the bill.

Mr. President, here we are with an opportunity to do something. I hope we will not be profligate and destroy the opportunity by beclouding the issue and cluttering up the bill, and thereby possibly leading to its ultimate defeat because a number of Senators for the first time have presented certain amendments. It would be a great tragedy if that were to happen, and a great reflection upon the Senate.

The other matters will be dealt with properly at another time by the Senate, and dealt with under the proper legislative scheduling.

I have nothing further to say about the amendments, except to express the hope that we may proceed to a conclusion of the consideration of the proposed legislation and keep it intact, insofar as we can, as an elections reporting and elections limitation measure.

VISIT TO THE SENATE BY THE AMBASSADOR OF VENEZUELA AND MEMBERS OF THE CHAMBER OF DEPUTIES OF VENEZUELA

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, a number of us who are members of the Senate Subcommittee on Latin-American Affairs had the privilege and pleasure of visiting our sister Republic of Venezuela during the period of the congressional adjournment. We had the opportunity to visit the Parliament of Venezuela and the pleasure of lunching with the President of Venezuela and his Cabinet. We came away from Venezuela convinced that we ought to increase parliamentary exchanges between the Congress of the United States and the parliaments of Latin America.

Today we are honored to have as our guests on the floor of the Senate men who have the privileges of the floor under our parliamentary procedure. First, I wish to introduce a man known to us, the distinguished Ambassador from Venezuela, who is a very able representative of his country, the Honorable Dr. Marcus Falcon-Briceno. [Applause, Senators rising.]

We also have with us three Members of the Chamber of Deputies of the Venezuelan Parliament. We have with us the whip of the Chamber of Deputies. Under their procedure he is known as the Republican Democratic whip of the Venezuelan House, Dr. Juan B. Moretti. [Applause, Senators rising.]

We also have with us another Member of the Chamber of Deputies, Dr. Hens Silva Torres, Republican Democratic Union Member of the Chamber of Deputies of Venezuela. [Applause, Senators rising.]

We also have with us a great educator and author in the field of labor relations, Dr. Aristides Calvani, Social Christian Party Member of the Chamber of Deputies of Venezuela.

[Applause, Senators rising.]

Mr. MORSE. I should like to say that I am particularly honored and privileged to be able to introduce these three members of the House of Deputies of Venezuela because they are all professors, as well as politicians. This shows that "eggheads" have their place in Venezuela as well as in the United States. I am particularly honored to be able to invite these three great educators from Venezuela to the Senate, both in their capacities as members of the Chamber of Deputies of Venezuela and in their capacities as great teachers.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, we certainly concur in the felicitous sentiments expressed by the distinguished Senator from Oregon, and we join in extending the hand of welcome and fellowship to this distinguished delegation from our sister Republic in Latin America.

The more often these exchanges take place, the more frequently we put into effect the people-to-people relations, and the greater the understanding between our countries.

Venezuela means much to the United States, and the United States means much to Venezuela. The exchanges of products and commodities in which they are interested and in which we are interested mean, of course, that there ought to be closer ties and closer associations. So I join my distinguished friend from Oregon in extending the hand of welcome to this distinguished delegation.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, I join with the Senator from Oregon and the Senator from Illinois in welcoming our guests from Venezuela to the Senate Chamber. It was my privilege in November to be a guest of our Venezuelan friends in their own country. During my visit my admiration for the people of Venezuela, the officials of the Venezuelan Government, and for the way they do business, was greatly enhanced.

It has been said that the three visitors from Venezuela today are all professors and are also Members of the Chamber of Deputies. I learned in Venezuela that not only the Members of the Chamber of Deputies, but members of the Cabinet, as well, teach classes in the university. I think it might perhaps be a good idea to apply that rule to the Members of the Senate. But I warn Senators that the classes in the university start at 7 o'clock in the morning. I am not certain how many volunteers we would get among our own Members to rise and start teaching at 7 o'clock in the morning, and then, after the classes were finished, to do the work of the Senate.

We certainly are very glad to have our friends from Venezuela visit us. As the Senator from Illinois has said, it is only through the exchanges of visits and getting acquainted with one another that we can understand and solve our problems satisfactorily. I hope the visit by our friends from Venezuela will be the first of many such visits which they and legislators from other countries will make to us in the United States.

FEDERAL ELECTIONS ACT OF 1959

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 2436) to revise the Federal election laws, to prevent corrupt practices in Federal elections, and for other purposes.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, I am considerably impressed by the argument advanced by the distinguished Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. PASTORE] about the stringent nature of the pending amendment. As I explained in answer to his inquiry, it was debatable in my mind whether the nomination of a candidate should be invalidated by a finding of a Federal court that a qualified person had been denied the right to register or to vote in a primary because of race, color, or previous condition of servitude.

I concluded at the time that the charge might well be leveled that the amendment permitted a certain amount of discrimination, and provided that a few persons could be denied the right to vote on this ground, but not very many. I felt that that was permitting a small amount of discrimination and could be criticized as indicating a lack of conformity with the principles for which the author of the amendment has always stood.

The discussion, however, has convinced me that it would add to the merit of the amendment, and would probably result in support of it by a larger number of Senators if the words in the fourth line of the amendment were changed from the present words, "that any otherwise qualified person was denied the right," to "that otherwise qualified persons have been systematically denied the right," and I so modify my amendment.

I send the amendment to the desk as a modification of the previous amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated for the information of the Senate.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. Mr. KEATING further modifies his amendment to read as follows:

And provided further, That no candidate's nomination in a primary election shall be valid if it shall be determined by a Federal court of competent jurisdiction that otherwise qualified persons have been systematically denied the right to register or vote in the primary on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, I refer the Senate to the report of the Civil Rights Commission, which indicates many areas where there has been such a systematic denial of the right to register or vote. Under my modification the nomination of any person will not be held invalid unless there is systematic discrimination within the State affected. So far as I am concerned, I am ready to vote on the amendment to the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment, as modified, of the Senator from New York to the amendment of the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG].

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MUSKIE in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from New York [Mr. KEATING] to the amendment of the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG]. [Putting the question.]

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I think the distinguished Senator from New York [Mr. KEATING] would like to have a division on this amendment.

I ask for a division.

On a division, the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG].

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, I do not see the minority leader [Mr. DIRKSEN]. Does the majority whip [Mr. MANSFIELD] know whether it is agreeable to the minority leader to withdraw the call for a quorum?

Mr. MANSFIELD. I do not know, but I imagine it would be, because it was agreeable to him on the last amendment, and I imagine it would be on this, too. I have had no word that he would object.

Mr. JAVITS. May we continue for about 30 seconds?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state that debate is not in order during a quorum call.

Mr. JAVITS. Will the clerk be kind enough to continue?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will proceed with the call of the roll.

The call of the roll was resumed.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG].

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is open to further amendment.

Mr. YARBOROUGH. Mr. President, I call up my amendment, which is printed and identified as "1-20-60—A."

First I modify my amendment, on page 1, line 4, by inserting the word "second" after the word "no"; striking out the word "reports" and inserting in lieu thereof the word "report"; and inserting the word "on" after the word "report"; and, in line 7, by striking out the word "reports" and inserting in lieu thereof the word "report"; and by striking out the word "for" and inserting in lieu thereof the word "before."

I ask that the clerk read the amendment as modified.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment offered by the Senator from Texas, as modified, will be read.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. It is proposed, on page 8, line 20, after the word "date" to insert a semicolon and the following: "except that where a candidate in order to qualify for the general election must run in two successive primaries in one party no second report on the first primary will be required for those candidates participating in the second primary if reports filed for the second primary are cumulative and supplementary of the report filed before the first primary".

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Texas yield for a question?

Mr. YARBOROUGH. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. HENNINGS. In order to undertake to try to clarify just what the able Senator from Texas has in mind, I should like to inquire whether he has accepted the suggestion that, in line 4, there be no requirement for a second report on the first primary. Is that the effect of the modification made by the interlineation?

Mr. YARBOROUGH. Yes. The suggestion of the senior Senator from Missouri has been accepted, and the proposed amendment, as read by the clerk, has been accepted by me as a sponsor of the amendment, and that is the form in which the amendment is now offered.

Mr. HENNINGS. That was my understanding. I thank the Senator.

Do I correctly understand that the Senator's amendment refers to a situation where the State provides for a runoff primary and where the second primary takes place on the 43d day after the first primary or within a shorter period of time?

Mr. YARBOROUGH. Yes. The purpose of this amendment is to cover those States which have two primaries and where less than 40 days elapse between the first primary and the second primary. I believe that is the situation in every State in the American Union which has a second primary.

Under the bill which is now pending before the Senate there is a provision requiring the accurate reporting of expenditures, which in the case of the first primary must be filed 40 days afterward.

Mr. HENNINGS. That is correct.

Mr. YARBOROUGH. In case there is a second primary, the provision requires that the report be complete as of the 10th day next preceding the date of the election and as of the 40th day following such election. So under the bill as drawn, without the amendment, there would be a conflict. There would be a period of time which would be covered by three different reports. The candidate filing the reports, and those who contributed for him, would be in peril as to the report which carried the contributions.

The purpose of the amendment is to remove the conflict and the hiatus, and not to require a final report covering the same period of time for both the first primary and the second primary.

Mr. HENNINGS. I should like to ask the Senator one or two other questions.

Is it the sole purpose of the amendment to drop, under the circumstances, the report due on the 40th day after the first primary, when a second primary is held?

Mr. YARBOROUGH. Yes.

Mr. HENNINGS. And the amendment does not otherwise affect any reporting dates fixed by the bill?

Mr. YARBOROUGH. That is the purpose of it. It would not otherwise affect the requirements of the main bill, but it would drop the requirement for the report after the first primary, because no State in the American Union has a second primary which is not as close as 40 days to the first primary.

Mr. HENNINGS. Precisely. With the Senator's indulgence, Mr. President, I believe the junior Senator from Texas has made a very meritorious suggestion. I think it would improve the reporting provisions of the bill, as to the States in which there are two primaries. It would indeed seem to be a hardship on a successful candidate of a first primary to file an overlapping report, in effect, on a runoff primary. Am I correct in that statement?

Mr. YARBOROUGH. That is correct.

Mr. HENNINGS. By this change, Mr. President, the disclosure provisions of the bill will be only enhanced and improved upon, because the data will thereafter appear in a consolidated form.

Therefore, Mr. President, I for one shall vote for the amendment of the Senator from Texas, and I ask other Senators to do likewise.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to ask a question?

Mr. YARBOROUGH. I yield.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. What would be the situation where the runoff is settled in a convention?

Mr. YARBOROUGH. This amendment does not apply to conventions. This amendment applies to States which have two primaries.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I understand that is true of this amendment, but since the primary amendment relates to either primaries or conventions the reporting requirements apply to either one.

Mr. YARBOROUGH. It is my understanding that the reporting requirements apply to the conventions as well as to the primaries.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. We have the same problem with respect to the time element for the convention, when the runoff is taken care of by the convention. I raise the question to make the suggestion to the able Senator from Missouri that the staff might give study to the matter, and, if some modification needs to be worked, when the bill goes to conference with the other House some language can be developed to fit the situation.

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. YARBOROUGH. I yield.

Mr. HENNINGS. I thank the able Senator from South Dakota for his observation. I am sure that will be done.

This would not apply at present to caucuses or conventions. I think that matter bears study.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. A similar problem could arise.

Mr. HENNINGS. The problem could arise.

Mr. YARBOROUGH. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished Senator from Missouri for his acceptance of the amendment. With such a thorough understanding of the amendment it was natural the Senator would accept it.

By removing the requirement for conflicting reporting we will clarify the bill, and make it more workable, I believe.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Texas [Mr. YARBOROUGH], as modified.

The amendment, as modified, was agreed to.

Mr. YARBOROUGH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point a list of the States which have the first and second primaries, the runoff primaries, since that list will clarify the discussion of the amendment.

There being no objection, the list was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PRESIDENTIAL AND CONGRESSIONAL PRIMARIES BY STATES

Alabama: May 3; runoff, May 29.
Florida: May 3; runoff, May 24.
Idaho: June 7; runoff, June 28.
Louisiana: August 27; runoff, October 1.
Mississippi: August 23; runoff, September 13.
North Carolina: May 28; runoff, June 25.
Oklahoma: July 5; runoff, July 26.
South Carolina: June 14; runoff, June 28.
Texas: May 7; runoff, June 4.
Virginia: July 12; runoff, August 16.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, I call up my amendments 1-13-60—F and ask unanimous consent that the amendments be printed in the RECORD, rather than read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Tennessee? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. KEFAUVER's amendments are as follows:

On page 2, in the table of contents, after "SEC. 304. Publication or distribution of election materials" insert the following:

"TITLE IV—INCOME TAX CREDIT OR DEDUCTION FOR POLITICAL CONTRIBUTIONS

"SEC. 401. Income Tax Credit.

"SEC. 402. Income Tax Deduction."

On page 2, in the table of contents, retitle "Title IV" as "Title V"; renumber "Sec. 401" to "Sec. 501" and amend it to read:

"SEC. 501. Effective dates of titles I–III"; and add a new section 502 to the table of contents, as follows:

"SEC. 502. Effective date of title IV."

On page 19, between lines 7 and 8 insert the following:

"TITLE IV—INCOME TAX CREDIT OR DEDUCTION FOR POLITICAL CONTRIBUTIONS

"Income tax credit

"SEC. 401. (a) Part IV of subchapter A of chapter 1 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (relating to credits against tax) is amended by renumbering section 38 as 39, and by inserting after section 37 the following new section:

"'SEC. 38. Contribution to Candidates for Elective Federal Office.

"'(a) GENERAL RULE.—There shall be allowed to an individual, as a credit against the tax imposed by this chapter for the taxable year, an amount equal to one-half of the political contributions (as defined in subsection (c)) payment of which is made by such individual within the taxable year.

"'(b) LIMITATIONS.—

"'(1) AMOUNT.—The credit allowed by subsection (a) shall not exceed $10 for any taxable year.

"'(2) APPLICATION WITH OTHER CREDITS.—The credit allowed by subsection (a) shall not exceed the amount of the tax imposed by this chapter for the taxable year reduced by the sum of the credits allowable under section 33 (relating to foreign tax credit), section 34 (relating to credit for dividends received by individuals), section 35 (relating to partially tax exempt interest), and section 37 (relating to retirement income).

"'(3) VERIFICATION.—The credit allowed by subsection (a) shall be allowed, with respect to any political contribution, only if such political contribution is verified in such manner as the Secretary or his delegate shall prescribe by regulations.

"'(c) DEFINITION OF POLITICAL CONTRIBUTION.—For purposes of this section, the term "political contribution" means a contribution or gift to—

"'(1) an individual whose name is presented for election as President of the United States, Vice President of the United States, an elector for President or Vice President of the United States, a Member of the Senate, or a Member of the House of Representatives (including a Delegate to the House of Representatives) in a general or special election, in a primary election, or in a convention of a political party, for use by such individual to further his candidacy for any such office; or

"'(2) a committee acting in behalf of an individual or individuals described in paragraph (1), for use by such committee to further the candidacy of such individual or individuals.

"'(d) ELECTION TO TAKE DEDUCTION IN LIEU OF CREDIT.—This section shall not apply in the case of any taxpayer who, for the taxable year, elects to take the deduction provided by section 217 (relating to deduction for contributions to candidates for elective Federal office). Such election shall be made in such manner and at such time as the Secretary or his delegate shall prescribe by regulations.

"'(e) CROSS REFERENCE.—

"'For disallowance of credit to estates and trust, see section 642(a)(4).'

"(b) The table of sections to part IV of subchapter A of chapter 1 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 is amended by striking out

"'SEC. 38. Overpayments of tax.'

and inserting in lieu thereof

"'SEC. 38. Contributions to candidates for elective Federal office.

"'SEC. 39. Overpayments of tax.'

"(c) Section 642(a) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (relating to credits against tax for estates and trusts) is amended by adding at the end thereof a new paragraph as follows:

"'(4) POLITICAL CONTRIBUTIONS.—An estate or trust shall not be allowed the credit against tax for political contributions to candidates for elective Federal office provided by section 38.'

"Income tax deduction

"SEC. 402. (a) Part VII of subchapter B of chapter 1 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (relating to additional itemized deductions for individuals) is amended by renumbering section 217 as 218, and by inserting after section 216 the following new section:

"'SEC. 217. Contributions to candidates for elective Federal office.

"'(a) ALLOWANCE OF DEDUCTION.—In the case of an individual, there shall be allowed as a deduction any political contribution (as defined in subsection (c)) payment of which is made by such individual within the taxable year.

"'(b) LIMITATIONS.—

"'(1) AMOUNT.—The deduction under subsection (a) shall not exceed $100 for any taxable year.

"'(2) VERIFICATION.—The deduction under subsection (a) shall be allowed, with respect to any political contribution, only if such political contribution is verified in such manner as the Secretary or his delegate shall prescribe by regulations.

"'(c) DEFINITION OF POLITICAL CONTRIBUTION.—For purposes of this section, the term "political contribution" means a contribution or gift to—

"'(1) an individual whose name is presented for election as President of the United States, Vice President of the United States, an elector for President or Vice President of the United States, a Member of the Senate, or a Member of the House of Representatives (including a Delegate to the House of Representatives) in a general or special election, in a primary election, or in a convention of a political party, for use by such individual to further his candidacy for any such office; or

"'(2) a committee acting in behalf of an individual or individuals described in paragraph (1), for use by such committee to further the candidacy of such individual or individuals.

"'(d) ELECTION TO TAKE CREDIT IN LIEU OF DEDUCTION.—This section shall not apply in the case of any taxpayer who, for the taxable year, elects to take the credit against tax provided by section 38 (relating to credit against tax for contributions to candidates for elective Federal office). Such election shall be made in such manner and at such time as the Secretary or his delegate shall prescribe by regulations.

"'CROSS REFERENCE.—

"For disallowance of deduction to estates and trusts, see section 642(i).'

"(b) The table of sections to part VII of subchapter B of chapter 1 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 is amended by striking out

"'Sec. 217. Cross references.'

and inserting in lieu thereof

"'Sec. 217. Contributions to candidates for elective Federal office.

"'Sec. 218. Cross references.'

"(c) Section 642 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (relating to special rules for credits and deductions for estates and trusts) is amended by redesignating subsection (i) as subsection (j) and by inserting after subsection (h) a new subsection as follows:

"'(i) POLITICAL CONTRIBUTIONS.—An estate or trust shall not be allowed the deduction for contributions to candidates for elective Federal office provided by section 217.'"

On page 19, line 8, renumber title IV as title V.

On page 19, line 10, renumber section 401 as section 501.

"SEC. 502. The amendments made by title IV shall apply only to taxable years ending on or after the date of the enactment of this Act, but only with respect to contributions or gifts made on or after such date."

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLARK] and the distinguished Senator from Oregon [Mr. NEUBERGER] have similar amendments pending, with the same purpose in mind as the amendments which I have called up. The Senators have stated to me that they will not call up their amendments, but that they join in support of and in cosponsorship of the amendments now before the Senate. I thank the Senators for their consideration, for their help, and for their support of the amendments.

Mr. President, these amendments would add a new title and would amend the Internal Revenue Code to provide for an income-tax credit of up to $10 or an income-tax deduction of up to $100 for contributions to political campaigns.

This provision is not new. It is identical with title IV of S. 2150 of the 85th Congress, which was favorably reported by the Committee on Rules and Administration, but which, unfortunately, was permitted to die on the Senate Calendar. I do not know whether the income-tax provisions were omitted from S. 2436, as reported, through oversight or design, but I believe they constitute one of the most valuable features which has been suggested in connection with improving our election laws.

Of course, the basic purpose of my amendments is to encourage small contributions to political campaigns and to discourage reliance upon large contributions. If adopted, they will greatly broaden the base of financial support for persons seeking Federal office. Naturally, this would increase the interest of the people in Federal elections.

Although the amendments look rather complicated, they are, in fact, rather simple in basic structure: Every taxpayer will be given a choice of a tax credit of not more than $10 or a tax deduction of not more than $100, but not both. To get the maximum tax credit of $10, contributions of at least $20 would have to be made, as the credit is given for only one-half the amount of contributions; this feature would appeal to the smaller contributors and especially to those in the lower tax bracket. Larger contributors, and especially those in higher brackets, would probably elect the $100 deduction, rather than the credit. However, both alternatives are designed to increase the numbers of those contributing to political campaigns and to reduce the necessary present reliance of candidates upon "big money" contributors.

The effect of this amendment would be that the Federal Government would pay part of the cost of campaigns—I stress the phrase "part of." This provision does not go as far as some would like in having the Government underwrite our Federal election costs. It does go part way. If incorporated in the bill, it will make our democracy more democratic and our federally elected officials less dependent on a relative handful of big contributors.

Mr. President, there are two matters concerning the amendment which I wish to reemphasize. First, only one credit or one deduction in any taxable year will be allowed. If Taxpayer Smith contributed to a Presidential or congressional campaign he could get only one credit of $10 or one deduction of $100. He could not make a contribution to a number of campaigns and get a separate credit for each one of them.

The second point is that this proposal is applicable only as set forth in the "definition of a political contribution," namely to—

> An individual whose name is presented for election as President of the United States, Vice President of the United States, an elector for President or Vice President of the United States, a Member of the Senate, or a Member of the House of Representatives (including a Delegate to the House of Representatives).

This does not apply, it will thus be seen, to campaigns for State or local office.

Frequently we hear reports with respect to large contributions, and the necessity for a greater interest in elections and campaigns, through a system which would make it possible for people of small means to make small contributions. This plan is being tried now—and I believe successfully—in the States of Minnesota and California, where deductions are allowed.

I have been asked several questions as to what the cost might be to the Treasury if this amendment were adopted. Frankly, I will say that it is quite impossible to estimate the cost, with any degree of accuracy. I do not know how many contributors there would be to national election campaigns for President, Vice President, the Senate, and the House of Representatives. I suppose a figure of 2 million contributors might be high. If we assume 2 million contributors, all of whom contribute at least $20, and all of whom elect to take a $10 tax credit, that would amount to $20 million. If many of the contributors were in the higher tax brackets, and if they elected to take a deduction of $100, that would mean that they would be getting a reduction of, say, $50 in their income tax—depending of course on many variables in their tax bill. In any event, I believe that the money spent would be very much worth while from the standpoint of cleaner elections and a greater interest in elections.

Many years ago Theodore Roosevelt advocated that the Federal Government take care of most of the cost of elections. Other students of politics and government have made similar recommendations. This proposal is only a small step forward, but I think it would be very helpful in broadening the base of contributions, and in relieving candidates from the necessity of being forced to rely so heavily upon very large contributions.

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KEFAUVER. I am very happy to yield to my distinguished colleague.

Mr. HENNINGS. I am very much in sympathy with the philosophy and general principles which the able and distinguished Senator from Tennessee has embodied in his amendment.

The Senator will remember, of course, that the provision granting tax deductions for political contributions was a part of the bill which I introduced, and which was reported to the Senate in 1957.

Mr. KEFAUVER. As I stated a little while ago, my amendment is a verbatim restatement of the Senator's proposal.

Mr. HENNINGS. The reason why I left it out, or did not undertake to offer the provision as an amendment to be incorporated in the pending bill, was, among other things, that there had been some question about whether such a provision should originate in the Senate, or whether it must originate in the House, it being a matter relating to the revenue. But I believe that the Senator's amendment would be a step in the right direction.

Although the general subject matter may require further study, we all know that at present a relatively small percentage of our total population contributes to political campaigns. Certainly it would be very desirable to broaden the base of political financing, and let smaller contributions take the place of large amounts contributed by a relatively few people.

I think we must hopefully look forward to the time when financing campaigns will be a part of the important business of every citizen.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, I appreciate the remarks of the distinguished Senator from Missouri, who has made such an outstanding record of achievement in guiding this bill through the legislative process. I hope that, in line with his thinking with respect to the tax provision, he will accept my amendment.

As to the constitutionality, or the question whether this proposal involves the raising of revenue and should originate in the House of Representatives, the distinguished Senator from Oregon [Mr. NEUBERGER] has a lengthy brief on that question, a copy of which I have seen.

Mr. HENNINGS. I would not raise that question at this time. We are now down to the final amendment. I am not acting in any spirit of haste, or of suggesting any lack of consideration. I believe that the Senator's amendment might properly go to conference, and there be disposed of. I ask that that action be taken.

Mr. BYRD of Virginia. Mr. President——

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. President, the distinguished Senator from Virginia has some observations in this connection.

Mr. BYRD of Virginia. Mr. President, I point out that this amendment has not received consideration by any committee. I was informed on the floor the other day by the chairman of the committee, the Senator from Missouri [Mr. HENNINGS], that it had not been brought up in the committee, and had not received the consideration of the committee.

Nor has it received the consideration of the Committee on Finance. The rules of the House specifically provide that revenue amendments may be offered only to revenue bills. That is the policy which has been followed in the Senate.

There is no estimate of loss of revenue. The Treasury has not been consulted with respect to this proposal. I can see some merit in an amendment of this character, but I do not believe that we should now enact a new deduction which might apply to 2 million, 3 million, 5 million, or 10 million people. No one knows to how many people it would apply. The loss might be far greater than the Senator from Tennessee has suggested.

Two methods of making deductions are provided. One is a credit of $10; or second, in lieu of that credit, a deduction of $100. If the taxpayer should be in the 50-percent bracket, that would mean a savings of $50.

I believe that the amendment is loosely drawn as to the various committees which could receive this fund, and the deduction allowed the donor. The language on page 6, line 13, is:

> (2) a committee acting in behalf of an individual or individuals described in paragraph (1), for use by such committee to further the candidacy of such individual or individuals.

There are hundreds of political committees. There are committees in the precincts, in the counties, in the cities, and in the States. In addition, there are national committees.

I submit that the clause relating to where the contributions can be made, and the provision relating to tax deductions, are very loosely drawn and could be greatly abused.

Let me say to the Senator from Tennessee that the Senate Committee on Finance would be glad to give full consideration to this proposal, should it be taken up in an orderly way, namely, by amending a revenue bill which had already passed the House, but I shall have to protest against the adoption of this amendment now, even though the chairman of the committee is willing to take it to conference.

I hope very much that the amendment will be defeated.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Mr. President, I wish to emphasize what my senior colleague from Virginia has said about a tax amendment on any bill originating in the Senate. It was my privilege to serve for 10 years on the House Ways and Means Committee, and I believe I know pretty well the attitude of that committee about any tax provision coming from the Senate. If it is a straight tax bill, it will not even be taken from the Speaker's desk. If the proposal is a part of some other bill, it is referred to the tax committee, where either it is eliminated or the bill is not considered at all.

The Constitution gives to the House the exclusive right to originate tax legislation, and the House is very jealous in preserving that constitutional right. It even goes beyond that point, and, by virtue of precedent, the House initiates all regular appropriation bills. There is no provision in the Constitution to that effect, but the House has originated such measures for a number of years, and the Senate has concurred. That custom is pretty well fixed.

From my personal standpoint, any amendment which would assure defeat of the bill in the House would be pleasing to me. I had intended to support the bill as it came from the committee. However, I believe that the States have done a good job in regulating their own primaries. I do not see anything to be gained, and much to be lost, by injecting Federal control into our primaries. Therefore I do not intend to support the bill.

I wish to make it clear that the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Finance has put us on notice that the House will not accept a tax provision in any bill which comes from the Senate, because we do not have constitutional jurisdiction to originate tax measures.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I support the amendment of the able Senator from Tennessee, and commend him for offering it. I am delighted that my good friend from Missouri is prepared to take it to conference.

The evil at which we seek to strike through this bill is the use of big money to influence elections and to influence the actions of successful candidates after they take office.

As the bill originally came from the committee, it did nothing to strike at that evil. Through the able, persistent, and patient efforts of the chairman of the committee, the distinguished Senator from Missouri [Mr. HENNINGS], the bill has been molded into such form that it will make a measurable contribution toward banishing the evil of big money in Federal elections.

Mr. President, there is no Senator who does not know that elections cost money. They cost great sums of money, and they cost more money every day. It is unfortunate, but it is true. In my judgment, the cost of elections should be, and one day will be, curtailed by requiring those who have a license to use the airways to give free television and free radio time for political purposes during election campaigns. We are not ready to require that yet. However, if we are to take the big money out of elections, we must put small money in its place. We have had campaigns of "Dollars for Democrats" and our friends on the other side, I know, have had campaigns to get contributions from Republicans in small amounts.

There does not seem to be the necessary incentive to get the amounts of little money which are needed to compensate for the cost of elections and make it unnecessary to get the big money which will buy, in many instances, the result of the election, and unduly influence the actions of a candidate after he takes office.

The amendment of the Senator from Tennessee would be an inducement for little money to come in and take the place of the big money. This, in my judgment, is the way to make a real contribution toward correcting the present evil.

It has been said that the Senate has no right to add a so-called tax amendment to an election bill. I shall be followed by the distinguished junior Senator from Oregon [Mr. NEUBERGER], who has had considerable research made on this subject, and who, I am sure, will convince those who will carefully listen to his argument, that the constitutional objection is not sound.

It has also been said that the House will not accept an amendment which deals with tax matters, if it is initiated in the Senate. I yield to no man in my respect for the other body. However, I believe we have a primary obligation to uphold the constitutional rights and powers and duties of the Senate.

If we think it wise to adopt this amendment, I do not believe we should take the position that the other body will not go along, and that, therefore, we should not act. I do not have the slightest doubt, if the pending amendment is adopted and the bill is taken to conference, that the able chairman, the Senator from Missouri [Mr. HENNINGS] will do his best to see to it that it is kept in the final bill. I have too much regard for the integrity and the desire to maintain the constitutional principles of every Member of the House than to believe that they would attempt to usurp a constitutional right or authority which is not theirs.

Again I commend the distinguished Senator from Tennessee for offering his amendment and the distinguished Senator from Missouri for approving it. I am happy to have the opportunity to join them. I again commend the distinguished Senator from Missouri, who knows more about the bill than all the rest of us put together, for his willingness to take the amendment to conference.

Mr. NEUBERGER. Mr. President, I thank my distinguished friend from Pennsylvania for what he has said about the argument I will make on the subject of the Constitution of the United States. I wish it were within my capacity to make a brilliant argument about the Constitution. Suffice to say that I have taken up this matter with the Legislative Reference Service of the Library of Congress, and I have received from them a memorandum on the subject under date of July 21, 1959. I shall ask unanimous consent that it appear in full in the RECORD, but first I should like to read one paragraph from it:

Four cases have been cited by Dr. Corwin in support of his position that bills for purposes other than raising revenue, which incidentally create revenue, are not included in the limitation placed upon Senate action by clause 1, section 7, article I.

I ask unanimous consent that the memorandum furnished to me by the Legislative Reference Service be printed in full in the RECORD at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the memorandum was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE LIBRARY OF CONGRESS,
Washington, D.C., July 21, 1959.

To: Hon. RICHARD L. NEUBERGER.
From: American Law Division.
Subject: When a proposal affecting revenue is incidental to the legislation to which it is attached, it can be initiated in the Senate.

You ask whether the title IV which you propose to submit as an amendment to the Senate's Federal elections bill is open to a point of order on the ground it would constitute the origination of a revenue bill in violation of the Constitution, article I, section 7:

"All bills for raising revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives; but the Senate may propose or concur with amendments as on other bills."

Your inquiry is carefully limited to the proposition that "if a proposal affecting revenue is incidental to the legislation to which it is attached, it can be initiated in the Senate."

Dr. Corwin, writing in the Constitution of the United States Annotated (1953), says that: "Only bills to levy taxes in the strict sense of the word are comprehended by the phrase 'all bills for raising revenue'; bills for other purposes, which incidentally create revenue, are not included." For this statement he cites "Story on the Constitution," volume I, section 880. Justice Story illustrates his point as follows: "No one supposes that a bill to sell any of the public lands, or to sell public stock, is a bill to raise revenue, in the sense of the Constitution. Much less would a bill be so deemed which merely regulated the value of foreign or domestic coins, or authorized a discharge of insolvent debtors upon assignments of their estates to the United States, giving a priority of payment to the United States in cases of insolvency, although all of them might incidentally bring revenue into the Treasury."

Four cases have been cited by Dr. Corwin in support of his position that bills for purposes other than raising revenue, which incidentally create revenue, are not included in the limitation placed upon Senate action by clause 1, section 7, article I.

In Twin City v. Nebraska, 167 U.S. 196 (1896), it was argued that section 41 of the National Banking Act of 1864 (R.S. sec. 5214) imposing taxes upon the average amount of notes in circulation of a banking association, was a revenue law. And because the section had originated in the Senate as an amendment to the bill passed by the House, the tax was unconstitutional and void.

Mr. Justice Harlan, speaking for the Court, said:

"It is sufficient in the present case to say that an act of Congress providing a national currency secured by a pledge of bonds of the United States, and which in the furtherance of that object, and also to meet the expenses attending the execution of the act, imposed a tax on the notes in circulation of the banking associations organized under the statute, is clearly not a revenue bill which the Constitution declares must originate in the House of Representatives.

"Mr. Justice Story has well said that the practical construction of the Constitution and the history of the origin of the constitutional provision in question proves that revenue bills are those that levy taxes in the strict sense of the word, and are not bills for other purposes which may incidentally create revenue. (1 Story on Constitution sec. 880.) The main purpose that Congress had in view was to provide a national currency based upon U.S. bonds, and to that end it was deemed wise to impose the tax in question. The tax was a means for effectually accomplishing the great object of giving to the people a currency that would rest, primarily, upon the honor of the United States, and be available in every part of the country. There was no purpose by the act or by any of its provisions to raise revenue to be applied in meeting the expenses or obligations of the Government."

In Millard v. Roberts (202 U.S. 429), the Court held, on the authority of Twin City Bank case, that the acts of Congress of February 12, 1901 (31 Stat. 767, 774), and February 28, 1903 (32 Stat. 909), for eliminating grade crossings of railways, and erection of a union station in the District of Columbia, were not unconstitutional as bills for raising revenue which originated in the Senate, by virtue of provisions for the taxation of property in the District of Columbia to pay the cost. "Whatever taxes are imposed are but means to the purposes provided by the act."

In Flint v. Stone Tracy Co. (220 U.S. 107), the "corporation tax cases," the constitutionality of section 38 of the Payne-Aldrich Tariff Act of August 5, 1909 (36 Stat. c. 6, 11, 112–117), was challenged as originating in the Senate in violation of clause 1, section 7, article I of the Constitution. But Mr. Justice Day, speaking for the Court, said:

"The tariff bill, of which the section under consideration is a part, originated in the House of Representatives and was there a general bill for the collection of revenue. As originally introduced, it contained a plan of inheritance taxation. In the Senate the proposed tax was removed from the bill, and the corporation tax, in a measure, substituted therefor. The bill having properly originated in the House, we perceive no reason in the constitutional provision relied upon why it may not be amended in the Senate in the manner which it was in this case. The amendment was germane to the subject matter of the bill and not beyond the power of the Senate to propose" (cit. supra, p. 143).

Rainey v. United States (232 U.S. 310), came to the Supreme Court on writs of error. It was contended that error was committed in not deciding that section 37 of the Tariff Act of 1909 was not void "as it is a bill for raising revenue, and it originated in the Senate and not in the House of Representatives, in contravention of article I, section 7, of the Constitution of the United States." To dispose of this point the Supreme Court adopted and approved the following declaration of the court below:

"I am also satisfied that the section in question is not void as a bill for raising revenue originating in the Senate and not in the House of Representatives. It appears that the section was proposed by the Senate as an amendment to a bill for raising revenue which originated in the House. That is sufficient having become an enrolled and duly authenticated act of Congress, it is not for this Court to determine whether the amendment was or was not outside the purposes of the original bill" (cit. supra, p. 317).

Mr. NEUBERGER. Mr. President, greater minds than mine by far will undoubtedly argue the point when the bill reaches the House, and also when it reaches conference. However, I have sought expressions of opinion on this issue from the leaders of our two great political parties, and on July 31 I addressed identical letters to Mr. Paul M. Butler, chairman of the Democratic National Committee, and to our colleague, the Senator from Kentucky, THRUSTON B. MORTON, chairman of the Republican National Committee. I asked their opinion on the proposal to provide a $10 tax credit for political contributions, so that contributions by average citizens of relatively small or modest means to support the parties or candidates of their choice may be encouraged.

On August 12, 1959, I received a reply from Mr. Paul Butler, chairman of the Democratic National Committee. I shall not read the letter in full, but Mr. Butler stated his support of either allowing a taxpayer to deduct $100 from his income tax, or to take a $10 tax credit from the tax which he pays to the Treasury.

Our colleague the Senator from Kentucky, the Honorable THRUSTON MORTON, chairman of the Republican National Committee, said he was opposed to a tax credit, and said so in no uncertain terms. However, in concluding the letter to me, he said as follows:

It would be my suggestion that we explore the possibilities of allowing a modest campaign contribution to a political party or candidate to be treated as a charitable deduction, as now treated under the Internal Revenue Code.

In other words, Mr. President, here we have the national political leaders of both our great major parties on record in favor of some form of the proposal submitted by the distinguished Senator from Tennessee [Mr. KEFAUVER], and accepted by the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Rules and Administration, who had managed the bill with such distinction on the floor of the Senate. The chairman of the Democratic National Committee has endorsed either a $100 tax deduction of a $10 tax credit. The chairman of the Republican National Committee has suggested that we explore the possibility of a tax deduction to be treated in much the same manner as charitable deductions are treated, in an effort to encourage wider dissemination of financial support to the great political parties of this country and to the men and women running for office.

I should like to say that this proposal is somewhat in the general vein and theme of that voiced in 1907 by President Theodore Roosevelt. In that bygone day, before radio and television costs were added to the cost of running for office, he cited the need for liberating candidates from the yoke of excessive expenditures for campaign purposes. He further proposed that the Federal Government underwrite campaigns for the Presidency and for the Senate and for the House of Representatives.

If we adopt the amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee, as the Senator from Missouri has forthrightly suggested we do, we will be putting into law, at least as proposed by the Senate, the living reality of Theodore Roosevelt's proposal to use modest sums in the Federal Treasury to encourage men and women everywhere in America, whether they be rich or poor, to contribute financially to the support of those who seek to represent them in government.

I ask unanimous consent that my letters to the Honorable Paul M. Butler, chairman of the Democratic National Committee, and to the Honorable THRUSTON B. MORTON, chairman of the Republican National Committee, and the reply of Mr. Butler of August 12, 1959, and the reply of Mr. MORTON of August 11, 1959, be printed in the RECORD at this point as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the correspondence was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

JULY 31, 1959.

Hon. PAUL M. BUTLER,
Chairman, Democratic National Committee, Washington, D.C.

DEAR PAUL: During the 1956–57 hearings on political activities, lobbying and campaign contributions conducted by Senator MCCLELLAN, you indicated your support for enactment of an amendment to the Internal Revenue Code which would provide a tax credit of up to $10 for political contributions, to encourage participation by individuals in political activity and broaden the base of financial support for political candidates, thus leaving them less indebted to "fat cats."

I have long felt that such an amendment would be an excellent idea. In 1956 I offered legislation to accomplish this. I plan to resubmit my proposal again this year.

I would greatly appreciate it if you could provide me with a statement of your views on the desirability of implementing the idea of a tax credit. Endorsement by you as chairman of the Democratic National Committee would be most helpful in development of enthusiasm in this plan, which has drawn the support of many thoughtful students of government—including yourself—in the past. I have also written to THRUSTON MORTON in a similar vein. It seems to me that this is a reform which both parties should support.

With best wishes, I am,
Sincerely,

RICHARD L. NEUBERGER,
U.S. Senator.

DEMOCRATIC NATIONAL COMMITTEE,
Washington, D.C., August 12, 1959.

Hon. RICHARD L. NEUBERGER,
U.S. Senate,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR DICK: Thank you for your letter requesting my views on your proposed amendment to the Internal Revenue Code to provide a tax credit of up to $10 for political contributions.

As you know, I have strongly advocated and supported all efforts to broaden the case of contributions to our political parties. This includes the national drive by the American Heritage Foundation in cooperation with the advertising council conducted in the 1956 presidential campaign to encourage small contributions from ordinary citizens. I am hopeful this drive will be conducted again this year.

Also, I have supported bills introduced in the 85th Congress to encourage political contributions by taxpayers by allowing them to deduct contributions of up to $100 to political parties or candidates, or, in the alternative, to allow an outright tax credit for political donations of up to $10.

Your proposed amendment would encourage ordinary citizens to contribute to the political party of their choice. It has my wholehearted support, since I firmly believe that an appeal to individuals for small contributions is the healthiest way to raise money for our political parties in a democracy.

I wish you success in your efforts.

With warm personal regards, I am,
Sincerely,

PAUL M. BUTLER.

JULY 31, 1959.

Hon. THRUSTON B. MORTON,
Chairman, Republican National Committee, U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR THRUSTON: During the 1956–57 hearings on political activities, lobbying and campaign contributions conducted by Senator MCCLELLAN, the then chairman of the Republican National Committee, Leonard Hall, indicated that he favored in principle some form of tax incentive to encourage participation by individuals in political activity and broaden the base of financial support for political candidates. Paul Butler, chairman of the Democratic National Committee, expressed a similar view.

I have long believed that amendment of the Internal Revenue Code to provide a tax credit of up to $10 for political contributions would be a highly beneficial thing in aiding us to reach the two goals cited above. In 1956 I offered legislation to accomplish this. I plan to resubmit my proposal, as an amendment to appropriate legislation, again this year.

I would greatly appreciate it if you could inform me of your views, as national chairman, on the desirability of implementing the idea of a tax credit. Endorsement in principle of the credit—which, unlike the deduction, treats all taxpayers alike—would be most helpful in development of enthusiasm for the plan, which has drawn the support of many thoughtful students of government. I have also written Paul Butler in a similar vein. It seems to me that this is a reform which both parties should support.

With best wishes, I am,
Sincerely,

RICHARD L. NEUBERGER,
U.S. Senator.

REPUBLICAN NATIONAL COMMITTEE,
Washington, D.C., August 10, 1959.

The Honorable RICHARD L. NEUBERGER,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR DICK: This is in response to your letter of July 31, dealing with political campaign contributions. You specifically asked my comments concerning an amendment to the Internal Revenue Code to provide a tax credit of up to $10 for political contributions.

First, let me say that I am wholeheartedly in favor of encouraging participation by individuals in political activity and broadening the base of financial support for political parties and candidates. I have read the testimony given by my predecessor, the Honorable Leonard Hall, in 1956 before a special committee to investigate campaign expenditures in the House of Representatives. This committee was created pursuant to House Resolution 483, 84th Congress. Hearings took place on December 17, 18, and 19, 1956.

As to your specific suggestion, I do not believe that a political contribution, even limited to $10, should be treated as a direct tax credit. Were it so treated, I don't think it would generate individual interest in political activity. Almost anyone would be willing to sign a paper and transfer $10 of his tax payment to the political party of his choice. It seems to me that this would result in merely transferring the cost of political campaigns to the Federal Treasury. Both major political parties, through State and local committees, could raise all the money they would ever need from this source, especially if employers were required to put in a checkoff or payroll deduction system. Furthermore, if such a plan were adopted, the Red Cross, the Cancer Fund, the Community Chest, the Heart Fund, and others would soon be asking for the same treatment. I think that charitable gifts should embody some sacrifice on the part of the giver, and the same theory should apply to political contributions. I think if the individual has some vested interest in the party of his choice, such as a modest contribution, he will take a greater interest in political activity and more effectively discharge the responsibilities of citizenship.

It would be my suggestion that we explore the possibilities of allowing a modest campaign contribution to a political party or candidate to be treated as a charitable deduction, as now treated under the Internal Revenue Code.

Best wishes.
Sincerely,

THRUSTON B. MORTON.

Mr. NEUBERGER. In conclusion, I wish to say that here we have the leaders of both of our great political parties on record as being sympathetic to one form or another of the proposal contained in the amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. JAVITS. I wish to express my agreement with the Senator. When I was a member of the Committee on Rules and Administration, I had the honor to vote with the chairman on the proposal for the reasons which have already been cited. I shall support the amendment.

Mr. NEUBERGER. We welcome the support of the distinguished Senator.

Mr. GRUENING. Mr. President, I rise in support of the amendment presented by the senior Senator from Tennessee. I commend him highly for it, and I associate myself with the very lucid explanation which the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLARK] has made and with the additional explanation which has been brought to our attention by my friend, the Senator from Oregon [Mr. NEUBERGER].

We are dealing with a very important amendment. It would accomplish a great deal. I shall not waste the time of the Senate to amplify what has already been said by my friend from Pennsylvania. However, I am hopeful that the Senate will vote to adopt the amendment.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I take it that after a tax return has been prepared under the amendment and after the taxpayer has made a certification that he has contributed $100, for example, in the form required by the Internal Revenue Service, he makes the deduction. It seems to me that under that kind of operation what is actually happening is that the Federal Government is supporting a national campaign, whether on one side of the aisle or on the other.

If we are going that far and take that first step, why not give serious consideration to the bill which has been here for some time, and have the Federal Government, through a direct appropriation, appropriate the expenses of any political campaign?

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Not at this point.

The other point I should like to mention is this: The amendment contains a definition of political contribution as follows:

For purposes of this section, the term political contribution means a contribution or gift to an individual whose name is presented for election as President of the United States, Vice President of the United States, an elector for President or Vice President of the United States, a Member of the Senate, or a Member of the House of Representatives (including a Delegate to the House of Representatives).

Mr. President, the Communist Party has not yet been outlawed in the United States, so far as I know, and they can get on the ballot if they desire. Therefore, a man could make a deduction from his income tax and, if he likes, and if that is his disposition, he could support a Communist candidate for the Presidency.

That, in my judgment, becomes an anomaly, if I have ever seen one—the idea of snitching money owed to Uncle Sam, only because Congress says so in a bill, in support of a candidate who under normal circumstances, whether by violence or otherwise, would seek to undo and to modify or even destroy, our whole system of government. I simply cannot understand that idea.

Mr. CLARK. I may say, in response to the first question asked by the Senator from Illinois, that the reason we do not want at this time to go all the way toward having the Federal Government pay the entire cost of an election is that we are sincerely interested in balancing the budget. We would like to have a surplus available to pay on the reduction of the national debt. We would not want to impose this entire cost on Uncle Sam. We do think a modest contribution from the taxes of the small taxpayer might well be credited against a desire to make a little money available for tax purposes to help us run clean elections.

The second comment of the Senator from Illinois, about the Communist Party, is certainly not worthy of any reply.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, it will be only a little while until the Senator from Pennsylvania, probably with others, will raise his voice in this Chamber for all sorts of causes which require money. It will be said, "Oh, it is only a little for aid to education; for juvenile delinquency"; for this, that, and the other purpose.

If we are going to be consistent, why spend a little money upon a political campaign, when money is in short supply, so far as the Treasury is concerned, and we can use conveniently every nickel which the revenue statutes will produce for causes which are infinitely more worthy.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. MORTON. I merely wish to emphasize the point which the Senator from Illinois has made, namely, that this proposal would, in fact, transfer, in my opinion, to the Federal Treasury the cost of our political campaigns. If this amendment were adopted, there would be no trouble even about getting a check-off system among large employers, so that they could deduct $10 from the wages of all employees and withhold it from them. The money thus deducted from the wages of each employee could be transferred to the treasury of the political party of his choice.

Under the statutory limit at present I think the three national committees in each party—the senatorial, congressional, and national committees—are shooting at an amount in the area of $7 million. That means that 700,000 good Democrats or good Republicans, who are at present having their taxes withheld by their employers, could say, "Certainly; you can take $10 from Uncle Sam and pay it to my party."

So in effect we would be transferring the cost of the election to the taxpayers.

I think there would be great merit in permitting a limited deduction, the same as we permit limited deductions for charitable contributions, with a limitation of $100, or $50; I do not know what the amount should be. That might be open to some debate. I think that if a person is giving to his party—either party; the party of his choice—there should be a little pain connected with it, just as there is when we give to our church, our hospital, or to any other civic endeavor. I think what we are trying to do in the two political parties is to get greater participation from the grassroots. We should let the people feel, "I am a part of this party." It will hurt a little to give $2 or $3, but the people who contribute will take a greater interest in their parties.

If they are merely to be checked off by the payroll clerk, I do not believe there would be great interest in the two political parties at the grassroots, the interest which we need if the parties are to survive. I think we should consider the question of transferring the cost of Federal elections from the large corporations directly to the taxpayers.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, this is just a beginning, a step. Another step will come sometime later; and in a little while, there will be a bill such as was before the House of Representatives years ago, a bill which provided a $10 credit if a person certified that he had voted in the last general election. If we are to do that, why not throw in 3 acres and a mule and make the bribe just as effective as we can?

I prefer the system which prevails in Australia, where a person is fined if he does not do his duty as a citizen by going to the polls and voting. But that will be the next step. So in a little while, all of the money will conveniently come out of the Federal Treasury. This is but a beginning on that road.

I sincerely hope that this amendment will be roundly defeated. I cannot concur in the sentiment expressed by the distinguished Senator from Missouri [Mr. HENNINGS] that this amendment can be taken to conference. That might be all right; but I would rather have a vote on it here and now. We are entitled to have a vote on it, to see what the sentiment of the Senate is.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. Mr. President, together with the Senator from Missouri I have supported the earlier amendments to the bill because we want to get a good, working bill. However, I do not think the amendment being offered here on the floor should be adopted. I join the chairman of the Finance Committee in asking the Senator from Tennessee to let the amendment be referred to our committee, in order that it may be properly studied. I do not say there is not some merit to what is being sought to be accomplished, but I think we must be very careful when we move into this field when the net effect of our action would be to let the Federal Government underwrite political campaigns.

I do not for a moment question the sincerity of the Senator from Tennessee in trying to get a good bill, but I should like to remind him of the experience we had with our tax laws some years ago. In 1951 or 1952, we found, much to the dismay and disgust, I may say, of many Members of the Senate, that there had already been devised a scheme to finance the political campaigns out of the Federal Treasury by an indirect method. At that time there had been three or four large contributions made to the Democratic campaign fund. One contributor gave about $300,000, and another about $400,000. They went to the Treasury Department and got a special ruling whereby their contributions were classified as special business deductions, which made the contributions not only exempt from gift taxes but also classified them as deductions for tax purposes. There was not one Member of the Senate who defended that ruling. There was not one Member of the Senate who said that it had been the original intent of the law to include such contributions. Nevertheless, that ruling was given by the Treasury Department, and it had the effect of financing a large part of the 1948 Democratic campaign out of the Federal Treasury.

I do not for a moment suggest that this amendment is intended to reinstate this section of the law so as to make such action again possible.

But I am not at all certain from reading the amendment that it could not be done. The present law specifically states that under no circumstances can any contribution to a political party ever be treated as a deduction for income tax purposes.

That provision is now very specific, but this amendment would amend that section of the law. Those earlier political rulings had the effect of having the 1948 Democratic campaign financed to a large extent by the Federal Treasury. That was the first time since the enactment of the income tax law in 1913 that such an effort had been made by either political party, and we want to be sure it is the last. I want to make certain that we do not tamper with the law so as to permit again such gross abuses by giving taxpayers an opportunity to claim: "You have repealed that section."

I think the members and the staff of our committee should be given an opportunity to examine this proposal. If, after we have examined it we find that it does not open any loopholes, it can then be considered on its merits.

I repeat: I am making this request as one who, together with the Senator from Missouri, has supported the earlier amendments, and I fully intend to support the bill on its final passage. I think the Senate should pass a good bill, a bill which will help to clean up elections, but let us be sure that in doing this we do not open an even worse loophole.

Mr. President, those rulings were printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of April 29, 1952, along with my statement outlining how they had been obtained.

Mr. President, I do ask unanimous consent to have printed as a part of my remarks another statement which I made during that same period describing how our tax laws were being used to give favorable rulings to taxpayers who, in turn, were agreeing to make contributions to the Democratic Party.

If a clean election bill is passed, are we going to make it possible for persons to approach an executive in the Government with the offer of a contribution to a political party, in turn for a favorable tax ruling, and then give him a tax deduction in return for his contribution to the party? Certainly we do not want to open up Pandora's box. Speaking for myself, I want to examine this amendment more carefully before I vote on it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Delaware?

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. President, on August 4. 1953, Mr. Welburn Mayock, an attorney in Washington, D.C., was testifying before the Kean subcommittee. At that time the Kean committee was investigating the scandal-ridden Bureau of Internal Revenue.

In his testimony of that date Mr. Mayock explained how in 1948, while serving as the chief counsel of the Democratic National Committee, he had entered into an agreement with Mr. William S. Lasdon, Katonah, N.Y., whereby he was to obtain for Mr. Lasdon a favorable ruling from the Treasury Department on his then pending tax case.

In return for obtaining this favorable ruling which would save nearly $7 million for Mr. Lasdon, Mr. Mayock was to receive a $65,000 cash fee with the understanding that $30,000 of this amount was to go to the Democratic National Committee.

Mr. Mayock without any power of attorney to represent this taxpayer but solely in his capacity as chief counsel of the Democratic National Committee then contacted Mr. John W. Snyder, the Secretary of Treasury, and promptly obtained the favorable ruling on Mr. Lasdon's tax question.

Mr. Lasdon previously had been denied a favorable decision upon this same question by the Treasury Department.

After this tax-fix scheme had been arranged and after Mr. Mayock had collected his $65,000 fee, he was confronted with the problem of how to get the $30,000 into the Democratic campaign fund without obviously violating the Hatch Act. (The Hatch Act prohibits contributions to a political campaign in excess of $5,000 by any one individual.)

However, once having agreed to fix a tax case for $65,000 the question of violating the Hatch Act apparently was not bothersome to Mr. Mayock and his associates.

Accordingly, as Mr. Mayock explained it, he merely arranged to have some of his friends write their personal checks payable to the Democratic National Committee in exchange for an equivalent amount of cash. In this manner he siphoned this $30,000 of "hot money" into the treasury of the Democratic National Committee.

While freely admitting all of the above transactions during his testimony before the Kean subcommittee under date of August 4, 1953, Mr. Mayock flatly refused to tell that committee the names of the individuals who cooperated in this underhanded method of financing a political campaign. Each time the committee pressed him for the names of these individuals Mr. Mayock replied, "That I am going to refuse to answer."

Since Mr. Mayock was reluctant to publish the names of the individuals who exchanged their personal checks payable to the national committee for an equivalent amount of this "tax-fix fee," I shall read that list to the Senate along with a breakdown of the amount handled by each individual plus the dates of the transactions.

This was not the only time that the Treasury Department, under the New Deal administration resorted to the issuance of questionable rulings for the purpose of financing the 1948 political campaign.

On April 29, 1952, I incorporated in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD copies of a series of political rulings which had been issued by the Treasury Department while Mr. John W. Snyder was Secretary of the Treasury, wherein Mr. Richard J. Reynolds, Winston-Salem, N.C., Mr. Marshall Field, and Mr. David A. Schulte, both of New York City, were permitted to charge off as bad business debts their approximately $400,000 contributions to the 1948 Democratic campaign.

Since incorporating those rulings in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD I have discovered that this same Mr. Welburn Mayock was one of the prime factors behind those rulings.

On December 27, 1948, Mr. Mayock, without any power of attorney to represent Mr. Reynolds or the others involved but solely in his official capacity as chief counsel of the Democratic National Committee, held a conference with Mr. Edward H. Foley, Under Secretary of the Treasury, and Mr. Thomas J. Lynch, General Counsel of the Treasury Department. At that meeting they discussed the Richard W. Reynolds case which involved a $300,000 contribution to the Democratic Party, as a party case and arranged for the issuance of a favorable ruling allowing him to write off this contribution as a bad business loan.

As further evidence of the callousness of the political regime then in power we find that the Treasury Department even permitted Mr. Mayock to get away with reporting on his 1948 Federal income tax returns only $17,500 of this $65,000 fee collected from Mr. Lasdon. Before computing his taxes he was permitted to deduct from the fee the $30,000 which he set aside for the Democratic National Committee. He deducted from the gross fee another $17,500 solely upon his claim that he paid $8,750 each to Mr. William Solomon, 275 Central Park West, New York City, and Mr. Louis Markus, 9445 86th Road, Woodhaven, Long Island, as their share of the tax-fix payoff.

This latter deduction was allowed notwithstanding the fact that when both Mr. Markus and Mr. Solomon testified under oath (August 5, 1953) before the Kean subcommittee, they emphatically denied that they had received any of this fee, and accordingly they had paid no taxes on their alleged share.

But the mere fact that no one was paying any tax on this $17,500 in controversy did not in the least bother the Treasury Department. They merely placed it in the same category as the $30,000 contribution to the Democratic National Committee and allowed everybody to write it off their tax returns.

This procedure of issuing favorable Treasury rulings in exchange for contributions to a political party was extremely costly to the American taxpayers from two angles:

First, the granting of these favorable rulings which apparently would not otherwise have been extended resulted in a substantial loss in revenue.

Second, the issuance of these rulings had the indirect effect of financing a part of the 1948 Democratic campaign out of the Federal Treasury.

The disclosure of these transactions was a shock to the American people and the overwhelming majority of the members of the Democratic Party were just as indignant as were the members of the Republican Party to find that certain high officials in that administration had stooped to such low tactics for the purpose of financing a political campaign.

Even after publishing the additional list of names of those involved in this deal there are still many questions left unanswered in this case, and I suggest that both the Department of Justice and the Treasury Department reexamine the conflicting testimony given before the Kean subcommittee in August 1953.

For instance, the conflict of testimony wherein Mr. Mayock under oath told the committee that he paid $8,750 each to Mr. William Solomon and Mr. Louis Marcus and their testimony on the following day emphatically denying this statement obviously is the basis of a perjury charge.

The statute of limitations may have expired on violations of the corrupt practices act in 1948, but it has not expired on any possible perjury charges resulting from testimony given before the Kean subcommittee in 1953, nor has it expired upon the ability of the Treasury Department to collect back taxes due on the erroneous deduction of the $30,000 fee to the Democratic National Committee as well as the controversial $17,500 referred to above.

Grand juries are now in session at both Omaha and St. Louis, and their work should shed additional light upon the scandal-ridden tax bureau of that era.

[From the Washington Post and Times Herald, May 19, 1955]

MAYOCK GETS CLEARANCE IN TAX CASE

LOS ANGELES, May 18.—A Federal grand jury today cleared Welburn Mayock, former general counsel of the Democratic National Committee, in an income tax case.

The jury returned a no bill, or declination to indict. U.S. Attorney Laughlin E. Waters said a complaint issued last April 4 would be dismissed immediately.

The complaint, issued at the time because the statute of limitations was running out, alleged that Mayock evaded $25,716 in taxes due on income of himself and his wife for 1948.

Mayock, a Washington and Los Angeles attorney, returned from the Capital and appeared voluntarily before the grand jury.

He told newsmen the Government was "persecuting" him, the case having been the subject of previous congressional committee and FBI investigation since 1952.

Mayock said the case stemmed from a payment of $65,000 before the 1952 campaign by a New York financier, William S. Lasdon. Mayock said $30,000 of this sum went to the Democratic national campaign fund, and Mayock and two other men divided the remainder as fees for some income tax work they did for Lasdon. Mayock said he listed the $17,000 he received in this deal in his tax return.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, my remarks are intended as a response to the statement made by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. MORTON], the chairman of the Republican National Committee. He undertook to favor a tax deduction. He was opposed to a tax credit. One of the great merits of the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee is that it favors the rich and the poor alike. It makes no distinction between a very wealthy contributor and a very small contributor, in overall, broad terms.

On March 6, 1956, the distinguished junior Senator from Oregon [Mr. NEUBERGER], who has long been a student of elections, made a speech on the floor of the Senate in which he pointed out how much of a $100 tax deduction, a deduction to be treated the same as a charitable deduction, would be paid by the United States Government, and how much would be paid by the taxpayer.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the table illustrating these figures may be printed in the RECORD at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, the critical thing, to my way of thinking, is this: If one has a net taxable income of between $2,000 and $4,000, and he makes a $100 contribution, and he claims a deduction as though it were a charitable contribution, he will pay $76.60, and the Government will pay $20.40. If, however, one is so fortunate as to have an income of $200,000 a year or more and makes the same $100 contribution, he will pay $9 and Uncle Sam will pay $91. I think it quite clear why my friend from Kentucky favors the deduction and opposes the tax credit.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CLARK. I yield.

Mr. MORTON. I do not favor that at all. I am willing to let it stay as it is. The way the Senator is talking, nobody gets the credit.

Mr. CLARK. That is correct.

Mr. MORTON. I do not want the implication left that nobody is getting anything at the present time. Would the Senator agree that if this proposal is enacted, sooner or later, whether it is the poor or the rich taxpayer, the Treasury of the United States will be paying the costs of campaigns?

Mr. CLARK. No. It will be paying a substantial part; not all of it.

Mr. MORTON. I think I could raise our part for our side, and I think my opposite number on the other side also could.

Mr. CLARK. The Senator is indeed very skillful, and I honor him for his ability.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, while the Senator from Kentucky is here, I wonder if he can give us any estimate as to the number of contributors. The Democratic Party would not be within his province, I take it, but does he have any expert knowledge of or estimate as to the number of Republican contributors to the Presidential, Vice Presidential, Senate, and House races?

Mr. MORTON. I do not think I could give even an educated guess, I will say to the distinguished Senator from Tennessee. I think the figures as to the number of contributions which come in to the Democratic or Republican National Committees are available. What someone may give in a certain county in the Senator's State or mine, in the interest of the Senator's candidacy or mine, $10 here, $5 there, on the county level, I do not think there is any way of estimating.

Mr. KEFAUVER. I do not think there is, either, unless it would be by experience; but some persons I talked to said they did not think there were more than 500,000 contributors. Under the terms defined under this proposal, if there were 500,000, and that number should be doubled by virtue of tax credit, on the tax credit side it would cost only $10 million. I think the tax deduction might cost $5 million more. But that is not a great amount, considering the advantages that would be derived.

Mr. MORTON. If the Senator will yield, I can indicate to him that in the past 90 days, as a result of the direct mail campaign which we have used in our headquarters, we have had about, I think it is, 14,000 contributions, the average being somewhere in the neighborhood of $10 each. That is merely to the one national committee.

Mr. BYRD of Virginia. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KEFAUVER. I yield.

Mr. BYRD of Virginia. I should like to call to the attention of the Senator from Tennessee that the amendment provides, "a committee acting in behalf of an individual or individuals."

There are any number of such committees. For a long time, years ago, I was chairman of the Democratic State Committee. There are county committees, precinct committees, and all kinds of committees. It would simply be impossible to get reports from these committees as to what they do with the money. The amendment does not say "political committees." It says a committee acting on behalf of an individual. An individual could appoint his own committee, under the Senator's amendment.

Mr. KEFAUVER. I thought it was made clear that the provision, which refers to an amount equal to one-half of the political contribution, as defined in subsection (c), applies only to Presidential, Vice Presidential, Senatorial, House Member, or Delegate campaigns. A committee in a State might be a committee for support of a candidate for the Senate or the House or both. It might be a committee for support of a candidate for President or for Senator or both, or there might be a single treasury.

I think it is clear: There can be only one deduction or one credit, regardless of how the contribution may have been divided between committees.

Mr. BYRD of Virginia. If the Senator will refer to page 6, line 13, he will find it there stated that these donations can be made to a committee acting in behalf of an individual or individuals. In a national election, every State will have committees formed to aid candidates for President, Senator, perhaps, and Representatives. Each of these, under the amendment, will be a committee that receives these donations.

Mr. KEFAUVER. That is the way campaigns are handled. There will be a committee for support of a candidate for President, for Senator, and so forth; but it is made clear, on page 2, that the credit allowed by subsection (a) shall not exceed $10 for any taxable year.

As to a deduction for any taxable year, that is also made clear on page 5, line 18, wherein it is stated:

> The deduction under subsection (a) shall not exceed $100 for any taxable year.

So only one contribution could be made for which a deduction could be taken. It could not be made to all the committees to which the Senator has referred. A person could make the contributions, but he could not get the tax credit.

Mr. BYRD of Virginia. Does the Senator think all these committees are going to report, if an individual can appoint a committee, and there are committees in the precincts, counties, or throughout the State? There could be two or three hundred committees supporting one candidate.

Mr. KEFAUVER. I think that under the bill as now proposed there will be better reporting. If somebody is contributing to the Communist Party, we will find out who he is, because he will have to make a report of it. Furthermore, it is the same as giving $10 to the Red Cross. If there is any question about it, when the Internal Revenue representative calls on the person making the claim, he must present a receipt or canceled check.

Mr. BYRD of Virginia. That requirement is not in this amendment.

Mr. KEFAUVER. That requirement applies to all deductions and all credits.

Mr. President, I yield the floor, and ask for a division on my amendments.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing en bloc to the amendments of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. KEFAUVER].

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, I am very sympathetic to the objective of the amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee. It could do much to stimulate contributions to political parties, broaden the base of their support, and increase nationwide interest in politics. These are worthy goals.

However, the pending bill is not a tax measure, and that is the fatal flaw of this amendment. The pending bill deals with reports and limitations on elections. It is not a revenue measure.

Mr. President, I have for years advocated giving a tax deduction for traveling expenses of working people going to and from work. I am the sponsor of a bill to grant deductions to disabled veterans who commute to work. We allow considerable deductions now for the traveling expenses of businessmen, and I think a strong case can be made for them. We should do the same for a person who is required to commute to and from work every day.

In addition, I have been very much interested in a tax deduction for premiums paid on voluntary health insurance. I have introduced a bill to achieve that goal. Rather than foist a Government system of forced health insurance on us, I favor trying to stimulate a greater interest among people in taking voluntary health insurance. My tax deduction would serve as just such a stimulant, and I hope someday to get some action on it.

In other words, there are many laudable purposes for which a tax deduction and tax credit could properly be made. I do not think a contribution to a political party perhaps stands as high as some of the others, although, if our fiscal situation were such that we could afford to do it, I would be much more in sympathy with the objectives sought by the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. President, I served in the House of Representatives. I know with what jealousy the House Ways and Means Committee looks upon the initiation of tax legislation. There are still in my mind serious constitutional questions about amendments of this kind. But even if those be swept aside, if this amendment falls within the confines of our Constitution, this bill if adopted, will still be completely unpalatable on the House side. It would run into much more opposition because of this amendment, Mr. President, than any other amendment that has been offered here.

Furthermore, Mr. President, this proposal has not been considered by the Senate Finance Committee. We should not hastily infringe on their jurisdiction either.

The appropriate committees in both bodies should have an opportunity to hear expert testimony on this proposal and to weigh it in the light of our overall tax structure. Until that is done, I do not think we should take up this idea.

I cannot understand how some Senators who opposed an amendment which simply gave everyone an equal right to vote would favor an amendment such as this tax legislation, initiated in the Senate of the United States, contrary to a well established principle.

It seems to me it would be hasty, unwise, and not in the interest of the Constitution and of orderly legislation for us to enact this amendment, much as we may favor the objectives which it seeks to accomplish. Therefore, I am opposed to it and shall vote against it.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. Mr. President, I should like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Rules and Administration a question in connection with these amendments.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, does the Senator from Delaware mean the Senator from Missouri [Mr. HENNINGS].

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. Since the Senator from Missouri is not here at the moment, I might ask the question of the Senator who has offered the amendments.

I see that the Senator from Missouri is now present, and I address my question to him. Under existing law, the taxpayer can deduct 10 percent of his income, up to $1,000, without making any itemization of his contributions. He is allowed that amount automatically. If he takes this $10 credit as proposed in this amendment, will he then have to itemize the deductions? What effect will these amendment have? The law now specifically provides that he may claim 10 percent of his income or up to $1,000 as a deduction, or more if the contributions are itemized.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Credit does not have any effect on deductions.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. The average taxpayer is already allowed a deduction of 10 percent of his income, or he can claim in excess of 10 percent provided he itemizes his deductions. I ask the question because I know the overwhelming majority of the smaller income individuals do not itemize their deductions.

On the form 1040 there is an automatic credit for that deduction. What effect will the amendments have?

Perhaps the Senator has an answer. Personally I think we are making a mistake trying to legislate on such matters here on the floor.

I wonder if the chairman of the committee can answer that question.

Mr. HENNINGS. I will say to the Senator from Delaware, with the indulgence of the Senator from Tennessee, it was because of these various matters, such as those raised by the senior Senator from Virginia and by the Senator from Delaware, that I forebore undertaking to offer this proposal as an amendment, or to incorporate it as any portion of the bill.

I think perhaps the philosophy of the amendments is admirable. Undoubtedly it is.

I think the other questions which relate to the matter are quite serious. I think this is a matter which should go to the Committee on Ways and Means of the House of Representatives and should be there considered because of its revenue implications. They are more than implications; they are revenue provisions.

The whole matter troubled me. I hoped to keep some of these matters out of the bill. I did not want to discourage the Senator from Tennessee from offering the amendments. I told him perhaps the matter might be taken to conference. I have had no success in persuading other Senators not to offer the amendments or not to support them.

I have indicated that I am in support of the amendment, but I think it presents a serious hazard with regard to the bill itself.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. I raise this question: The Senator from Tennessee has presented the amendments, but I am sure he would not want to change the present tax law in this connection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Tennessee has the floor.

Mr. KEFAUVER. In the first place, Mr. President, the Senator has talked about somebody making big campaign contributions in 1948 and getting a tax ruling in that regard. I do not know what the Senator is talking about, but it has no application to this amendment.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. This has no application to my previous remarks. That is correct. This is a separate question.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Secondly, as to the credit, I understand at the present time a person can take a deduction without itemization up to 10 percent. I suppose if the amount were within that allocation the person would not have to itemize it. If it ran over the amount he would have to.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. The Senator from Tennessee, for whom I have great respect, has said he "supposes." He is the author of the amendments. Do they so provide? I do not think we can pass laws based upon supposition. We do not want to take away a tax exemption which the people already have. I simply ask the question: Did the Senator consider this point in offering the amendments?

Mr. KEFAUVER. It is my understanding that the amendments were drafted by officials of the Treasury Department for the Committee on Rules and Administration in the 85th Congress.

I did discuss that matter, although frankly I will say I am not an expert on tax law. My best judgment is what I have just stated. If the amount runs above the allowable deduction a person would have to itemize, and if it were within the allowable deduction he would not have to.

In regard to the matter of tax law originating in the House of Representatives——

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. Mr. President, will the Senator yield on that point?

Mr. KEFAUVER. I yield.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. The point I am making is a very simple one. Let us say that a man has a $3,000 income and has been taking a 10-percent deduction, or $300. Perhaps he has made contributions of only $100 or $150. Under the existing law such a man can get credit for $300. Then this $10 credit would not bring him in excess of the $300 but if it means he must itemize it he will lose money. Therefore, unless he had contributed the maximum of 10 percent and could so show, he would get no credit under the amendment, because the law very clearly states, as I understand it, that one may take credit up to 10 percent without itemization, or not to exceed $1,000.

Many people no doubt do not contribute the full 10 percent; they may contribute only 5 percent.

In such a case what happens?

Mr. PASTORE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KEFAUVER. I yield to the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. PASTORE. That 10 percent is for charitable contributions and other authorized deductions. This has nothing to do with charity. This is an added public responsibility, for which a person is given a $10 credit.

The 10 percent about which the Senator has been talking is in lieu of stating deductions or charitable contributions. A person may take a 10-percent deduction. That may go as high as $1,000. However, if there is a hospital bill which runs up into another $1,000, even with the 10-percent rule one can take the medical deduction.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. That is substantially correct.

Mr. PASTORE. That is a deduction for sickness. This deduction would be in addition to the 10 percent, and it would be allowed for the purpose of public participation in the cleaning up of elections and the avoiding of all the bad publicity resulting from "big money" in election campaigns.

Why should we complicate this matter? We are either for it or against it. The fact of the matter is that this is a credit of up to $10, or a deduction of $100 over all, for 1 taxable year, and has nothing to do with charitable contributions. The 10 percent the Senator has been talking about is a deduction authorization in lieu of itemizing charitable contributions and other deductible items.

That is how simple this matter is.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. That is an excellent explanation. The question I ask is, Is the Senator sure this is what the amendment will do?

Mr. PASTORE. That is the answer.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. Where is it so provided in the amendment? I know that is what the Senator intends to do. I am simply asking, Where in the pending amendments is that separated?

Mr. KEFAUVER. I accept the legislative history as stated by the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. Does the Senator not know enough about his own amendments to tell me where to find it?

Mr. KEFAUVER. The amendments would not amend the general law. They would only add another deduction a person could take, like the medical deduction. I do not think we have to rewrite the entire law on deductions in order to provide a new deduction. At least, the good people from the Treasury Department who drafted this provision for the committee did not think so.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. The Senator ought to be very sure of what he is doing, and I am not so sure he is.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Vote! Vote!

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, I have a word to say on the question of whether this matter should come from the House of Representatives.

Article I, section 7, of the Constitution provides:

> All Bills for raising Revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives; but the Senate may propose or concur with Amendments as on other Bills.

The Senator from Oregon [Mr. NEUBERGER] has read what Dr. Corwin in his fine work, "The Constitution of the United States," says, and he cites quite a number of cases on that point. The cases are to the effect that if the tax matter is incidental to another larger purpose, an amendment can be added in the Senate, notwithstanding the fact that it is a tax matter.

Furthermore, this is not an amendment for the purpose of raising revenues. The Supreme Court has always said that the term should be strictly applied, and that if it were simply a method of getting revenue or decreasing revenue for some laudatory purpose it would be allowed. The Supreme Court has not passed on this particular matter, but it has stated that for an incidental purpose it is not necessary that the provision originate in the House of Representatives.

Mr. President, I ask for a division.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. KEFAUVER] on which a division has been requested.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. President, of course, the Senator from South Dakota does not pose at all as a constitutional expert, but he does know that the attitude of the Members of the House of Representatives who serve on the Committee on Ways and Means is a very jealous one with respect to the constitutional provision with regard to the origination of bills which deal with revenue.

I recall rather distinctly that when we were working on the highway financing bill, we were told we must not seek to originate any revenue provisions in regard to that proposed legislation if we wanted the House to receive it or to consider it.

Furthermore, it was pointed out to us that there was an act—I think it related to the Cotton Futures Act—which the Supreme Court had held to be unconstitutional because the Senate bill carried a provision relating to revenue. It was said that such a bill would have to originate in the House of Representatives.

I recall on another occasion when I sought to take care of a very minor matter dealing with the District of Columbia, as to the payment of a long-standing bill to some employees under the OPS, or the OPA, the House had a field day, for we had provided that as much as $15,000, or something less than $15,000, should be available to pay the salaries, which had been unpaid for a long time.

Regardless of the merits of this provision—and I think the provision does have some merit, and I think on its merit one might find some reason for supporting such a provision—I think it would be unwise, if we want this proposed legislation to become effective, to try to put such a provision in the pending bill.

It is true that the House Committee on Administration or the House Committee on Rules might report a bill with a House number, striking out all after the enacting clause and substituting the text of whatever we do here, but I have no hope at all that the House would receive and pass the bill with a Senate number if the bill originated something dealing with revenue as clearly as this provision does. Therefore, I think it would be unwise and damaging to the purposes of this bill if we were to adopt the amendment which is proposed at this time.

Mr. PASTORE. Mr. President, I hesitated at the beginning to speak in regard to this amendment, but I am more or less impelled to say a word or two.

I really think this is an exercise in futility. I do not believe anything is going to happen to this amendment even if it is taken to conference, but I am glad it was brought up, Mr. President, because it emphasizes the very heart of the problem which confronts us with regard to the clean elections bill.

Everyone knows that the thing which leads to corruption of the election laws is so-called big money. The important question is, How shall we encourage the little people to make the contributions they would like to make and we would like to have them make? Many people would like to give $10 or $20, and that is the most they could afford.

All we are trying to say is that if we want to clean up the election laws and eliminate corruption and abuse, especially the vast expenditures of money at campaign time for very expensive campaigns, we must do something to encourage the little fellow to make a reasonable contribution. This amendment may not be the way. I do not know how much money is involved, but I am glad the question arose. I do not care what happens in the House. We cannot prognosticate that far. I have heard it said, "Let us include the primary amendment." Someone else says, "It will not survive in the House." Later the same man will make the opposite argument, as we have heard here this afternoon.

The time has come to give serious thought to the best way of cleaning up the mess caused by tremendously large contributions which are leading to an evil in our election process.

I do not know what will happen. Perhaps the best thing would be to withdraw the amendment. However, it will serve to put the country on notice. I have no doubt that it will not survive in the House, for one reason or another. I am very happy that the question arose, because in my opinion, if we want fair elections, we must make them more democratic. We must make it possible for more people to participate. Unless we do something of this kind to interest people in elections, I am afraid the entire effort will be a dismal failure.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing en bloc to the amendments offered by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. KEFAUVER].

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, I ask for a division.

On a division, the amendments were rejected.

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. President, may we have the third reading of the bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is open to further amendment. If there be no further amendment to be proposed, the question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading and was read the third time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill having been read the third time, the question is, Shall it pass?

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, on behalf of the able junior Senator from Arizona [Mr. GOLDWATER], I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point a statement which he has prepared in opposition to the bill, and which he previously had given me to place in the RECORD for him in his absence. I ask that it be printed in the RECORD prior to the vote on final passage.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR GOLDWATER

I cannot in good conscience bring myself to vote for a bill that, I think, is, first, a violation of States rights and, second, a measure that clearly overlooks the greatest single source of political spending today in its reporting requirements. I voted against the inclusion of the requirement for primary reporting because I do not feel that a man is a candidate for Federal office until he is nominated, and I further feel that the fact that most States require primary reporting, as does my State of Arizona, is sufficient to satisfy those who want to know where the money comes from and in what amount.

I tried on the floor of the Senate to explain to the chairman of the committee the reasons why I feel political action committees, such as COPE, would come under this law, but I was unable to convince him or a sufficient number of my colleagues to insure this would come about.

There is no question that section 610 of the Taft-Hartley Act makes it illegal for a labor union or a corporation to make political contributions, but there is not a man on this floor who in all honesty can say that COPE and similar organizations in business do not make political contributions, and in the case of COPE these contributions are astronomical. The bill makes it possible for these committees to continue to operate against what, to me, is the clear intent of the existing law, and I was hopeful that something could be done in this bill to take care of this, but it has not, so I must agree with other Members of this body that a study into the whole field would be proper. As ranking minority member of the Labor and Public Welfare Committee, I will give this suggestion our study and report to the body at a later date. In fact, I think it is high time that the Congress looks into the whole subject of the power vested in the labor movement, and I have before the Senate at the present time a resolution calling for the establishment of a select committee to make such a study, and if those colleagues of mine who have indicated a desire for such a study will support the resolution, it is possible the leadership will create such a committee.

Since some union leaders are now assuming a role of political leadership and exercise a power greater in many instances than elected officials or top functionaries of the political parties, it seems time to examine with care the origins of such power. They have proven at National Democrat Conventions that they can veto nominations to the national ticket, and can also name alternate candidates. They have also taken advantage of the grassroots void created by civil service reform of the patronage system, and have moved into the Democrat Party with a new grassroots machine, a new-style political patronage machine owned and operated by a few union officials and paid for by the diversion of union dues from their proper uses.

In a word, the power is illegitimate right down through the operation. These union leaders are assuming the responsibilities and power of political leaders, responsibilities and power never granted to them by their union constituents or by the public; and they are exercising this power by the illegitimate use of union dues for political purposes, union dues granted by the members for the furtherance of their economic welfare, and not for politics.

The power of these men cannot be reached by the voters. They cannot be voted out of office because they do not derive their power from any public election. They cannot be reached by the voters. Their constituents are the union members.

Nor is their political leadership the basis on which they are tested for reelection to union office. Even the union members cannot reach this political power.

Such a threatened usurpation of political power was thought to exist on the part of corporation heads at the turn of the century. Some irresponsible financiers and corporation heads certainly did make ruthless use of assets which belonged to their stockholders, putting funds behind candidates and parties not necessarily supported by these stockholders.

On the recommendation of a Republican President, a law was passed in 1907 by a Republican Congress outlawing such use of corporate funds for political purposes. Since then, it has remained illegal to use corporate funds in Federal elections. The States quickly followed with laws banning corporate funds in State elections.

Fifty years ago, it was the question of the illegitimate exercise of political power by corporation barons; now, 50 years later, it is the labor barons who are abusing the public in this same way but on a scale unimaginable 50 years ago. It is my firm opinion that we must have new legislation to restrict the political activities of the unions, and immediate action by the Department of Justice to apply existing law with a determination and allocation of legal personnel comparable to that expended on the monopoly problem. Only Congress and the judiciary are now powerful enough to resist and turn back an illegitimate power drive of such magnitude. Already this power has reached so far that corrective action by Congress in the near future seems unlikely.

It was a task the liberals willingly undertook in 1907 to curb such a threat then coming from some corporation heads; it remains very instructive to observe how the evangelical liberals confront the same threat coming now from the union leaders.

I have always found very puzzling the view that curbing of irresponsible political power in giant corporations is "liberal" but the curbing of irresponsible political power in giant labor unions is "reactionary." It is my plan to inquire into the meaning of this matter from some of my learned colleagues in the U.S. Senate.

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that in the engrossment of the bill to revise the Federal election laws, to prevent corrupt practices in Federal elections, and for other purposes, the Secretary of the Senate be authorized to make such changes in section, subsection, and paragraph numbers and letters, and cross references thereto, as may be necessary to the proper numbering and lettering of the bill; also that the Secretary of the Senate be authorized to make the proper amendments to the table of contents, to make the table conform to the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. President, I believe a brief statement should be made with respect to the change in the effective date of the bill.

The bill was reported as the Elections Act of 1959. There has been some slight misunderstanding expressed in several quarters over the change in the effective date of the bill. It appears that this change in date has been interpreted by some—I hope not many—to be for the specific purpose of excluding the forthcoming elections of 1960 from being covered by the bill. While it is true that this will be the result, that is not the reason for the change.

The bill was reported by the Committee on Rules and Administration on July 23, 1959, and, as reported, it would become effective on January 1, 1960. However, the bill was not scheduled for consideration by the Senate until after that date. Should the bill now pass the Senate, it will be sent to the House for consideration, where several weeks of consideration by the House may be required, even if the House Committee on Administration is able to begin consideration of the bill immediately.

Mr. President, I should like to have the attention of the minority leader. I am undertaking to explain the amendment which he and I offered the other day relating to the effective date of the bill. He may have something to add.

Many States hold their primary elections early this year. Illinois and New Jersey have primaries in April. Many States have primaries in May. Because of this many candidates and committees have already received contributions and made expenditures.

It would be grossly unfair to require reports of these past transactions as the bill would require if the effective date of January 1, 1960, was left in the bill. It would also be impossible to make the law effective as of the date of passage because the reports of political committees are based on the calendar year, that is, the reports must cover the period from January 1 to the date of the report.

The bill, therefore, cannot be made effective until January 1, 1961. Any other effective day would make it apply to periods prior to its enactment.

Committees that operate only within the boundaries of a State have never reported to the Federal Government before; however, under the terms of the bill, as amended, they will have to report contributions received and expenditures made throughout the year. It would be unjust to require them to make reports of such transactions which occurred prior to enactment.

The limitation on expenditures imposed on political committees which operate in two or more States, and the $10,000 overall limitation on contributions are applicable to the calendar year, January 1 to December 31. These provisions provide for criminal penalties, and as we all know, the Constitution prohibits legislation which will make an activity which has already occurred a crime. Therefore, if the provisions of this bill are to be effective, they cannot be put in force until January 1, 1961.

Many of us are sorry that Congress did not reach the consideration of this bill in 1959 so it would apply to the forthcoming elections, but since it has come before us only now, it cannot be effective until 1961.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point an editorial entitled "Victory for Reform," published in the Washington Post of January 23, 1960; also an editorial entitled "An Echo From History," published in the St. Louis Post-Dispatch of January 22, 1960. The St. Louis Post-Dispatch editorial was written by my very good friend, Irving Dilliard.

There being no objection, the editorials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Post, Jan. 23, 1960]

VICTORY FOR REFORM

Senator HENNINGS has surprised nearly everyone—probably including himself—by winning broad and significant improvements in the diluted clean elections bill reported by the Senate Rules Committee. The Senate's agreement to extend Federal regulation of campaign spending to primary elections was perhaps the most heartening from a political viewpoint, in the light of stout opposition by Southern Democrats and their conservative Republican allies. This step alone could make the limitations on spending meaningful in "one-party States." A gain of less sweeping importance but nonetheless an important reform was the approval of the overall $10,000 limitation on individual campaign contributions, on which there is now no effective limit.

Of broadest significance was the Senate's acceptance of the major Hennings proposal that political committees anywhere, regardless of the scope of their operations, must report all spending in excess of $2,500 in behalf of any candidates for Federal office. Under present law, and under the committee's bill, there are no reporting requirements for the State and local committees which, it is estimated, account for perhaps 75 percent of all campaign spending.

Speaker RAYBURN, asked about the Senate action, not surprisingly threw cold water on Federal regulation of primaries, which he has always opposed. Apparently this provision would be the focal point of opposition to election law reform in the House, where action remains unlikely this year—a prospect that lessens the import of the Senate decision to postpone the effective date of the new requirements beyond this year's elections. The somewhat cynical suggestion that the Senate toughened the clean elections bill in the expectation that it would get nowhere in the House falls short of a realistic appraisal of what Mr. HENNINGS has accomplished, however. Whatever the motives of individual Senators who have supported the Hennings amendments, they have built a fire that Members of the House cannot easily extinguish. The country might have remained unstirred by a total failure of Congress to address itself to this important subject. It will not lightly accept House refusal to carry forward the excellent work now accomplished in the Senate.

[From the St. Louis Post-Dispatch, Jan. 22, 1960]

AN ECHO FROM HISTORY

The first Senate rollcall in the 86th Congress 2d session, is one that has history stamped all over it. By the surprising generous vote of 50 to 39, the progressive Democrats, joined by the progressive Republicans and aided by a substantial number of recruits, have adopted the Hennings-Keating amendment to include nominating primaries under Federal election spending controls.

This was a step of far-reaching political consequence. To appreciate its importance it is necessary to turn the calendar back more than 40 years to 1918.

That is the year of the bitterly fought race between Henry Ford, automobile manufacturer, and Truman H. Newberry, financier and businessman, for the Republican nomination for Senator from Michigan. The results were so close that a recount was ordered. It showed Newberry winning by a scant 4,300 votes.

But the primary had been marked by lavish spending, particularly on the part of the Newberry forces. The estimates went up close to $1 million, which was many times over the allowance in the Federal Corrupt Practices Acts of 1910 and 1911. Newberry and 16 fellow Republicans were convicted in 1920 of conspiracy to violate the law. He was fined $10,000 and sentenced to serve 2 years in the Federal penitentiary.

The convictions were taken to the Supreme Court, which decided by a narrow split in 1920—although none too clearly—that a primary was not an essential part of an election as that term was understood by framers of the Constitution. Thus freed of the prosecution, Newberry took his seat in 1922, but only after a 46 to 41 vote of his colleagues. The Supreme Court decision and the vote to admit Newberry to the Senate were so hotly criticized over the country that the embattled Senator served less than a year in office. He resigned November 19, 1922, and the Governor of Michigan appointed to succeed him James Couzens, who became an outstanding Senator.

Such is the historical background of the Senate's vote to approve the Hennings-Keating amendment. Democrats, including those paired and announced, supported the amendment 40 to 24, while Republicans opposed it 18 to 16. Since primaries regularly decide many election contests, especially in southern States, a renewed effort to exempt them from spending controls can be expected. We hope that the lines will hold firm in the Senate, and that the House can be persuaded to go along. It is high time that the country corrected the Newberry decision.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill having been read the third time, the question is, Shall it pass?

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. President, on the question of final passage of the bill I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Mr. President, at the close of the debate on the bill, and after the amendments have been acted upon, I should like to take a moment or two to make as clear as possible, in broad generalities, the reasons why I shall vote against the bill.

In the first place, I believe it starts with the creation of a false impression in the minds of the people. It was denominated—for what reason I do not know—a "clean elections" bill. In my view it would do nothing to clean up the evils which have heretofore existed in connection with elections. I do not believe the bill would add anything to the sanctity or security of elections.

On the contrary, because of certain amendments which have been adopted on the floor during the debate, it opens the gate further to the misuse by certain people of the power which they possess to influence and control elections with money which they do not own or possess, but which they divert from other purposes in order to control elections in the way they would like to see them go. I refer to the labor bosses. The bill would do nothing to curb the procedure by which labor bosses can take the money of union members and use it contrary to the opinions and wishes of many union members, in influencing and controlling elections.

So far as I am personally concerned, or so far as candidates for office in my State are concerned, it makes little difference whether the bill is passed or whether the law remains the same as it has been heretofore. In my State, as a rule, we spend comparatively little money on election campaigns. It is almost unheard of in my State that election workers are hired or paid for. The idea of spending hundreds of thousands of dollars upon a political election, statewide or otherwise, in my State, is simply unknown.

Mr. President, we have an accounting procedure in my State which I believe to be completely adequate. I have no objection, and I am sure other candidates in my State have no objection, to the filing of reports of contributions, so as to make a clear exposition of the amounts received and spent.

Therefore, so far as elections in my State are concerned, the pending bill will not change the situation one iota. However, we have seen from time to time representatives of certain groups come into my State, subsidized and paid for by moneys which were not originally contributed for political purposes, and attempt, through coercion and otherwise, to influence elections. We have seen in my State money come in from certain organizations and groups who have claimed to be exempt from control, and would still be exempt under the bill, and we have seen that money come in by the thousands of dollars, in green cash bills, and diverted to political channels in my State for the purpose of controlling elections. This bill will do nothing at all to correct that evil. The same persons who have been performing in that manner in the past in my State will continue to perform in the same manner in the future if the bill is enacted.

I said at the outset that the pending bill has been, in my view, mistakenly denominated—for what reason I do not know—as a clean elections bill. I do not say that it is a dirty elections bill. However I say that the term "clean elections bill" is a misnomer, because it will mislead the public into thinking that we have done something to correct the major evils which we all know exist.

I for one will not vote for the bill, when I believe it not only utterly fails to reach the evils we would like to reach in connection with elections, but also, in my judgment, completely fools many of the people of the country into thinking that it is a corrective measure. It is not in any degree. It does not reach those things we would like to reach. I believe the passage of the bill will create a misconception and will fool people for at least a time into thinking that we have done something we have not done.

Mr. President, I will not lend my vote to that kind of business in the Senate. I am not going to lend my support to it, in spite of the fact, as I say, it would be very easy to vote for the bill, I presume, because it does not affect my State one way or another. We are not particularly concerned, because it does not do anything to clean up the situation which has existed interstate. In my State we have no objection to reporting, and we have no objection to thorough reporting. We have a limitation on expenditures, and we have a limitation on the use of money. As it stands today, the law can be circumvented in my State, as is the case in every other State in the Union; and the way the law will stand if the bill is passed, the same circumvention can occur.

Therefore I cannot go before the public in my State and say we now have passed a clean elections bill, when I do not believe any such thing. I believe an examination of it will show that to be the fact. I think the bill will, in effect, if passed, prevent a great many honorable, zealous people who would like to see good public officials elected to office, from contributing, in many instances, of their substance to see that that is done. It will do nothing to prevent the corruptionists and those who would seek to direct elections for ulterior purposes from carrying on in the same way as in the past. I, therefore, wish to make it clear that I cannot support a bill which I believe to be a subterfuge in connection with all the civic, political, and human rights we are entitled to exercise in free elections.

Mr. ERVIN. Mr. President, I expected to vote for the pending bill in the form in which it came from the committee. However, it has been amended so as to confer upon the Federal Government the power to regulate primaries. In my opinion one of the most tragic things that is happening to this country today is the continuing centralization of power in Washington.

I have not yet contracted Potomac fever. I still believe that the people of the States have enough intelligence and enough character to regulate the conduct of primaries and conventions and caucuses, as they have done since 1789. I see no reason for changing the rule, which has been in operation since the foundation of this Republic. Since the primary amendment has been incorporated in the bill, I cannot vote for the bill. This is true because I believe that the continuing centralization of power in Washington imports tragedy for this Nation.

Mr. JORDAN. Mr. President, I should like to associate myself with the remarks made by the distinguished senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. ERVIN]. I am a member of the Committee on Rules and Administration, which considered the bill in committee in the first session of the 86th Congress. Bringing primaries under the provisions of the bill was killed in committee. The bill as reported by the committee did not contain such a provision. The amendment has been added. I cannot support it as the bill now stands, and I shall vote against it.

North Carolina has good election laws to regulate primaries and elections. I believe it would be a reflection upon the honor and integrity of North Carolina to say that the Federal Government must come to North Carolina to regulate primaries in North Carolina. Therefore, I am opposed to the bill with the primary election section contained in it, as it now stands.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I shall not detain the Senate, but I believe that at this point it might be well to summarize precisely what the bill in its present form will do. I ask the indulgence of the Senator from Missouri to correct me if I am in error.

Mr. President, it would apply to both general elections and primaries, and would become effective on the first of January 1961. It does not, however, relieve any candidate from making a report and filing it under the existing Corrupt Practices Act.

Second, with respect to expenditure limits, candidates could spend one of three amounts: Either $50,000 or 20 cents for the first million voters in the last general election, plus 10 cents for each voter over that number; or 20 cents for each of the first million registered voters, and 10 cents for all voters over 1 million.

In the case of candidates for President and Vice President, in a general election, they could spend 20 cents for each voter in the last general election, but in the primary they could spend only one-half of that amount. In the case of national committees, all of them could spend an amount equal to 20 cents per voter for the number of voters in the last general election.

With respect to the contribution limitation, there is an across-the-board limitation of $10,000 per person.

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me to interrupt him on one point he has mentioned, before he gets away from it, I should like to say that it is not "all" committees, but each of the committees.

Mr. DIRKSEN. That is true. I meant each committee. I was probably using "all" in the same sense. With respect to contributions, the across-the-board limitation is $10,000. I am reminded of a senatorial campaign, when I went to an advertising agency. I had noticed a beautiful illuminated sign on top of a building. I said to the manager of the agency, "What would that cost a month?" He said, "It would cost $1,500 for 30 days."

So we would limit the contribution by an individual, who, because his country has been good to him, might wish to contribute infinitely more, to a sum equivalent to the cost of seven illuminated billboards. He can give as much as he likes to his church. He can give as much as he likes to his lodge. He can give as much as he likes to his country club. However, when it comes to his country and he wants to help to elect to public office people who will represent his point of view, we say the limit is $10,000.

The next item is with respect to reports. From here on out, every candidate ought to be a bookkeeper, a detective, an accountant with a CPA degree, and a flair for politics, all rolled into one. There will have to be four reports in the case of every committee, large or small, national, State, or local, if in the case of such committee as much as $2,500 of the funds available is expended for a national candidate.

The report embraces, roughly, nine different categories of information.

Then there comes the problem of evaluating the services of money raisers, clerks, accountants, typists, and ghost writers, and everything else which goes along with a campaign. There will be three places in which to file these reports: with the Senate, with the House, and with the appropriate U.S. district court. Interestingly enough, these reports will have to remain on file for a period of 6 years. That is the equivalent of three terms in the House of Representatives. So if a Member of the House is elected in November 1960, then for the equivalent of three full terms that report will be on file and open for inspection.

With respect to the committees, in every case they will have to make apportionments and allocations to show how much the sheriff received of the committee funds, how much was devoted to the Governor, how much to the auditor of public accounts, how much to the State treasurer, how much to the Representative, and how much to the Senator, to determine whether or not the amounts for a Federal officer, paid out of the committee till, amounted to $2,500.

In the case of individuals, so far as reports are concerned, the limit is $100. When an individual contributes $100 or more in any calendar year in two or more States, that individual, as I read the bill, must make four reports. It will take a little bit of doing before we get through.

The effect of the bill, as I measure it, with respect to committees, is this: Obviously, it will be necessary to determine whether the Senator or the Representative received $2,500 from any committee; if so, then, of course, a report must be made.

Penalties are provided. This is a criminal statute. I can readily imagine that humble people, who have been an essential part of the working political organism of the country, on the advice of counsel, if they go to see counsel, will back off and refuse to serve as treasurer of a county committee because they do not know exactly when, where, or how to make reports, or when they might be headed for the jail. In addition to this, all the State reports will have to be made.

With respect to out-of-State contributors, a contributor from out of a State, contributing in another State, would obviously have to make a report. As I read it, a man who has his own fiscal means will be the one who derives the big advantage from a bill like this.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Is my understanding correct that, if a citizen is requested to serve on one of the committees, he will serve at his peril? That is, in the event some report is not filed, will he be subjected to a $5,000 fine and a penitentiary term if he is guilty of dereliction in connection with the filing of one of the reports?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Let me put it in this form: Whether it be in a county in Illinois or a parish in Louisiana, let us suppose a man has served as precinct committeeman for a long time. The county committee meets within 30 days after the primary election. They organize. They select a chairman, a vice chairman, a secretary, and a treasurer. Suppose they want to honor a fine old chap who has been lugging in the votes and doing his duty as a citizen. They make him treasurer of the committee. Either he or some clerk will have to make the report.

County committees normally do not have the personnel whom they can keep on their payroll in order to make reports. So the treasurer of the committee becomes responsibile for the report. If as much as $2,500 from the county committee till was spent for the election of a Senator or a Representative, that gives the matter a Federal character. Then a report has to be made in a number of places.

So the treasurer will begin to back off a little. He will say, as would a treasurer in Louisiana—certainly it would be the case in Illinois—"Well, now, I don't understand all this abstruse business. I guess I will have to go and get myself a lawyer." Then he begins to speculate about it, goes home, and talks to his wife.

His wife may say, "John, if I were you, I just wouldn't do it. I would go down to the next meeting of the county committee and resign."

Mr. President, Aristotle said that man is a political animal. He is. He thinks politically. All people do. I am not going to be one to take the political animal and put him in a straitjacket, because politics is not only politics in this country; it is diversion and recreation and society, as well, in so many areas. So we will be making it rather difficult and rather confusing.

The point I make is simply this: The man who has his own means is the fellow who does not have to worry about expenses. Assume 4 million votes will be cast in the State of Illinois. That is 20 cents for the first million, or $200,000; 10 cents for the next 3 million, $300,000. That is $500,000 which a candidate can spend. A man having his own financial means will have that amount to spend, and he can spend it out of his own pocket.

Mr. President, where do you think a humble citizen like me would get off, who has to go forth and tap everybody he possibly can in order to get a little money with which to buy television time at $100 a minute; to buy radio time; to buy newspaper space at $8 a running column? The deal favors the man having his own means, because he has the money to spend; and the bill says: "This is the amount you can spend." If he has the money, and if he is interested enough in coming to the Senate or the House of Representatives, let Senators tell me if we are not today putting a premium on a great big, fat bankroll as a qualification for holding Federal public office in the United States. It stands to reason that such a person is the one who will benefit.

Then I must point out, again, that this is a criminal statute. Penalties are provided for its violation. A fine and imprisonment are provided for. So Senators can see what will happen.

The candidate will have to be like Pooh Bah, in the Mikado. He will have to be the Lord Chancellor of the Exchequer, the Prime Minister, the Lord High Executioner, and everybody else. The candidate will have to be a pretty good bookkeeper; he will have to keep account of the $10,000 limit. If anyone wants to give him a little money, he will have to know how much has gone to other committees. Then he will have to go around and say to the boys, "I can't ask you for $100, because if I do, and if you send a little money over to Bill Jones, BOURKE HICKENLOOPER's friend in Iowa, you will have to make four reports. So I'll tell you what to do. Just give me $99."

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. HENNINGS. I had not expected to take part, in the Senate, today, in a lengthy debate on the bill, which, come Wednesday, will have been under consideration for 2 weeks. I think Senators are well aware that many arguments can be made on both sides of the bill, including the amendments.

The Senator from Illinois paints a rather distressing view in his picture of a humble citizen who might serve as treasurer of a political committee. The Senator is aware, I am sure, that the Corrupt Practices Act of 1925 imposes criminal penalties.

The Senator cannot quite have it both ways. He said a man who loves his country cannot contribute more than $10,000 a year. Thereafter, he says that campaign costs are exceedingly high, but that a man, his wife, and eldest son could contribute much more than $10,000, considering all the assets and means of some families and groups in this country.

I do not want to get into a discussion of the rather extreme conclusions which I believe have been postulated by the Senator's speech.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Does that make any difference with respect to what is in the bill?

Mr. HENNINGS. No. The Senator from Illinois was not for the bill at the outset; I would scarcely expect him to be for it now.

May I ask the Senator from Illinois whether, campaign costs having now reached the astronomical figures he has suggested, from his having investigated the cost of a neon sign—I believe that that was the sort of sign he considered—he would be in favor of our attempting to raise the archaic, obsolete limits prescribed by the Corrupt Practices Act of 1925?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I will make the Senator from Missouri a deal. I will offer an amendment to take only those items which raise the expenditure total for a candidate, and are in the existing Corrupt Practices Act, and stop right there. I will take away all the provisions about reports, if my friend will accept that proposal.

Mr. HENNINGS. I regret exceedingly that I cannot speak for the Senate. I regret that I am offered only a Hobson's choice. I think it is lamentable that the Senator did not project his deal during the consideration of the amendments.

However the deal might have been regarded, the Senator knows what the Senate has done with the amendments which have been accepted by the Senate and with others which have been voted upon, and I am sure that while the Senator can make a ludicrous case about many, many fine people being taken off to jail for some violations, the Senator is aware which penalties are provided. The Corrupt Practices Act of 1925 likewise provided penalties. The Corrupt Practices Act of 1925 provided for more reports by committees than this bill provides. This bill requires semiannual reports; the Corrupt Practices Act required quarterly reports. There are many, many other points I could make, but I shall not detain the Senate further.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I must close with two observations. First, the Senator from Missouri mentioned that a man can give $10,000; his wife can give $10,000; his children can give $10,000. Of course, everybody knows that would be in the nature of a subterfuge, and that family would be investigated by a Senate investigating committee.

If the Senator wants choice reading, I refer him to the book by the distinguished Senator from Tennessee [Mr. GORE], written after making an investigation. I had the pleasure of going over it last night. I am going to keep it as a memento and keepsake, because I may receive $10,000, but ultimately it will be spun out before some Senate investigating committee ere we get through.

The other point I wanted to make was this. I have been on this floor every day. I have been on the floor all the time while these amendments have been under consideration. My friend from Missouri, I am sure, will not contend that the minority leader was lacking in diligence in pursuing this bill, because certain amendments which were offered by him were adopted, and he knows how the Senate disposed of other amendments. But if my friend will make with me the same deal that he made with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. KEFAUVER] on the tax amendment, and say, "We will take it to conference," I suggest the striking out of everything except the increase in expenditure allowances, and then I shall be able to vote for the bill.

I have made my case, and I am prepared for the vote.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. President, the junior Senator from South Dakota was under the impression there were a few matters in the bill that changed existing law. For the RECORD, I should like to ask one or two questions of the Senator from Missouri.

In the committee report on the bill, I read, on page 4, the following:

> S. 2436 shares with the existing law its basic theories and its remedies. Still there is some difference in the emphasis on certain aspects of disclosure. While the existing law establishes the principle of public disclosure on the national level, S. 2436 lays special stress on the availability of information as to campaign financing not only on the national, but also on the local level.

I should like to ask the Senator from Missouri his opinion, and the opinion of the committee in reporting the bill, as to whether making reports available on the local level would be a salutary improvement of the election process.

Mr. HENNINGS. I am very glad the Senator from South Dakota has asked the question. We have undertaken to say, during the course of the discussion of this bill, that reports on the local level—I think it might be a better phrase to say in the neighborhod area, and that would apply to any State official authorized by law to accept reports—would tend to a greater dissemination and understanding of just who is contributing, what expenditures are being made, and in what amounts. That certainly is the purpose of the provision.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I read further, on page 5 of the committee report, this statement:

> Existing law, despite its professed philosophy that corrupt election practices can be cured or prevented by full disclosure of campaign financing, fails to provide for a wide dissemination of reports dealing with campaign contributions and expenditures. According to present law these reports are to be filed with the Clerk of the House, and by senatorial candidates also with the Secretary of the Senate. [See par. 9.3.2.1 below.] It is obvious that in these circumstances only through the media of the press can the public at large be sufficiently informed about the sources and the volume of campaign financing. At present, only the representatives of the press have easy access to campaign reports filed with the mentioned officers of the Congress. Even so, the existing law fails to require that these officers permit the copying of reports by modern mechanical means. At present, in fact, it happens that even committees of the Senate are not allowed, without special permission of the Speaker of the House, to have these reports photostated.

As I understand, the bill before the Senate requires the filing of these reports with the nearest district court, or, in the event State law designates some State official to receive reports of this nature, they may be filed with him. Is that correct?

Mr. HENNINGS. The Senator is exactly correct, and the purposes are self-evident.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Was it the opinion of the committee and the chairman of the committee reporting the bill that the making of reports available at the local level would improve the climate under which elections would be conducted?

Mr. HENNINGS. It was thought, I will say to the learned Senator, that having the reports available in the area where the candidate lives, filing them with either the district court or the State officer, would enable the press and others interested, including the opponents of one candidate or the other, to have access to the reports at home, in the State, for the purpose of the legitimate use of the reports in presenting them to the people, so that the people might know.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. President, in my experience, when one lives in a State that is some distance from Washington, when one is busy with a campaign it is very difficult for him to determine in advance of the election whether the reports which were filed in advance of the election with the officers of Congress had any particular significance that would have any bearing upon the election. We have traditionally gotten those reports 2 or 3 days after they were filed, when the election was in its last days, and no opportunity for an analytic study of them was available. I had thought, and I have been supporting the bill under the impression, that the filing of reports within the State, at the local level, would be of material assistance to candidates in knowing what was going on with respect to the financing of the opposition.

Mr. HENNINGS. The Senator has well stated the purpose of the provision relating to which he has inquired.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. There is one other section of the bill which I had been under the impression was of some value, and that was the requirement about transfers from one political committee or candidate to another.

I noted, at page 10 of the committee report, the statement that reports by political committees shall contain:

> (4) Name and address of each political committee or candidate from which the committee received any transfer of funds;
> (8) Name and address of each political committee or candidate to which the committee made any transfer of funds.

That requirement is provided by this bill and is not a provision of the existing law.

Is it a fact that the bill does make these changes, cited as section 202(a) (4) and (8), relating to reports filed by political committees of transfer of funds?

Mr. HENNINGS. The Senator's support of this bill has been exceedingly helpful, and his able analysis of these provisions is again correct to philosophy, foundation, and ultimate effect.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Is the Senator of the opinion that the requirements for the reporting of transfer of funds both by a committee that has transferred them and the requirement that the name and address of the committee and candidate to whom the funds may be transferred also will have a salutary effect upon the conduct of elections?

Mr. HENNINGS. I think it is beyond cavil that it will, and that is one of the objectives we desire to accomplish.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Because of these changes and also because I think the provisions which update the law with respect to the cost of elections are definite improvements over the present law, I intend to vote for the bill. In South Dakota I do not think we have been running close to the maximum in past elections, but I recognize that in larger States a realistic look at the situation does involve some updating, if one may call it that, within the permissive limits of contributions and expenditures.

For that reason, as well as for the reason that the changes which I have indicated will be for the better in making for healthier and sounder elections, I shall vote for the bill.

Mr. STENNIS. Mr. President, I certainly shall not detain the Senate at length. I have tried to follow the course of this bill. I am amazed that the Senate of the United States would pass this bill at a time when very few Members actually know what is in the bill in its present form. No copy of the bill as amended is available, whereby one can make a final study or analysis of it, unless it be in the hands of the chairman of the committee, who has certainly rendered fine service in handling the bill. I have no criticism of him. But it is a fact which should be noted for the record that, so far as the Senator from Mississippi has been able to ascertain, there is available no copy of this bill in its amended form that can be had so as to make a comparison or study of the bill with the present law or with the original bill.

I have a memorandum I prepared in regard to the original bill, as reported by the committee, and virtually every point noted about the bill, as originally presented to the Senate, is now out of date and incorrect, reversed in one way or the other by the floor amendments.

I am further amazed, Mr. President, to observe that 99 men and one lady, representing States of the United States, come to the Senate Chamber and, by one vote—by one sweep of the pen, so to speak—block out and obliterate a large part of the election laws of the respective States. I refer particularly to the primary election laws.

I do not think anyone has any complaint about those laws in my State. I know they are very strict, so strict that a U.S. Senator has to travel 2,000 miles to go home to vote. We do not have an absentee ballot provision in our election law, because that opens up avenues of abuse. The laws are rigidly followed and they are protected and respected. I know it is a matter of honor in my State for one to be chosen as an election manager. I have not heard of much money being spent there in any election.

Members of the Senate are elected from States at large to represent the States as such, and it is simply inconceivable to me, Mr. President, with all defense to them, that a majority would come forward and with one sweep wipe out State election laws to such an extent as has been done.

I was looking at a map of the United States today. There are more than 3,000 counties. Those are the great training grounds for citizenship, which make our large Nation distinctive from almost any other major nation in the world. We have more than 3,000 counties. Each of those counties is represented in a so-called upper branch and a so-called lower branch in one of 50 State legislatures.

How can we assume that we have the collective wisdom of this Nation with reference to the election laws in precincts, in counties, and in States? How could our vision be so superior? How could our judgment be so superior to that of all these other men and women, in 50 legislatures representing more than 3,000 counties, as we try to work out a sound, sane, practical program for regulating, controlling, and conducting elections in those precincts.

With all deference, I submit that the bill should be defeated, or referred to the committee for further work on the subject which needs some attention, as to the amounts of expenditures.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, lest the remarks of my distinguished friend, colleague and neighbor, the junior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. STENNIS], leads someone to think that some unusual course has been followed with respect to this bill, I respectfully suggest that it has followed the course of all proposed legislation. Every amendment which has been agreed to has been stated and is printed in the RECORD. The bill now before the Senate in its amended form is discernible to all who have followed the amendments.

I do not claim that this is a perfect bill. I regret that it is not more stringent. I am particularly regretful that its effective date has been postponed.

But it is a start, Mr. President. It is a start—and a good start. I hope the other body will improve it. I hope that at a later time, before another election in 1962, we shall have an opportunity to strengthen the law further.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill having been read the third time, the question is, Shall it pass? On this question the yeas and nays have been ordered, and the clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. ELLENDER (when his name was called). On this vote I have a pair with the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. RANDOLPH]. If present and voting he would vote "yea." If I were at liberty to vote I would vote "nay." I therefore withhold my vote.

The rollcall was concluded.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I announce that the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY], the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY], the Senator from Montana [Mr. MURRAY], the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY], the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. RANDOLPH], and the Senator from Missouri [Mr. SYMINGTON] are absent on official business. I also announce that the Senator from Idaho [Mr. CHURCH], the Senator from California [Mr. ENGLE], and the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. KERR] are absent because of illness.

I further announce that if present and voting, the Senator from Idaho [Mr. CHURCH], the Senator from California [Mr. ENGLE], the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY], the Senator from Washington [Mr. JACKSON], the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY], the Senator from Montana [Mr. MURRAY], the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY], and the Senator from Missouri [Mr. SYMINGTON] would each vote "yea."

The Senator from Florida [Mr. SMATHERS] is absent on official business for the Latin America Trade Study Mission as chairman of the Latin America Trade Subcommittee of the Senate Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee.

The Senator from Washington [Mr. JACKSON] is absent on official business attending the christening of a U.S. naval vessel.

Mr. KUCHEL. I announce that the Senator from Indiana [Mr. CAPEHART] is absent because of death in his family.

The Senator from Maryland [Mr. BEALL], the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. CURTIS], the Senator from Idaho [Mr. DWORSHAK], the Senator from Arizona [Mr. GOLDWATER], the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SALTONSTALL], and the Senator from Kansas [Mr. SCHOEPPEL] are necessarily absent.

If present and voting, the Senator from Maryland (Mr. BEALL) and the Senator from Idaho (Mr. DWORSHAK) would each vote "yea."

On this vote, the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. CURTIS] is paired with the Senator from Arizona [Mr. GOLDWATER]. If present and voting, the Senator from Nebraska would vote "yea" and the Senator from Arizona would vote "nay."

The result was announced: yeas 59, nays 22, as follows:

Definitions

SEC. 102. As used in this title and title II, unless the context clearly indicates otherwise—

(1) The term "election" includes a general, special, or primary election, including a preferential primary, and a convention or a caucus of a political party held for the purpose of nominating candidates;

(2) The term "candidate" means an individual whose name is presented at an election for nomination for, or election as, President or Vice President, or Senator or Representative in, or Resident Commissioner to, the Congress of the United States, whether or not such individual is nominated or elected;

(3) The term "political committee" includes any committee, association, or organization which accepts contributions or makes expenditures in an aggregate amount exceeding $2,500 in any calendar year for the purpose of influencing or attempting to influence in any manner whatsoever the election of a candidate or candidates or presidential or vice presidential electors;

(4) The term "contribution" includes a gift, subscription, loan, advance, or deposit, of money, or anything of value, or transfer of funds between committees, and includes a contract, promise, or agreement, whether or not legally enforcible, to make a contribution;

(5) The term "expenditure" includes a payment, distribution, loan, advance, deposit, or gift, of money, or anything of value, or transfer of funds between committees, and includes a contract, promise, or agreement, whether or not legally enforcible, to make an expenditure;

(6) The term "person" includes an individual, partnership, committee, association, corporation, and any other organization or group of persons; and

(7) The term "State" includes the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, any possession of the United States, and the District of Columbia.

TITLE II—CAMPAIGN PRACTICES

Organization of political committees

SEC. 201. (a) Every political committee shall have a chairman and a treasurer. No contribution shall be accepted, and no expenditure made, by or on behalf of a political committee for the purpose of influencing an election until such chairman and treasurer have been chosen. No expenditure shall be made for or on behalf of a political committee without the authorization of its chairman or treasurer.

(b) Every person who receives a contribution for a political committee shall, on demand of the treasurer, and in any event within five days after the receipt of such contribution, render to the treasurer a detailed account thereof, including the name and address of the person making such contribution, and the date on which received. It shall be the duty of the treasurer to see to it that all contributions received by or for a committee shall be kept separate from any personal funds and deposited in a special account.

(c) It shall be the duty of the treasurer of a political committee to keep a detailed and exact account of—

(1) all contributions made to or for such committee;

(2) the name and address of every person making any such contribution, and the date thereof;

(3) all expenditures made by or on behalf of such committee; and

(4) the name and address of every person to whom any such expenditure is made, and the date thereof.

(d) It shall be the duty of the treasurer to obtain and keep a receipted bill, stating the particulars, for every expenditure by or on behalf of a political committee exceeding $100 in amount. The treasurer shall preserve all receipted bills and accounts required to be kept by this section for a period of two years from the date of the filing of the statement containing such items.

Reports by political committees

SEC. 202. (a) The treasurer of a political committee shall file reports of receipts and expenditures with the Clerk of the House of Representatives, on forms to be prescribed by him, and shall transmit a copy of such reports (except as provided in section 207 (b)) to the clerk of the United States district court for the district in which the principal office of the committee is located. Such reports shall be filed, complete as of June 30 and December 31 of each year, and as of the tenth day next preceding the date on which an election is to be held, and as of the thirtieth day following an election, with respect to which contributions were received or expenditures made by such committee. In each instance reports shall be filed not later than the third day following the reporting date as above provided. Each report shall contain—

(1) the amount of cash on hand at the beginning of the reporting period;

(2) the name and address of each person who has made a contribution to or for such committee in one or more items of the aggregate amount or value, within the calendar year, of $100 or more, together with the amount and date of such contribution; and for the purposes of this paragraph the term "contribution", as used herein, shall not include transfers of funds to or from political committees or candidates;

(3) the total sum of individual contributions made to or for such committee during the calendar year and not stated under paragraph (2);

(4) the name and address of each political committee or candidate from which the committee received any transfer of funds, together with the amounts and dates of all such transfers;

(5) the total sum of all contributions made to or for such committee during the calendar year;

(6) the name and address of each person to whom an expenditure has been made by such committee in one or more items of the aggregate amount of value, within the calendar year, of $100 or more, and the amount, date, and purpose of such expenditure;

(7) the total sum of all expenditures made by such committee, during the calendar year and not stated under paragraph (6);

(8) the name and address of each political committee or candidate to which the committee made any transfer of funds, together with the amounts and dates of all such transfers; and

(9) the total sum of expenditures made by such committee during the calendar year.

(b) The reports required to be filed by subsection (a) shall be cumulative during the calendar year to which they relate, but where there has been no change in an item reported in a previous report only the amount need be carried forward.

(c) The report required to be filed as of December 31 shall cover the entire calendar year.

(d) In the case of political committees supporting candidates for President, Vice President, or Senator, a copy of the report filed with the Clerk of the House of Representatives under subsection (a) shall be filed with the Secretary of the Senate.

(e) The reports required to be filed by subsection (a) of this section shall also contain a list of the names of candidates in whose behalf contributions were received or expenditures made. In the case of political committees supporting more than one candidate (and State and local candidates), the amount of the total expenditures allocable to each candidate—

(1) shall be in the same ratio as expenditures on behalf of each candidate for printing and advertising, radio time, and television time bears to the total of such expenditures, or

(2) where no expenditures were made for Federal candidates for any of such purposes there shall be charged to each Federal candidate an amount equal to the full expenditure divided by the total number of candidates, Federal and State; except that expenditures specifically designated for an individual candidate shall be charged to such candidate.

(f) Whenever any report is filed by the treasurer of any political committee pursuant to subsection (a), such treasurer at the same time shall transmit a true and correct copy of such report to each candidate on whose behalf such report reflects any contribution received, or any expenditure made, by such political committee.

Reports by others than political committees

SEC. 203. Every person (other than those filing reports pursuant to section 202) who makes an expenditure in one or more items aggregating $100 or more within a calendar year, other than by contribution to a political committee, for the purpose of influencing, in two or more States, election of candidates, shall file with the Clerk of the House of Representatives, on a form to be prescribed by him, an itemized detailed report of such expenditures in the same manner as required of the treasurer of a political committee by section 202, and shall file a copy thereof (subject to the provisions of section 207(b)) with the clerk of the United States district court for the district in which such expenditures are made, and in the case of any expenditure in support of a candidate for President, Vice President, or United States Senator, shall file a copy of the report with the Secretary of the Senate.

Reports by candidates

SEC. 204. (a) Every candidate shall file with the Clerk of the House of Representatives, on a form to be prescribed by him, reports of receipts and expenditures and shall transmit a copy thereof to the Secretary of the Senate if a candidate for Senator, and (except as provided in section 207(b)) to the clerk of the U.S. district court for the district in which the candidate resides. Such reports shall be complete as of the 10th day next preceding the date on which an election for the office for which he is a candidate is to be held, and as of the fortieth day following such election, and in each instance shall be filed not later than the third day following the reporting date; except that where a candidate in order to qualify for the general election must run in two successive primaries in one party no second report on the first primary will be required for those candidates participating in the second primary if reports filed for the second primary are cumulative and supplementary of the report filed before the first primary. Such reports shall contain a correct and itemized detailed report of contributions received and expenditures made by him in aid or support of his candidacy for election, or for the purpose of influencing the result of the election, in the same manner as required of the treasurer of a political committee by section 202, including amounts expended from his own funds.

(b) The reports required to be filed by subsection (a) shall be cumulative, but where there has been no change in an item reported in a previous report, only the amount need be carried forward.

(c) Every candidate shall enclose with his first report a statement, based upon the records of the proper State official, giving the total number of votes cast for all candidates for the office which the candidate seeks (or the number of persons registered to vote), in the election required to be used as a basis for the computation under section 208(b)(2).

Formal requirements on filing reports and statements

SEC. 205. The reports and statements required by this title to be filed by a candidate, a treasurer of a political committee, or by any other person, with the Clerk of the House of Representatives and the copies thereof required to be filed with the Secretary of the Senate, and (subject to the provisions of section 207(b)) with the clerk of the United States district court—

(1) shall be verified by the oath or affirmation of the person filing such report or statement, taken before any officer authorized to administer oaths;

(2) shall be deemed properly filed when delivered to the specified recipient, or when deposited in an established post office within the prescribed time, duly stamped, registered, and properly addressed, but in the event it is not received, a duplicate of such report or statement shall be promptly filed upon notice of its nonreceipt by the officer with whom it is required to be filed; and

(3) a copy shall be preserved by the person filing it for a period of one year from the date of filing.

Duties of the Clerk of the House of Representatives and the Secretary of the Senate

SEC. 206. It shall be the duty of the Clerk of the House of Representatives and of the Secretary of the Senate—

(1) to preserve the reports and statements filed under this title for a period of six years from the date of receipt;

(2) to make such reports and statements available for public inspection during regular office hours;

(3) to make such reports and statements available for such inspection within twenty-four hours of their receipt by them; and

(4) to permit copying of any such report or statement by hand or by duplicating machine, as requested by any person, at the expense of such person.

Duties of clerks of United States district courts

SEC. 207. (a) It shall be the duty of the clerks of United States district courts—

(1) to receive and maintain in an orderly manner all reports and statements required by this Act to be filed with such clerks;

(2) to maintain such reports and statements for public inspection for a period of six years from the date of receipt;

(3) to make such reports and statements available for public inspection during regular office hours;

(4) to make available for public inspection each report and statement within twenty-four hours of its receipt; and

(5) to permit copying of any such report or statement by hand or by duplicating machine, as requested by any person, at the expense of such person.

(b) In States where the secretary of state or other State official is authorized to perform the duties specified in this section, the filing of reports and statements under this title shall be with such State official in lieu of the filing with the clerk of the United States district court.

Limitations upon amount of expenditures

SEC. 208. (a) A candidate for Senator or Representative in, or Resident Commissioner to, the Congress of the United States, in his campaign for election, shall not make expenditures in excess of the amount which he may lawfully make under the provisions of this title.

(b) A candidate, in his campaign for election (treating primaries, nominating conventions, caucuses, and special and general elections as separate for the purposes of this limitation), may make expenditures up to—

(1) the sum of $50,000 if a candidate for Senator or Representative at Large, or the sum of $12,500 if a candidate for Representative or Resident Commissioner; or

(2) in the case of an election other than a caucus or nominating convention an amount equal to the higher of the following:

(A)(i) the amount obtained by multiplying 20 cents by the total number, not in excess of one million, of votes cast in the last general election for all candidates for the office which the candidate seeks, plus (ii) the amount obtained by multiplying 10 cents by the total number of such votes in excess of one million; or

(B)(i) the amount obtained by multiplying 20 cents by the total number, not in excess of one million, of persons registered to vote in the general election for the office which the candidate seeks, plus (ii) the amount obtained by multiplying 10 cents by the total number of such persons in excess of one million.

(c) Candidates for elections as President and Vice President who are nominees of a political party, in their campaign for election, shall not make expenditures in excess of an amount equal to the amount obtained by multiplying 20 cents by the largest number of voters casting votes for presidential electors in any one of the last three preceding elections. For the purpose of the limitation prescribed in this subsection, there shall be included the expenditures made by or on behalf of either or both candidates.

(d) A candidate for nomination for the office of President or Vice President, in his campaign for such nomination, shall not make expenditures in an amount in excess of 50 per centum of the amount prescribed in subsection (c), above.

(e) Money expended by a candidate to meet and discharge any assessment, fee, or charge made or levied upon candidates by the laws of the State in which he resides, or expended for his necessary personal, traveling, or subsistence expenses, or for stationery, postage, writing, or printing (other than for use on billboards or in newspapers), for distributing letters, circulars, or posters, or for telegraph or telephone service, shall not be included in determining whether his expenditures have exceeded the sum fixed by paragraph (1) or (2) of subdivision (b) as the limit of campaign expenses of a candidate.

General penalties for violations

SEC. 209. (a) Any person who violates any of the provisions of this title shall be fined not more than $1,000 or imprisoned not more than one year, or both.

(b) Any person who willfully violates any provision of this title shall be fined not more than $10,000 and imprisoned not more than two years.

Expenses of election contests

SEC. 210. This Act shall not limit or affect the right of any person to make contributions or expenditures for proper legal expenses in contesting the results of an election.

Effect on State laws

SEC. 211. This Act shall not be construed to annul, or to exempt any candidate from complying with, the laws of any State relating to the nomination or election of candidates, unless such laws are directly inconsistent with the provisions of this Act: Provided, That the limitations on expenditures prescribed in section 208 shall supersede any such limitations prescribed in State laws which differ therefrom.

Partial invalidity

SEC. 212. If any provision of this Act or the application thereof to any person or circumstance is held invalid, the validity of the remainder of the Act and of the application of such provision to other persons and circumstances shall not be affected thereby.

Repealing clause

SEC. 213. The Federal Corrupt Practices Act, 1925, and all other Acts or parts of Acts inconsistent herewith are repealed.

TITLE III—AMENDMENTS TO CRIMINAL CODE

Definitions

SEC. 301. Section 591 of title 18 of the United States Code is amended to read as follows:

Overall limitation on financial aid to candidates or political committees and prohibition of certain purchases

SEC. 302. Section 608 of title 18 of the United States Code is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 608. (a) Whoever, directly or indirectly, makes contributions or expenditures in an aggregate amount in excess of $10,000 during any calendar year, or in connection with any campaign for nomination or for election, for any or all of the following purposes—

"(1) to or on behalf of any candidate or candidates for an elective Federal office or offices, including the offices of President and Vice President of the United States and Presidential and Vice Presidential electors, or

"(2) to or on behalf of any committee or committees or other organizations engaged in furthering, advancing, or advocating the nomination or election of any candidate or candidates for any such office or offices or the success of any national political party, shall be fined not more than $5,000 or imprisoned not more than five years, or both.

"This subsection shall not apply to contributions or expenditures made by a political committee.

"(b) Whoever purchases any goods, commodities, advertising, or articles of any kind or description, the proceeds of which, or any portion thereof, directly or indirectly inures to the benefit of or for any candidate or any political committee shall be fined not more than $5,000 or imprisoned not more than five years, or both: Provided, however, That this subsection shall not apply to the purchase and sale by candidates and committees of campaign pins, buttons, and similar materials for prices not exceeding $5 per article: And provided further, That nothing in this subsection shall be construed to prohibit the purchase from any political committee of any goods, commodities, advertising, or articles sold by such political committees on a nonprofit basis, nor shall it interfere with the usual and known business, trade, or profession of any candidate.

"(c) In all cases of violations of this section by any person other than an individual, any officer, director, or managing head thereof who consents to such violation, shall be punished as herein provided."

Maximum contributions to and expenditures by interstate political committees

SEC. 303. The first paragraph of section 609 of title 18 of the United States Code is amended to read as follows:

"No political committee operating in two or more States shall receive contributions or make expenditures in any calendar year in amounts greater than the amount obtained by multiplying 20 cents by the highest number of voters casting votes for all candidates for the office of presidential elector in any one of the last three elections for that office."

Publication or distribution of election materials

SEC. 304. Section 612 of title 18 of the United States Code is amended by inserting after the word "names" wherever it appears therein the words "and addresses".

TITLE IV—EFFECTIVE DATE

Effective date

SEC. 401. Titles I and II and the amendments made by title III shall take effect on January 1, 1961, except that the provisions of this Act shall not apply to contributions and expenditures made prior to such date; but nothing in this Act shall relieve any person from filing any statements or reports required under the law in force prior to the date of enactment of this Act.

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

ECONOMIC REGULATION OF THE ALASKA RAILROAD

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Calendar No. 430, Senate bill 1508.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be stated by title for the information of the Senate.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. A bill (S. 1508) to provide for economic regulation of the Alaska Railroad under the Interstate Commerce Act, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Texas.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce with an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the first paragraph of the first section of the Act entitled "An Act to authorize the President of the United States to locate, construct, and operate railroads in the Territory of Alaska, and for other purposes", approved March 12, 1914 (38 Stat. 305), as amended (48 U.S.C. 301), is amended to read as follows:

"That the President of the United States is hereby empowered, authorized, and directed to adopt and use a name by which to designate the railroad or railroads and properties to be located, owned, acquired, or operated under the authority of this Act; to employ such officers, agents, or agencies, in his discretion, as may be necessary to enable him to carry out the purposes of this Act; to authorize and require such officers, agents, or agencies to perform any or all of the duties imposed upon him by the terms of this Act; to detail and require any officer or officers in the Engineer Corps in the Army or Navy to perform service under this Act; to fix the compensation of all officers, agents, or employees appointed or designated by him; to designate and cause to be located a route or routes for a line or lines of railroad in the State of Alaska not to exceed in the aggregate one thousand miles, to be so located as to connect one or more of the open Pacific Ocean harbors on the southern coast of Alaska with the navigable waters in the interior of Alaska, and with a coal field or fields so as best to aid in the development of the agricultural and mineral or other resources of Alaska, and the settlement of the public lands therein, and so as to provide transportation of coal for the Army and Navy, transportation of troops, arms, munitions of war, the mails, and for other governmental and public uses, and for the transportation of passengers and property; to construct and build a railroad or railroads along such route or routes as he may so designate and locate, with the necessary branch lines, feeders, sidings, switches, and spurs; to purchase or otherwise acquire all real and personal property necessary to carry out the purposes of this Act; to exercise the power of eminent domain in acquiring property for such use, which use is hereby declared to be a public use, by condemnation in the courts of Alaska in accordance with the laws now or hereafter in force there; to acquire rights of way, terminal grounds, and all other rights; to purchase or otherwise acquire all necessary equipment for the construction and operation of such railroad or railroads; to build or otherwise acquire docks, wharves, terminal facilities, and all structures needed for the equipment and operation of such railroad or railroads; to establish, change, or modify rates for the transportation of passengers and property; to receive compensation for the transportation of passengers and property, and to perform generally all the usual duties of a common carrier by railroad; to make and establish rules and regulations for the control and operation of said railroad or railroads: Provided, That effective one hundred and eighty days after the enactment of this proviso, and thereafter, the operation of the said railroad or railroads and the facilities and equipment thereof shall be subject to the provisions of part I of the Interstate Commerce Act, as amended, and related Acts, including the Acts of March 2, 1893; March 2, 1903, and April 14, 1910, known as the Safety Appliance Acts (45 U.S.C., secs. 1–16); the Act of May 6, 1910, known as the Accident Reports Act (45 U.S.C., secs. 38–43); the Acts of February 17, 1911, and March 4, 1915, known as the Boiler Inspection Acts (45 U.S.C., secs. 22–34); the Act of March 4, 1907, known as the Hours of Service Act (45 U.S.C., secs 61–64); the Act of April 22, 1908, known as the Employers' Liability Act (45 U.S.C., secs. 51–60); title I of the Railway Labor Act (45 U.S.C., secs. 151–163); and the Act known as the Explosives and Combustibles Act (18 U.S.C., secs. 831–835), and to the provisions of any applicable statutes regulating intrastate transportation enacted by the State of Alaska, in the same manner and to the same extent as if such railroad or railroads and facilities were privately owned and operated, except that approval of the Interstate Commerce Commission shall not be required for any extension of such railroad or railroads or for the issuance of securities, and except further that in carrying out its duties under section 20 of section 20 of the Interstate Commerce Act as amended, the Commission shall consider the needs of the Comptroller General of the United States, the Secretary of the Treasury, the Director of the Bureau of the Budget and the Secretary of the Interior pursuant to provisions of law with respect to the accounting, auditing, financial reporting, and budgetary requirements of such railroad or railroads, so long as such railroad or railroads continue to be wholly owned and operated by the United States. No free pass or free or reduced rate or fare transportation shall be given except as permitted by the provisions of part I of the Interstate Commerce Act. The President is empowered and authorized in his discretion, to lease the said railroad or railroads, or any portion thereof, including telegraph and telephone lines, after completion under such terms as he may deem proper, but no lease of such railroad or railroads shall be for a longer period than twenty years and no other lease authorized in this Act shall be for a longer period than fifty-five years, or in the event of failure to lease, to operate the same until the further action of Congress. If the said railroad or railroads, including telegraph and telephone lines, are leased under the authority given under this Act, they shall be operated by the lessee under the jurisdiction and control of the provisions of the interstate commerce laws. The President also is empowered and authorized to purchase, condemn, or otherwise acquire upon such terms as he may deem proper, any other line or lines of railroad in Alaska which may be necessary to complete the construction of the line or lines of railroad designated or located by him, but the price to be paid in case of purchase shall in no case exceed the actual physical value of the railroad. The President also is empowered and authorized to make contracts or agreements with any railroad or steamship company or vessel owner for joint transportation of passengers or property over the road or roads herein provided for, and such railroad or steamship line or by such vessel, and to make such other contracts as may be necessary to carry out any of the purposes of this Act; to utilize, in carrying on the work herein provided for, any and all machinery, equipment, instruments, material, and other property of any sort whatsoever used or acquired in connection with the construction of the Panama Canal, so far and as rapidly as the same is no longer needed at Panama, and the successors to the Isthmian Canal Commission are authorized to deliver said property to such officers or persons as the President may designate, and to take credit therefor at such percentage of its original cost as the President may approve, but this amount shall not be charged against the fund provided for in this Act."

SEC. 2. The Act of April 10, 1926 (44 Stat. 239), relating to free transportation on the Alaska Railroad, is hereby repealed.

LEGISLATIVE PROGRAM

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, while Senators are present in goodly numbers, I should like to ask the majority leader about the calendar of business of tomorrow and the ensuing days.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, has the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE] been recognized?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No; the Senator from Oregon has not been recognized.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. If I may be recognized, I wish to make a very brief statement. I do not wish to detain the Senate.

It is planned to consider Order No. 430, Senate bill 1508, tomorrow. I am informed that there will be very little time consumed in discussing that bill.

It is expected that the Senate will take up Order No. 819, Senate bill 694, a bill introduced by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. HILL] and the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLARK], to provide Federal assistance for projects which will demonstrate or develop techniques and practices leading to a solution of the Nation's juvenile delinquency control problems. An announcement has been made previously with respect to this bill.

It is expected that the Senate will consider Calendar No. 559, Senate Joint Resolution 39, a constitutional amendment proposed by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. KEFAUVER] to amend the Constitution to authorize governors to fill temporary vacancies in the House of Representatives. Amendments are expected to be offered to the joint resolution.

I do not know that these measures will necessarily be taken up in the order mentioned, but they have all been cleared.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield.

Mr. MANSFIELD. In other words, there is a possibility that Senate Joint Resolution 39, Calendar No. 559, the constitutional amendment proposed by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. KEFAUVER], may be taken up tomorrow.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. It is very likely. That is the plan.

CONNECTICUT'S GIFT TO ITS NAMESAKE IN THE NATION'S CAPITAL

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, as a member of the Senate District Committee, I was especially interested to learn about a meaningful and symbolic event that took place in Washington last month, the success of which was due in large measure to the vision and initiative of our esteemed colleague, the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. DODD].

I have reference to the Christmas tree presentation and lighting ceremonies held in Dupont Circle on December 3 by the Connecticut Avenue Association, during which a live fir Christmas tree was presented by Mrs. Dodd, in the absence of the Senator who had arranged for the tree to be given as a permanent memorial to the Connecticut Avenue Association from the State of Connecticut "in recognition of the outstanding public service projects sponsored by its namesake in the Nation's Capital."

This memorable occasion, attended by many dignitaries, featured a beautiful and inspiring rendition of Christmas carols by the St. Matthew's Cathedral Choir. It also marked the beginning of a 3-week drive by the association to help provide a brighter Christmas for the 1,700 mentally handicapped and problem youngsters at the Children's Center, a District of Columbia Public Welfare Institution located at Laurel, Md. Mrs. Dodd and her 11-year-old son, Nicky, were the first to give a gift to the association's Open House for the Children's Center. The success of the endeavors undertaken by the Connecticut Avenue Association in sponsoring this drive has been warmly attested to by Miss Winifred Thompson, superintendent of the center, and I believe that this humanitarian project should not go unnoticed.

At the ceremonies on December 3, Mrs. Dodd made the presentation of the tree, on behalf of her husband and the State of Connecticut. Her excellent remarks on that occasion deserve attention and I ask unanimous consent to have them printed in the RECORD at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A PERMANENT REMINDER OF CONNECTICUT

Monsignor Cartwright, Dr. Elson, Mrs. Fistere, honored guests, members and friends of the Connecticut Avenue Association, I should like to convey my husband's sincere regrets at being unable to be here with you today to participate in these ceremonies. He has asked me to present this statement in his behalf.

It is an honor for me to be here representing the people of Connecticut, and I am especially delighted to see Mrs. Connole and the members of the Connecticut State Society here today, actively participating in the support of the Connecticut Avenue Association's drive for needed Christmas gifts for the youngsters at the Children's Center.

I would like to thank Mr. Morris Rosenbloom, your executive vice president, for his many kindnesses and assistance in arranging for this presentation. I know he has played a leading role in fostering the many good works of your association.

Although I know that Connecticut has presented your association with a Christmas tree last year, we are particularly pleased to provide now this live fir tree from our State as a permanent memorial to the association.

I understand that 1960 will mark the 25th anniversary of the incorporation of the Connecticut Avenue Association as a business and civic group in our Nation's Capital. During the years that my husband and I have lived in Washington, we have been impressed by your efforts in behalf of civic improvements.

It is, therefore, a matter of pleasure to me that the Connecticut namesake in our Nation's Capital receive this permanent reminder of our State. This tree, though today small in stature, will grow through the years as your association has grown in significance over this quarter century.

And now, Mrs. Fistere, on behalf of our State, may I present you this fir tree with the warmth and affection of the people of Connecticut.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, may we have order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will be in order.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, the presentation of this symbolic Christmas tree proved of interest to many residents of Metropolitan Washington. The beneficiaries were not limited to the more than 100 members of this civic-business association, nor to their families and employees, nor to the members of the Connecticut State Society who gave this project their full support. The beneficiaries included a large segment of the citizenry of this area, who received a warm inner glow from viewing the handsome tree that remained lit throughout the holiday season and served as a source of inspiration at this important spiritual period of the year.

I make reference to this civic event for several reasons. First, because I think it represents a good example of the type of project that can and should be conducted along similar lines by other communities throughout the United States. Second, because I wish to call attention to the dedicated spirit that characterized the work of the association members in their 3-week campaign on behalf of the youngsters at the Children's Center. Third, because I wish to commend Senator DODD for playing such an instrumental role in making this project possible.

During the number of years that I have spent in Washington, I have been well aware of the contributions made in the public interest by the Connecticut Avenue Association and I am glad to have the opportunity of joining with Senator and Mrs. Dodd in acknowledging this work publicly. As the annual meeting of the association takes place this evening, January 26, and marks the 25th anniversary of the incorporation of this outstanding civic-business group, I want to take this occasion to extend my hearty congratulations to President Ethel Fistere and the members of this association for the work they perform on behalf of this community. I wish to congratulate them on their past accomplishments—for their Red Cross blood donor drives; for their efforts on behalf of Hungarian relief, the United Givers Fund, the worship in the church of your choice campaign and numerous other worthy causes. I hope that their achievements in recent years serve as a spur to even greater accomplishment in the days ahead. In particular, at this time, I am pleased to have an opportunity to call the attention of my colleagues to the notable event that took place here last month during the Christmas season—one which was so symbolic of the bountiful good will that exists between Americans who, though separated by many miles, are responsive to each other when significant humanitarian endeavors become the spiritual meeting ground.

Mr. DODD. Mr. President, I wish to extend my gratitude and thanks to the distinguished Senator from Oregon for the very gracious remarks he has made about Mrs. Dodd and me and the Connecticut State Society. I did not know that he was going to make the remarks until only a few minutes ago. It is typical of the warm heart and consideration of the Senator. I am personally grateful to him, and I know Mrs. Dodd is, as is also the Connecticut Avenue Association.

RESOLUTIONS OF THE OREGON ASSOCIATION OF SOIL CONSERVATION DISTRICTS

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, recently Mr. Elmer Peterson, president of the Oregon Association of Soil Conservation Districts, brought to my attention certain resolutions passed by the association at the 11th annual meeting in Salem, Oreg. Because the resolutions discuss important national legislation, I feel that it is most appropriate for me to bring them to the attention of the Senate. I ask unanimous consent that these resolutions be printed at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the resolutions were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

RESOLUTION 3

The Oregon State Association of Soil Conservation Districts at their annual meeting held in Salem, November 4–6, 1959, determined that—

Whereas the local landowners, Federal, State, and local agencies and organizations, and the Siuslaw SCD have a coordinated plan and program in operation to stabilize and develop the drifting sand dunes in the proposed national sand dunes seashore recreational area; and

Whereas failure to stabilize the dune area will destroy the recreational attraction and value of the area in the form of fresh water lakes, streams, forests, farms, existing park facilities, and Federal and State highways; and

Whereas the present plan and program being coordinated through the Siuslaw SCD is a combined effort of Federal, State, local and private organizations and individuals working together in common cause on multiple use development of the area for the good of the greatest number of people for all time; and

Whereas private money and resources are presently being utilized in this multiple use development and conservation of the area; and

Whereas the area is already well developed for recreational use including Federal, State, and county facilities; and

Whereas much of the area involved is in public lands and now available for the use of all through the existing coordinated plan; and

Whereas the beaches of Oregon have been declared by law to be a State highway and available to the public: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Oregon State Association of Soil Conservation Districts actively oppose the bill in its present form for the establishment of a national sand dunes seashore recreational area in the vicinity of Florence and Reedsport, Oreg.

RESOLUTION 4

The Oregon State Association of Soil Conservation Districts at their annual meeting held in Salem, November 4–6, 1959, determined that—

Whereas certain groups are advocating and urging the Congress through Senate bill 1123 to convert large areas of public lands into wilderness areas, devoid of all facilities except limited fire protection; and

Whereas such wilderness areas, if created, would interfere with orderly programs of land and watershed management and development and in which public land users may share in the costs of such development; and

Whereas such wilderness areas would negate the multiple use concept of public lands management by impairing grazing use, lumbering, and mining, and would prohibit the use of such lands for transportation purposes and transmission line rights-of-way; and

Whereas these so-called wilderness areas, because of their inaccessibility and lack of facilities, would neither be available nor suitable for recreational use by the average person but would be reserved for only a small minority of the American public who profess a need for large areas of uninhabited wild lands for their pleasures: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Oregon State Association of Soil Conservation Districts be opposed to the enactment of legislation which would create wilderness areas, and recommends legislative action be taken to attain full use of the public lands for watershed management, grazing use, recreation, and such other benefits which may accrue from multiple use of such lands; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be sent to the Oregon congressional delegation.

RESOLUTION 5

The Oregon State Association of Soil Conservation Districts at their annual meeting held in Salem, November 4–6, 1959, determined that—

Whereas the Southern Umatilla SCD is sponsor of the application for planning assistance to bring the Tutuilla Watershed within the provisions of the Small Watersheds Act, the Oregon Association of Soil Conservation Districts is aware of a condition in regard to the Indian-owned land and regulations pertaining to this land, which might well hamper, if not prevent it, as well as adjacent non-Indian land, from receiving the benefits of such a program; and

Whereas the Tutuilla watershed covers approximately 40,000 acres of farm-and-rangeland of which approximately 58 percent is non-Indian and the balance Indian-owned; and

Whereas it would be impossible to apply any plan for works of improvement without including all lands because of the checkerboard pattern of this land; and

Whereas the indian land stands to benefit in proportion to other land as a result of this proposed watershed project, but because of its peculiar nature it could well be denied benefits which could accrue were it not Indian-owned; and

Whereas all farmers owning or operating land in the watershed have indicated an interest in the project; farmers operating 33,664 acres of land having signed a formal application requesting planning assistance: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Oregon State Association of Soil Conservation Districts support legislation in the Congress of the United States which would permit Indian-owned land in trust to the U.S. Government to be legally included within watershed districts under the Small Watersheds Act, and thereby receive all benefits which would accrue were it not Indian land.

RESOLUTION 6

The Oregon Association of Soil Conservation Districts at their annual meeting held in Salem, November 4–6, 1959, determined that—

Whereas the needs expressed by the soil conservation districts for additional soil and water research have been given recognition; and

Whereas a group composed of spokesmen for (a) the Oregon, Washington, and Idaho Associations of Soil Conservation Districts; (b) the Oregon, Washington, and Idaho Wheat Growers Associations; and (c) the Oregon, Washington, and Idaho Agricultural Experiment Station Directors, meeting in Pendleton, Oreg., March 19, 1959, affirmed their stand by resolution to support the Facility Needs—Soil and Water Conservation Research Report as set forth on pp. 128–129; and

Whereas the United States Senate has seen fit to publish this report in full as Senate Document No. 59, 86th Congress, 1st session: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Oregon Association of Soil Conservation Districts go on record as supporting Senate Document No. 59, 86th Congress, 1st session, which recommends the establishment of certain soil and water research field stations and laboratories for the Pacific Northwest.

THE RURAL ELECTRIFICATION ADMINISTRATION

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, the Rural Electrification Administration is an agency which commands solid support among the citizens of Oregon.

It is true to say that this one agency alone has done more to transform our farms than almost any other single factor. An excellent summary of the current status of the REA appeared in the January 1960 issue of Northwest Ruralite, under the byline of Henry Alderman, its editor.

Mr. Alderman is particularly well qualified to discuss this subject since for many years he was closely associated with the work of a sister agency, the Bonneville Power Administration.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the editorial to which I have alluded be printed at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TWENTY-ONE AND NINE-TENTHS KILOWATT-HOURS

(By Henry Alderman)

Electric systems financed by the Rural Electrification Administration connected 131,500 new consumers during fiscal 1959, now serve 4,654,000 homes, farms and other rural establishments.

REA has 987 active electric borrowers; 983 of them are consumer owned. REA has made electric loans to 24 profit power companies, totaling $20,067,200. Four of the power companies are active borrowers at this time.

Rural electric systems serve consumers in every State except Connecticut, Massachusetts, Rhode Island and Hawaii.

More than 96 percent of America's farms are now electrified, compared with 10 percent when REA was established in 1935. More than half are served by REA borrowers.

NATURE OF THE PROGRAM

Rural electric systems are locally owned, controlled, and operated by the people they serve. Members elect directors, who establish system policy.

REA, a Federal agency within the U.S. Department of Agriculture, serves only as a banker for the systems. It does not generate or distribute electric power.

Funds for REA loans are annually authorized by Congress. Loans are repaid over a 35-year period with interest at 2.

Rural electric systems provide service on an "area coverage" basis, even in the most sparsely settled areas. The systems average just over three consumers per mile of line. A comparable national average for the profit power companies is not available, but reports indicate they average more than 30 consumers per mile of line.

The rural electric systems are voluntarily associated in State, regional and national service organizations. Nine hundred fifty-eight systems are members of the National Rural Electric Cooperative Association.

The sysems, usually through State associations, publish 28 monthly consumer magazines with a total circulation of more than 2½ million.

FINANCIAL RECORD

REA has approved loans totaling $3.9 billion for rural electric service.

As of October 31, 1959, REA borrowers had repaid $805 million in principal, and $388 million in interest. Of the principal payments, $149 million had been paid in advance of the due date. Only a fraction of 1 percent of repayment due was in arrears more than 30 days.

The net worth of the systems totaled $515 million in December 1958—16.6 percent of total assets. This wes an increase of 1.7 percent over 1957.

Operating revenues for the systems amounted to $563 million for 1958, an increase of 8 percent over 1957. Net margins totaled $75 million, an increase of 9 percent over 1957. Forty-five systems had deficit net margins in 1958, and 166 failed to make debt service—REA's standard for judging the financial health of its borrowers.

PURPOSE OF LOANS

The bulk of REA loans are now made for system improvements and generation and transmission facilities. In fiscal 1959, 17.3 percent of loan funds were for generation, 19.2 percent for transmission, 26.3 percent for system improvements, 35.4 percent for new distribution facilities, and 1.8 percent for consumer wiring, plumbing, and equipment financing.

RETAIL POWER SALES

The rural electric systems sold 21.9 billion kilowatt-hours in 1958. Average monthly residential consumption per consumer was 311 kilowatt-hours, an increase of 10 percent over 1957.

The average cost per kilowatt-hour for residential rural electric consumers in 1958 was 2.65 cents. The average monthly residential power bill was $8.23.

WHOLESALE POWER SUPPLY

The wholesale power requirements of rural electric systems are doubling about every 5 years.

Rural electric systems generated 3.4 billion kilowatt-hours in fiscal 1958, and purchased 19.9 billion kilowatt-hours.

Of their wholesale power purchases in fiscal 1958, the systems bought 9.1 billion kilowatt-hours (39.1 percent) from profit power companies at an average cost of 8 mills per kilowatt-hour. They bought 10.8 billion kilowatt-hours (46.5 percent) from Federal and other public suppliers.

THE PACIFIC NORTHWEST ACCOUNT BILL

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I have submitted a statement before the Subcommittee on Irrigation and Reclamation of the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs in continued support of my position in favor of the basin account approach and payment for reclamation projects out of profits to be derived from the great multipurpose dams. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD as a part of my remarks the statement I made before the subcommittee.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT OF SENATOR WAYNE MORSE, BEFORE THE SUBCOMMITTEE ON IRRIGATION AND RECLAMATION OF THE SENATE COMMITTEE ON INTERIOR AND INSULAR AFFAIRS ON THE PACIFIC NORTHWEST ACCOUNT BILL, S. 1388, JANUARY 22, 1960

Mr. Chairman and members of the subcommittee, I wish to thank the subcommittee for this opportunity to present my views on behalf of maximum development of one of the richest resources we hold in trust for Americans of today and of future generations—our heritage of fertile lands of the arid and semiarid regions of the Pacific Northwest.

For years I have taken the position that the enormous hydroelectric power developed in the waters of the Columbia River Basin should, in part, be put to work in assuring irrigation development of rich lands that lie unproductive until touched by the magic of water. This idea was inherent in the magnificent Grand Coulee Dam project, which, over the years, has demonstrated that low-cost power and enormous irrigation benefits can go hand-in-hand through proper development of a great multipurpose damsite.

In recent years I have applied the same principle to projects less vast than Grand Coulee, but which nevertheless are important to the economy of the Pacific Northwest. One of these is the Crooked River reclamation project near Prineville in central Oregon. I cosponsored the Crooked River authorization bill, S. 3101, which became law in August 1956. An important feature of this law makes a portion of the cost of the Crooked River project payable from surplus revenues of the Dalles Dam project.

More recently, I introduced the bill, S. 2195 of the 86th Congress, which would authorize the construction of the Dalles Federal reclamation project. Under this bill, construction costs beyond the ability of the water users to repay, are to be obtained from a reclamation fund created through net power revenues derived from the sale of power from the Dalles Dam project.

I joined as a cosponsor of S. 1388, the so-called Pacific Northwest account bill, because I believe the time is at hand for working out an orderly and sensible plan whereby reasonable amounts taken from net power revenues of Federal multipurpose projects in the Columbia River Basin may be applied toward bringing into production in future years the farm lands that will be so urgently needed by coming generations. If we do not take appropriate action now, we will guarantee the production of sagebrush on these lands instead of essential foods and fibers. Our generation, I am sure, has more foresight than to permit these lands to lie waste when the means is at hand to put them to work for humanity.

Arid and semiarid lands of this type cannot be developed by farmers on their own resources. They need assistance. The giving of such assistance through reasonable plans to be worked out by the Federal Government can be classified, beyond a doubt, as action taken in the general public interest. I am satisfied that the large majority of people of the Pacific Northwest who have studied this problem are in agreement that these lands should not be permitted to lie waste and should be put into production in the reasonably foreseeable future to meet the growing needs of our rapidly expanding population. We agree as to the need; the only area of disagreement is that relating to the method whereby these lands may be reclaimed in the public interest.

I was happy to cosponsor S. 1388 because it offers a plan. I shall not attempt to give the subcommittee the technical details of the plan because the subcommittee will have the privilege of hearing from those who have expert knowledge of the subject. Present in the hearing room this morning are residents of Oregon who are outstanding in their work on behalf of reclamation and their knowledge of the program envisaged by S. 1388. I refer to Mr. LaSelle E. Coles, president of the National Reclamation Association; Mr. Carlos Randolph, manager, North Unit Irrigation District, Madras, Oreg.; and Mr. Paul House, manager, Owyhee Irrigation District, Myssa, Oreg. These gentlemen have devoted many years in fostering and advancing the interest of reclamation within the State of Oregon, and are eminently qualified to discuss the merits of S. 1388. In addition, you will hear from officials of the Bureau of Reclamation who have studied this legislative proposal in great detail. I urge the subcommittee's very serious consideration of the testimony to be supplied by these witnesses.

In general, the bill under consideration would make possible the use of excess power revenues to assist farmers in repaying the costs of reclamation development. Designated Federal power projects within the Columbia River Basin would be considered as a unit under a Federal accounting system and excess power revenues from these projects would be available to assist farmers in repaying the costs of irrigation projects which are beyond their ability to repay in the normal 50-year period. The program is not an innovation. For example, basin accounts were set up prior to the development of the Missouri River Basin project and the Upper Colorado River Basin project.

I am aware of the fact that S. 1388 is opposed by some in the Pacific Northwest, but I believe that the opposition is not directed against the general policy of assistance to irrigation development by the use of power revenues; rather it seems to me that the opposition relates to the method whereby S. 1388 endeavors to achieve its objective. For example, Mr. Gus Norwood, executive secretary of the Northwest Public Power Association of Vancouver, Wash., has indicated that the interest component should be used for irrigation subsidy instead of the plan contained in S. 1388. I know that Mr. Norwood will give the subcommittee the benefit of his thoroughly considered views on this important topic.

The subject of this hearing is one of great complexity to the average person. It seems to me that the subcommittee can do an important job in the interest of resource development of the Pacific Northwest by its careful analysis of the factual information to be supplied at today's hearing. After weighing all facets of the problem, I am satisfied that the members of this subcommittee will provide us with a workable and reasonable plan whereby the Pacific Northwest's great contribution to our Nation through the production of power at multipurpose damsites may be applied systematically and reasonably toward bringing into production arid lands that would otherwise be of little service to humanity.

It might be well to note on this occasion that if Hells Canyon had been developed as a Federal project, a portion of its benefits would have been available for assisting the irrigation projects in the area. The private utility dams which have been built to thwart public development of Hells Canyon obviously will not provide any assistance to irrigation. This is a lesson which supporters of the basin account approach should bear in mind in connection with future development of resources of the Pacific Northwest.

UNFAIR EXCISE TAXES

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point an editorial published in the Benton County Herald of my State entitled "Unfair Excise Taxes."

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

UNFAIR EXCISE TAXES

How temporary can a tax be, especially after it has been levied for over 15 years? We are speaking of the excise taxes on rail, plane, and bus passenger fares, which have been 10 percent. Also unfair is the 10-percent excise tax on local telephone service.

Some time ago the Senate voted to repeal these taxes, but the House refused to go along. Under a compromise agreement, not yet adopted, the passenger travel tax is to be reduced to 5 percent and the telephone tax is to be retained at 10 percent.

The travel tax came into being in World War II when transportation facilities were overloaded through troop movements and the Government wished to discourage unnecessary civilian travel. A decade and more has passed, and the railroads, airlines, and bus companies have plenty of capacity. The tax is not needed for the purpose it was intended, and in fact hinders the carriers who are the backbone of U.S. transportation in their competition with the private automobile.

Equally unfair is the telephone tax, which also hinders telephone expansion and takes more money out of users' pockets. With the present service there is no way the unfair telephone tax can be justified.

As the Oregonian pointed out in an editorial on this attempt to repeal these wartime excise taxes, "The episode certainly proves one point. There is no such thing as a temporary tax. Once you get into them, they stick like flypaper."

The only solution is to avoid letting such taxes be levied if at all possible—and if not, to demand their removal. This can be accomplished if enough voters care enough to show Congress they mean it. Just a little more letterwriting to our Congressmen might have persuaded the House to go along with the Senate's action.

THE LABOR LAW

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point an article by one of the greatest labor statesmen, Mr. George M. Harrison of the Railway Clerks, in which he comments on the recently passed labor law.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From Labor, Jan. 16, 1960]

SEES ALL UNITED STATES SUFFERING FROM ANTILABOR LAW

CINCINNATI, January 11.—All America, as well as the union movement, will suffer from the drastic Landrum-Griffin labor control law, Pres. George M. Harrison of the Railway Clerks declared here in an interview given to the Scripps-Howard newspapers.

The interview was with James Feldman, labor reporter for that press chain, who asked Harrison to appraise the past decade and preview the next one. The clerks' chief did so, acutely and pungently.

He stressed that the Landrum-Griffin Act may turn the coming decade into "a period of industrial unrest and rule by demagogs."

Because of the Landrum-Griffin law, he added, "the entire character of the union movement will change during the decade to the disadvantage of the people, the country, and industry."

LICENSE TO MALCONTENTS

Calling the law an indefensible invasion of the rights of union members to run their own organizations, Harrison predicted that it would weaken trade union leadership because it "gives a license to irresponsible demagogs and malcontents to subvert the operation of unions."

Recalling the hectic days of labor-management relations of 25 years ago when the sitdown strike and picket line violence was the rule of the day, he said that the Government and industry kept demanding "responsible union leadership."

"Well, we've given it to them," he declared. "We've trained people, we've sent them to school, we revamped our unions and we've given them responsibility, but now they are going right back to the days when the man who can get on a barn and yell the loudest will be the man with the following."

Harrison said labor would survive the 1960's despite all the roadblocks thrown in its way, but that industry would suffer because it seemed bent on fomenting mob rule.

"The trouble," he said, "is that some leaders of industry are so blinded by their hatred of the labor movement that they are incapable of seeing that they are injuring themselves."

Looking back over the fifties, Harrison noted that both management and labor have sharpened their capabilities of dealing with one another. Both have hired professionals to take care of special fields; both have recruited more skilled people, and both have learned something from each other.

OBLIGATION OF UNION LEADERS

He said that the modern labor leader must not battle blindly, but must take into account such things as the economic condition of his industry, the country, and even international affairs.

Speaking of industry during the fifties, Harrison said "there is an unhealthy concentration of industry into the hands of too few corporations." He said that "controlled pricing," whereby huge industries create artificial shortages and set their own price levels, and tremendous, unwarranted profits have led to inflation.

"Inflationary profits of industry are running at a rate that the economy just cannot sustain," Harrison added. In addition to price inflation, they are also causing inflation in interest rates because huge stock profits are taking money out of the market that should be available for lending.

Harrison was also asked about the possibility of a railroad strike.

"My own judgment," he replied, "is that there will not be a strike and that we will be able to settle our problems through the machinery provided for under the Railway Labor Act."

THE SITUATION IN CUBA

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. Mr. President, recently the Secretary of State was quoted as saying at a conference on American-Cuban relations that he was "worried about the situation."

As late as yesterday, the Secretary of State huddled with the American Ambassador to Cuba, who had been recalled for a special conference on problems arising in that nation.

Mr. President, it is time the State Department became worried over conditions in Cuba and elsewhere in Latin America. My only regret is that officials in the State Department have waited so long to become alarmed and so long to become worried. I was worried in 1957 over problems in Latin America, and I made a special report on Communist activity in Latin American affairs which was printed as a Senate document by the Judiciary Committee. This report brought to the attention of officials conditions existing at that time, but some of the ultraliberal publications of the Nation, supported by semiofficial reports supposedly representing our State Department's views at that time, belittled any concern over Communist activity in Latin America.

Mr. President, Fidel Castro, who still claims not to be a Communist, in my opinion is more dangerous than a Communist, for he is doing the work of Communists for Communists under the cloak of being a liberator for freedom.

He is like a wolf in sheep's clothing. The people of Cuba have not had any free elections, as they were promised. The agrarian land reform program has turned into a program of Communist confiscation of private property, and instead of bettering Cuba's foreign relations and her economy, Castro has worsened them on every front. His actions last week were below the dignity of diplomatic relations and could only be called acts of a desperate dictator who is fearful of losing control of his position as leader of people.

The U.S. Government has always been a close friend of Cuba. It was the United States that wrested Cuba away from Spanish yoke and gave that country its first taste of freedom. Through the years the American Government has seen fit to pay a premium price for Cuban sugar. While we could have bought sugar at a much lower price, we have through the years, to help Cuba's economy, insisted upon giving that nation a differential for her sugar. At every turn we have attempted to help Cuba.

The actions of Castro against the U.S. Government and against citizens of the United States, both physical and economical, would normally border on what the diplomatic corps would call acts of aggression. Certainly if a European foreign power had treated the United States, its citizens, and its properties as Cuba has done, it would be a matter of international concern.

The State newspaper of Columbia, S.C., of Sunday, January 24, in an editorial entitled "Step to Isolation," clearly stated that Castro's present foreign policy is one that will lead Cuba into isolationism and bankruptcy.

An editorial which appeared in the News and Courier of Charleston, S.C., of Saturday, January 23, in clear-cut language described the outrages of Castro against the United States, Spain, and against individuals, newspapermen, and property holders. The News and Courier boldly paints for us the true picture that communism is at work in Cuba and may spread from that island to other places.

In my opinion, we need bolder action from the United States toward Cuba to put that nation in line and to safeguard freedom. As the News and Courier says, "One way or another, communism must be barred from the New World." Sometimes it is easier to deal directly with open communism than it is with deceptive communism such as we have in Cuba.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that these editorials from the State of January 24 and the News and Courier of January 23 be printed in the RECORD following my remarks.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Columbia (S.C.) State, Jan. 24, 1960]

STEP TO ISOLATION

Fidel Castro has taken one more step to isolation on the end of a limb by insulting away the Ambassadors from the United States and Cuba's mother country, Spain.

We have never been able to see much caliber to Senor Castro, so could never feel that his rise to power could mean any great and permanent improvement to the people of the island. His subsequent actions have continuously and eloquently vertified this doubt.

Being a weak nation at best it should be fundamentally observable to any but the most obtuse that friendship among the family of free nations is necessary for Cuba's progress. Since coming to power Castro's foreign policy has been one of antagonism, hate, and robbery of property owned by nations that have befriended his country.

Having taken over a not too strong house, Castro seems to be bent on weakening it further and as far as possible, though he probably lacks the perception to realize what he is doing.

[From the Charleston (S.C.) News and Courier, Jan. 23, 1960]

BOLDER U.S. ACTION ON CUBA REQUIRED TO SAFEGUARD FREEDOM FROM CASTRO

In rallying the Cuban mob, Fidel Castro is goading the United States ever more surely toward decisive action. Unwilling though our Government may be, it cannot put off indefinitely adopting firmer means of curbing the bearded dictator.

If Washington continues to do nothing, a people's republic soon will be in full bloom 100 miles off the Florida coast and a new staging area for Soviet power will take shape.

Polite treatment of Castro has not made him act respectably. American property has been seized. U.S. citizens have been put in jail. Castro has rejected friendship with the country that liberated Cuba in 1898. He has joined the Communist bloc in the United Nations. The direction in which he is leading must not be misinterpreted.

The latest outrageous act, an abusive speech against the Spanish Ambassador to Cuba, was not without design. Cuban middle and upper classes have strong emotional ties to Spain. They regard Spain with the same kind of affection that many Americans feel for England. By striking at Spain, Castro would discredit moderate elements in Cuba. If he can link Spain, which is disliked by Latin America's leftwing intellectuals, with Washington, he will have gained another point in his propaganda war against the United States.

The Associated Press reports that U.S. Ambassador Philip Bonsal now believes a new policy is needed with respect to Cuba. If he suggests a crackdown on Castro, it is unlikely the State Department will endorse his recommendations. The State Department has a long history of resisting bold measures against world communism. Such firmness as exists in U.S. policies comes from the Defense Department.

The American press has changed its tune on Castro. Influential newspapers such as the Washington Post and the Chicago Daily News, once strongly pro-Castro, now condemn him. The public is getting into a frame of mind for action against the Cuban dictatorship.

Though the State Department in 1934 signed away the specific right to intervene in Cuba, the Monroe Doctrine is still the Nation's basic guide for this hemisphere. This 137-year-old document established a permanent U.S. policy of barring European powers from taking over Latin American governments. While European Communists are not in direct control of Cuba, Castro's lieutenants are leftists who follow the international Communist line. Thus the United States has a doctrinal basis for intervention.

But what sort of action should the United States take in Cuba? The answer, in our judgment, is whatever may be necessary. If Americans will do what's necessary to hold a string of little islands 5 miles off the mainland of China, they should not lack for boldness in Cuba.

The first logical step to restore freedom in Cuba is to withhold the sugar subsidy, which Castro's government needs to prop up the economy. Next could come withdrawal of U.S. recognition, an embargo on trade, and support of a free Cuba movement in the United States.

Beyond this is the possibility of direct United States military intervention, should revolt occur. As in Lebanon, the United States would have to go in quickly and get out just as fast.

If the U.S. Government could act in Lebanon, which is across the world, it could act in Cuba at its own doorstep. All that's necessary is for the public to get adjusted to the idea. Military intervention may seem too drastic at the moment, but we believe the public is ready for initial steps. If these are successful, it may not be necessary to send Marines to Cuba.

One way or another, communism must be barred from the New World.

THE DISMANTLING OF THE ERA OF TERROR

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, Mr. Thomas E. Murray is one of the ablest engineers in the United States. He is also one of the most public spirited citizens. For a number of years he was a member of the Atomic Energy Commission. Since his departure from that body he has devoted a great deal of time and attention to the problem of the proper use of atomic energy and the best policy the U.S. Government can adopt.

On December 9, 1959, he read an extraordinary paper before the Institute of World Affairs, in Pasadena, Calif. The paper is entitled "The Dismantling of the Era of Terror."

In his paper, Mr. Murray proposes that an international agency be set up to supervise the destruction of American and Russian megaton weapons; that the destruction be done on a matching basis, weapon for equal weapon; and that the process be continued until its political purpose is achieved.

I ask unanimous consent that the full text of the remarks of Mr. Murray be printed at this point in the body of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE DISMANTLING OF THE ERA OF TERROR

(Remarks prepared by Thomas E. Murray, consultant to the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy, for delivery before Institute of World Affairs, Huntington-Sheraton Hotel, Pasadena, Calif., December 9, 1959)

On August 29, 1949, when the Soviet Union exploded its first atomic device, a new era began in the long history of the relations between politics and force. During the ensuing decade the pace of political and technological change has been so swift that men are now begining to say that we have reached the end of the era that began in 1949.

One general judgment of the era is becoming increasingly common. We now realize that the immense drive to arm the United States with nuclear weapons and delivery systems has not been guided and controlled by a clear and practical national purpose. In particular, five criticisms are gaining currency.

First, our armament effort has been wrongly subject to the domination of technology. We have failed to submit technological possibilities to the criterion of military and political usefulness. Second, the result has been an emphasis on the strategy of unlimited war, as exhibited in the concept of massive retaliation. Third, the further result has been a complete divorce between military strategy and political aims. Our dominant military strategy and its supporting arms look to the release of unlimited power, whereas our political aims, whatever they may be, are certainly not unlimited. Fourth, and again in consequence, in the very midst of the enormous power struggle now going on in the world arena, our foreign policies lack the necessary support of force. Our military strength has degenerated into a mere capacity to wreak unlimited nuclear violence, which is politically useless; and this very capacity inhibits us from the use of limited force, which may be politically necessary. Fifth, this whole disorderly structure of policy stands under the final peril, which is a lack of moral sanction. It is against the dictates of reason that military strategy should accept the control of technology. Politics, not technology, is the rightful master of military doctrine. It is also against the dictates of reason that the use of force, which may be the necessary instrument of justice, should suffer moral degradation and become a sheer exercise in violence, which can serve no moral or political purposes.

These five criticisms are entirely valid. If I may say so, I had made them myself before their validity began to be commonly recognized. Taken together, they demonstrate the instant need for a new design of American policy, guided by a new vision of the public purpose of America.

The danger at the moment is that American disarmament policies during the decade to come will be characterized by the same confusions that have marked our armament policies in the decade that is past. We swung into action on armament without stopping to put right order in our thought. We have already swung into action on disarmament without stopping to correct the disorders of thought that have already proved so pernicious and will prove pernicious again.

The first problem then is to define the public purpose of America in the field of disarmament. The basis of definition must be the essential distinction between violence and force. This is a political distinction, based on a moral premise. By violence I mean the use of military power in such an extensive, indiscriminating, or even unlimited, measure and manner that its use becomes inept and useless for the rational purposes of politics, which are always limited. By force I mean the use of power in such a limited measure and in such a discriminating manner that its use becomes an apt instrument for the achievement of legitimate political goals. The release of violence is irrational and therefore immoral but the use of force, as thus defined can be rightful, depending on the political rationality and moral rightness of the particular purposes for which it is used.

The past decade has been an era of terror because over it has hung the threat of violence—uncontrolled, unlimited, both politically and morally absurd. Our immediate and urgent purpose, therefore, must be to effect an orderly dismantling of the era of terror, by dissipating this threat of violence. This negative purpose must be allied with the more positive purpose of effecting the orderly construction of a new era. One cannot give it a name or fully describe it. But its essential characteristic must be the reinstatement of force as an instrument for the basic political purpose that is indicated in the American Constitution, namely to establish justice.

Given the nature of man, the art of international politics cannot dispense with the use, or at least the threat, of force, any more than human society can dispense with law, which requires force to back it up. On the other hand, international politics perishes as an art if power is allowed to suffer moral degradation and become mere violence, which is destructive of the very idea of force and of law too.

This statement of the twofold national purpose of America immediately serves to make it clear that nuclear tests are not the primary or most important issue. The past decade has not been the era of terror because it has been an era of tests. The current moratorium on all tests has done nothing to banish the threat of violence. This threat derives from the escape of nuclear technology from the control of military doctrine and political purpose. Here the primary issue appears. Technology does not know the difference between violence and force. Left to itself, without the control of higher policy, it has tended to enlarge our capacity to wreak violence, not to use force. Government, however, is supposed to know this essential political and moral distinction. And it is the duty of Government, by political decision, to make the implications of the distinction binding both on the deliberations of the military strategist and on the experiments of the technological expert.

The primary issue therefore is a reform of thought, to be expressed in political decisions. Moreover, it is not difficult to discern the direction that political decision must take, if it is to rectify its own past errors and retrieve its own past failures. The disorders of policy in the past decade have left as their fateful legacy a great and ever growing stockpile of weapons of violence—megaton weapons whose destructive capacity is unlimited, if used in the numbers required by the current strategy of massive retaliation. We must assume that the Soviet stockpile matches our own. The sheer existence of these stockpiles is the proximate reason why the past decade has been an era of terror. These stockpiles have created their own strategy, which is that of war of annihilation. And the threat of annihilation has in turn created the terror.

It follows in all logic that the era of terror will not be dismantled until these megaton stockpiles are themselves dismantled. This is the immediate issue presented for political decision. The decision does not fall to the strategist or to the technologist. It falls squarely within the province of politics; for it is an issue that concerns the public purpose of the United States. The making of this decision by Government is the very condition for the restoration of politics to its rightful place of primacy in the structure of American policy. There is no other way in which the present rupture between political purpose and military strategy can be healed in its depths.

I should like, first, to present in general outline the form that this political decision should take, and then construct the argument, pro and con.

My suggestion has two parts. First, that an international agency be constituted and located on neutral territory and empowered to supervise the systematic destruction of the megaton weapons in the American and Soviet stockpiles. Second, that the destruction be done on a matching basis, weapon for equal weapon. The United States will hand over to the international agency one megaton weapon, beginning in the highest range; the Soviet Union will in turn hand over one weapon of the same size. Experts in the agency will be able to estimate, within a small percentage of error, whether the weapons are equal in their yield. The "hardware" of the weapons will then be destroyed in some public fashion. Their content of highly enriched fissionable material will be put at the disposal of the appropriate international authority for peaceful uses. This matching of weapons, one for one, will continue. The process has a political purpose—to end the era of terror, to banish the threat of violence, to redeem force from its moral degradation and its political absurdity. The process will therefore continue until this political purpose, under a decent respect to the opinions of mankind, has been achieved.

Considerable detail ought to be added to this proposal; but the presentation of its substance is sufficient for the purposes of immediate public debate. I shall undertake to make the case for it.

In the first place, this proposal takes far more realistic account of the needs of national security than does current American disarmament policy. Our present policy was announced at the London Conference of 1956, and it has not been changed. It calls for nuclear disarmament: first, by the cessation of all nuclear tests; second, by the stoppage of the flow of fissionable material into weapons; third, by the total destruction of all existing nuclear stockpiles. This proposal clearly illustrates our fatal habit of divorcing political and military policies. For political reasons we declared a moratorium on all tests, despite the fact that military reasons demanded certain kinds of tests. These tests would develop what I have called the third generation of weapons. They would be carried out underground and give us new types of much needed limited weapons, defensive and offensive, which could be used in discriminating fashion. Moreover, the other parts of the proposal, if carried out, would be fatal to any rational concept of American military strength. The program would strip us, not only of the capacity for unlimited and useless nuclear violence, but also of the most useful and necessary capacity to use limited nuclear force.

It is true that the carrying out of the present program was made contingent on the establishment of international inspection and controls. However, in the matter of tests it is clear to informed people that an adequate and effective inspection system, which would detect tests even down to 5 or 10 kilotons, is for the present not a definite scientific possibility, and it is also, for the foreseeable future, a political impossibility. An adequate and effective system would have to consist of thousands of stations, equipped with devices not yet invented; this is the scientific problem. Many hundreds of these stations would have to be on Soviet and Red Chinese territory; this is the political impossibility.

Moreover, the stoppage of all nuclear production and the total destruction of existing stockpiles—stand even farther beyond the possibility of control for scientific and political reasons. Therefore, the first argument for my new proposal lies in the need to find a safe alternative to the extremely risky and altogether unrealistic policy to which we are presently committed.

In the second place, the new proposal goes to the heart of the issue. It is the sinister stockpiles of megaton weapons, and the strategies of annihilation built on them, which give off the fumes of terror that today are poisoning the international atmosphere. The terror has to be attacked at its source, which is the bilateral and balancing power of the United States and the Soviet Union to wreck the fabric of civilization in a matter of hours. These pools of potentially unlimited violence must be drained and dried. All other issues are secondary to this.

In the third place, this proposal is practical. It should be possible to negotiate an agreement on it between ourselves and the Soviet Union, the only two necessary partners to such an agreement. The single indispensable condition of agreement exists, namely, self-interest, hard and cold self-interest, the common and coincident self-interest of both parties. It is as much in the interests of the Soviet Union as it is in ours to avoid the ultimate catastrophe in which the era of terror may culminate, if it is not deliberately brought to an end. No national interest, American or Russian, is served by maintaining and increasing a stockpile of weapons of violence that are utterly useless for any political purpose, Russian or American. The political absurdity of unlimited nuclear violence—reciprocally acknowledged—this is the basic fact on which, as on solid ground, an agreement can be based. In the course of their rivalry for megaton armament the United States and the U.S.S.R. have both been driven into an absurd situation. There is a common interest in putting an end to it.

Moreover, the proposal is practical for another reason. It avoids the political stone wall into which other American proposals have always run. This stone wall is set up by the Soviet concept of absolute national sovereignty which forbids honest and effective international inspection of Soviet territory. A new formula has to be found to establish the principle of international control. The proposal I am discussing contains this new formula. It does not call for inspection of Soviet territory.

In the fourth place, this new proposal will inevitably find favor in the court of world opinion. This is what the nations really want—that the United States should take the lead in bringing them out from under the shadow of possible annihilation. The Soviet Union could not refuse to follow this lead without incurring the political punishment of the disfavor of the nations. Moreover, by making this proposal the United States would finally assume the initiative in the problem of disarmament. In all negotiations the party that defines the issue has already gained the initiative. We lost it by giving way under pressure and allowing the Soviet Union to define, as the primary issue in disarmament, the cessation of all tests. This was a grave mistake on many counts. We shall rectify it, and gather the initiative into our own hands, only if we ourselves define the real issue that rightfully claims primacy. This primary issue is the stockpiled capacity for unlimited violence.

In the fifth place, if megaton means of wreaking violence were thus gradually to be destroyed by mutual agreement, the threat of violence would cease to be of use as an instrument of international politics. It would be absurd for a nation to begin surrendering its weapons of terror, and at the same time go on brandishing the threat of their use. Nuclear blackmail would be at an end. The international atmosphere would be considerably cleared.

In the sixth place, the essential distinction between the cold war and the era of terror would begin to be realized. The cold war had begun before the era of terror set in; it will continue after the terror is ended. Basically, the cold war is a crisis in civilization. The contest is between opposed conceptions of the nature of man, his role in history, and his relation to the State. This ideological conflict has carried over into the field of politics; and its economic dimension is continually growing. During the era of terror it has also acquired a military dimension of altogether swollen proportions. Until this military dimension is cut down to proper size, the real issues in the cold war will be obscured.

In particular, it is absolutely necessary to remove from the cold war the issue of sheer physical survival. This issue has done nothing but darken counsel, paralyze purpose, and confuse policy. The issue is fundamentally false; survival should never be an issue in political struggles or even in war. But a nightmarish sort of reality attaches to the issue of survival because of the megaton stockpiles whose use would imperil the survival of everybody. Until these weapons are destroyed, the issue of survival will continue to distract the mind of America from its real job. The public purpose of America in opposing world communism will remain blurred, undefined to ourselves, to the Soviet Union, and to all the world.

In the seventh place, a most salutary effect would be produced on American strategic thought. At least since 1953 it has stood under the hypnotic influence of megaton technology. Its focus has been fixed on the strategy of annihilation. The concept of massive retaliation has held it in deadly thrall. The spell can only be broken by the political decision to enforce the primacy of politics and to begin an orderly surrender of weapons that are politically useless. This decision would compel the military strategist to take new thought. There could at last take place a movement toward increased flexibility in strategic thinking, toward a revival of the traditional principle that the aim of a general is the will of the opposing commander, not the butchery of his forces, still less the total destruction of his country and the indiscriminate slaughter of its civilian population. Thus military doctrine would find its way to rightful relation with political aims. The fatal rupture would come to an end. And with this change in strategy from emphasis on inept violence to emphasis on apt force the technology of weapons would at last be brought under proper rule and restraint. The tail of technology would cease to fly the kite of strategy.

In the eighth place, a step would be taken toward the positive goal of American disarmament policy. The distant goal, still far over the horizon of the future, is the gradual transfer of the right to use arms and to produce nuclear arms, to some new kind of international authority. A small step toward this goal would be taken by establishing an international agency empowered to supervise the destruction of weapons of violence. This assignment is very limited. But the new agency would embody the essential principle of international control of nuclear armament. The principle would have been publicly recognized in the face of the nations and extensions of it would gradually become possible.

In the ninth place, a considerable amount of highly enriched fissionable material would become available, presumably to the International Atomic Energy Agency, for peaceful purposes particularly for the development of industrial nuclear power. This fact would give a tremendous and badly needed impulse to the whole program of atoms for peace. This development would have important consequences both in the improvement of international relations as well as in the advance of economic progress.

Here then are the reasons in favor of the proposal. What are the reasons against it? There are only two.

First, it will be said that an agreement to match the Soviet Union in the destruction of weapons of violence would impair the military strength of the United States.

This objection rests on a false concept of strength. I do not consider it strength on our part to consent to the current degradation of force into violence. On the contrary, it is weakness. Surely, it is moral weakness. It is a failure of the moral intelligence to understand what is going on, or a want of moral courage to stop this process of corruption. It is also political weakness. It is a failure of the political intelligence to see the absurdity of violence, and to see also the rational necessity of force, for the purposes of politics. Moreover, unless this process of moral degradation is checked by the courage of political decision, the result will be to continue and increase our military weakness, the weakness of a nuclear establishment whose political uselessness grows more and more apparent, and the weakness of a technology whose resources of power are exploited without purpose, because they lack due military and political direction.

It is becoming apparent today that we have been pursuing an illusion of strength along a dead-end road, the same dead-end road into which technology turned military doctrine in 1953, when the hydrogen bomb assumed control of strategy. Since that day our nuclear superiority has been lost. A balance of nuclear power has been established. In this new situation the strategy of ultimate deterrence plus massive retaliation and the megaton stockpile which supports this strategy have lost whatever value, both military and political, they may once have had in the past day of our nuclear superiority.

The conclusion is that we ought now to make some political use of this stockpile since it has been a military liability. Self-interest presently dictates that we trade in our great weapons of violence, one for one, with the Soviet Union doing the same, as a political deal with a political purpose. This act of self-interest would also be an act of the moral conscience of America and a declaration of our civilized public purpose. We would give witness in action that we shall not abdicate the right uses of force, but that we do abjure the senseless uses of violence, because we understand that politics needs force, but morals condemn violence.

The second objection raises the ultimate question: Would the proposed action invite massive Soviet aggression and open the United States to defeat and destruction? Would not the Soviet Union "cheat on" the agreement in order to gain nuclear superiority in megaton weapons, and then would it not, at some given moment, launch a total attack on the United States?

This possibility cannot be absolutely excluded. Here is the irreducible risk. No policy can take account of every single future possibility. Policy directs itself to what is likely to happen, not to what may possibly happen. Risks must always be calculated. On any fair calculation the risk involved in my proposal is minimal. Certainly it is far less serious than the risk involved in the present American disarmament proposal.

It has to be remembered that the distinction between force and violence, which I am urging as the basic premise of American policy, does in fact constitute the basic premise of Soviet policy. In contrast communism is not committed to the political ineptitude of unlimited violence. The Communist purpose is always to use apt force, whenever it is useful or necessary. Here lies the real risk for the United States. Force is forever the servant of Communist policies. It will be used not only on the defensive occasion but also to further the success of the offensive move.

Therefore the United States must always expect from the Soviet Union the threat, and the use of apt force in support of declared policies. This, I repeat, is the real risk, the ever present likelihood—in fact, the certainty—to which American policy must address itself. This risk was disregarded by the sweeping three-part disarmament policy set by the United States in 1956. My proposal takes it fully into account.

For the rest, there remains the outside possibility, the unlikely contingency, the tenuous risk that no disarmament policy, however ingenious, can absolutely exclude. Might it not happen that, at some future and undetermined date, in a conjectural situation of possible Communist nuclear superiority, the Soviet Union might conceivably threaten the use of total nuclear violence, for no very clear or predictable political purpose? Who could possibly answer this question? This is not the kind of guesswork on which present American policy ought to be based. For my part, I cherish the confident hope that, if such a threat of violence were ever to be made, the United States would be secure enough in other forms of valid nuclear strength, to have the courage simply to defy it.

Let us, however, come back from speculations about the unforeseeable future to the certain and seen realities of the present. The existent fact is that the real invitation to military helplessness and political defeat before the advancing forces of communism is being issued by the present rigidity of the American posture, both political and military, that refuses to make the essential distinction between apt force and inept violence. The enforcement of this distinction points the only way to security, both for ourselves and for all the world.

I do not, of course, maintain that it will be easy to negotiate in detail the precise and concrete meaning of this distinction as applied to nuclear stockpiles. But I do maintain that this is the cardinal issue that needs to be negotiated. I further maintain that the necessary premise of negotiation exists. It is a matter of self-interest to both parties to agree to the distinction itself and to strike a further agreement to negotiate its practical meaning. Success in the negotiations is not assured. But at least success is a more genuine possibility and a more instant necessity in this area than anywhere else.

Nor need we fear that the guidance of Divine Providence will be lacking to us as we thus set to work to dismantle the Era of Terror, which has grown increasingly offensive to the moral conscience. The redemption of mankind from the dominion of terror is not alien to the intentions of God.

FACTS ABOUT THE AMERICAN MERCHANT MARINE

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, the Propeller Club of the United States is a nationwide, one might even say a worldwide, organization of shipping, exporting, industry, and professional people banded together for the specific purpose of promoting and supporting an American merchant marine and allied industries adequate to meet the requirements of national security and of the economic welfare of the United States.

Each year the Propeller Club conducts an American Merchant Marine Conference as part of its program of public relations, education, and good will among exporters, importers, and the public generally. Its 33d annual conference, held in Detroit this past October, very properly was devoted largely to problems of the country's "Fourth Seacoast," the St. Lawrence Seaway.

As an introduction to its recently published record of resolutions adopted at this 33d annual convention, there is presented a brief summarization of "Facts You Should Know About the American Merchant Marine." This summary is so impressive, and so deserving of widespread public attention and study, that I ask unanimous consent that the statement be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FACTS YOU SHOULD KNOW ABOUT THE AMERICAN MERCHANT MARINE

WHAT IT IS

It is an American industry of substantial size, operating about 1,000 ships of various types in ocean trades and 5,000 vessels in lakes and rivers, providing over one-half million jobs in vessel operations, ship construction and repair, port services and supplies, fuel oil, insurance, longshore and seafarer wages, etc.; providing about $2 billion in payrolls annually.

ROLE OF AMERICAN MERCHANT MARINE AS A CUSTOMER OF U.S. BUSINESS

It spends with American business concerns about $800 million per year in goods and services.

Its food bill, for foodstuffs purchased entirely from United States companies, for feeding passengers and crew members is $75 million annually.

It gives $75 million in business to other American companies each year for ship supplies.

American insurance companies enjoy $72 million in insurance premiums from American shipping; oil companies $168 million in fuel oil and other petroleum product sales; and shipyards $99 million in repairs.

It will spend $3 billion in the next few years for ocean vessels alone in the greatest shipbuilding program in its peacetime history. All of these expenditures will be made in American shipyards.

HOW THE AMERICAN MERCHANT MARINE SERVES THE ECONOMY OF THE UNITED STATES

Besides being a great first-rate customer of American business and employer of American industrial workers, the American merchant marine serves a vital role in keeping the wheels of American industry turning.

It provides the only reliable transportation medium for the $32 billion annual import-export business of the United States on which an additional 4½ million Americans rely for their jobs.

It is the only insurance in times of stress or emergency that our American exports can move to their foreign markets.

This means safe, reliable transport for a quarter of our cotton; a third of our wheat; one-half of our entire rice crop; a quarter of all tobacco raised in the United States; the equivalent of 100 percent of all of the agricultural products of 1 acre out of 10 in the United States.

It guarantees to the industry of the United States, because by law it must serve U.S. trade, that the flow of essential imported raw materials will not stop, and paralyzes our mills and factories. It guarantees transport to our consumption centers of the world's raw materials, such as manganese, bauxite, lead, tin, nickel, natural rubber, and other essential metals and ores whose primary source is often overseas and without which we could not even produce steel; could not operate the factories of the Nation and could not adequately prepare for defense.

Its domestic oceangoing fleet of modern vessels, serving the intercoastal and coastwise trade, serves American industry in two important ways.

It offers the largest single transport container, in which goods can be handled on certain routes at a lesser cost than by any other medium.

It provides an effective stabilizing force on land transport rates in the basic commodities without which our industry would be burdened with excessive costs.

Its great fleet of river and lake vessels, both self-propelled and towing types, provides a transport system for finished goods and raw bulk commodities in quantities and at rates impossible through any other medium. In the case of many bulk cargoes, these vessels and the transport system they constitute make possible the very industries they serve.

American flag tanker vessels provide the crude and refined petroleum products which are essential to every industrial operation on the American scene.

WHAT THE AMERICAN MERCHANT MARINE COSTS

Contrary to generally accepted views, the American merchant marine does not cost the American taxpayer "one red cent," according to Mr. Clarence G. Morse, Federal Maritime Administrator and Chairman, Federal Maritime Board.

It received many millions in harbor and navigation project appropriations, but returned on an average of $1.50 for each $1 spent for such projects in economic benefits to the industries and communities along our rivers, lakes, and coastlines.

It received $449 million in operating subsidies (one-fourth of our ocean fleet only) from 1946 to 1955, and paid back into the U.S. Treasury $422 million in taxes.

Millions in additional taxes were realized out of its purchases of supplies, foodstuffs, fuel oil, new ships, port services, and the myriads of other items bought from American business to run a modern American merchant fleet.

DEATH OF SENATOR LANGER, OF NORTH DAKOTA—RESOLUTION

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, at a meeting of the Antitrust and Monopoly Subcommittee held on January 11, 1960, it was unanimously agreed to draw up a resolution expressing the sorrow of each of the members at the passing of Senator William Langer, of North Dakota, who inaugurated the subcommittee and served as its first chairman. The resolution was to make note of Senator Langer's monumental achievements in the Senate generally and in the subcommittee in particular.

I was directed, as chairman, to place the resolution in the permanent records of the subcommittee and in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

I was also directed to send a copy of the resolution to each of Senator Langer's four daughters: Mrs. Cornelia Noland, 3326 Quesada Street NW., Washington, D.C.; Mrs. J. Peter Schaeffer, 7 Hunter Lane, Rye, N.Y.; Mrs. D. King Irwin, Lees Hill Road, New Vernon, N.J.; and Mrs. Franklin Gokey, Box 1959, Fargo, N. Dak.

I ask unanimous consent that the resolution be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

RESOLUTION

Whereas Senator William Langer had a long and distinguished record in the service of his country and its people, respectively, at attorney general and twice Governor of North Dakota and as U.S. Senator from that State since his election in 1940; and

Whereas Senator William Langer, as chairman of the U.S. Senate Judiciary Committee in 1953–54, inaugurated the Senate Antitrust and Monopoly Subcommittee and served as its first chairman; and

Whereas Senator William Langer's record of achievement as chairman of said Senate Antitrust and Monopoly Subcommittee was instrumental in fostering the subcommittee as one of the permanent subcommittees of the Senate Judiciary Committee; and

Whereas Senator William Langer has continued through the years since 1953 to participate actively in the investigations and hearings of the Senate Antitrust and Monopoly Subcommittee and has brought great credit to the efforts and accomplishments of said subcommittee; and

Whereas Senator William Langer has long been recognized as a great champion of the small business people and the efforts of Congress to curb monopoly and monopolistic power and control over the destinies of man and business; and

Whereas Senator Langer's concern over the problems of the poor and the oppressed were reflected in all walks of life and his door was open to one and all who needed a sympathetic ear; and

Whereas the members of the subcommittee have for these many years relied on Senator William Langer's great wisdom and enthusiasm in combating any spreading of monopoly in the United States of America; and

Whereas the members of the Senate Antitrust and Monopoly Subcommittee were deeply grieved by the sudden passing of their beloved colleague and friend on November 8, 1959, while Congress was adjourned; and

Whereas the members of this subcommittee will miss Senator William Langer's wise counsel and rare humor in hearings and meetings of the subcommittee: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Members of the U.S. Senate Antitrust and Monopoly Subcommittee on this the 11th day of January 1960, That they are deeply grieved by the sudden loss of their friend and colleague, Senator William Langer, of North Dakota, and that said loss will be genuinely felt for many years to come by those who knew, loved and worked with him and by the many people who profited by his dedication to our free enterprise system and the antitrust laws; and further

Resolved, That this resolution be signed by each subcommittee member and placed in the permanent records of the subcommittee and in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD; and further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be forwarded to his four daughters.

ESTES KEFAUVER,
U.S. Senator, Chairman.
THOMAS C. HENNINGS, Jr.,
U.S. Senator.
JOSEPH C. O'MAHONEY,
U.S. Senator.
JOHN A. CARROLL,
U.S. Senator.
PHILIP A. HART,
U.S. Senator.
EVERETT MCKINLEY DIRKSEN,
U.S. Senator.
ALEXANDER WILEY,
U.S. Senator.

AMENDMENT OF INTERNAL REVENUE CODE OF 1954—BILL INTRODUCED

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, the amendment to the clean elections bill, which was passed this afternoon, allowing a small deduction or credit for campaign contributions to Federal elections, was not agreed to.

I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill, the text of which is the same as that of the amendment which was rejected this afternoon. I assume it will be referred to the Committee on Finance for consideration. I have been told by members of that committee that they would consider it in due course.

I understand that the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLARK] and the Senator from Oregon [Mr. NEUBERGER] wish to be added as cosponors of the measure. Therefore, I ask unanimous consent that the bill lie on the desk for 1 day in order to allow them and other Senators to join as cosponsors.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the bill will lie on the desk, as requested by the Senator from Tennessee.

The bill (S. 2905) to provide for a credit or deduction against Federal income taxes for certain political contributions, introduced by Mr. KEFAUVER (for himself, Mr. CLARK, and Mr. NEUBERGER), was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, I move that the Senate adjourn until 12 o'clock noon tomorrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 51 minutes p.m.) the Senate adjourned until tomorrow, Tuesday, January 26, 1960, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

MONDAY, JANUARY 25, 1960

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Rev. Paul J. Harrell, pastor, Memorial Baptist Church, Arlington, Va., offered the following prayer:

The Scriptures command us to "Live as free men; yet without using our freedom as a pretext for evil; but live as servants of God" (I Peter 2: 16).

Let us pray: Worthy art Thou, our Lord and our God, to receive the glory and the honor and the praise of men and of angels: for Thou didst create all things, and because of Thy will they were, and were created.

Father of truth and of justice, of Thine infinite goodness and wisdom, direct, we pray Thee, the hearts of these who hear authority in our Nation, strengthen them with the power of Thy Holy Spirit; protect them from the snares of the enemy and the pride of power; and grant that rulers and people may with one mind serve Thee our God and King through Jesus Christ. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

The Journal of the proceedings of Thursday, January 21, 1960, was read and approved.

RICKOVER DESERVES THE PRESIDENT'S EAR

Mr. HECHLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from West Virginia?

There was no objection.

Mr. HECHLER. Mr. Speaker, the Eisenhower administration's ostrichlike reaction to reality was dramatized again Sunday evening in a televised interview with Vice Adm. Hyman Rickover on "Meet the Press."

James Reston, of the New York Times, asked Admiral Rickover if any important official of the Eisenhower administration had ever asked him to give his views on the American educational crisis. The admiral's reply was a soft, sad "No, sir."

On numerous occasions, the father of the atomic submarine has spoken and written with wisdom and insight on the grave problems facing our educational system. His views have been discussed and debated across the land. But the Eisenhower administration is not even interested enough to pick up the telephone and invite him over for a discussion of probably our gravest national problem.

President Eisenhower and his education advisers apparently are content to keep their heads buried deeply in the sands of material prosperity—as the President did in his recent state of the Union message.

All is well, said the President in his state of the Union message. Prosperity and happiness are pursuing our people at an unprecedented pace, he said. And, above all else, our educational system does not need what he called a "Federal hypodermic."

But not only our children but the security and vitality of our country will be stuck—with a woefully inadequate educational system—if this Congress fails to enact a genuine program of Federal aid to education, such as the Murray-Metcalf bill.

On "Meet the Press," Admiral Rickover warned that a stronger educational system, buttressed with Federal assistance, was our Nation's most urgent need and our first line of defense. He also indicated that Pentagon appropriations actually might be cut 20 to 30 percent and the savings invested in education. National defense probably would be strengthened by such a move, Admiral Rickover said, by thinning the bureaucratic layers which are strangling our defense program.

I announced before this session began that I would not vote another penny for arms spending until a genuine program of Federal aid to education is enacted. If necessary, I would favor diverting a billion dollars a year from our defense budget to improve our schools because, as Admiral Rickover pointed out, education is the foundation of our national security in the future.

In this era of both international tension and unparalleled international opportunity, education has become a national problem that demands national solutions. No longer should the tired cry of States rights—which often turn out to be States wrongs, as Adlai Stevenson has pointed out—lull us into ignoring this Nation's educational crisis.

Only the Federal Government has the resources and the efficient taxing techniques to rescue our local school systems from a fate far worse than the bogeyman of Federal control—the mediocrity fostered by an inadequate local investment in education.

Our States and communities vary widely in their ability and effort to support public schools. But the industrial States, which are able and willing to spend generous sums on public education, suffer from inability of their less fortunate cousins to finance adequate schools in this age of mobility. Poorly educated citizens of the less fortunate States migrate to the more prosperous ones in search of work, bringing with them the crippling handicaps of inadequate education. And our national welfare and security cannot stop at State boundaries. Today, probably more than ever before, we are "One nation, under God, indivisible, with liberty and justice for all."

Let us look at my State of West Virginia. Only 14 States add more basic wealth to the Nation's economy than does West Virginia. But in 1958, West Virginia ranked 35th in family buying income and 42d in school expenditures per pupil. Why this great gap between West Virginia's contribution to the national economy and the social and economic dividends my State realizes from its tremendous contribution?

West Virginia, like many other States, is not getting its fair share of the tax yield from the wealth it produces. The State's production goes out in tank, coal, and flat cars. Few finished products, which carry a high ratio of local and State taxes that can be passed on to the residents of other States, are manufactured in West Virginia. But when West Virginians buy these finished products, they are helping finance the school systems of more industrialized States.

Both in the interest of fairplay and national progress, West Virginia and the many States sharing its tax plight desperately need and deserve Federal aid to education. In this way they could receive their fair share of the national tax yield and make even greater contributions to the growth of these United States.

For these reasons and the urgent ones cited by Admiral Rickover, this Congress must yank the Eisenhower administration's head out of the sand into the hot glare of reality by enacting a genuine program of Federal aid to education. Our national survival is at stake.

THE CIVIL RIGHTS DISCHARGE PETITION—A RELIABLE POLITICAL DIVINING ROD

Mr. MOORHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOORHEAD. Mr. Speaker, from ancient times people have used divining rods to discover that which is hidden beneath the surface.

For years believers in civil rights have looked for a reliable divining rod which would point unerringly to the real attitude on civil rights, hidden beneath political party platforms.

Both Republican and Democratic platforms have proclaimed support for civil rights.

Which party's claim is real—which party's claim is spurious?

On September 8, 1959, I took the floor of the House to predict that the political affiliations of the signers of the civil rights discharge petition would be our divining rod—would tell us whether or not there was an unholy alliance at work—would tell us whether support for the administration's tough labor bill—was purchased only in return for an agreement to block civil rights—would demonstrate that those who clamored loudest for a so-called bill of rights for labor would refuse to protect the genuine, Constitution-rooted civil rights of millions of Americans.

Mr. Speaker, the question has been answered.

On Friday, January 22, 1960, the New York Times, a reliable paper, provided us with a reliable divining rod.

The Times reported that, as of adjournment the previous day, 175 Members, or 40 percent of the membership of the House, had signed the civil rights discharge petition.

Significantly, the Times report showed that 145 Democrats, or more than one-half of the total Democratic membership, had signed the petition whereas only 30 Republicans, or not even one-fifth of the Republican membership, had signed it.

In my speech last September I recognized that because of years of tradition and deeply embedded patterns of social thought, plus the facts if practical politics that very few, if any Members from the South of either party would sign the petition.

On that date I made the confident prediction that a vast majority of Democratic Members from the North and West would sign the petition.

If we take the New York Times report and exclude from it members of both parties from the South the figures are even more revealing. Over 80 percent of the Democrats from the Northern, Western, and border States signed the petition. Barely 21 percent of the Republicans from these areas signed the petition.

In the delegation from my State, Pennsylvania, 93 percent of the Democratic members signed the petition, as compared with 14 percent of the Republicans.

Put another way, 15 out of 16 Pennsylvania Democrats placed themselves solidly in favor of civil rights, while only 2 out of 14 Republicans have thus far acted to bring the petition to the floor.

What has been the position of the leadership of both parties in Congress? The Speaker of the House of Representatives, the Honorable SAM RAYBURN, Democrat, of Texas, has traditionally opposed discharge petitions. This year, breaking with tradition, the Speaker has privately and publicly urged Members to sign the petition.

In the other body, the Senate majority leader, Senator LYNDON B. JOHNSON, Democrat, of Texas, has announced that if the House has not acted on civil rights by February 15, 1960, he would bring it before the Senate, even if he had to do so by attaching civil rights as a rider to other legislation.

On the other side of the aisle, the Republican leadership, which has demonstrated its ability to achieve party unity, has maintained massive indifference to this legislation, even though it is substantially the civil rights program that the administration purports to support. House Republican leaders say that they are against discharge petitions because they do not believe in circumventing House rules. In commenting on this reasoning, the New York Times in an editorial published today said:

> To put it bluntly, those explanations are lame. It can hardly be circumventing House rules to sign a discharge petition when the rules provide for such a petition.

Last September I said that if a majority of Republicans from the North and West do not sign the petition the American people will be entitled to draw one of two conclusions—either, first, the Republican Party, despite protestations to the contrary, is really opposed to civil rights legislation, or second, the Republican Party in a shabby deal, has bargained away any effective support it might otherwise have given civil rights this year as part of the price of obtaining support for the administration's tough labor bill.

Mr. Speaker, the fact that only a pitiful minority of Republican Members have signed the petition gives us reliable political divining rod on civil rights. As the New York Times editorial today said that failure of the Republicans to act "can only give credence to charges of a deal between House Republicans and southern Democrats."

I think it is a case of hypocrisy on civil rights, where the old coalition has exacted its price.

WHO WILL PAY THAT PRICE?

Primarily it will be the millions of Negroes in America, the very people we are supposed to be trying to help.

The Negro will pay it as he continues to be denied the opportunity for an adequate education. He will pay it again as he continues to be denied his right to vote and, along with millions of Americans in other minority groups, he will pay it through continued discrimination in employment based on race, creed, and national origin.

Another group who will pay the price for the coalition's handiwork will be those Americans who have seen the synagogues and temples of their faith bombed in senseless acts of violence which Federal authorities cannot now prosecute or prevent as efficiently as would be the case were a strong anti-bombing law now on the statute books.

No new purpose would be accomplished here by listing these bombings or recalling the dishonor roll of the places where mob violence has closed schools. These events are already inscribed indelibly upon the conscience of America and in the minds of other people whom we must face daily in the conduct of world affairs.

These things have created a false impression of America for, in reality, our national history, despite occasional regressions, has been one of progress toward wider enjoyment by more and more of our citizens of those civil rights without which there can be no real life of freedom.

Billions of dollars in foreign aid cannot hide that false impression.

The worldwide impression of America is, or should be, the Nation in which all men are born equal.

No petty political deals should be permitted to cloud that fundamental belief of all Americans.

As I did before I now again urge all my colleagues on both sides of the aisle to sign the civil rights discharge petition so that all the world will know that America has not fallen victim to cynical government-by-coalition but that we of all nations are taking world leadership in demonstrating the brothership of man.

THE VOTE ON THE NATIONAL FLOWER

Mr. DAVIS of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

Mr. DAVIS of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, last year I introduced House Joint Resolution 141 which would make the rose our national flower. Mr. BECKWORTH, of Texas, and several Members of the other body have also introduced measures for the same purpose.

Certainly no argument is needed for the proposition that the flower which is chosen the national flower of the United States should be one which has the approval and wide acceptance of the people of our Nation.

We now have convincing evidence that a broad section of the American public wishes to have Congress declare that the rose is to be, in fact, our national flower.

During last October, Florists' Telegraph Delivery Association, a nationwide organization of florists who send floral orders by wire, undertook to assist the Congress by determining the true state of public opinion on this point—which has been under discussion for a number of years.

Through its national network of more than 11,000 member shops, FTD conducted in October a unique national flower election. The association went to considerable expense and trouble in preparing for this election. Special ballots and ballot boxes were prepared and placed in all member shops, and the results were later tabulated by a firm of certified public accountants.

I voted in this election in my home district, as I am sure many of you did in your own home districts.

In this election, the results of which are being officially announced to Congress today, 1,055,629 persons voted in the national flower election, including schoolchildren, garden clubs, and hundreds of thousands of flower loving home garden enthusiasts.

The result is exactly what I had expected.

The rose ran far in front of the other 19 flowers listed on the official ballot, which included 8 other flowers proposed for the national flower in bills now before Congress.

I am submitting the official results, as attested by the auditors, and ask that they be made a part of the body of the RECORD at this point in my remarks:

LYBRAND, ROSS BROS. & MONTGOMERY,
December 2, 1959.

FLORISTS' TELEGRAPH DELIVERY ASSOCIATION,
Detroit, Mich.

DEAR SIRS: The tabulation of votes cast in the national flower election, organized and directed by the Florists' Telegraph Delivery Association during the period from October 1, 1959, to October 31, 1959, was conducted under our supervision. This tabulation included all valid ballots delivered to our office through November 23, 1959.

We report the vote results by flower to be as follows:

Position, flower, and vote
1. Rose	386,841
2. Carnation	171,591
3. Chrysanthemum	75,729
4. Lily-of-the-valley	60,033
5. Orchid	46,681
6. Tulip	31,639
7. Gladiolus	30,569
8. Camellia	27,560
9. Black-eyed-susan	22,249
10. Mountain-laurel	20,840
11. Geranium	17,177
12. Magnolia	16,871
13. Goldenrod	16,831
14. Rhododendron	16,678
15. Daffodil	16,675
16. Peony	15,887
17. Shasta daisy	14,542
18. Grass	13,614
19. Corn tassel	12,788
20. Marigold	10,741
21. All others	30,093
Total valid votes	1,055,629

Very truly yours,
LYBRAND, ROSS BROS. & MONTGOMERY,
Certified Public Accountants.

Because this accounting of national flower election returns may not be immediately available to all of the Members, I feel obliged to say that the rose polled more than one-third of a million votes, more than twice the number of its nearest competitor. For the highest three, the votes ran as follows:

No. 1, the rose, 386,841.

No. 2, the carnation, 171,591.

No. 3, the chrysanthemum, 75,729.

Next in order came the lily-of-the-valley, the orchid, the tulip, the gladiolus, the camellia, the black-eyed-susan, the mountain-laurel, the geranium, the magnolia, the goldenrod, the rhododendron, the daffodil, the peony, the shasta daisy, grass, the corn tassel, and the marigold.

A few votes for other flowers were cast in a write-in blank provided on the ballot, but no separate count of these votes is available.

I am particularly pleased to announce the sweping victory of the rose in this truly national election, conducted by the Florists' Telegraph Delivery Association, because it is the first broad expression of public sentiment in the 50 States of the United States and the District of Columbia. I am informed that flower lovers, including children, who are among the truest of flower lovers, welcomed this opportunity to tell us, the elected representatives of the people, how we should settle this historic controversy.

Naturally, only Congress can make the final decision. But FTDA has given us valuable information on which to base that decision. I believe that the decision should be made in the near future. We have, as I have said, a clear mandate from the people provided us through the mechanism of this unusual and spirited floral election campaign.

In light of the victory of the rose in the national flower election, I stand confident that its chances of becoming our national flower have been greatly enhanced.

THE LATE ALBERT ENGEL

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD and include a letter.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, under permission to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter:

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D.C., January 25, 1960.

MRS. ALBERT J. ENGEL, Sr.,
Lake City, Mich.

DEAR MRS. ENGEL: I want you to know that my heart grieves with you and the State of Michigan, as well as the country, in the passing of your wonderful husband, the Honorable Albert J. Engel.

I well remember and enjoyed so much meeting you both when you first came to Washington. You were both so fine, and added so much to the Washington life. It was a pleasure and a privilege for me to work with your husband during his term of office, and it was while serving with him on the Veterans' Affairs Committee, that I first admired his amazing capacity for work and enthusiasm. He was constantly working for measures that would help the country, and was most successful in everything he undertook. His life was an American life, beginning modestly and going step by step to finer and greater success and prosperity. He has a worthy successor in Mr. ROBERT GRIFFIN, who is such a close friend and law school classmate of your splendid son, Albert J. Engel, Jr., for whom I know you both have great pride.

I extend to you my deepest, most understanding sympathy, and may God bless and comfort you and your family in your great loss.

Deeply sincerely,
EDITH NOURSE ROGERS,
Member of Congress.

INTERNATIONAL LABOR UNIONS

Mr. SMITH of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kansas?

There was no objection.

Mr. SMITH of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, the steel strike and its ultimate settlement has again brought to the attention of the general public the political and economic power of the under regulated, tax exempt, specially privileged international labor unions. The McClellan committee investigation vividly brought forth and displayed the arrogance of the Hoffas and other international labor bosses in their treatment of their own members but the steel strike settlement again points up the necessity of regulating labor's monopoly power in order to protect the general public interest. The industrywide bargaining power of international unions can shut down hundreds of businesses from coast to coast. Jimmy Hoffa can, by making six or eight phone calls, tie up truck transportation throughout the United States. The general public is not fully aware of this fact—that the power, the arrogance, and many times corruption found in the international labor bosses—stems directly from monopoly.

If we try to point out the fact that part of monopolistic power of the union boss gives them control over individuals we are immediately castigated and pointed out as one who is the enemy of the man who labors and as one who is trying to destroy unions. Any power that is derived from a monopoly either by businessmen or union bosses soon becomes corrupt and can easily destroy freedom of the individual.

With such autocratic power it is easy for corrupt monopolists to tie up, stop, or curtail the necessities of modern society, such as communications, transportation, light, and heat. This power is uppermost in many people's minds, hence they are demanding that this monopolistic power of international labor bosses be curtailed—the same as they demanded the monopolistic power of the industrial giants was curtailed by legislation many years ago.

There are two factors in this monopoly power of the international union bosses that need correction—the union shop and industrywide bargaining concept. The monopoly power over men is the right of a union to sign a union shop contract with management—under which every person employed must join the union within 30 days. The right-to-work laws passed in 18 of the States makes such a contract illegal.

This labor monopoly power has grown up because of an indifferent public opinion. Few people realize that the so-called labor laws have been used by selfish union bosses to gain personal, social, economic, and vast political power. These bosses in their talks with the men in their unions always are careful to point out the absolute necessity for political power in order to achieve their legislative demands.

In many cases, union bosses use a sly approach and call their political organization an educational league. They thought this would give them a high sounding title as well as exemption from certain election laws. It is apparent that both objectives were successful. No one at all familiar with the political life of the past 20 years would deny the political power of the labor unions over legislative, executive and even judicial offices.

Some unions have a provision in their constitution that a member may be expelled from a union for "unbecoming conduct." In order to show just how powerful some unions have become and how their power is used, here is an item as copied from a Washington paper:

LOS ANGELES, January 19.—A judge has decided that advocating a right-to-work law was unbecoming conduct on the part of two union members and warranted their expulsion.

The ruling yesterday by Superior Judge Jesse J. Frampton denied damages sought by Cecil C. Mitchell and John Mulgrew from the International Association of Machinists. They asked $50,000 each.

The two, Lockheed aircraft employees, were expelled from the union for advocating passage of a measure in the November 1958 State election that would have prohibited making union membership a condition of employment.

Suggest that you reread that item and then ask this question: "How could this happen in America?" The answer is easily found because of political power of labor bosses. This political monopolistic power of the union bosses is the most dangerous of all present-day attempts to lead us down the road to a welfare state and a planned economy for the benefit of the labor dictators—which, of course, would be known as a Socialist labor government. It is a very simple plan—in order to control or govern the economic life of our country all you have to do is to control political power. The union bosses like to point out and have said "that a worker is a member of an economic society when he takes a job—the union is the organization or government of this society." The above statement was made before the Supreme Court of the United States by a labor union lawyer.

The greatest fallacy in the thinking of the union bosses is this, they do not understand that the establishment of compulsory union membership by law over free men—men who have to join a union in order to provide for their families—will in the long run destroy the unions or lead to a dictatorship. There is a lot of difference between the happiness and willingness of a volunteer organization and the oppressive servitude as practiced by the Jimmy Hoffas and others who have the power-drunk boss complex. So long as labor bosses have the power to use the brutal force of monopolistic power—the general public and private enterprise will see many dark days ahead.

For the reasons set forth above I again have introduced a bill, just as I have in the last two Congresses—a bill to compel the labor unions to come under the provisions of the Sherman Antitrust Act, which forbids unlawful restraints and monopolies and for other purposes.

In my opinion the enactment of such a law would be one of the most effective ways of protecting the public interest in the labor-management relations field and would cure many of the evils now existing in collective bargaining between labor and management because after all the problem is simply curbing the political and economic power of one segment of our economic life.

THE EXECUTIVE BRANCH

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD and include an editorial.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, the New York Times of yesterday carried the following editorial:

THE EXECUTIVE BRANCH

While we are still far enough distant from election day to have a certain amount of perspective, it may be useful to ask ourselves what the function of an American President is, and what differences an election may make. We must not fall under the illusion that when we choose a President we are choosing the total political future for 4 years or more. We aren't doing anything of the sort. What we are doing is to influence the nature of an institution that we may call the executive branch.

The executive branch is what its name implies. It is not a person. Persons can and do put their stamp upon it, so that an Eisenhower administration is quite different from a Truman administration, but we cannot treat an election as an incantation.

No one supposed, when the Constitution was presented to the people, that the President would have the powers he now possesses. No one could foresee the time when the Federal Government would absorb something like 20 percent of the total national income. It took a long time for the Government as a whole, and for the President as a part of the Government, to grow to large proportions. McKinley, at the turn of the century, had a personal staff of 8 or 10 and a small flock of stenographers and typists. Today the institution known as the Executive Office of the President, which is quite distinct from the several executive departments, requires 19 pages in the U.S. Government Organization Manual and includes in the immediate Presidential staff about 400 persons.

The result is, of course, that many decisions that are nominally made by the President are actually made by other persons and accepted by him because he trusts those persons.

Nevertheless, the President must make some major decisions. In time of war these decisions can be shattering, as when President Truman ordered that the atomic bomb be dropped on two Japanese cities. Even in time of peace we expect the President, as the ultimate source of executive power, to intervene in major strikes and other domestic crises and to set monetary, economic, and diplomatic programs.

These ultimate and unavoidable responsibilities may be more than any man who is not a supreme political genius should be asked to bear. Men do grow to the stature of the office, but we cannot expect miracles. We are in danger if we let the President become a father symbol for us. Even while we support our favorite candidate in this year's race for the White House, we should remember that if there is no greatness in the body of the people, the Nation cannot be saved by any imaginable greatness in the White House.

GEN. DOUGLAS MACARTHUR

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. Speaker, tomorrow a group of dedicated Americans will assemble in New York City to help their old chief, Gen. Douglas MacArthur, observe his 80th birthday. The men who will be present will be the old staff who assisted in the return of freedom to so many of the Asiatic countries.

While only a few will attend this annual reunion, countless millions of Americans will be present in spirit.

No man ever gave a greater thrill to the world than Douglas MacArthur in his liberation of so many of the Asiatic countries that had been overcome by the Japanese, and finally his triumphal entrance into Tokyo itself. Military students will never forget his strategy, his skill, and his success.

America has produced many outstanding military men, but none ever surpassed Douglas MacArthur. He stands out as one of the military geniuses of American history.

One has but to visit Japan or any other Asiatic country to observe the esteem and regard in which he is held.

When I think of the hundreds of millions of dollars we spend annually in propaganda, much of it in Asia, I cannot help but think how much more good-will could be created by a simple visit of the old soldier to scenes of his former triumphs.

May I offer to the general, whose true friendship I appreciate, my warmest birthday greetings and express the hope which I am sure millions share that he will continue to enjoy good health and deserved blessings.

Mr. RIVERS of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina?

There was no objection.

Mr. RIVERS of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I concur fully in what the gentleman from Massachusetts has said about General MacArthur. No military man has ever done more for his country than General MacArthur. His genius has put Japan where she is today—our strongest ally. His vision and foresight number him among the world's foremost statesmen. Truly a prophet in his own day.

On the 19th of January I introduced House Concurrent Resolution 462 extending to General MacArthur the thanks of the Congress. I hope we will get this resolution passed at this session, giving him the thanks of a grateful country. So far this country has given him exactly nothing. I congratulate him on his 80th birthday. May God bless him. May he not be a prophet in his own country without honor.

Mr. ALFORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arkansas?

There was no objection.

Mr. ALFORD. Mr. Speaker, I was delighted to hear the remarks of the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MARTIN], praising Gen. Douglas MacArthur, and I consider it a privilege and a pleasure to associate myself with everything he has said.

A native son of Little Rock, General MacArthur enjoys the esteemed admiration and affection of all of the people of Arkansas. In my own humble opinion, he not only is one of the greatest generals of all times but also one of the greatest Americans of all times.

I feel it is altogether fitting and proper that the esteem with which this noble American is regarded be voiced here on this floor today and be spread in the RECORD so that all the world may know:

Gen. Douglas MacArthur is one prophet who is honored not only in his own hometown but throughout this land of ours and throughout all those areas of the world which are better off today because he came their way.

I salute this great and distinguished "old soldier" who, in the minds and hearts of millions, will never never, fade away.

UKRAINIAN INDEPENDENCE DAY

Mr. ALBERT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MACHROWICZ] may extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

There was no objection.

Mr. MACHROWICZ. Mr. Speaker, the 22d day of January is an important day in the annals of the history of the world. It marks the 42d anniversary of the proclamation of Ukrainian independence and the 41st anniversary of the proclamation of the act of union by which Western Ukraine was joined with the Ukrainian National Republic which took place in 1918 and 1919, respectively.

These two dates mark the expression by Ukrainians of the same ideals held by the Americans. The independence which was accomplished by the Ukrainians was a union in spirit of Ukrainians and Americans. Unfortunately, this achievement was obliterated by the force of the continually growing menace to the democracies throughout the world. The Ukrainian nation was but one instance of a people enchained by the godless materialistic Goliath called international communism, but the spirit of hope of Ukrainians lives on and one day justice and truth will end most triumph.

The continuous pressure for freedom by the Ukrainians is something that we cannot afford to overlook. This is the largest captive non-Russian nation in the U.S.S.R.

I join with those who today honor the Ukrainian nation and express the hope and confidence that they will eventually regain their lost freedom and independence.

GAS AND GERM WARFARE

Mr. KASTENMEIER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

Mr. KASTENMEIER. Mr. Speaker, last September I discussed on this floor the efforts of certain segments of the Defense Department to have the United States change its basic position in regard to the use of gas and germ warfare. That position has long been that only if an enemy used these weapons against us in wartime would we employ them ourselves.

I introduced in September House Concurrent Resolution 433, which would reassert the traditional American position against first use of these weapons. This I did because I believe the moral position of the United States requires that we not use such weapons unless others use them first. The Army's position, in recent months, has been that these weapons are more humane than others. I doubted that belief, and my doubt has been amply confirmed by analysis of some of the kinds of materials with which the various chemical and biological services are working.

These agents are sufficiently dangerous that, from military research into biological and chemical weapons, three deaths have resulted. There has been a total of 715 cases of illness and injury, of varying intensities. I shall describe below the various categories of these cases.

I should make it clear at this point, Mr. Speaker, that my interest in this matter is simply to show the kinds of agents being used. I do not believe that research in this field should be stopped, so long as other nations have the capability of developing these weapons. I am glad that such research has been so surrounded with safety measures, as I understand it has. The elaborate safety measures, in fact, only bear out my contention that these agents can be best described as deadly, rather than humane.

On January 12, 1960, I directed a series of questions concerning the numbers of illnesses and deaths to Mr. John E. Jackson, Director of Atomic, Biological, and Chemical Warfare in the Defense Department. On January 20, Mr. Jackson replied. I shall list below my question concerning illnesses and deaths and his replies:

Question 1. Without regard to or mention of the agent involved, have any deaths occurred as a result of research in chemical warfare? (Here only the agents, not the fact of death, could be of interest to a foreign power.) If there have been deaths, how many?

Answer. Since 1950, only one death has occurred as a result of contact with chemical agents in our research and development program. This resulted from an accident which occurred during the development of a flame thrower. No deaths have occurred from research on toxicological chemicals.

Question 2. Without regard to the specific agents involved, have any illnesses or injuries resulted from research into chemical warfare? If so what was the total number of such injuries or illnesses?

Answer. The number of illnesses and injuries that have occurred since 1950 as a result of occupational exposures in our chemical warfare program are shown below. We have broken these down into two categories showing the number of individuals with minor (or "no lost time") and "lost time," cases.

No lost time	432
Lost time	32

Question 3. Without regard to the agents involved, have any deaths occurred as a result of research in biological warfare, and if so, how many?

Answer. There have been two occupational deaths since 1950 resulting from our biological warfare research program. I believe this to be an excellent safety record in view of the frontier areas of research involved, and the fact that it is necessary to investigate all manner of infectious micro-organisms and viruses. This record is all the more outstanding when we consider that during the past 10 years 12 deaths have been reported among the technicians and scientists handling small monkeys needed by pharmaceutical companies for the research and production of poliomyelitis vaccine. It should be noted that many discoveries by the Chemical Corps have contributed to protecting, through the development of vaccines and other means, those working in biological and chemical research laboratories.

Question 4. Without regard to the specific agents involved, what is the total number of illnesses resulting from research into biological warfare?

Answer. A total of 251 cases of occupational illness have occurred as a result of our biological research and development program since 1950:

Minor to moderate illness (characterized by flu or grippe symptoms)	228
Severe illnesses (symptoms of a relatively more severe nature than the above category)	23
Total	251

Question 5. In biological warfare, a number of cases of illnesses have already been published, with reference to the particular agents. These include anthrax, Venezuelan equine encephalomyelitis, brucellosis, human glanders, tularemia, psittacosis, Q-fever, shigellosis, and plague. With reference to these agents only, since these any foreign powers knows have been worked on, what, for each disease, have been the total number of cases and the total number of deaths? If any case has involved a combination of diseases, please note that fact.

Answer. The information requested in question 5 is classified, as such a compilation might reveal the character of the effort being placed on the various agents in our program. The information requested relative to combinations of diseases is classified for the same reasons. In most instances the mere fact that a particular agent is of interest is not classified, while data that might reveal the relative amount of effort being placed on it are classified.

Question 6. We are informed that about 30 percent of the diseases resulting from biological-war research have not been published, but that is only because no one has yet written these cases up, not because the national security would be damaged by publication. What are the details of these cases?

Answer. In reply to question 6, some cases have been published in the unclassified literature on the basis that the information would be of value to the scientific community. Copies of these articles have been furnished to your office. We are continually reviewing our data to determine whether or not it would be of value to the scientific community to publish other cases. The determining factor in this activity is whether the information we have accumulated will contribute to the advancement of scientific knowledge without unduly revealing our military program. The ratio of published to total number of clinical cases in this field is a classified figure, on the basis that it might reveal the character and extent of the effort in our program.

Aside from these cases, totaled without regard to kind of illness by Mr. Jackson, there are a number of cases, some before and some after 1950, which have been reported in various medical journals. These were 1 case of plague, reported in the U.S. Public Health Service's Morbidity and Mortality Weekly Report for November 28, 1959; 60 cases of acute brucellosis, reported in the March 1959 American Medical Association Archives of Internal Medicine; 62 cases of tularemia, reported in the March 1959 Annals of Internal Medicine; 12 cases of psittacosis, reported in a paper at the American Trudeau Society meetings in May 1959; 27 cases of Q fever, reported in a paper at the American Trudeau Society meetings in May 1959; 14 cases of Venezuela equine encephalomyelitis, reported in the August 21, 1954, Journal of the American Medical Association; 6 cases of human glanders, reported in the January 1947 Annals of Internal Medicine; 25 cases of anthrax, reported in the August 3, 1946, Journal of the American Medical Association; 6 cases of shigellosis—bacillary dysentry—reported in the April 24, 1954, Journal of the American Medical Association.

The two deaths resulting from biological research, one in November 1951, and the other in July 1958, were from acute onsets of anthrax. The 1951 patient was a bacteriologist for the Army. He evidently caught the disease from accidental dispersion of anthrax after a laboratory experiment, and died 3 days later. Presumably, the work with anthrax was still secret, so the bacteriologist's death certificate listed bronchial pneumonia as the cause of death.

In 1958, anthrax was caught by an electrician in the town of Frederick who changed light bulbs on the base at Fort Detrick. Six days after the onset of the disease, he died. His death certificate listed myocardial failure due to visceral anthrax as the cause.

In raising this whole matter, Mr. Speaker, I repeat that my intention is to show that agents of chemical and biological warfare are not humane. As I said I have no doubt that safety precautions at the various installations are excellent, as they need to be in the presence of such deadly materials. And I am further convinced that, so long as there is no effective international agreement that would eliminate these weapons, we must continue to do research on them.

But that does not mean we should decide to use these dread weapons first. To uphold our moral position before the world and for ourselves, we should state our formal national policy, to use these weapons only if we are forced to do so by their being used against us. To that end, I again urge the passage of House Concurrent Resolution 433.

GEN. DOUGLAS MacARTHUR

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I, too, would like to join with my colleague the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MARTIN] in saying "Happy birthday" and expressing our appreciation to Gen. Douglas MacArthur upon his 80th birthday.

I would like to say to the distinguished gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. RIVERS] that I should be delighted to vote for his resolution expressing the thanks of the Congress of the United States to Gen. Douglas MacArthur. I wish, Mr. Speaker, that it could be treated as a privileged resolution and that it could be passed today.

Over these many eventful years I have had the great pleasure of working with Gen. Douglas MacArthur, both here in Washington and elsewhere. I knew of his wise counsel and cooperation long before I became a Member of Congress.

In national affairs as well as world affairs, never have I known a man better informed. His wide knowledge of civil as well as military matters always command respect. It is one of the great joys of my life that I have had the privilege of knowing and benefiting from the wisdom of General MacArthur. Everyone in America and in many lands even to this day and far into the future benefit and are helped by his advice.

No honor is too great for him. I believe his beloved country, through the Congress, should award him a special medal of appreciation. May the good Lord shower his choicest blessings upon him and his family for what he has given to America and to the world.

THE CHALLENGE OF ENLARGING ECONOMIC FREEDOM FOR OUR CHILDREN: PART II—THE FIVE POTENTIALS TO ROLL BACK THE ECONOMIC PERILS

The SPEAKER. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CURTIS] is recognized for 1 hour:

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, this is the sixth speech of our series on how the Republican Party is suited to meet the challenge of modern times. I wish to continue the discussion begun by the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. RHODES] on the challenge of preserving and enlarging economic freedom for our children.

The gentleman from Arizona outlined the real perils which have arisen to threaten not only the growth of that freedom but its very existence. As his talk progressed, it became apparent how the lack of the four basic qualifications for an effective political organization—the qualifications which make up the theme of this series of speeches—in the party then in control of the country gave rise to these perils

These four qualifications are first, a basic degree of unity; second, a belief in principle over expediency; third, democracy within its own organization; fourth, a sense of responsibilty toward the future.

I believe a discussion of the attitudes of the two parties upon the subject of the Federal Government's responsibilities in setting forth the economic goals of our society and of its necessary role in seeking to attain these goals, will reveal that the Republican Party possesses the four qualifications needed to meet the challenge of the future and that the other party lacks them.

Just recently the Republican members of the Joint Economic Committee had occasion to set forth their views, which I believe coincide with the views of the Republican Party, on the Nation's economic objectives. These views show considerable contrast to those expressed by the Democratic members of the committee in their report. The Democratic members report shows disunity in thought, which I believe stems from the disunity of the divergent and conflicting interests they seek to represent. This report shows a constant appeal to expediency over principle—indeed, a failure to give more than lipservice to certain principles basic to our people and way of life. It shows a lack of democracy in its own organization, in the very preparation of the views they sought to express. Finally, by an undue emphasis on the present and the past and on purely material goals their report shows a lack of sense of responsibility toward the future.

I am quoting the Republican expression of views on the Nation's economic objectives:

The majority reduces our economic goals to three: Economic growth, high and stable employment, and stability in the general level of prices. Certainly, these are important goals which we all seek. But, is this an exhaustive list? Surely it is not. There are other important economic goals, and if these are not also made explicit, we think it is impossible to establish priorities and resolve conflicts.

Virtually all countries and economic systems share these three major goals. The really significant differences among economic systems arise out of the interactions of these goals with other goals. Fundamentally, it is our great regard for and realization of the goal of economic freedom that distinguishes the structure and performance of the American economy from that of the Soviet.

At the minimum a list of major economic goals should include: Economic freedom, economic efficiency, economic stability (both price level and employment), economic growth, and economic security. Some of these additional goals are implicitly adopted by the majority in discussion, but we cannot have the very clear concept of objectives which they call for if the list is incomplete and the relationships among the goals—the circumstances under which they conflict with or complement each other—are never carefully explored.

Economic freedom is an end in itself, one which Americans very highly prize.

Economic freedom means economic opportunity for the individual as a seller of his services and output, and also as a buyer in markets responsive to his wants. It allows individuals with initiative, imagination, and faith in their own ideas to break out of the rut of tradition into new and more productive endeavors. Economic freedom, with its challenging opportunities and its built-in disciplines, is a powerful instrument for promoting economic growth, efficiency, and welfare. But because of risks, frictions, and imperfections in the economic structure, economic freedom may at times conflict temporarily with economic stability and economic security.

Economic efficiency means that our productive resources are allocated among competing uses, both private and public, so as to produce the greatest output of the right things at lowest cost. Maintenance of economic efficiency requires that the economy be very flexible, capable of adapting promptly and smoothly to changing consumer, business, and public demands. It means that public and private consumption and investment reflect the true preferences of the people in light of the relative scarcities involved. This important objective is not explicit in any of the three goals which the majority set forth as all-embracing.

We want our economy to be efficient, whether we grow at a slow rate or a fast one. Economic efficiency complements growth because as it improves we get more output from a given set of resources and because meaningful, sustainable growth requires the same kind of flexibility and resource mobility that promote efficiency. Efficiency in some ways complements stability; no one would argue that mass unemployment makes for an efficient economy. In some ways, economic efficiency does conflict with stability and with security. The way to reconcile these objectives is to work toward improving the responsiveness of the economic system and the enlargement of economic opportunity for all.

Economic growth, economic freedom, and economic efficiency tend to reinforce each other. But economic growth typically involves changes with effects unevenly distributed. It rarely is to be had for free—it upsets the status quo, it disrupts and bankrupts, it makes obsolete existing skills and capital assets. Growth may then conflict to some degree with stability and security, though in the long run it enables us to strengthen economic security.

Stability and security go together in many respects. Increased stability of employment provides those willing and able to work with an increased security in steady incomes. Society can attempt to provide security by preventing economic change or adjustment to it, but this can be and often has been a terribly costly and temporary route to security, clearly one which is detrimental to the objectives both of growth and of efficiency. Excessive concern with either stability or security can jeopardize economic freedom, efficiency, and growth. To pretend otherwise is to delude ourselves.

Given our present knowledge about economic processes, and assuming no dramatic improvement in the adequacy and timeliness of the flow of data on which policy must be based, it seems fair to say that the rate at which we can improve the overall performance of our economy will depend heavily upon our ability to increase the competitiveness of our markets, raise the mobility of labor, and reduce price rigidities.

In view of the heavy current concern about growth, we wish that the majority had made one point unmistakably clear: Growth which is promoted by means which erode freedom and efficiency is likely to produce only "ersatz" growth. Whatever the numbers and rates may seem to show, force-fed growth will tend to distort the economic structure and lessen its capacity to satisfy our private and public wants and needs. Economic growth is meaningful only as it provides us with more of what we most want, both as individuals and as citizens vitally concerned with the security of our Nation and of the free world. It is interesting to speculate about what the Russian economic growth rate would be if we were able to measure Russian output in terms of the values put on it by the Russian people. Clearly, the figures would fare poorly in a comparison with those derived from official sources, based of course on administrative valuations.

Our basic point is that the goals of economic policy are far more complex than the majority report suggests. Our dissatisfaction is not with what the majority says about the importance of our national economic objectives—by and large we agree. Our dissatisfaction is with what they do not say. The section might more properly be entitled "All This and Heaven Too," for it leaves the ridiculous impression that perfection is easily and costlessly attainable. This is not a balanced and nourishing diet for anyone to set before the American people—and we regret that it was served by the majority of the Joint Economic Committee.

In essence the Democratic Party views the road ahead through a rearview mirror reflecting the depression decade when it had full political power. To this day that party will not face up to the fact that it was World War II, not the policies of the New Deal, that put an end to the depression. Indeed, in its analysis of post World War II problems, the Democratic Party constantly shows a strange inability to distinguish between an economy based upon peace and an economy based upon war. Throughout all of its criticisms of Republican economic policy from 1953 to the present it quite ignores the most important economic fact of the period—that we shifted from war to peace in June 1953. A party that cannot, or at least refuses to, distinguish between the economic behavior and policies appropriate to a war economy from those of a peacetime economy cannot be said to have much regard for principle or any real sense of responsibility toward the future.

The Democratic Party approach toward the peril of inflation also demonstrates its disunity. One segment of the party, I am happy to state, fully realizes, and acts upon this realization, that constant Federal deficits create a powerful inflationary force. Yet another segment of the party is looking right now at the administration's 1961 budget surplus of $4.2 billion as an invitation to promote further Federal expenditures. Indeed, some of the basic disunity in the Democratic Party stems from its belief in expediency over principle in the area of Federal expenditures. The party seems willing to reflect the views of any special interest or minority group that desires to spend Federal funds providing it will organize for political action. It is this patchwork quilt of diverse interests that the Democrat Party puts forward as the image of the common man. Actually the common man is robbed as a child, as an adult, and as an elder citizen. He and his children after him are robbed through policies originating in this crazy patchwork substitute for a real liberalism.

The very group that looks upon budget surpluses in times of prosperity as an invitation for more spending rather than for retiring some of the Federal debt is the same group that cries out against tight money and decries the cost to the citizen of the financing of the Federal debt. There is only one basic answer to tight money and high interest rates, that is to cut down on the demand for money. The Federal debt constitutes the greatest demand in the money market today. The Federal Government is competing against every business firm and every consumer who wants to finance a home, a car, or a washing machine, or an education. It is the size of the Federal debt that is the greatest cause of tight money and high interest rates. Those who really are opposed to tight money and high interest rates, and the Republican Party is, can show it by cutting down on Federal expenditures and by creating budget surpluses for debt retirement whenever possible. The Democratic Party, as a party, has demonstrated its complete disunity and leadership incapacity on this important issue.

The Republican Party does possess the four qualifications of a modern political party, so it is able to offer for the decade ahead a coherent, unified forward-looking economic philosophy, which is not a mere camouflage for special interests and which can be supported in spirit and in truth with legislative votes under our White House leadership.

This positive Republican approach rests upon the conviction that inflation is not only unnecessary, but is evil, unjust, and a process which undermines existing rights and security gained by our countrymen. Furthermore, we believe that our competition with Russia, whatever the form it may take, certainly demands that we not forfeit our freedoms in meeting it. In fact, it demands that we endeavor to expand and root ever more firmly the freedoms we now have, while by this example encouraging the rest of the world to seek social forms with freedom as a basic value. But freedom must be solidly founded on a base of collective responsibility and practical self-discipline. The battle for a sound dollar is thus a necessary part of any struggle for sound freedoms in this country and in the free world.

We believe the Federal Government has an important responsibility in promoting our national growth and in increasing our individual disposable incomes. But this responsibility is not as superficial as the Democratic advisory council visualizes it. It must be properly balanced with the responsibilities of State and local governments and, above all, with the responsibilities of the private sector of our economy.

That responsibility includes protecting and promoting the function of the free market as the primary place in which economic decisions are made. Restrictive and inflationary monopolies of business or unions, inflexible Government straitjackets, archaic and unjustified subsidies, unsound monetary policies must not be permitted to destroy the fundamental workings of our free enterprise system. To meet this responsibility Government must avoid treating all the problems of our day as emergencies requiring hasty, ill-considered and self-defeating actions and counteractions. Continued deficit financing in prosperity which has arbitrarily robbed real family income throughout this country, must be eschewed.

First. The first potential to enlarged economic freedom and prosperity for our children is wise budget management.

Ideally, the budget should be balanced each fiscal year, regardless of the national economy. The difficulty in obtaining the ideal is that revenues, at fixed tax rates, automatically decline when business activity declines. At the same time, built-in Government spending rises. To reduce spending or to increase tax rates at such a time would be unwise, and would not balance the budget of that given year, anyway, because of the delayed and perverse effects of those changes.

Practically, then, we strive for balance within cycles in American economic activity rather than within cycles in the calendar. During strong business activity, normal spending programs and tax rates should produce sizable surpluses. During recessions, maintenance of the same spending programs and tax rates automatically generate deficits which would stimulate recovery.

The deadly enemies of this balanced economic cycle are those politicians who in recession would enact spending programs that do not automatically contract during periods of prosperity. The economic sin of the New Deal was not that it resorted, in a time of deepest depression, to deficit financing. It was that it inaugurated spending programs that could only spiral upward. It was that its philosophy aimed our economy toward permanent deficit financing, or, in other words, toward a permanent depression climate.

The economic sin of the recent Democratic-controlled Congresses has not been so much in unbalancing the yearly appropriations part of the budget. It has been in the enactment of built-in spending programs, outside of the appropriations process, which would require a President, say in 1962, to request so may billions for programs set up by law by Congresses long since dead. The ultimate in demagoguery would be for the enactors of that legislation to then accuse whoever is President in 1962 of being the spender. And yet, during the last session of Congress, some of the opposition leaders tried to exercise just that exact type of demagoguery in respect to the results now showing up of actions taken by preceding Congresses under their leadership.

Indeed, it will continue to be possible in the decade of the 1960's for politicians to damage the economic health of our Nation without ever being called to task for their damage.

I think the Republicans are challenged to do their utmost to enlighten the people about these economic facts. For I fear that throughout this decade, the disunified condition of the other party, giving rise to the rule of vast special interests, will demonize that party again and again to destroy the balanced budget. Many responsible Democratic leaders will realize the tragedy of what is happening, but the devilish division that possesses that party will make it impossible for them to prevent the tragedy. Thus, the only safeguard of the public economy becomes an enlightened public.

The President's Cabinet Committee on Price Stability for Economic Growth has wisely noted that obtaining a balance within the cycles of American economic activity "does require a high level of economic understanding on the part of the public and of resolution on the part of their elected representatives and officials."

To us Republicans, this becomes an economic challenge and a major responsibility.

Second. The second potential we propose to use to preserve and enlarge economic freedom for our children is sound monetary management.

A fundamental plank in sound monetary management is the maintenance of the integrity and nonpartisan position of the independent Federal Reserve System. That system should remain outside year-to-year politics, so that momentary partisan consideration will not move its judgment about credit and money policies. An effective administration of the Federal Reserve System demands freedom and flexibility to act quickly in response to changing economic rather than political conditions.

The Republican Party will not retreat in its fight against those leaders of the opposition who would subvert the position of that system and make it their political handmaiden.

In the decade we now enter, it would be most tragic if, in the guise of promoting low interest rates, any legislation was passed which would coerce the Federal Reserve System into adopting a policy of loose money to make Treasury borrowing easier. Current attempts by Democrats to produce depression level interest rates in an era of prosperity signify that their economic intellects are on the level of the 1930's and 1940's, not the 1960's. It would be a high blunder to repeat the policy of the Democratic administration from 1946 to 1951, which inflated the money supply and consequently fanned rising prices. Abnormally low interest rates are not worth the cost of abnormally high prices in every sector of the economy. Again it must be stated that the most effective way to have lower interest rates is to lower the Federal debt. The very people who promote the Federal expenditures in excess of Federal revenues are the very ones arguing hardest for cheap money.

Moreover, proper money management aims at economic growth that is sustainable, and will not artificially balloon out only to burst. When business activity is strong and rising, an easy money policy would merely encourage the type of spending that could not be matched by an expansion in real output of goods or services, which would therefore be inflationary. When business activity is weak and lagging, on the other hand, easier money becomes appropriate to increase spending to levels required for maximum sustainable economic growth.

We see it as vitally important that the Federal Reserve and both political parties during the 1960's become capable of seeing the economic picture with long-range vision. I note again my fears that the opposition will not be able to see or to act in light of that unified picture, because of its basic lack of party unity.

Third. Another economic potential for preserving and enlarging economic freedom for our children is sound debt management.

An increasing dilemma in this decade will arise from the shorter and shorter maturity on Federal debt issues, resulting simply from the passage of time. This in itself will have inflationary implications. And with increasing frequency the Treasury will be forced to enter the market.

Plainly, the short-term maturities of a large part of the present debt already constitute a dangerous inflationary peril. By increasing liquidity, they increase the velocity of money. Those short-term issues of the Treasury can cause the Federal Reserve to delay action when it is needed to deter inflationary influences on the economy at large. Short-term issues are much more difficult to administer and they are more subject to the upturns and downturns of economic cycles, whereas long-term financing affords a stability which transcends these cycles.

The inevitable shortening of the debt will become worsened—indeed it is being worsened each month that passes—if the Treasury is forced by the statutory limit on long-term bond interest rates to continue to borrow in the short-term money market where it has no interest ceiling to restrict it. Should the opposition party succeed in blocking the recommendation to eliminate that limit through this decade, by 1970 every family in America would reap an inflationary whirlwind. During the last session of Congress, the opposition did block reform legislation in this field, under the guise of holding down interest rates and saving the taxpayer money. As a result, the rates on Treasury short-term bonds soared over 5 percent by January 1, 1960. So, no money was saved for the taxpayer after all. And the goddess of inflation received new food in the form of short-term issues and the people who wanted to buy autos and small businesses which wanted to expand had to pay higher interest rates or in many instances were forced to do without short-term credit because the Federal Government had usurped it.

A principal goal of Republican economic policy will continue to be that of converting greater portions of our debt into long- instead of short-term inflationary issues. A second goal of Republican economic policy will continue to be to save the taxpayer outlay for financing the debt by reducing the debt.

Before leaving these three particular economic potentials, let me emphasize that all three influence the total impact of Federal financial management. This the Truman administration did not comprehend. Consequently, its rigid long-term bond interest rate policies were an undue burden on its monetary policies and helped to cut the purchasing power of the dollar in half. A proper balance of the burdens is essential.

Fourth. A fourth economic potential to preserve and enlarge economic freedom for our children is the enlargement of the incentive system in America.

Traditionally, the productive vitality of the United States was nurtured on a boundless variety of incentives. To meet a Russian competition spurred on by the abandoning of many traditional communistic doctrines and the adopting of much of the incentive systems of private enterprise, the Democratic advisory council advocates our abandoning many of the features of the incentive system of private enterprise and adopting the very type of centralized programing and spending which Russia is abandoning because it kills incentives. What upside down thinking is this? In contrast, the Republicans want to restore our entire incentive system which has been already cut into by the legislation adopted through Democratic administrations.

The inherent economic advantage we possess over communism or any totalitarian type of government is that these forms of government can never duplicate our traditional incentive program and still remain totalitarian. For the chief pillar of that incentive program has been the profit system, the opportunity for risk, enterprise, and reward, with the marketplace determining the outcome rather than arbitrary decisions by groups of political bureaucrats or industrial oligopolists.

In the United States, if all business and professional enterprises are added together, the total of so-called economic teams of individuals is over 8 million. Each team has its own unique contribution to make. By accommodating itself to the market, it is spurred on to increasingly productive efforts. The search for profits has always been the greatest generating force for research and development which produces cumulative economic growth. It is from realized profits that sound sustainable economic expansion comes.

But this expansion has been greatly inhibited by an antiquated, unbalanced and unfair tax system. Wise reform of the corporate tax structure would both create more jobs and increase Federal revenues by promoting new investments. Wise reform of personal income taxes would stimulate untold individual creativity throughout the Nation.

It is a curious tragedy that President Roosevelt, beginning with his famous "soak the rich" speeches in 1935 and 1936, created an image that the New Deal tax policies would hurt the rich and help the poor. Actually, these restrictive tax policies merely made it more difficult for the poor, regardless of their work, effort, and ingenuity, to rise to the affluence of those of inherited wealth. Such shortsighted policies tightened rather than dissolved the barriers between the two economic groups. Strange as it may seem, the wealthy classes of the 1880's or the 1910's were a much more fluid, democratic class, where literally most of its members had earned their own way, than the wealthy classes have ever been since the New-Fair-Deal personal income tax laws.

In this decade, we must totally revise our tax system, so that enterprise, hard work, and imagination will again receive its reward, so that those in the lower and middle income brackets will have just as much right to be a millionaire as the man who inherits a million dollars.

Fifth. A fifth potential to enlarge freedom and prosperity for our children is aimed at restoring the mobility of capital and labor in our society.

This is closely related to recreating the incentive system. An economy based on profit motive is often conceived of as cruel, because profit involves sharp competition, and in competition somebody loses.

That system is cruel wherein there is no mobility in capital and labor. This indeed describes the feudal society of the Dark Ages. Mobility is the saving grace which makes the weeding out of inefficient enterprise good and healthful, instead of cruel and damaging to the individuals who must lose in the process. It means that unprofitable labor and capital, by the loss system, is forced—for its own good—into more profitable activity and investment. A cloying sentimentality has been behind much of the New Deal programs to subsidize and protect the "little man." Actually these policies result in making men little and weak instead of encouraging them to grow and to live up to their own capacities. Far from helping the little man, these policies have hurt him in his personal pursuit of happiness and in curtailing the increasingly beneficial part he could play as a member of his society. Nor has this exchange of his freedom for a promised security given him any real security.

Unfortunately, this mobility can and has been partially destroyed. We have seen how our tax system has destroyed part of it.

Compulsion through the arrival of the robber baron prototype in labor unions has destroyed another part. Many employees have become the subjects of robber baron controlled union monopoly to which they must bow. The employer finds that wage policies of the unions often deprive him of flexibility and frequently cut into his funds for reinvestment with which he creates new jobs. All too often, unions respond to a decline in employment in a poorly subsisting business or in an increasingly technological business by demanding shorter hours for the same pay. Other unions bar new workers with more ability from industry, and practice featherbedding and forced employment.

The robber baron type in business was checked by Republican sponsored legislation in the late 1800's and early 1900's. However, we still must perfect our antitrust legislation to be certain that the marketplace remains free to make fair economic decisions. Eternal vigilance is the price of freedom for the robber baron type still exists to muscle in wherever he can.

It must be emphasized, particularly as certain Democratic leaders seem to be trying to promote a public mood for playing the numbers game with economic growth rates, that economic growth does not come free. Parenthetically, it should be pointed out that growth in itself as it is measured today in gross national product is to a large extent meaningless. Gross national product measures include economic extravagances, economic errors, and sheer waste and calls changes in this total growth. Yet it fails to fully measure as growth efforts and capital spent in education, vocational training, research and development, and other areas which mean much more to future sound growth than probably anything else. Furthermore, growth rates do not accurately represent a society's productive capacity. A society builds its capital plant and its citizens learn their productive skills over a period of many years. The business organizations which put capital and human skills together, the third factor in productive capacity, often require decades to establish. It is productivity capacity which is the real test of a nation's economic strength, not a specially selected short span of years of growth rates. Indeed, the smaller the productive capacity one starts with as a base the more phenomenal the growth rates in the early years appear to be. As a society matures and becomes strong in productive capacity, its growth rate more than anything reflects its reactions to its needs of the day and less and less relates to its creation of new productive capacity. Russia, on the other hand, with a relatively small productive capacity, still uses a good bit of the productive capacity she inherited from the czars, particularly housing, and its capacity is still so small in relation to its needs and so much of it is obsolete that its growth rate reflects very little a response to the needs of the day but very heavily its addition to its productive plant. In spite of this, her growth rate is behind that of the United States for any comparable period of development and she will remain far behind the United States of America in productive capacity throughout the 20th century.

Rapid technological growth means increased frictional unemployment. In other words, as new technologies are developed old skills become obsolete. The very people who presently seem so entranced about the subject of economic growth are the very ones who are complaining the loudest about the problems we have which have resulted primarily from the technological changes behind a rapid rate of growth. What do these Democratic leaders think has caused the grave unemployment and underemployment in the rural areas? It has been the extraordinary technological growth in American agriculture which has made obsolete, uncompetitive, and unneeded the skills of the old 40-acre farmer. The Republicans seek to meet the human problems that this rapid economic growth has created, but in doing so we know we must face up to the fact that it is rapid economic growth that has largely created the problem. Do we indeed want more rapid economic growth in the agricultural sector of our society? Or wouldn't we do better to stimulate growth in some other section where it is needed and where we might find jobs for the displaced?

In the area of cost-of-living problems we must also recognize that rapid technological growth creates increased costs. These costs are real costs, not inflation or unfair profits, these costs result from making obsolete machines and tools and skills, from purchasing new machines and tools, from training for the new skills, and from money invested in extensive research and development which lies behind most technological growth.

Yet again, the very people who are entranced with this question of more rapid economic growth are the ones who are stirring up the people over the cost-of-living increases that occur as a result of it. What sort of areas am I talking about? Take the field of health. Never in the history of the world has there been such a rapid advancement in the control of sickness and disease, in the increasing of the human life expectancy, in the cutting down of absenteeism for health reasons as in the United States in the past few decades. Parenthetically I might state that this rapid growth is only partially measured by the economic measuring sticks we have available and so is largely not included in the United States of America growth figures.

The costs in the health field are real costs and they have gone up considerably. Yet, as I have said, those who keep crying for more growth are the very ones who are castigating those who are responsible for this rapid growth in health because of the costs involved. Certainly, human problems have arisen from increased costs in the health field resulting from this very rapid technological growth. But instead of cursing our blessings, let us meet the problems.

Strangely enough, those who would curse the costs resulting from the very rapid technological growth in the health field are the very ones who want to have the Federal Government stimulate the growth in this area even more. Is it not fair to ask them if they are prepared to cope with the problems that further rapid advancement will bring inasmuch as we have still not met the problems already existing in this area?

These are some of the economic potentials we must understand and meet if our children are to know real freedom of choice and opportunity.

I think the report of the Republican National Committee on program and progress succinctly expresses what the Republican economic philosophy proposes:

> Lift the ceiling over personal opportunity; strengthen the floor over the pit of personal disaster.

Perhaps historians will find new parallels to the story of a President, not a candidate for reelection, and of Republican Members of House and Senate, outnumbered nearly 2 to 1, who battled courageously and vigorously for the best interests of every family man and mother who want to see their children inherit economic freedom, to be able to save some money, and to be free from fiscal dictation. In fighting these battles we Republicans have learned to develop and cherish the qualifications that make us the party for the future.

THE PARTY QUALIFIED TO MEET THE CHALLENGES

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. PATMAN). Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HALLECK] is recognized for 1 hour.

Mr. HALLECK. First, I want to commend my colleagues for the great diligence they have been showing in this series of talks to set forth our basic philosophies, spelling them out in detail, so that thoughtful people may know exactly where we stand. I might say that already I have had many people who have been reading the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD tell me they are heartened and much encouraged by what they have read.

It is a matter of real gratification to me that these younger Members who have preceded me in this series have shown this vigor and this initiative pointing up the issues of the day.

I have felt for a long time, and have said so publicly on many occasions, that Republicans need to do a better job of selling the people on their record of accomplishments for the country and their record of adherence to sound principles.

Getting any story across is never easy; it is a job that requires many voices, and I congratulate my colleagues for the presentations they have made during the past week and earlier today.

For my part I appreciate having been invited to take part in these discussions and am proud to associate myself with those who have made such effective arguments for the Republican cause.

At the outset of our speech series on party differences 2 weeks ago, the able chairman of the Republican policy committee, the gentlemen from Wisconsin [Mr. BYRNES], asked:

> Are the two major political parties in this country qualified to meet successfully the challenges of the sixties?

In seeking an answer, we have examined the challenge of preserving peace through justice, the challenge of maturing labor-management relations, and the challenge of enlarging economic freedom for our children. Within the next 10 years we also will face many other tests. But these three furnish us the means of analyzing the different ways that each of our political parties respond to demanding situations. From this the voting public can predict what to expect in the future from each party.

The very survival of our Nation—and the free world—will depend upon that well-informed public.

In the opening speech the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BYRNES] discussed the obligations of political parties. If they are to be more than a conspiracy to gain power, more than a machine to serve special interests, they must strive for party unity, party principle, party democracy, and party concern for future generations. Lacking these, any political party, regardless of how fine may be some of its leaders and members, cannot fulfill the public demand for real leadership in the new age ahead.

If either of those parties fails to be constituted so that it can meet and discuss issues candidly, then the two-party process is frustrated. The voter has no choice. The future of the country is endangered by the threat of power politics, of bossism, of special interest groups.

Since the chairman of the Republican policy committee analyzed the four qualifications of our party, I now have the duty of analyzing the other party.

What does the first qualification—unity—demand of the other party? That there be no dissension? Certainly not. But it demands that the dissension not be over fundamentally opposing issues which can never be reconciled. It demands that that party not dissipate its leadership on party strife and bickering. For a party really divided against itself may stand, but it stands at the expense of the general public.

Some say that the Democrat feuds merely hurt the Democrats and help the Republicans. In the first place, it is not the Democrats who are hurt. It is the entire Nation that is hurt. And, in the second place, it is not the Republicans who are helped. For out of each fight springs an attempt to restore party peace by blurring, compromising, and watering down the issues over which they fought. That evasion hardens the task of the Republicans to convey the real issues to the people who will be going to the polls.

In this decade we now enter, political parties must have unity of purpose within themselves if they are to transmit purpose to a nation challenged by communism. Especially does this unity become essential in foreign policy.

The second speech of this series outlined how the Democratic advisory council has promoted a line of disunity in our foreign policy and hindered our sense of purpose.

The fourth speech of our series outlined the ill effects of party disunity in the field of labor-management relations. The labor-management policies of the other party during the last session of Congress were riddled with disunity. The discerning Democrats joined in with Republicans to support the only bipartisan bill offered. But, as a party, the opposition was incapable of meeting the challenge.

The same story repeats itself in the economic field, as the fifth and sixth speeches of the series demonstrated. The other party is incapable of uniting on economic policy.

Now, what about the second qualification for a party—a forward-looking political philosophy based on principle?

Each speech of this series, whether in the field of foreign policy, labor management, or economics, has strained to find a real Democrat philosophy based on consistent principle. If only we could have found that, we could have compared our principles with their principles. But what we found was much expediency, many generalities, but no consistency of principle.

So let us take a close look at some of these glib Democratic generalities, which we might better call "gliberalities."

Since the 1930's, we have heard the "gliberality" that the philosophy of the other party is one of helping the common man. This "gliberality" rings high-sounding notes. The fifth speech reviewed in great detail how the deficit spending approach of the other party has turned into a Frankenstein monster stealing from the so-called common man's pocketbook. The economic policies of the other party have led to increasing hardship for the pensioned senior citizens, the widows, the school teachers, and in fact, for the entire household of the average American family.

Let us examine another "gliberality." At the December meeting of the Democratic advisory council, there was much talk about its so-called liberal philosophy.

What do they mean by liberal? Why do they not define it? Freedom-loving liberals like Patrick Henry and Samuel Adams raised the cry of despotism against George III and his policies of high taxation and increased centralization. But the advisory council and the liberal wing of that party in the House supports programs which would advance high taxation and increased centralization.

The first great liberal President, Thomas Jefferson, warned against deficit financing in these words:

> The earth belongs always to the living generation. * * * Neither the representatives of a nation, nor the whole nation itself assembled, can validly engage debts beyond what they must pay in their own time.

The Democrat Party should be blushing at Jefferson's words. The fifth speech in our series carefully documented the fact that how, during this century, Democrat administrations had added deficits equaling over 90 percent of our national debt. That speech also documented how Democrat-controlled Congresses have added deficits equaling our entire national debt today. Yet there is no letup in the clamor in the ranks of Democrats for more and bigger spending programs.

We cannot discover a concrete Democratic philosophy on economic, or governmental, or foreign policy because there is no basic principle for that philosophy.

One last point about Democratic Party "gliberalities." The publications of that party propagandized that they can look ahead, adapt to new ideas, meet changing situations.

Yet, there is perhaps one predominant fact that has emerged from the discussions of this speech series. Those Democrats are not looking forward. They are looking backward. By their policies and their conduct, they have dubbed themselves the reactionaries. Both in foreign and domestic policy, they have become a large size, super-deluxe Mr. Reactive. They react. They cannot act. They respond with the hackneyed solutions of the 1930's and the 1940's. They cannot initiate a philosophy for the 1960's and the 1970's.

Now I turn to the third essential qualification for a political party—democracy within party ranks.

How is policy made in the opposition party? Who knows?

The opening speech of this series explained how Republican policy was formulated by our policy committee which furnishes geographical representation from the entire country. The opposition party in the House has no policy committee. It has ignored a major recommendation in the 1946 reorganization of Congress.

Of course, in 1956 the Democratic advisory council was created to advise Democrats in Congress on policy. We have seen how that organization is not really representative. In fact, the Democratic National Committee has carefully seen to it that no Democrat Representative in this House is on the main body of that advisory council. The advisory council proposes to tell Democrats in this body how to vote, without ever hearing their viewpoints. Is that democratic? Do most Democrats really want to have policy dictated by an organization in downtown, instead of formulated on Capitol Hill by a congressional policy committee geographically composed?

Disunity inevitably denies the other party the opportunity to become a truly Democratic Party. Constantly jockeying for power are its special interest groups, or its special geographical groups.

But this process of power politics denies the weaker groups any representation at all. The voice of the party minorities is silenced.

That lopsided representation becomes apparent even in the organization of committees in this Congress. The nationwide farm program is controlled by legislation in the House and Senate. Today, the Midwest is being subjected to the bitter fruits of unsound farm policies that began decades ago. But where are the home districts of the ranking eight Members of the opposition on the House Agriculture Committee? North Carolina, Texas, Alabama, Arkansas, South Carolina, Mississippi, Oklahoma, Virginia. In other words, the cotton and tobacco interests are represented, but not the farmers of Minnesota, Wisconsin, Kansas, and Iowa.

Compare this geographical concentration of power with the distribution of the other side of the committee. The first eight Republican Members represent States in this order: Iowa, Pennsylvania, Oklahoma, Maine, Utah, Kansas, California, Minnesota. That is balanced representation. As in the operation of the Republican policy committee, representation is for the best interests of all, and not the special interests of any.

I have taken a bit of ribbing for using the term "Democrat Party." I have a good reason for doing this. The "democrat" with the small "d" is being driven out of the Democratic Party. That party is not truly representative of the hopes, aspirations, and wishes of the people who vote its ticket. The voter who wants to be represented must vote the Republican ticket.

Now to the fourth qualification of a political party—long-range vision toward future generations.

Again and again our speech series has brought out Democratic characteristics of responding with splintered vision, with one-sided viewpoints, with crisis and crash solutions, with accumulated expediency. The last administration had its view so fixed on Europe in the late 1940's that it allowed the Communists to outflank us in the Far East.

Today most congressional Democrats have their view so fixed on the spending part of the budget that they forget the revenue part.

Indeed, these short-range viewpoints are confusing.

They stand up to a Russian threat one time, then retreat before the threat the next time. Be tough over Berlin, but give up the outer defenses of Formosa. Proclaim the faith of a balanced budget one day, advocate spending programs which would make that balance impossible the next. Criticize the present administration for routine appropriations requests necessitated by Democratic spending legislation a few years back, and yet legislate more built-in spending for 1962.

Plainly, this type of party inconsistency can lead us into a deadly collision with the perils of this new decade.

In all four of the qualifications for a political party, the other party has disqualified itself. Without unity, without consistent principle, without internal democracy, without long-range vision, no wonder it seeks a shelter in a preference for security over freedom. Since it parades under false colors of its abandoned heritages, no wonder it is mired in negativism and turns back from the new worlds of human relations ahead.

The other party is confused and bewildered. The precious qualities which we possess, the other party is denied. No simple act of their party leadership can cure the malady, so deep has become their split personality. This means that heavy demands for meeting the challenges ahead are slowly but surely being transferred to our shoulders. And if in our Republican political health, in our political capabilities for real statesmanship in foreign and domestic policy, we fail through apathy or through inability to get our Republican message across, then we are deeply to blame.

During these next 10 years we must never rest from the duty of bringing maximum public discussion upon these real issues of our survival, and of presenting the Republican message.

And what is that message?

It says that while men and parties may cry for peace, the only real and lasting peace comes with justice and freedom. And this type of peace can be achieved only through a leadership which sees the Sino-Soviet peril as a whole and not in parts.

That leadership must marshal all the forces of our free society to dissolve that peril. Our foreign policy must be consistent, and disallow the type of miscalculations which produced the Korean war, and which, in the future, could produce nuclear holocaust.

We must maintain an effective, flexible military deterrent system which employs a secure, retaliatory capacity to respond in just the right measure to make aggression unprofitable.

And we must maintain the strength of this system through sacrifice and not through robbing our economic defenses. For a strong, free, rapidly growing American economy is the very foundation stone upon which our survival in protracted competition with communism depends.

We must maintain and improve our collective security and solidarity throughout the free world.

We must encourage the dynamic forces of science and technology, and we must never allow central dictation and control to kill basic educational or basic research processes.

We must disavow cheap materialism or socialism which could destroy the fiber of our psychological, moral, and spiritual resources. We must support the leadership inaugurated by the President and Vice President to approach the peoples of the captive societies, so that they will exert pressures upward to obtain more freedom.

Not one, but all of these potentials of our free society must be used in this summons to preserve peace with justice and freedom.

Then there is our message about labor-management relations. Both labor and management leaders represent startling economic power. Any political party that seeks to protect either special interest at the expense of all the people is betraying the country.

Republicans led in antimonopoly legislation against business at the turn of the century. Republicans led in reform legislation to protect rank and file of unions last year. Republicans oppose measures of the opposition which would curtail the dynamic forces of industry through Government price fixing. Republicans opposed Truman's efforts to draft railroad union members into the Army in 1946. Ours is the only party truly bipartisan in these crucial matters.

Our Republican message also speaks about preserving economic freedom for our children. Policies of the opposition begun during the depression decade and carried on by Congress have burdened the average American family with a national indebtedness. Its product has been a steadily increased cost of living and high taxes. They have increasingly robbed the real take-home pay, the spending and investing money, of the typical family.

The first big weapon for preserving freedom lies in the sound management of our budget, our money, and our debt. When political leadership in prosperous times promotes legislation which turns surpluses into deficits, our children are being punished with debt. When such leadership tries to subvert the independent judgment of the Federal Reserve into false monetary management, our children are being cheated with a cheapened dollar. Those who successfully oppose measures for long-term financing of our national debt are punishing our children with economic instability in their old age. For prosperity with stable prices can only spring from proper budget, monetary, and debt management.

We need to restore the incentive system to America. The New and Fair Deal taxation concepts which have kept the poor poor, and not allowed them to move into the class of those who have inherited wealth, must be abolished. Creativity must be allowed to find its rewards. The mobility of capital and labor must be restored, and not frozen by systems of Federal regulations, monopolistic practices in labor and industry, and subsidy programs that enforce the abnormal. For only so will our children and their children really know the land of the free.

In a few days we will be observing the birthday anniversary of Abraham Lincoln. It was almost a century ago when he said:

> Fellow citizens, we cannot escape history. The fiery trials through which we pass will light us down in honor or dishonor to the last generation. * * *
> The occasion is piled high with difficulty, and we must rise with the occasion.
> We must think anew, we must act anew, we must disenthrall ourselves.

May we Republicans disenthrall ourselves with attitudes that old ways of expressing ourselves are good enough. We must become missionaries of our messages of enlarging freedom at home and abroad. We must vigilantly avoid being misrepresented. We must carry our story to every American home. We must take our message to the marketplace of ideas throughout our land. We must force public debate about the real alternatives of our national policy. And may even those who disagree with us be compelled to say that our political party used its unique qualifications to meet and not to escape the trials of our time.

For the age of promise which lies ahead belongs to those who earnestly seek the promise in the creativity of freedom, and in the strength of justice.

A REASON FOR CONFUSION ABOUT THE GOP

Mr. EDMONDSON. Mr. Speaker, when the distinguished gentleman from Indiana described the Democrats today as "confused and bewildered," he certainly described the inevitable reaction of many Democrats who have been following this series of Republican policy committee speeches.

When anybody describes the Republican Party as a "party of unity," he is certain to create some confusion among House Members who recall vividly the bitter and divisive battle for GOP leadership in this body—a battle which still reverberates around the corridors, now and then.

When anybody describes the Republican Party as a "party of principle," he is sure to lead to some confusion among American voters who are still puzzled by such Madison Avenue terms as "dynamic conservatism" and "unleashing Chiang Kai-shek"—to mention only a couple of the "consistent principles" for which the GOP has contended loudly in recent years.

When there is talk by Republican leaders about "internal democracy," the confusion mounts. That is one that is sure to confuse even some Republicans—including one named Governor Rockefeller, in New York. Any resemblance to "internal democracy" in the forthcoming GOP presidential convention is likely to be, as they say in the movies, "purely coincidental."

But the claim that is certain to compound universal confusion is that high-flying assertion about "long-range vision" in the GOP. Long-range vision in the present Republican Party? Where in the world can it be found?—a confused America is sure to ask. Do you find it in our space program, where we are far behind? Do you find it in our missile program, on any nonpolitical authority? Do you find it in conservation of our resources, in education, in housing?

In search of some explanation for this curious collection of claims on behalf of the Republican Party, Mr. Speaker, I finally located this gem of political advice in a well-known address on the subject of "Fundamentals of Campaign Organization."

The author, unless a very reliable authority is in error, was a California political expert named Chotiner, who reportedly has been a great help to some of our colleagues in past campaigns.

"May I suggest that where you have weaknesses in your candidate, you should take advantage of it," advised Mr. Chotiner.

The candidate in this instance, of course, would be the Republican Party—and the weaknesses of that party under its present leadership are matters of common knowledge and matters of recent record. They include a bitter disunity on the congressional leadership issue, an attitude on political principle under Madison Avenue guidance that can charitably be described as casual, a brand of internal democracy that is often a mockery of the term, and a blind and absolute absence of long-range vision on many important national issues.

On these points, it will no doubt be said, I may be a little prejudiced as a Democrat.

So, I submit, is the distinguished minority leader, whose hard-hitting attack on an obvious collection of strawmen might even be mistaken by some as an opening barrage in a campaign for Vice President.

As a candidate for that office, on his own party's ticket, our distinguished Indiana colleague undoubtedly has many qualifications—and many in this body are sure to wish him well.

One thing is sure, he has learned his Chotiner.

POSTAL INSPECTION

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. PATMAN). Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. JOHANSEN] is recognized for 60 minutes.

Mr. JOHANSEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks and include extraneous matter.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan.

There was no objection.

Mr. JOHANSEN. Mr. Speaker, on Monday last the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. HECHLER] addressed this House on the subject of the so-called peepholes in the post offices. His remarks may be found on pages 662 and 663 of the RECORD. I notified the gentleman of my intention to refer to his remarks, and I am pleased to see that he is on the floor.

In discussing this subject I want to be meticulously accurate both as to the facts and as to the implications of my statements.

I want to be completely fair to the Postmaster General of the United States and to the officials and members of the U.S. Postal Inspection Service—who, by the way, deserve better treatment in this House than shoddy and totally unsubstantiated accusations of "vicious," "gestapo-like," "big brother," "un-American spy activities," all of which were terms used by the gentleman from West Virginia.

I want to point out that both the American people and that vastly overwhelming majority of honest Federal employees who constitute the personnel of the U.S. Postal Service have a stake in the inspection system and the issue here under discussion.

Finally, I hope in these remarks to contribute to the fuller understanding on the part of Members of this House as to the necessary uses and the rigidly prohibited abuses of this so-called peephole or lookout system.

Furthermore, Mr. Speaker, I wish to refer to the gentleman from West Virginia with complete kindness and respect—certainly with much more kindness and respect than he referred to the Postmaster General and to other postal officials when he said:

> I suggest that Postmaster General Summerfield may want to place signs so all post office employees can see them, and the signs might read: "Big Brother Arthur is watching you."

Earlier in his remarks the gentleman from West Virginia had indicated the import of this "big brother" reference, because he said:

> Mr. Speaker, you remember that terrifying book by George Orwell, entitled "Nineteen Eighty-Four."
> Last week I was shocked to discover that in the post offices of this country, 1984 is already here.

I think this last-quoted statement clearly indicates what happened and explains why the gentleman from West Virginia came to the floor of this House full of what he believed was righteous wrath over what he had just discovered and over what he impulsively believed to be a new, wicked, and abominable practice.

Now I want to go even a step further in being fair and kind to the gentleman from West Virginia—and at the same time be completely frank and honest about the matter.

If the gentleman from West Virginia is in the least bit embarrassed about the lateness of his discovery of this practice in the postal service, perhaps a frank acknowledgment on my part will moderate his embarrassment. I was not only a Member of Congress but, of all things, a member of the House Committee on Post Office and Civil Service, before I discovered the existence of the lookout or observation gallery system in the post offices.

Moreover, and I am baring my own innermost thoughts to the gentleman and this House on this matter, I must acknowledge that I at first reacted somewhat critically to the practice. I claim no superior virtue when I add that I did not instantly voice my feelings but instead asked a great many questions about the whys and wherefores, the reasons and the restrictions, with regard to this feature of the postal inspection system. The simple truth is, I will say to my colleague, this is the first time I have ever acknowledged to anyone that my first and impulsive reactions had, to say the least, been one of skepticism.

I would not want to believe that the gentleman from West Virginia spoke as he did last Monday for any other season than the same instinctive reaction which prompted my own initial skepticism. And so I can say, for my own part, as the bishop said when he saw the felon being led away to be hanged, "There, but for the Grace of God, go I."

Now, let us get into the subject itself.

I want to quote a statement made by a high postal official regarding this observation gallery system:

> I do not like to think that any of the clerks in our service should be kept righteous through fear, but clerks should understand the possibility of their apprehension when they make missteps from the strict path of honesty. The purposes of the observation galleries should be explained to them.
> While I am on this subject I might say that observation galleries, lookout galleries, or catwalks, or whatever you may call them, are used for but one purpose and one purpose only, that is the apprehension of thieves. They are not used by postmaster or supervisors or anyone else to determine whether or not clerks are loitering or doing anything else they should not be doing. That would be a suspecting supervision which I for one will not tolerate either from lookout galleries or by any other means. They are not used for the apprehension of thieves until it is first ascertained that the number of losses in the mails chargeable to a certain office make it apparent that someone is stealing. And then only when it is ascertained that the losses have narrowed themselves down to a comparatively small section of the office. No honest man needs to fear a lookout gallery. Their purpose is to protect honest men.

Now this statement was made in an address before the national convention of the National Federation of Post Office Clerks. It was made by Chief Postal Inspector K. P. Aldrich. It was made in September 1939. It reflected official policy and regulations of the Post Office Department then in force. And when that statement was made the Postmaster General of the United States was the greatly respected Hon. James A. Farley.

Is it therefore to be suggested that Jim Farley, as he was and still is affectionately known, was sponsoring and promoting, or permitting to be sponsored or tolerated in the Post Office Department, a vicious, un-American spy activity patterned after the Gestapo—the Gestapo which was that very year at the peak of its wicked and wholly nefarious activities?

Or is it to be suggested that Jim Farley was tolerating or approving practices in the Post Office Department which, unwittingly, anticipated and predated the Big Brother of 1984 philosophy and tactics then not yet even envisioned by George Orwell?

I don't think so—and neither, I am sure, does the gentleman from West Virginia.

The truth of the matter is, of course, that the use of observation galleries and of lookouts for the detection of suspected criminals who are violating the sanctity and the secrecy of the mails, is a practice of very long standing. Indeed, I have not been able to determine the date of its origins. I am told that the U.S. Postal Inspection Service is the oldest investigative agency in the Government, and that the charge to provide for the safety and security of the mails by all necessary means was imposed upon the first Postmaster General, Benjamin Franklin, by the Continental Congress.

As to the history of the observation galleries, I am further advised, and the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GARY] who serves so ably as chairman of the Post Office Appropriations Subcommittee could doubtless verify this bit of history, that the Old Post Office Building at Richmond, Va.—used during the period of the Confederacy as the Treasury Building—is so equipped.

As to the general use of this system in more recent times, I ask permission to insert at this point in the RECORD instructions regarding control of lookout galleries issued by Hon. Walter Myers, Fourth Assistant Postmaster General, November 3, 1943. The Honorable

Frank C. Walker was Postmaster General at that time:

TO POSTMASTERS AT FEDERAL BUILDINGS UNDER THE ADMINISTRATION OF THE POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT:

Section 57 of "Instructions and Suggestions for Postmasters in the Operation of Public Buildings" is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 57. Lookout galleries: (1) Lookout galleries are to be kept free from dust and ready for immediate use at all times.

"(2) It is especially important that the louver slats and sills under same be kept clean. Exit doors must not be blocked with furniture or other equipment.

"(3) This work should be assigned to certain employees, who are to be held responsible for the proper care of the same. The lookouts should be cleaned on the first Monday of each month, and the employees should be admitted on that day only. When this day falls on a holiday the lookout should be cleaned on the following business day.

"(4) Post office inspectors, postmasters, and superintendents at stations or branches located in Federal buildings are the only officials who should have keys to the entrance doors to the lookouts. The key in the custody of the postmaster (or superintendent) should be kept in his safe, vault, or in the key cabinet under lock, where it will not be accessible to unauthorized persons.

"(5) Requests for lookout keys should be directed to the inspector in charge of the division in which the building is located."

This amendment should be inserted in your copy of the Book of Instructions.

Respectfully yours,

WALTER MYERS,
Fourth Assistant Postmaster General.

In that connection I should call attention to a paragraph from the 1937 edition of "Instructions to Postmasters on the Maintenance and Care of Federal Buildings." This paragraph, found in section 57, states:

Only postal inspectors in the discharge of criminal work are authorized to use lookout galleries.

Also, I insert in the RECORD at this point an excerpt from 1947 House Appropriation Subcommittee hearings on the Post Office appropriation bill, page 509:

Mr. LUDLOW. Is there a lookout in every large post office?

Mr. DORAN. Yes; there is a lookout post in every Federal building; in the ones that have been built in the last 25 years, I am sure they each have a lookout. Some of the older ones where they have been remodeled, are not so good, but all of the new ones have lookouts.

Mr. LUDLOW. That has been the means of discovering a good many violations?

Mr. DORAN. We have no other way in many of these places except to place an inspector on the job, and it is a job the inspectors do not like very much and you can imagine what going into a place like that and staying for hours means, but there is no other way to protect the public.

Mr. LUDLOW. Do they have regular hours or tours of duty?

Mr. DORAN. The inspectors?

Mr. LUDLOW. Yes.

Mr. DORAN. No.

Mr. LUDLOW. Just whenever they have occasion for such work?

Mr. DORAN. There are men in the post office who are assigned to work with the inspector, and they sometimes are called depredation assistants, in the large cities only. They spend a considerable amount of their time. But it is unfair to ask a man to spend more than 2 hours in one of those places, because, in the first place, the dust that has accumulated is enough to impair their health, and in the second place they have to stand in a cramped position, and at other times some of them have to kneel down to observe what is going on.

We do not use that method until we are satisfied that there is a thief operating at a particular place, then we go to work on him.

DEPREDATIONS BY EMPLOYEES

Mr. LUDLOW. What you refer to as depredation is the stealing of valuables from the mail, checks and money?

Mr. DORAN. As a rule, they are small amounts, that are stolen from organizations that are in the habit of getting contributions for various things. I do not like to admit it, but the fact is they steal from the Red Cross and from drives for infantile paralysis, and from the cancer contributions, and things of that kind. That is the safest kind of mail, because very often people will just put a few dollars in an envelope; they do not have a check on it; and many of these organizations do not make any acknowledgment; that is true especially of the relief organizations, and there are times when they get a lot of money.

In these hearings Chief Inspector Doran, of the Post Office Department, stated that—

There is a lookout post in every Federal building * * * that have been built in the last 25 years.

He stressed that—

We do not use that method until we are satisfied that there is a thief operating at a particular place, then we go to work on him.

And he cited types of thievery from the mails which were most frequently encountered. That, I repeat, was in 1947 when the Postmaster General was either Hon. Robert E. Hannegan or Hon. Jesse M. Donaldson, who himself came to that Cabinet post as a career man in the postal service.

Now as to the present practice and regulations: Section 622.524 of the current Post Manual governs use of observation galleries, the rigid control of keys, and the responsibility of postmasters and all others to report any unauthorized use of the facilities. Observance of the requirements of this cited section is periodically examined by postal inspectors.

Furthermore, a part of the indoctrination of newly appointed post office employees, adopted under the present Postmaster General in 1953, is that of emphasizing the absolute sanctity of the seal on mail matter and the serious penalties they apply for violation of that sanctity. Incident to this indoctrination, employees regularly are informed of the lookout facilities and of the use made of them by inspectors when necessary to aid in the detection of theft or violation of the secrecy of the mails.

At this point, Mr. Speaker, I should like to digress for a moment from the matter of the bare rules and regulations governing this system and offer a few observations about some of the deeper implications—both of this technique for safeguarding the secrecy and security of the mails and implications of the unfortunate and highly intemperate attack on this technique. In that connection, let me point out that the gentleman from West Virginia did not limit his criticism to alleged abuses of the observation gallery system—and about those alleged abuses I will say more a little later. He did not limit himself to criticism of alleged abuses but specifically attacked the system in relation to the safeguarding of the sanctity and security of the mails.

He said—and objected—that, and I quote his words:

Snooping postal inspectors * * * spy on postal workers * * * to see that they do not steal anything.

Even that is not an accurate statement as to the legitimate use which is made of the observation gallery. I am advised that the use of the gallery may properly be resorted to only when there is strong reason to believe—or when there is positive knowledge—that the mails are being pilfered. Generally, I am told, it is done when suspicions have narrowed down to a particular area of the postal operations or of the actual work floor.

So the real purpose is not, as was slurringly implied by the gentleman from West Virginia, "to see that they do not steal anything"—as though it were a general and shotgun surveillance of all employees arbitrarily and maliciously exercised—but it is instead for the purpose of detecting the source of known or strongly suspected thievery and to apprehend the offender on a basis and with evidence that will stand up in a criminal trial.

In this connection I wish to recall one particular statement made by the gentleman from West Virginia last Monday:

These peephole facilities * * * do not accomplish anything that tight supervision could not cure.

I challenge that statement as a matter of elemental commonsense, as a practical consideration. Does the gentleman mean to imply that normal supervisory methods—even those of tight supervision—are always adequate to detect and apprehend a sneak thief or a criminal pilferer of the mails? Certainly he does not believe that normal supervision should involve the drastic stringency sometimes necessary to apprehend such a thief? I am sure the gentleman did not actually realize the import of what he was saying.

I hope the House will indulge me as I offer a few further observations on this point—which is actually the crux of the whole matter.

Unfortunately we live in a world in which there are dishonest people, individuals who deliberately betray a trust, people who disregard the rights of others, people who by their own wrongdoing bring innocent persons under wrongful suspicion, and, perhaps worst of all, people who invoke for their own unworthy benefit and to the limit of their unscrupulous ability and to the limit of legal technicalities the very safeguards created by the Constitution and the Government to protect the innocent and to protect the rights of individuals and of society generally.

Are these enemies of the genuine rights of individuals and of society to be permitted to continue their criminal depredations unchecked and without effective challenge by the lawful forces of society?

Of course not, and I am sure the gentleman from West Virginia would be the first to subscribe to that answer.

Then, inevitably, comes the whole problem and philosophy of criminal detection and methods incident thereto.

I need not labor the point that those guilty of the criminal depredations do not knowingly advertise their activities and do not knowingly cooperate in their own apprehension.

I must apologize for pointing out the obvious—yet it appears to be necessary to do so.

Of course the confusion—and it can indeed be a very honest confusion—arises from a further consideration.

The very same regard for individual human rights which properly prompts us to look to Government for the safeguarding of those rights and the rights of society, including the secrecy and the security of the mails, also prompts a deep-rooted and very valid detestation of spying and snooping of the big brother, Gestapo variety.

That detestation, that aversion, is something that I hope we as Americans will never lose.

It is a built-in part of our concept of decency, fairplay, honorable conduct, and justice.

But—and this is the point I am making—the right of immunity and freedom from spying and snooping cannot extend to those persons who, through depredations of their own, have violated the rights of individuals or of society and have thereby deprived themselves of the normal safeguards against what is so glibly and mistakenly branded with those terms of approbrium.

Of course that opens the further complex area of still another principle of American justice and jurisprudence, to wit, the concept that a person is innocent until proven guilty and the requirement that probable cause be shown before a person may be apprehended, indicted, or bound over for criminal trial.

I am somewhat abashed at my own immodesty—as one who cannot remotely claim to be learned in the law or even a member of the bar—in discussing this matter.

But the right of investigation, of detection, and of apprehension on reasonable grounds of belief that a specific person has indeed committed a specific crime is—and must ever remain—an essential part of the processes of justice and of protection of the rights of individuals and of society.

That is an absolute, practical necessity.

So the whole matter boils down to this proposition—that the very concern for and effort to safeguard the rights of the individual and of society which we all cherish so greatly makes necessary, on occasion, the employment of the very methods of surveillance and detection here under discussion.

That becomes not only a necessity, but a very special obligation in connection with positions of special and great public trust and responsibility.

Such a position of public trust and responsibility is peculiarly exemplified in terms of employment in the U.S. postal service

To smear as spying, snooping, un-American activity, Gestapo tactics, and 1984–big brother methods the necessary, lawful actions for safeguarding of that trust and the secrecy and security of the U.S. mails against the depredations of a small minority is something which I am sure every responsible Member of this House—including the gentleman from West Virginia—would, at least on sober second thought, indignantly repudiate.

I am sure they would do so all the more when they realize that at stake in this secrecy and security of the mails are not only the personal communications of private citizens and the monetary and other items of immense property value, but also confidential and classified materials pertaining to the security of the United States.

Certainly in the postal service, even more than in many of the departments of Government outside of the Defense Establishment—and I believe the principle applies to all departments of Government—it is a tragic mistake to equate employment in the Government service with that of employment in any private enterprise. Those vested with the responsibilities of Government service bear the public trust for all citizens, for all private enterprise, and for all that we cherish in our country.

I am sure that the overwhelming majority of the employees in the postal service share this high and proud view of their own positions of responsibility and public trust—and do not want any other view held.

In that connection I include at this point a letter from a veteran postal employee published in the Los Angeles Times of October 21, 1959, answering an earlier letter from a disgruntled former employee whose line of argument was generally similar to that of the gentleman from West Virginia:

INVIOLATE MAIL

I read the Wadell letter on post office surveillance. I have been in the Los Angeles Post Office for nearly 24 years and can truthfully say that this is the first time I have heard of anyone resigning because of this so-called surveillance.

It is my opinion that if an employee is doing his job as it should be done he need not fear any observance of his work. One of the things stressed in the orientation of new employees in the post office is the inviolability of the U.S. mails. Those in charge undoubtedly feel that a certain amount of observance is necessary to see that this inviolability isn't being broken.

MERLE A. GRAY.

LOS ANGELES.

Now I come to a completely different phase of the brief but enormously damaging address given by the gentleman from West Virginia.

In his remarks last Monday he makes numerous charges that the gallery observation—or if you please, peephole—system is being used, among other things—and these are direct quotations—"to spy on postal workers to try to find them loafing"; "misused to spy on union meetings, and to embarrass postal employees in matters which should remain personal"; and "so they can look and listen in on union meetings if held in the post office."

The only thing approaching substantiation of these sweeping and very grave charges—and I do not regard it as substantiation in any way—is the following statement:

The editor of the Ravenswood News, Phil Fourney, in denouncing this practice, reported that a postal inspector in Ravenswood boasted "they often spend 18 hours or more in their peephole area observing activities of postal employees."

Now, Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman from West Virginia has any proof whatsoever of these charges or of the existence of these practices, at Ravenswood, W. Va., or anywhere else in the postal system; or if any person, in the postal service or out of it, has any proof or any reasonable grounds for believing that such practices and abuses are occurring, he has not only the right but the most solemn duty to bring that to the attention of the highest postal authorities, to the attention of the House Committee on Post Office and Civil Service, or to the attention of his own Member of Congress.

Let me add, for any value that it has to the cause of evenhanded justice, that I will, as a Member of Congress and as member of the House Committee on Post Office and Civil Service, cooperate in any appropriate way and to the limit of my ability to the end that any abuses of this character are ended and the offenders or condoners of such practices are properly dealt with, if there is proof of such malfeasance or misfeasance within the postal service. Without having formally consulted the committee, I think I can confidently state that it would take the same position.

What is passing strange to me is that the gentleman from West Virginia, who is so violently repelled by legitimate, stringently supervised methods to detect wrongdoers who commit serious depredations against the U.S. mails, does not seem to be in the least bit repelled by the practice of indulging in the most blanket sort of unsubstantiated charges against the members of the U.S. Postal Inspection Service. Indeed he has joined in that practice.

Members of the Postal Inspection Service, I would respectfully remind the gentleman from West Virginia, are also human beings; they are also Americans; they are also employees of the postal service, and they are also entitled to have produced proof of the indiscriminate, damning, and reckless accusations he has made against them.

This business of fairness, decency, and justice should work both ways. Let us see to it that it does work both ways hereafter.

Mr. Speaker, under permission to extend my remarks I enclose following my remarks a statement of the Post Office Department regarding costs of the observation galleries about which the gentleman from West Virginia also complained.

The statement follows:

Obviously a dollar value cannot be placed upon the protection of the private papers and communications of the American public which are entrusted to the mails. It is obvious that the American public would seriously criticize any attempt to do so, and would take the position that whatever is required to protect the U.S. mails is the responsibility of the Post Office Department and the Government generally.

However, the allegation that millions of dollars are being spent on observation galleries is not supported by the facts. Actually, observation galleries represent considerably less than 5 percent of the initial construction costs, and the first cost is the final cost. The relatively small amount of time to clean the galleries is insignificant.

In this connection it is important to point out that prior to 1954 only one type of observation gallery was constructed in Federal buildings. It was known as the hanging-type gallery and was suspended from the ceiling. This gallery was constructed in all post offices employing a given number of persons. In 1954 the Chief Inspector assigned an inspector to collaborate with the Department's construction engineers with a view to possibly reducing the cost of expensive galleries. The result was the development of a substantially less expensive gallery which has been found suitable in certain types of buildings. Also the specifications on doors were reviewed and additional savings were effected. Further, a less expensive and adequate floor covering was developed and placed in use. In addition, a revision was made upward of the minimum number of employees and thus less galleries are being constructed than has been true over the years under formerly used specifications. Finally, a new type observation unit to be installed in the observation galleries was designed by a postal inspector and became standard equipment in 1953.

I also include the following editorial from the Natchitoches (La.) Enterprise of December 10, 1959, calling attention to an open house to display the new annex of the post office and its new facilities:

It's really quite an outfit, the postal service. Not long ago we mentioned in a news story that the Natchitoches Post Office has "hidey holes" where postal inspectors may observe and overhear all that goes on in any corner and any cranny of the local post office. We were bemused when we heard several people who had read this mumble about "Gestapo methods."

The Gestapo was an organization that was terribly hated because it preyed upon private citizens expressing their private convictions in private. The postal inspector is a man who watches the way in which public servants execute a public trust and his principal preoccupation is the precise opposite of the function of a Gestapo agent. It is his business to protect the private citizen, not only from theft, but from prying—and from being in any way deprived of the complete freedom of the mail: the freedom to express his private convictions in absolute private.

The postal employee is frankly told when he is hired that someone is watching him always. He is told not only that he may at any time be watched while he is working in the post office, but that any man he sees on the streets may be a postal inspector * * * and that he is always in the eyes of his employers, the public. It is to the everlasting credit of the postal service that the men it employs are, with fabulously few exceptions, men who—so to speak—bear watching.

Mr. HECHLER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHANSEN. I yield to the gentleman from West Virginia who very courteously asked me previously if I would do so at the end of my speech.

Mr. HECHLER. Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the fine courtesy of the gentleman from Michigan in informing me that he was going to deliver his address today.

I have not had the opportunity to analyze the gentleman's speech. I want to accord him the full chance to get unrestricted coverage on what he has said. Others would counsel that it is necessary to come back with a strong statement which will make the same newspapers, but I have confidence that truth will win out.

Mr. Speaker, I am not going to give up in this fight to see that our thousands of hard-working postal employees and the American people are given a fair and even break.

I have scores of letters from postal workers, and even from supervisors and postal inspectors in various parts of the country. I will say that the facts are on my side so I have no fear.

Last Monday I wrote a letter to Postmaster General Arthur E. Summerfield. As of this time, I have received no answer nor even an acknowledgment.

During the period when I was working for the executive branch we used to have a rule that all congressional letters should be answered within 24 hours. We also had an inflexible rule that if a full answer could not be given within that time, at least the letter's receipt should be acknowledged within 24 hours.

It is about 2 miles down to the Post Office Department, so perhaps the letter which I mailed last Monday has not yet reached the Post Office Department or the Postmaster General.

Mr. Speaker, I want to be fair to the Postmaster General. I do not want to say the letter is neglected on his desk. I can only conclude the letter has not reached him. I hope that through the medium of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD he may read the letter I wrote him.

Mr. Speaker, the letter addressed to Mr. Summerfield to which I referred is as follows:

JANUARY 18, 1960.

Hon. ARTHUR F. SUMMERFIELD,
Postmaster General of the United States, Washington, D.C.

DEAR GENERAL SUMMERFIELD: While attending the dedication of a new post office at Ravenswood, W. Va., recently, I was very disturbed to note the construction of a special corridor and peepholes, as well as one-way glass panels to allow postal inspectors to watch employees at work, where they eat lunch and even in the restrooms.

I realize that this system has been prevalent for many years in larger post offices throughout the country, but I do not believe this excuses the invasion of personal privacy nor the insult to the individual employee.

I would be interested in learning the specific amount of money required for the construction of these special corridors and peephole facilities.

I would also like to have your statement on the number of post offices in which these facilities are installed, the type of information secured, the justification for such procedures and your own personal estimate of the future validity of these procedures.

Do you honestly believe that the amount of money saved, and the possible deterrent through operation of these procedures justifies both the expenditures and the serious effect upon employee morale?

Sincerely,

KEN HECHLER.

In this letter I asked the Postmaster General to give me facts and figures on this peephole system, why it was used, how many post offices it was used in, what the cost is and what the results were.

Mr. Speaker, up to the time I came to the floor I had received neither an acknowledgment nor an answer to the letter which I wrote to the Postmaster General.

Mr. JOHANSEN. I am glad to hear the gentleman from West Virginia say he wants to be fair to the Postmaster General. I welcome that change in attitude on his part. I observe the gentleman said he did not want to speak today because it would compete with my coverage—by which I assume he means news coverage. I want to say to the House that while the postal service and the inspection service are entitled to at least the same coverage that was given to the gentleman's remarks, my interest is not in newspaper headlines but in defending the postal service and its ability to meet its responsibilities to the American people.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHANSEN. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. GROSS. I want to commend the gentleman for the statement he has made in response to what I consider to be an unwarranted attack upon the Postmaster General of the United States. I wonder if the gentleman from Michigan knows whether the editor of the Ravenswood News, who quotes a Federal inspector as saying that often inspectors spend 18 hours or more in a peephole area observing the activities of postal employees; I wonder if this editor or if the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. HECHLER], if he cares to respond, will tell the House whether he or this editor previously complained to the Post Office Department?

Mr. HECHLER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHANSEN. Before I yield, I will say to the gentleman from Iowa, when he asked that question, I assume he is asking whether the gentleman from West Virginia made inquiry before making the statement on the floor.

Mr. GROSS. Yes; that is right.

Mr. JOHANSEN. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HECHLER. Yes; I will say to my friend from Iowa. I called up the Chief of the Inspection Service in the Post Office Department, who was out of town. I talked to his assistant prior to making my remarks on the floor. I also dispatched a letter to Postmaster General Summerfield. I do not know what happened to the letter. You know, we used to have a rule when I worked downtown that all letters from Members of Congress be acknowledged within 24 hours. But, it is now 7 days and I have gotten no acknowledgment from this request for information which I sent to the Postmaster General. I wonder if the postal service has broken down.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHANSEN. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. GROSS. That is evading the question for which I am trying to get an answer. Did this statement appear in the Ravenswood News as an editorial? How was it handled in this newspaper, and when?

Mr. HECHLER. I will be glad to insert in the RECORD the editorial statement from the Ravenswood News. I will supply it for the RECORD for publication. I will have the date, and I will be glad to supply it for the RECORD.

Mr. GROSS. Can the gentleman give us the approximate date when it appeared?

Mr. HECHLER. This appeared approximately 10 days ago, I will say to my friend from Iowa.

I include as a part of my remarks the following editorial from the January 14, 1960, issue of the Ravenswood News, Ravenswood, W. Va.:

RURAL ROUTE—GESTAPO METHODS PREVAIL AT OUR NEW POST OFFICE

(By Phil Fourney)

The dedication was a pleasant affair. Weather couldn't have been more perfect for a January afternoon. And, for this, the Greater Ravenswood Chamber of Commerce took—and was given—credit.

It seemed, though, that there was one sour note as local patrons inspected the new facility. They noted that parking facilities had not been completed, due to a lack of funds, and that there is no telephone in the post office. Yet they saw the elaborate peephole system in use.

This peephole system smacks of gestapo methods and bureaucratic waste. The post office has a corridor built along one side and through the middle of the mailing room. Entrance to the corridor is through a private door from the outside—the keys to which only Postmaster Blackburn and postal inspectors have. Blackburn is not permitted to use the key, nor to enter the peephole area, except in case of emergency.

Postal investigators come to town, enter the peephole area through their own private door, and observe the actions of postal employees without detection. A series of one-way glass panes enable the inspectors to view activities throughout the post office—even in the men's restroom—without detection. So that the postal inspector may enter the building and remain there unnoticed, there's even a private restroom in that area for the inspector.

The one-way glass panes he looks through enable him to observe the men's restroom, and the employees' dining area. The inspector can see all movements in the working area of the post office—with the exception of Blackburn's private office.

Since it isn't proper to observe activities in the ladies' restroom, there are no peepholes provided. But this room is kept locked, so that unauthorized personnel are refused entry.

The idea behind this elaborate peephole system is twofold: First, to catch crooked employees in the act of stealing and, second, to confuse the employees so they'll never know when their actions are being observed.

We overheard a fellow—who said he was a postal inspector—tell a local visitor that often they spend 18 hours or more in their peephole area observing activities of local employees.

We appreciate honesty, and we like the feeling of knowing our mail isn't tampered with. But we certainly have no use for the methods used, nor for the expense incurred.

A private industry would be blackballed for using such gestapo methods to detect dishonest behavior of its employees. We certainly can't condone the practice by the U.S. Government in Ravenswood.

And we'd much rather they'd used that money to install a telephone—or to complete the paving around the building.

Mr. GROSS. And the gentleman made no complaint to the Post Office Department at that time?

Mr. HECHLER. I made my complaint both by telephone and by letter to the Post Office Department, I will say to my friend from Iowa.

Mr. GROSS. I thought you said you wrote last Monday after you made your statement on the floor of the House.

Mr. HECHLER. No. I wrote before I made the statement and I also made a phone call before making the statement and made a complaint to the Post Office Department at that time, I will say to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. GROSS. Well, I think the timing is important. I would like to, sometime, get it settled. I doubt whether we will this afternoon. Let me ask this question: Former Postmaster General Donaldson, whom the gentleman from Michigan referred to a little while ago in his statement, came from the inspection service of the Post Office Department, did he not?

Mr. JOHANSEN. That is my understanding. I know he was in the postal service, and it is my understanding he came from the inspection service.

Mr. GROSS. Since the gentleman from West Virginia has pitched this on a political basis, former Postmaster General Donaldson was a Democrat, was he not?

Mr. JOHANSEN. He was, at least, a Democratic appointee, I will say to the gentleman.

Mr. GROSS. A career Post Office Department officer. He came out of the career service in the Post Office Department.

Mr. JOHANSEN. That is right.

Mr. GROSS. And at no time did former Postmaster General Donaldson eliminate the use of the observation galleries, did he?

Mr. JOHANSEN. The fact of the matter is that the regulations governing their use and the definition of the purpose of that use were actually strengthened under the administration of Mr. Donaldson.

Mr. GROSS. Yes. Let me ask the gentleman this question. Since this has been pitched on a political basis by the gentleman from West Virginia, there were many post offices of the first class built during the thirties; is that not correct?

Mr. JOHANSEN. That is correct.

Mr. GROSS. And all of the first-class post offices, or I assume practically all of them, contain these observation galleries that were constructed within them when they were built under a Democrat administration; is that not correct?

Mr. JOHANSEN. There was testimony, as I mentioned in my prepared remarks, by Mr. Doran before the Subcommittee on Appropriations in 1947, that there is a lookout post in every Federal building built in the last 25 years.

Mr. GROSS. So that if these are snooping galleries, it was the Democrats who put the snooping galleries in the post offices.

Mr. BASS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHANSEN. Let me say to the gentleman from Tennessee and the gentleman from Iowa, I have not in any way based my comments today on partisan political considerations. I base them solely on what I regard as the interest of the postal service, and I endeavored in my remarks to commend the contributions of the great Postmasters General of both parties to the preservation and improvement of that service.

Mr. BASS of Tennessee. Will the gentleman now yield?

Mr. JOHANSEN. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. BASS of Tennessee. For 6½ years before coming to the Congress I had the privilege of serving as postmaster, and I served in one of those buildings built by the Democratic administration, in my hometown; we had lookouts and peepholes, both.

Mr. JOHANSEN. Of course, the gentleman did.

Mr. BASS of Tennessee. And I worked under them. And, as I sat here and listened to this discussion today, I hope that a copy of all of this colloquy, the former, this one and the ones that follow, will be mailed to the clerks and the postal carriers and the postmasters throughout the United States.

I say that because I can imagine that they will really get a bang out of this, out of reading all this discussion that is being had on the floor of the House about peepholes and lookouts in post offices; because, in the first place, it does not disturb the average postal employee very much. As a matter of fact, during the 6½ years I was postmaster I think I was the only person who got into the lookout in my office. I went there to inspect it, to see if it had been cleaned.

If the gentleman will permit, I should like to express one more opinion on this subject. I think, without being critical, but being generous, really, the entire discussion is superfluous. I do not think the lookouts or peepholes in post offices serve the slightest purpose because I do not believe there are enough crooks in the postal service to demand the use of such an instrument. I do not think they are used very often. I think the expense of building them far exceeds the value that they perform for the postal service because I do not believe we have that many crooks in the postal service of the United States of America.

Mr. JOHANSEN. Mr. Speaker, first of all, in order to keep the record straight, I will say in response to the gentleman's remarks that, as postmaster, he was acting within the regulations when he went there to inspect the gallery, because the regulations so provide. He was acting entirely properly. However, I must differ with the gentleman.

Mr. BASS of Tennessee. If I had not known I was acting properly, I would not have said I was there.

Mr. JOHANSEN. I am sure I could go further than the gentleman has gone and say that if he had not known it was proper he would not have done it.

Mr. BASS of Tennessee. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. JOHANSEN. As to the matter of cost and the matter of its importance, under permission to include extraneous matter in my speech, I have a statement from the Post Office Department regarding very major reductions in cost through a modification of the type of construction in the newer post offices.

I wish I could agree with the gentleman in what he has just said. Certainly no one is implying that there is any more than a minority and a very small, an infinitesimal minority of people who require this sort of treatment. Unfortunately, the seriousness, the gravity of a violation of the sanctity of the mails is not to be measured solely or even primarily by the number of such offenses.

Mr. BASS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. JOHANSEN. I yield.

Mr. BASS of Tennessee. I want to agree with the gentleman thoroughly on that score. Nothing is more important to the postal service, in my opinion, than the sanctity of the mails. And we are proud of the fact that when we seal a letter and drop it in a postal box we know, here in America, that the only person who will see that will be the one to whom it is addressed or someone named at his discretion. That is one of the most important parts of our mail service. However, in stating what I did, I am of the opinion that this really time-worn practice of lookouts is outmoded, because the average employee going into the postal service at the present time is so much under surveillance by his own fellow employees who have also this deep-seated desire to observe the sanctity of the mails, that this business of having an individual look at him through a lookout, in my opinion, is unimportant.

Every employee of the Post Office Department is a postal inspector in his own right because he is so proud of the institution for which he works that he is going to see that the sanctity of our mail is continuously preserved. I believe this is the thing which has made the Post Office Department the one Department of our Government that is performing day after day a dollar's worth of service for every dollar we pay out for it. I am happy to have had the privilege to learn this through personal experience.

Mr. JOHANSEN. I thank the gentleman. I am glad to have on record the expression of his views. Of course, whether or not we agree in every detail, the important fact is that the basis on which he rests those views is quite different from the basis on which the views were expressed by the gentleman from West Virginia.

Mr. BASS of Tennessee. I did not get into the colloquy to express an opinion on the statement of either the gentleman who now has the floor or that of the gentleman from West Virginia because I did not have the privilege of reading the remarks of the gentleman from West Virginia and was not on the floor when he made them. I just wanted to say a word about the postal employees and about the way the postal service is carried on in this particular instance, without taking any sort of interest in the colloquy between the gentleman from Michigan and the gentleman from West Virginia.

Mr. JOHANSEN. I thank the gentleman in any case for his remarks.

LEGISLATIVE PROPOSALS TO HELP SMALL BUSINESS

Mr. BURKE of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from California [Mr. ROOSEVELT] may extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD and include extraneous matter.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky?

There was no objection.

Mr. ROOSEVELT. Mr. Speaker, last week I announced that I would introduce bills designed to provide encouragement and help for small business engaged in the distribution of food, petroleum, petroleum products, and motor-vehicle parts, equipment, accessories, and supplies. We who are members of the House Small Business Committee are well aware of the need for legislation to help small business.

As you will recall, on March 17, 1959, when I announced the program for Subcommittee No. 5, I stated that it was the intent and purpose of the subcommittee to review the trade relations and trade practices in the sale of petroleum and automotive accessories, including tires and batteries, for the purpose of determining whether improvement had been made and whether the improvement had provided small business firms with the benefits and opportunities to which they were entitled. Also, it was announced at that time that Subcommittee No. 5 would include in its program an investigation, hearings, and study of alleged unfair competitive trade practices in the field of food distribution. We noted that in that connection it had been alleged that monopolistic and unfair trade practices were becoming matters of great concern to those who cherish and fight for a free and competitive enterprise, and present a threat to those things needed for the growth and survival of a healthy small business community.

We noted that the Federal Trade Commission had stated that "there have developed tendencies to concentration of economic power, to collusive price action, and to unfair competitive methods." In that connection, Hon. John W. Gwynne, then Chairman of the Federal Trade Commission, in announcing that the Federal Trade Commission would study the situation said:

> We want to know why the industry is getting so tough for the smaller operator. * * * The trend seems to be to eliminate the small man entirely.

With this backdrop, Subcommittee No. 5 first turned its attention to small business problems in food distribution. We learned that although the FTC has had under way for a considerable period of time an economic study of small business problems in the food industry, that study did not include an investigation of pricing practices, trade practices involving private labels, price discriminations, integration practices, financing of small business, and the economic significance of the concentration of economic power in food distribution. We were told that the Trade Commission was undertaking some specific cases involving these problems. However, those cases have in their sights only the specific practices allegedly carried on by those few corporations named as respondents in the cases. Therefore, industrywide treatment of problems stemming from these particular matters has not, and perhaps cannot, be undertaken by the Federal Trade Commission.

In view of these circumstances, these matters appropriately have become matters of concern, study, investigation, and hearings before Subcommittee No. 5 of the House Small Business Committee. Hence, we directed our attention to these things when we commenced hearings on small business problems in the food industry in Washington, D.C., last June 22. Before we concluded that series of 8 days of hearings on July 9, we had heard from witnesses of every segment of the food industry.

We heard from the chainstores and the co-ops, from the frozen food people and the poultrymen, from the wholesalers and retailers, and from the farmers. The Government agencies gave us facts on how many retail grocery stores there are and how much money we spend in them. From all of this information we have a broad picture of small business problems in food distribution.

Among small business problems in food distribution presented to the subcommittee during the course of its Washington, D.C., hearings were those involving the following subjects:

First. The effect of concentration of economic power in food retailing.

Second. The effect of integrating retailing and manufacturing in the food industry.

Third. The need for grading of livestock and livestock products.

Fourth. The effect of mergers in the food industry.

Fifth. The problem of private brands against advertised brands.

Sixth. The contest for shelf space in retail food stores.

Seventh. The problem of small businessmen in their efforts to secure shopping center locations.

Eighth. The practice of loss leader selling.

Ninth. Advertising allowances.

Tenth. Price discrimination in the sale of oat flour.

Eleventh. Price spreads and consumer interests.

Twelfth. The effect of a few large chain food retailers in making their purchases of canned fruits and vegetables through west coast buying offices located on or near California Street, San Francisco, and alleged abuses incident to the so-called California Street buying.

Therefore, we accomplished the purpose of the Washington hearings to put these problems in their proper perspective. Then we moved on to San Francisco where we held 6 days of hearings—and then to Denver, Colo., for 2 more days of hearings. In all, we have heard almost 100 witnesses and have built up a record of almost 1,400 printed pages on small business problems in the food industry.

Out of this mass of information emerged the showing of need for legislation to help small business in dealing with some of these problems. For example, in the course of our hearings in Washington, we found that approximately 40 percent of all markets for preserves and jellies have been captured by large chain retailers who are either producing their supplies or have made special long-term arrangements for their supplies. In the face of these facts, small independent producers and packers of jams, jellies, and preserves are under severe handicaps in their efforts to survive.

During the course of our hearings in San Francisco, we were told that a few buyers or large chain food retailers with offices on or near California Street, San Francisco, were buying 80 percent of the annual output of canned fruits and vegetables produced in that section of the country. Incidentally, California produces almost 50 percent of the national output. We were told that these few buyers for the large chain food retailers are utilizing their combined economic power in such a way as to result in the destruction of countless independent business enterprises.

Our Denver hearings disclosed that large chain food retailers are getting into the production, preparation, and distribution of meat food products. Large food retailers have captured a substantial portion of the total retail market of meat food products. Proceeding from that vantage position, they are integrating backward into the processing, slaughtering, and even the feeding of cattle.

Representatives of small meatpackers, feed lot operators, ranchers, and many other businesses testified that the practices of large food retailers in integrating the retailing with the feeding, slaughtering, and packing of meat food products, are destroying small and independent business enterprises and competitive markets for those products. In that connection, it was pointed out that the strongest argument now being put forward by the large packers for relief from the provisions of the meat packing decree of 1920 is the fact that the large food retailers are integrating backward into the meat packing business. In that connection, I stated on the record during the course of our hearings in Denver that "If the basic and fundamental principles which brought about that consent decree were sound, and we must believe they were sound—they remained in operation for many many years, and were therefore in the public interest—it would seem to me a poor excuse to upset them simply because someone else in the other direction was going forward to accomplish the same thing. And my question would be, would it be unreasonable to think that should the 1920 consent decree be reversed, or be obliterated, that there would also be the great danger that that would be the opening door for an amalgamation of the chainstore and the large packer to accomplish exactly what was prohibited in 1920?"

In addition to distribution problems in the food industry, Subcommittee No. 5 also addressed itself to the problems existing in the petroleum industry.

Heretofore, in the 84th and 85th Congresses, Subcommittee No. 5 of the House Small Business Committee investigated and studied the problems of small business and the distribution of petroleum products and automotive parts and accessories, including tires and batteries. In the course of the investigations and studies, much useful information was developed regarding trade relations between the major oil companies and independent service station operators. It was disclosed that in these trade relations unfair trade practices had been used, including the practice of price discriminations and franchise terms, which operated against the survival and growth of independent service stations. During the 84th Congress, through our House report—House Report No. 1423—recommendations were made for improvement in these matters.

In following the intents and purposes we announced March 17, 1959, the subcommittee caused an extensive questionnaire to be prepared by the staff, and mailed on June 12, 1959, to those in the segments of the industry who could supply the subcommittee with information about the conditions and the practices in the distribution of petroleum and automotive accessories, including tires and batteries. The information received in response to those questionnaires clearly indicated that while there had been some improvement, there was room for considerable improvement and the need for additional information was clearly evident.

On December 9, 10, and 11, 1959, hearings were held by Subcommittee No. 5 in Washington, D.C., on distribution practices in the petroleum industry. The hearings were confined primarly to practices in the distribution of TBA—tires, batteries, and accessories—and other related automotive products handled by retail gasoline station dealers and by the independent wholesalers of those products.

There were 28 witnesses from 19 States. All sections of the country were represented by the witnesses. These witnesses, all of whom testified under oath, were independent wholesalers of TBA products, gasoline station dealers and association representatives of both of these segments of the industry. The record of the hearings is replete with instances in which, through the threat of lease cancellation or other economic pressures, the independent service station operator is coerced into exclusive dealing. One witness alone listed 15 such instances. The evidence indicated that there is a general pattern throughout the country that most of the major oil companies bring pressure to bear on the service station operators to compel them to handle specific products which are sponsored by the major oil companies and on which the major oil companies receive some compensation, usually in the form of an override commission. This does not only have a tremendous adverse economic impact on the independent service station operator, but also deprives the independent automotive parts and TBA wholesalers of their fair proportion of a competitive market.

When we consider that the yearly rate of turnover of gasoline station operators is 39 percent, the highest of any retail business—when we consider that over 200,000 service station operators in the nation may be affected by this economic problem—when we consider that there are 16,000 automotive parts wholesalers and distributors in the nation—when we consider that the vast majority of these are small, independent businessmen who only ask for their right to meet their competitors in a fair and open market, then we realize that it is a matter which must be faced now.

It is evident from the record of our 1955, 1956, 1957, and 1959 hearings that although much lipservice is given to the problem, the major oil companies either will not or cannot correct the situation. The old cry by these companies that it is not their policy to intimidate or coerce the independent service station operators, that they instruct their officials and employees at all levels that these service station operators are independent businessmen and may handle any products they desire, is expected to resound as often as before. But the record does not substantiate this. It also has been suggested in the past and will perhaps be suggested again that a part of the testimony received by the subcommittee concerning the alleged coercive tactics of the major oil companies was indirect testimony containing much hearsay evidence. This may be partially true since the record indicates that the service station operator, who is at the mercy of the major oil companies, hesitates to testify because of fear of retaliation. But not only is the record filled with sworn affidavits concerning these alleged practices, but one independent small service station operator submitted a tape recording of a conversation between the service station operator and the major oil company salesman who advised him that he must remove all competitive products not sponsored by the oil company from his shelves before his lease could be renewed. This same service station operator presented a film which was shown to the committee which depicted the same instance. This is evidence that cannot be refuted and cannot be overlooked.

In brief, the apparent continued widespread use of intimidation and coercion in the sale of TBA and petroleum products, and the pricing tactics of the major oil companies, appear more than sufficient to justify the introduction of legislation designed to relieve small business concerns from these undue pressures and unfair practices and to remove from their shoulders the yoke of the tremendous economic power wielded by the major oil companies.

In view of these facts and circumstances, I am today proceeding to introduce several bills designed to meet these problems.

Three of these bills specifically relate to small business problems in the distribution of petroleum, petroleum products and motor-vehicle parts, equipment, accessories, and supplies. The first one would provide a new antitrust law. Its objective is the divorcement of retail sales of gasoline and petroleum products from the control of the persons, partners, and corporations engaged in the production, sale, and distribution of gasoline and other petroleum products at wholesale.

The bill seeks to accomplish this objective by providing that on and after January 1, 1964, no producer or affiliate who sells gasoline or other petroleum products or motor-vehicle parts, equipment, accessories, and supplies in interstate commerce at wholesale shall sell such products at retail or directly or indirectly as an agent or any manufacturer or distributor of motor-vehicle parts, equipment, accessories or supplies. The bill does not prohibit a producer or affiliate from continuing to sell gasoline or petroleum products at retail unless it is selling such products at wholesale.

Moreover, the bill would not prohibit a producer from continuing the ownership of retail gasoline stations even though such producer is engaged in the sale of gasoline and petroleum products at wholesale providing that its gasoline retail stations before January 1, 1964, are under leases to independent businessmen. In these situations the oil company producer would, under the terms of the bill, be permitted to continue the ownership and operation of the retail station under such lease arrangements until the lease arrangements are terminated. Even then the oil company would be entitled to continue the ownership and operation of any such retail station in the event that the operator lessee and the oil company mutually agreed for the termination of the lease agreement and the substitution of another operator as a lessee. The death of the operator prior to the termination of the sublease would leave the oil company lessor free to continue the ownership and subleasing of the retail gasoline station to a successor operator lessee.

Other provisions of the bill provide a $50,000 penalty and prison term for not more than 1 year for violations and that the provisions of the bill shall be construed as a part of the antitrust laws, thus paving the way for small businessmen to sue for triple damages for violations.

The second bill also provides for a new antitrust law. Its objective is to prevent producing and refining oil companies selling gasoline at wholesale from acting as agents for manufacturers and distributors in selling motor vehicle parts, equipment, accessories, or supplies to operators of retail gasoline stations.

The bill seeks to accomplish this objective by making it unlawful for any producer or affiliate who sells gasoline or other petroleum products at wholesale to act directly or indirectly as an agent for or to receive directly or indirectly any commission, compensation, or payment because of the sale of any product of any manufacturer or distributor of motor vehicle parts, equipment, accessories, or supplies.

There is included the penalty provision of $50,000 or imprisonment of 1 year or both for violations. A further provision makes the provisions of this bill part of the antitrust laws providing for private litigation in the form of triple damage suits. Except for the latter, this bill is almost a duplicate of the provisions contained in a bill, H.R. 428, I introduced in the 85th Congress.

The third bill would amend and supplement the Federal Trade Commission Act for the purpose of securing close and constant supervision by the Federal Trade Commission over leases between oil companies and operators of retail gasoline stations and the performance under such leases.

The bill seeks to accomplish this objective by requiring that every lease, entered into by a producer, refiner, or importer of petroleum or petroleum products, providing for the operation of a retail gasoline station to be filed with the Federal Trade Commission within 30 days of the date of its execution. It also provides that additional information must be filed by the parties to any such lease regarding performance thereunder. The failure to file any of this information with the Federal Trade Commission would subject the parties to a penalty of $100 per day for each day the failure to file continued. The Federal Trade Commission, by the terms of the bill, would be empowered to investigate the contracts and leases and performance thereunder from time to time.

The requirements of this bill are quite similar to the requirements of the Webb-Pomerene Export Trade Act, Public Law 126, 65th Congress, approved April 10, 1918. It will be recalled that the Export Trade Act requires that every export trade association agreement be filed with the Federal Trade Commission and that supplementary reports relating thereto be filed from time to time as required by the Commission. The bill I am introducing contains similar requirements regarding leases entered into by producers, refiners, or importers of petroleum products providing for the operation of retail gasoline stations.

The fourth bill I am introducing today provides for a strengthening of our antimerger laws. It would help small business not only in the food industry, the petroleum industry, and in the distribution of motor-vehicle parts, equipment, accessories, and supplies, but also would help those in other areas of our economy where the merger movement is sweeping away competition and creating monopolies. The representatives of many small businessmen have urged that our antimerger laws be strengthened.

This objective would be accomplished by amending section 7 of the Clayton Act—the antimerger provision—so as to require any corporation having capital surplus and undivided profits in the aggregate of more than $10 million from acquiring the capital stock or facilities of any person engaged in or affecting interstate commerce without first notifying the Attorney General and the Federal Trade Commission. Even then the merger could not take place for a period of 30 days following such notification. Moreover, the merger would be further delayed if within that 30-day period the Attorney General or the Federal Trade Commission should act to require the filing of additional factual information about the merger. A further delay in the merger would be required following the submittal of that factual information for a period of 60 days. At the conclusion of that period the merger would be free to proceed unless the Attorney General or the Federal Trade Commission had in the meantime filed proceedings charging that the merger as consummated would be in violation of the antitrust laws. In that event, the merger would not be permitted to proceed until the litigation would be brought to a conclusion.

A concluding provision of the bill would authorize the Federal Trade Commission, with the approval of the Attorney General, to exempt by rule any proposed merger from the notice and filing provisions of this bill if the Federal Trade Commission should find that the proposed acquisition would not have the effect of substantially lessening competition nor substantially affect the ownership or control of the company whose facilities are to be acquired.

The fifth bill I am presenting would divorce the retail sale and distribution of livestock products and meat food products from the slaughter, preparation, and wholesale sale and distribution of such products.

The bill would accomplish this purpose through an amendment to the Packers and Stockyard Act of 1921 so as to make it unlawful for any packer or any other person engaged in the business of manufacturing or preparing livestock products or in the wholesale marketing of meats, meat food products, livestock products, and so forth—when such person, during the immediately preceding calendar year, enjoyed gross sales of more than $10 million—to engage in the business of selling at retail any such products.

In addition, the bill would amend the Packers and Stockyard Act of 1921 by making it unlawful for any person—whose purchases of livestock in commerce during the preceding calendar year totaled more than $1 million—to buy or—for any person whose sales of livestock in commerce during the preceding calendar year totaled more than $100,000—sell livestock in commerce for the purpose of slaughter except, first, at a stockyard, or second, at a market conducted openly and publicly in the same manner as stockyards are required to be conducted under this title.

Penalty provisions for violations include a $50,000 fine or imprisonment of 1 year, or both.

The sixth bill I am introducing today would amend the Federal Trade Commission Act. The objective of this bill is to divorce retail sale and distribution of food and grocery store business from the business of manufacturing, processing, and preparation of food and related merchandise normally offered for sale through retail food stores.

The bill would accomplish this objective by making it unlawful for anyone engaged in the retail sale of merchandise in any more than one market area through food or grocery stores to engage in the manufacturing, processing, or preparation of any such merchandise. This would be done through an amendment of the Federal Trade Commission Act. The amendment would make it unlawful and an unfair act and practice in commerce within the meaning of section 5 of this act, for any person, partnership, or corporation engaged in the retail sale of merchandise, or the distribution for retail sale of merchandise, in or affecting commerce, to engage in the manufacturing, processing, or preparation of any such merchandise, where the effect of integrating the retailing of such merchandise with such manufacturing, processing, or preparation may be substantially to lessen competition or tend to create a monopoly in any line of commerce.

In conclusion, I wish to state that the majority members of the House Small Business Committee have informed me that they endorse these bills in principle. Some of the minority members have reserved judgment until further inspection of the bills. All of our colleagues, whether or not they are members of the House Small Business Committee, are invited to join in sponsoring and supporting these bills to help small business.

SLUM CLEARANCE

Mr. BURKE of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DINGELL] may extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD and include extraneous matter.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky?

There was no objection.

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Speaker, one of the President's reasons for twice vetoing the omnibus housing bill of last session was the amount of money made available to clear up slums and renew our cities. That bill contained a very modest amount of $1.5 billion and was only signed when this was reduced to $650 million. The original figure was inadequate, but the final figure which the President accepted was still more so.

Careful thinking on the cost of slums to the people of the United States is in order. Then we can see how much of an error the President has made in failing to make this an important issue during this year.

James W. Follin, while serving as Federal Urban Renewal Commissioner, said in a speech before the University of Michigan School of Public Health:

> An Eastern city, in 1 year, received $108 more in per capita revenue from good residential areas than it spent there, but its slums cost $88 more per person than they yielded. In one Southern city, slum areas contributed only 5.5 percent of the city's property taxes, but required 53 percent of the city's health, police, fire, and other service facilities.

One expert estimates it costs local government in the average city about $60 per person to service its entire citizenry each year. The cost of servicing slum areas zooms to $140 per year per capita.

It has been estimated that cities like Cleveland, Buffalo, St. Louis, and Boston are each pouring $7 million to $8 million per year into slum areas.

The cost of some 20 million Americans living in slums conservatively figured in dollar value runs about $2 billion annually.

Over and above this we are incapable of measuring the loss through crime, delinquency, disease, loss of hope and character by the people who live in these areas.

Let us take a tract of some 5,000 dwelling units which has become a slum whose value for taxation has been reduced to about $1,000 per unit. The cost of buying and clearing an average slum unit should run about $6,000 per unit and the cost of renewal of such area of 5,000 units would cost the taxpayers about $30 million.

This is not money down the drain. When the land is cleared it will be the property of the city to be sold to developers for rebuilding.

When the land has been rebuilt it will certainly have regained its tax valuation of $30 million, approximately what its value was previous to the time it became a slum.

It will have appreciated in value some $25 million.

The city will have eliminated an annual loss in cost of services furnished over income derived of about $1.3 million.

Previous to renewal, tax income from the area averages about $30 per unit, or $150,000. Expenditures in the area probably ran about 10 times this to furnish police, fire, garbage and sewage service in addition to health and other municipal services for a total of about $1,500,000. The deficit previous to redevelopment for services of this area probably ran about $1,350,000.

Washington, D.C., is a splendid case in point and reports its slum-clearance program in the renewal area in the southwest should offer a tax boost of from $451,000 to $3,430,000. The gain related to all other renewal projects in the city gives a net gain of $7 million annually, an amount sufficient to amortize the whole renewal program cost in 10 years.

This is why urban renewal is so vitally needed across the country by cities like Detroit.

We in the city of Detroit can anticipate some rich rewards from the $6,250,000 to be spent for urban renewal during the next year and the $1,825,000 last year and $1,280,000 spent the previous year, but the needs of our city are vastly greater than the amount that we have spent and the only place these funds can come from is from the Federal Government.

Some statistics on municipal growth in this country are striking proof of this.

Long-term indebtedness of the 14 largest cities in this country averaged $168 per capita in 1950 and $254 in 1956, a 50-percent increase in 6 years. Slum deficits play a large part in the financial troubles of our cities and make urban renewal even less possible to our cities.

Failure for this Congress to act on urban renewal as vigorously as the needs of the country demand will only result in still more slums springing from slums to the detriment of the population of our whole country.

AMERICAN MILITARY POWER

Mr. BURKE of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from New York [Mr. STRATTON] may extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD and include extraneous matter.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky?

There was no objection.

Mr. STRATTON. Mr. Speaker, last week, as a member of the House Armed Services Committee, I had the opportunity to be present when Defense Secretary Thomas S. Gates, Jr., filled in members of our committee on the present status of our national defense. A good deal of comment has appeared in the press in recent days with regard to what the Secretary has recently been saying about our Nation's military posture, as well as some things which I do not believe he did say. Not all of those who have commented, unfortunately, have had the opportunity to hear the Secretary's able presentation at first hand.

I want to take this opportunity to say that while I agree with Secretary Gates we must never become complacent and must continue to work hard to maintain our military strength. I do believe on the basis of his presentation that we are in a better position today than we were a year ago, and I believe that Secretary Gates and General Twining are handling their difficult assignments with sincerity and ability.

The comments which they have recently made with regard to our improved relative position are not based on any effort to read the Russian mind, as has been alleged in some quarters. Rather they have been based upon a further refinement of information available to us. Surely, for those in command of our military services not to utilize the best and latest information available to them would be not only foolish but extremely dangerous.

I believe there are many urgent tasks which lie ahead for the Members of this Congress in this session in seeing to it that our military posture is kept at its fullest possible peak. But I believe that this responsibility can and should be discharged without resorting to some of the more extreme statements on this subject which have recently made their appearance in the press.

In that connection, a very fair and very sound statement of the Secretary's position as presented to our committee and the status of American military power was recently presented in an editorial which appeared in the Albany Times Union of January 24. Under leave to extend my remarks, I include herewith that editorial:

KEEP IT THAT WAY

Some mighty heartening news has come from Secretary of Defense Thomas S. Gates, Jr., and Gen. Nathan F. Twining, Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. "Mighty" seems to be the right word.

On the basis of revised intelligence estimates, Secretary Gates and General Twining told the Senate Armed Services Committee that our nuclear forces of all types, when matched against Soviet nuclear strength, "represent a clear balance in our favor."

This is impressive because (1) Secretary Gates and General Twining are military experts, (2) they have access to top-drawer information, (3) they have the experience and knowledge to assess it, and (4) their jobs impose on them the obligation to give our country the best defense posture possible.

Detailed testimony to support their belief was taken in closed session—as of course it should have been. But it was sufficient to bring from acknowledgeable and cool-headed Senator RICHARD B. RUSSELL, Georgia Democrat and chairman of the Senate committee, the comment that "It was encouraging."

Two notes of caution.

Both Secretary Gates and General Twining conceded the Russians probably have greater numbers of long-range missiles than we. It should be our business to close this gap.

On a more general level, we Americans seem to have a tendency to relax into complacency when things look encouraging, and in this case the temptation to do so may be greater because a lot of us have done a lot of worrying.

We cannot afford complacency if we are going to keep "a clear balance in our favor" and we had better work hard to keep it.

We cannot afford complacency under any circumstances in defending ourselves against, or dealing with, communism.

AS I SEE IT

Mr. BURKE of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN] may extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD and include extraneous matter on various subjects.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky?

There was no objection.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, permission having been granted, I am inserting herewith two articles by Mr. E. B. Germany, president of the Lone Star Steel Co., which is located in the district that I have the honor to represent. Eugene Germany is one of our finest and best citizens; he has made the Lone Star Steel Co. a success. It means a lot to the Gulf Southwest and the entire Nation. Without Eugene Germany we would not have this wonderful plant along with the benefits and opportunities it brings to the people of our area.

Mr. Germany edits a column each week in 18 newspapers in the area of Lone Star Steel's plant under the title, "The Way I See It." Articles which appeared under this heading December 17, 1959, and December 23, 1959, were handed to me today by a prominent constituent with the request that they be inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. They are as follows:

THE DEATH OF MR. FREEDOM

(By E. B. Germany, president, Lone Star Steel Co., Dallas, Tex.)

PART I

Mr. Freedom was born on July 4, 1776. His birth certificate was the Declaration of Independence. From birth, he often struggled against great odds, and on several occasions it seemed he might not survive vicious attacks from within and without his country.

Mr. Freedom's first brush with adversity of importance occurred at Valley Forge, where as a mere babe, his blood stained the white snows. Only the superhuman efforts of a small, poorly equipped, half-frozen band of patriots led by the immortal George Washington staved off the ravages of cold and hunger to keep alive the faint beat of Mr. Freedom's heart. With the coming of spring, Mr. Freedom grew stronger, and it was not long until he was able to walk proudly, head erect, shoulders back, a brawling young giant capable of holding his own in any kind of fight.

As the years wore on, violence came to Mr. Freedom with increasing intensity. He fought valiantly during the great conflict between the States, and his blood drenched the battlefields of Bull Run, Shiloh, Missionary Ridge, the Wilderness, Gettysburg, and finally, it was at Appomattox courthouse that there was reached a meeting of minds between two of Mr. Freedom's stanchest supporters, U. S. Grant and Robert E. Lee, and in this settlement of a bitter feud, Mr. Freedom walked from the field of conquest and defense with honor, dignity and respect.

The Spanish-American War left its mark upon the face of this scarred veteran, but here as before, a great American—Teddy Roosevelt—threw the weight of his daring and courage into the melee, and at the end, Mr. Freedom was victorious.

Mr. Freedom's brilliant career was less than a score of years into the 1900's when the first of two great worldwide conflicts drew him into action that produced Chateau Thierry, Battle of the Marne, the Argonne Forest, and others. Afoot, Mr. Freedom was a mud-sloshing doughboy that recognized no man as his peer. In the air, he was a spectacular daredevil cutting and slashing at the vaunted Knights of Baron von Richthofen, and afloat, not even the salt-crusted Briton could match the fury of his attack against the U-boats and the mighty dreadnaughts of the Imperial German Navy. At the end, at Versailles, Mr. Freedom stood as proudly as ever, glorious in victory, gracious and forgiving to them who fought him.

The second worldwide conflagration not only drew Mr. Freedom into action, but virtually disarmed him at one and the same time. It was on that fateful December morning in 1941, that Mr. Freedom was knocked to his knees by a sneak attack at Pearl Harbor, and then for months on end, he reeled like a drunken sailor as he struggled to rise against a relentless, savage, and capable enemy. Mr. Freedom fought valiantly around the globe. His blood seeped the sands at Salerno, and those in his company fell by the thousands at Bataan, Guadalcanal, Guam, in the jungles of India, high over the Hump, at Dunkirk, Battle of the Bulge. His men knew the fatal scream of a kamikaze pilot riding his own death bomb into eternity, and Mr. Freedom's boys knew all of the horror, the cruelty, the suffering of full-blown global warfare. And yet—at the end, Mr. Freedom stood erectly on the deck of the U.S.S. Missouri and watched war lords of the East hand over their swords.

In Germany, he saw the forces of Nazi aggression disintegrate before the onslaught of his men.

Mr. Freedom was respected the world over for his generosity and sympathy toward those not endowed with the rich heritage that had been his since 1776. For more than 180 years, Mr. Freedom had endured against all types of slavery, against the ideological "isms" that lead away from the dignity of man and to the dungeons of captivity.

Mr. Freedom helped build the greatest civilization known to mankind, and it was largely through his presence that his country was able to develop an economy unsurpassed anywhere. Under his watchful eye, free enterprise gave Mr. Freedom's countrymen the righest standard of living ever enjoyed by any nation at any time. Under him, men had freedom of speech, the right to worship as they pleased, the right to own personal property, the right to work. Men had a voice in the making of rules and regulations under which they would share Mr. Freedom's way of life, and when some erred, even they were guaranteed the right of trial by jury.

In the light of all these accomplishments, the death of Mr. Freedom in a relatively insignificant Minnesota town is the more impressive for its lack of the grand setting. In no global war was Mr. Freedom slain, nor was there a volley of musketry, nor heavy cannonading, nor fiery aerial dogfight to dress the stage for Mr. Freedom's demise. He went to his death without warning and without fanfare. His death warrant was the scratch of pen, his requiem the sound of armed might confiscating private property with gestapo tactics instead of upholding the laws Mr. Freedom promulgated and had protected since 1776.

The deceased leaves upward of 200 million relatives who live in abject fear lest they, too, be sacrificed without warning upon the altar of politics, not policy.

Next: part II, White Cross at Albert Lea, or Murderer in Minnesota.

PART II

As this is written, three Federal judges study the events leading to the death of Mr. Freedom. Here are the salient facts in the case:

On September 1, 1959, a labor contract between the Wilson Packing Co. and the United Packinghouse Workers terminated. The workers continued to work at the Albert Lea, Minn., plant without a contract. Negotiations between the company and the union were broken off on October 29, 1959, when the union members refused to work a 9-hour day. After a few days, Wilson notified the strikers that they would be replaced if they did not return to their jobs. On November 1, 1959, the plant resumed operations with nonunion employees. Violence occurred, and the Governor of Minnesota sent in the National Guard to restore order. The 200 National Guardsmen accomplished this result by simply shutting down the plant. Wilson went to court in an effort to prohibit continued seizure of the plant by the Governor and the National Guard.

It is only coincidental that the name of the Governor who issued the order is Freeman, that the name of the county in which the Wilson plant is located is Freeborn. It is not a coincidence that the name of the victim is Mr. Freedom. In padlocking the Wilson plant, Mr. Freedom was executed through loss of his right to own property, his right to work, and his right to protection from the lawless. Free enterprise was sacrificed on the altar of politics—not policy, not the law of the land, not the Constitution of the United States of America, which had been Mr. Freedom's birth certificate for close on to two centuries.

After the guardsmen, armed with fixed bayonets and guns, locked the plant gates, union strikers were quoted as saying "it makes a beautiful picket line, doesn't it?"

In considering this flagrant disregard for the constitutional rights of the American worker and an American business, it should be emphasized that the merits of the strike are of no consequence. The union acted within its right to strike. The company acted within its right to operate the plant with replacements. To this point, there can be no criticism of either union or plant. Beyond this point, however, regard for law and order broke down, and given the stamp of approval by the Governor of Minnesota, armed soldiers moved in to accomplish the aims and objectives of lawbreakers who should have been arrested instead of supported.

What could have been Governor Freeman's thinking when he padlocked the Wilson plant? He simply said he did it to prevent bloodshed. What law did Wilson violate to warrant punishment? Will the Governor say that to prevent bloodshed we should knuckle under to the Communists? Will the Governor say that to prevent bank holdups, in which people may be wounded or killed, we should close our banks? Isn't it true, Governor, that you accede to the thought that if one man throws a rock into a store window he doesn't like, that man should be arrested and punished, but that if a mob of 300 throws rocks in violation of the law, they should not be arrested simply because they constitute a large group? Did you, Governor, think about politics instead of policy when you closed this plant? Did you think about union votes instead of the rights of the many individuals who chose to work and to earn an honest day's wages in jobs that were quit by the strikers?

Perhaps Governor Freeman didn't know about a Supreme Court ruling down a few days ago. In this case, Quaker State Refining Co. closed its plant after a labor contract ran out without a new agreement being reached. The union charged the Quaker State company with an illegal lockout. The Labor Board held for the union, and now, the Supreme Court upholds the union.

What about Albert Lea, Minn., a relatively unknown little city of 13,500 population, where an American business firm sought to operate, even as the Labor Board and the Supreme Court held in the Quaker State case, after a contract ran out?

Is the union going to charge Wilson Packing Co. with an illegal lockout or is Governor Freeman going to be charged or will the National Guard become the defendant? Is a Governor of any State acting within his lawful rights when he uses soldiers to quell a riot if stopping the violence means winking at the violators while eliminating the constitutional rights of others?

Why, Governor Freeman, didn't you padlock those who threw the rocks? Why did you penalize those who got hit by the rocks and who violated no law? Why, Governor, did you permit the death of Mr. Freedom on the sacrificial cross of politics instead of standing for principle and policy and thereby enhancing Mr. Freedom's chances for being with us for a good many years to come?

I do not believe that the working men and women of this great country of ours support armed intervention in matters of this kind. I think they feel that free bargaining is the only answer to maintaining the free enterprise system. If on occasions, emotions run high and some violence occurs, there are legal ways of handling those who run afoul of the law. But soldiers to close a plant and deprive men of the right to work just because some union members got mad and refused to follow the "No Violence" orders of their leaders, never.

That's the way I see it.

SPECIAL ORDERS GRANTED

By unanimous consent, permission to address the House, following the legislative program and any special orders heretofore entered, was granted to:

Mr. O'HARA of Illinois, for 60 minutes on Wednesday next.

Mr. COHELAN, for 1 hour, on Wednesday next.

Mr. BROOKS of Louisiana, on Thursday next, for 1 hour.

Mr. PUCINSKI, on February 1, for 1 hour.

Mr. MULTER (at the request of Mr. BURKE of Kentucky), for 1 hour, on Wednesday next.

Mr. PATMAN, for 1 hour, on February 8, and to revise and extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.

Mrs. GREEN of Oregon (at the request of Mr. BURKE of Kentucky), for 30 minutes, on January 27, and for 30 minutes, on February 3.

Mr. ASHLEY (at the request of Mr. BURKE of Kentucky), for 1 hour, on Wednesday next.

Mr. PORTER (at the request of Mr. BURKE of Kentucky), for 1 hour, on Wednesday next.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

By unanimous consent, permission to extend remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, or to revise and extend remarks, was granted to:

Mr. IRWIN and to include a letter.

Mr. JENSEN and to include a letter from President Eisenhower.

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri and to include extraneous matter.

(At the request of Mr. CUNNINGHAM, and to include extraneous matter, the following:)

Mr. DERWINSKI.

Mr. HALPERN.

(At the request of Mr. BURKE of Kentucky, and to include extraneous matter, the following:)

Mr. FISHER.

Mr. JOHNSON of California.

Mr. QUIGLEY.

Mr. ALGER.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. BURKE of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 1 o'clock and 55 minutes p.m.) the House adjourned until tomorrow, Tuesday, January 26, 1960, at 12 o'clock noon.

REPORT OF COMMITTEES ON COUNTERPART FUNDS

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Speaker, the Mutual Security Act of 1958, chapter IV, section 401(a), requires the Committee on House Administration to publish in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, within 10 legislative days after receipt, the consolidated report of each committee of the House using foreign currencies—counterpart funds—during the preceding year. Accordingly, there is shown herein, within the prescribed time limit, the consolidated reports of the Committees on Appropriations, Interior and Insular Affairs, Un-American Activities, and Veterans' Affairs:

COUNTERPART FUNDS

JANUARY 11, 1960.

COMMITTEE ON APPROPRIATIONS

Foreign currency and U.S. dollar equivalents expended between January 1, 1959, and December 31, 1959

No counterpart funds authorized for expenditure in any country.

CLARENCE CANNON,
Chairman, Committee on Appropriations.

JANUARY 11, 1960.

COMMITTEE ON INTERIOR AND INSULAR AFFAIRS

Foreign currency and U.S. dollar equivalents expended between January 1, 1959, and December 31, 1959

No counterpart funds were expended.

WAYNE N. ASPINALL,
Chairman, Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

Anniversary of the Birth of Robert E. Lee

OF

HON. A. WILLIS ROBERTSON

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, January 25, 1960

Mr. ROBERTSON. Mr. President, on Saturday, January 23, the senior Senator from South Carolina delivered a stirring address in Statuary Hall commemorating the 153d anniversary of the birth of Robert E. Lee, general of the Confederacy.

Senator JOHNSTON, the able chairman of the Senate Post Office and Civil Service Committee, was invited to deliver this address by the United Daughters of the Confederacy, and I commend the UDC in their choice of a speaker.

Senator JOHNSTON is an outspoken defender of the rights of States, and one who carries on today in our mutual struggle to preserve in our Nation the principles to which Lee dedicated his life.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that this address by Senator JOHNSTON be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ADDRESS OF SENATOR OLIN D. JOHNSTON COMMEMORATING THE 153D BIRTHDAY OF GEN. ROBERT E. LEE IN STATUARY HALL, THE CAPITOL, WASHINGTON, D.C., JANUARY 23, 1960

Madam President and Daughters of the Confederacy, one approaches a discussion of the life of Robert E. Lee in an audience of this character with a feeling of great satisfaction and deep reverence. To again be honored with your invitation is a source of no little personal gratification to me.

Robert E. Lee was a direct descendent of the famous Lee family which played such a prominent part among the Founding Fathers of our Nation. Richard Henry Lee, one of his uncles, as a Delegate from Virginia, signed the Declaration of Independence and also the Articles of Confederation. In fact, Richard Henry Lee was the author of the resolution at the Virginia Convention which resulted in the Articles of Confederation.

Robert E. Lee's father was the distinguished Revolutionary War hero, Henry Lee, a bosom friend of George Washington. His father is better known as "Light Horse Harry" because of his extraordinary exploits during the Revolution. As a consequence of this service, Lee's father became a major general in the U.S. Army. He later served as Governor of Virginia and as a Member of Congress. The Congress selected Lee's father to deliver their eulogy to George Washington upon the latter's death. It was he who was the author of the time-honored reference to Washington as the man "first in war, first in peace, and first in the hearts of his countrymen."

The distinguished ancestry of Lee stood him in good stead both as a southerner and as an American. He is now loved by men of good will in both the North and the South.

Theodore Roosevelt had as one of his aides Col. Fitzhugh Lee, a nephew of General Lee. President Roosevelt remarked about the general as follows:

"This Nation is big enough to revere the name of Robert E. Lee without sectional distinctions. He is no longer southern; he is American, and he belongs to the Nation, not to the South alone."

As a southerner, I am proud to acknowledge a debt to Mr. Roosevelt for the use of those words. It gives us heart to know that out of the blood and sorrow and suffering of war has come, at last, a healthy, mutual respect—yea, admiration—for the man on both sides of the Mason and Dixon line.

It is a trait of our race well to be glorified that we possess the inherent and cardinal virtues of forgiveness and forgetfulness.

There is a noble page in our history we will not forget. That was the last sad encounter between General Lee and General Grant at Appomattox. Lee, the highborn knight, the flower of chivalry, and the best the South could produce, met Grant, the plain man of the plain people of Ohio. Lee was there—in the words the Daughters of the Confederacy engraved on the stone marking the spot of surrender, which say:

"Here on Sunday, April 9, 1865, after 4 years of heroic struggle in defense of principles believed fundamental to the existence of our Government, Lee surrendered 9,000 men, the remnants of an army unconquered in spirit, to 118,000 men under Grant."

From the pen of a Union officer who accompanied General Grant to General Lee's headquarters on the day of surrender, we have a moving account of what transpired on that fateful day. Grant, upon entering General Lee's room, extended his hand, saying, "General Lee." The two shook hands cordially. The conversation started with General Grant saying, "I met you once before, General Lee, while we were serving in Mexico." "Yes," replied General Lee, "I know I met you on that occasion and I have often thought of it."

After a brief reminiscence of the Mexican campaign, in which General Grant was a captain and General Lee a colonel, General Lee requested General Grant to write out the surrender terms. After admiring the handsome uniform and sword worn by General Lee, General Grant said it would be an act of humiliation to require the officers and men to surrender their swords and side arms or their personal baggage and horses.

General Lee upon reading the terms of surrender was greatly relieved when he read the passage permitting his men to retain their horses and baggage. He said with a warmth of feeling:

"This will have a very happy effect on my men."

As General Lee left his office and mounted his famous Traveler, General Grant moved toward him and saluted. Returning the salute, General Lee left in a slow trot to break the sad news to the brave men under his command. It is said that General Grant sent an order to the Union soldiers that no salutes be fired by them, for, he said:

"The war is over; the rebels are our countrymen again; and the best sign of rejoicing after victory will be to abstain from all demonstrations in the field."

In this brief talk, ladies, which you were gracious enough to invite me to give, I shall not attempt to even give in summary a career and life so crowded with momentous historical events. The life and heritage of the man so overshadow all description that one would be presumptuous to feel otherwise. I am confident that you need little introduction to the subject matter.

Robert E. Lee was born January 19, 1807, at Stratford, the stately Lee Mansion in Westmoreland County. His background on his father's and mother's side was illustrious. His army service tempered the aristocracy of his birth. He never claimed preference or prerogative of birth or name. There was a cast to his mind, an elevation of spirit and a loftiness of thought which gave him a wholesomeness of spirit and action. He was drawn to the right as the needle is to a magnet. He never had to meditate on the truth; he spoke it by nature. Unconsciously, he set up as his life's model his father's distinguished friend, the illustrious George Washington. Lee followed that example as an humble aristocrat in thought, word, act, and deed.

Shortly after General Lee's death, a most distinguished Southern Senator, in an address before the Southern Historical Society, said:

"When the future historian shall come to survey the character of Lee, he will find it rising like a huge mountain above the undulating plain of humanity, and he must lift his eyes high toward Heaven to catch its summit. He possessed every virtue of other great commanders without their vices. He was a foe without hate; a friend without treachery; a soldier without murmuring. He was a public officer without vices; a private citizen without wrong; a neighbor without reproach; a Christian without hypocrisy, and a man without guile. He was Caesar without his ambition; Frederick without his tyranny; Napoleon without his selfishness, and Washington without his reward. He was obedient to authority as a servant, and royal in authority as a true king. He was gentle as a woman in life; modest and pure as a virgin in thought; watchful as a Roman vestal in duty; submissive to law as Socrates, and grand in battle as Archilles."

Lee was a military genius. He graduated from West Point, second in his class, at the age of 18 years. No one need labor the point of his military excellence. His record equals history's greatest. Distinguished historians, professional military men, as well as laymen, vie with one another in their praise of his military achievements.

The late James Ford Rhodes, the scholar and historian from Ohio, said of Lee:

"Drawing from a knightly race all their virtues, he had inherited none of their vices. Honest, sincere, simple, magnanimous, forbearing, refined, courteous, yet dignified and proud, never lacking self-command, he was in all respects a true man."

When the War Between the States became evident, Lee was offered the command of the Union forces. He resigned his U.S. Army commission and said:

"With all my devotion to the Union, and the feeling of loyalty and devotion as an American citizen, I have not been able to make up my mind to raise my hand against my relatives, my children, and my home."

We cannot know the agony of spirit which he must have suffered in his decision to leave the Union and remain with those on his native soil of Virginia. He must have paced the broad pillared veranda of Arlington House struggling with soul and mind as he saw the Capitol's dome. We must recognize in that hour of trial one of the finest products of the American way of life. As the years go by, surely we shall see in larger measure that such a life cannot be judged in a partisan measure or tone. All shall come to look upon him as the English now look upon Washington.

Sir Frederick Maurice, an English major general, said of General Lee:

"As he rode along lines, hundreds of his devoted veterans pressed around the noble chief, trying to take his hand, touch his person, or even lay hands on his horse, thus exhibiting for him their great affection. The general then, with head bare and tears flowing freely down his manly cheeks, bade adieu to his army. In a few words he told his brave men who had been so true in arms to return to their homes and become worthy citizens."

Such was part of the farewell to the army of the South. It is said that when Lee returned to Richmond after the surrender, the people flocked to cheer him. He was received with great acclaim by men and women alike. The record, the character of the man, had placed him forever in the hearts of his comrades and his people irrespective of war's misfortunes.

The integrity, humility, and devotion to duty of General Lee are among his great characteristics. Many have appraised his service after the war to be more important than his direction of the South during that struggle. He returned to his wrecked and prostrate homeland. By precept and example he called his fellow citizens to duty to their State and Nation. Among other things, he said:

"I have led the young men of the South in battle; I have seen many of them die on the field; I shall devote my remaining energies to training young men to do their duty in life."

General Lee accepted the presidency of Washington College at Washington, Va., which had been almost totally demolished by the ravages of war. Cheerfully, resolutely and with determination he set about his appointed task of building the character and educating the men privileged to attend the college which now bears his name along with that of Washington.

Lee's greatness is exemplified in his farewell message to his troops. That also becomes a good note on which to end this discourse. The great General we all love and respect so much said:

"After 4 years of arduous service, marked by unsurpassed courage and fortitude, the Army of Northern Virginia has been compelled to yield to overwhelming numbers and resources. I need not tell the survivors of so many hard-fought battles, who have remained steadfast to the last, that I have consented to this result from no distrust of them; but, feeling that valor and devotion could accomplish nothing that could compensate for the loss that would have attended the continuation of the contest, I have determined to avoid the useless sacrifice of those whose past services have endeared them to their countrymen. By the terms of the agreement, officers and men can return to their homes and remain there until exchanged. You will take with you the satisfaction that proceeds from the consciousness of duty faithfully performed; and I earnestly pray that a merciful God will extend to you His blessing and protection. With an increasing devotion to your country, and a grateful remembrance of your kind and generous consideration of myself, I bid you an affectionate farewell."

Federal Lamb Grading

OF
HON. O. C. FISHER
OF TEXAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, January 25, 1960

Mr. FISHER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks I include a letter to the editor of the Washington Post which appeared in that paper on January 13, 1960. It was written by our colleague the gentleman from California [Mr. MILLER]. I commend it to your reading, because it contains some sound advice on an important subject. It is good food for thought. The letter follows:

UNGRADED LAMB

Your January 9 editorial on lamb grading is worth some comment. I imagine all of us feel the need for proper quality standards of all food products. In this day and age, the individual is helpless to do the job himself.

However, it may as well be noted that such standards, unintentionally, of course, are very frequently of no help and may actually harm the consumer. In the case of lamb, prime grades now require prescribed amounts of fat along the back-lining of the animal.

This surplusage must be paid for by the consumer thought it is of no possible use to anyone. To feed the lamb up to grade requires keeping past its prime, into the second year. This is not young lamb at all. So, as a result of lamb grading we pay added costs which serve no purpose, and we lose out in flavor, and delectability.

This general thesis can be extended to other agricultural products. It is easy to see the imposition of unnecessarily high grading standards as an instrument of monopoly and high price structure. The farmer takes the rap because his good product is turned down at the plant unloading dock as below standard.

Witness what is happening in the fruit industry, peaches, apples, pears. Consumers share the costs of this restrictive wastefulness with the farmer; only the middleman gains.

This is the other side of the grading coin. As our society becomes wealthier and feels it can afford restrictive practices which are wasteful, we do not seem to comprehend that the added costs are ours.

CLEM MILLER.

Our Farmer Can Now See a Ray of Hope

OF
HON. BEN F. JENSEN
OF IOWA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, January 25, 1960

Mr. JENSEN. Mr. Speaker, as you know, on November 16, last, I wrote President Eisenhower recommending the soil bank withdrawal plan, as explained in my remarks to the House on January 7, at which time I said I would send the plan to many Americans in all walks of life, which I did, and I am now pleased to report that the response and support of that plan has been most encouraging, from Members of Congress and nationwide.

I have just received the following letter from President Eisenhower:

JANUARY 22, 1960.

The Honorable BEN F. JENSEN,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR BEN: I have your recent letter regarding the soil bank withdrawal plan, which has been given serious study here. CHARLIE HOEVEN is also interested in this general approach.

A number of people in the executive branch are working actively on this proposal; a position on it will be firmed up shortly. The plan as you have outlined it is quite clear and is well understood and I appreciate your constructive interest.

With warm regard.

Sincerely,

D.E.

Hence, Mr. Speaker, we can now at least see a ray of hope for our farmers for the first time during the past several years—for if this plan is made law, to pay liberally in kind for effectively reducing production of the costly price depressing surpluses, of not only corn and wheat, but also of cotton and tobacco, it will reduce the surpluses to normal size in about 2 years and will tend almost immediately to stabilize all farm prices on a higher profitable level without added cost to our taxpayers, farmers themselves being substantial taxpayers.

Now we can only hope that President Eisenhower will urge—yes, even demand—that this plan be enacted into law, just as he recommended in his farm speech to Congress on January 9, 1956.

Crisis of the Commuter Railroads: No. 1

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. DONALD J. IRWIN

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, January 25, 1960

Mr. IRWIN. Mr. Speaker, the commuter railroad conditions in the Fourth Congressional District of Connecticut, which I represent in this House, and those of other metropolitan areas have reached the critical point. Dwindling passenger traffic has resulted in shrinking revenues for the commuter railroads which in turn invite disaster while further worsening traffic and financial problems of our major cities. The importance of rail commuter service to a strong economy, to national defense, and to our security warrant the attention of the Congress to problems of the commuter railroads. To help focus attention on these problems, I shall submit a series of articles, statements, and other matter bearing upon the subject. Pursuant to permission granted, I insert into the RECORD, a letter published in the Ridgefield (Conn.) Press of January 21, 1960:

REPRESENTATIVE IRWIN REVIEWS COMMUTER PROBLEMS

To the Editors:

I appeal to you as readers of this paper to let me know your views on the New Haven Railroad commuter service problems.

You know the difficulties, indeed you have to live with them. What you want, need, and deserve from the commuter service has deteriorated and nobody knows it better than you.

In the Fourth Congressional District of Connecticut live some of the most talented people in the country. They have proven this in countless business successes and I want to call on them. They can provide invaluable help and insight into the commuter issue to supplement findings from my personal studies and inspections of the railroad's operations.

The overall problem is simple to state: How do you transport some 35,000 persons to New York City in the morning and return them at night with safety and on time. This isn't being done.

A look at highway travel as an alternative emphasizes that it must be done.

To carry the 35,000 commuters, say with car pools of four in a car, would take 8,750 cars—a bumper-to-bumper line from Bridgeport to Greenwich, about 28 miles. Imagine what would take place in Westchester and picture the scene at the New York bridges? Go a step further into the city—traffic experts estimate conservatively it would take more than 50 acres to park the 8,750 cars. Where do you find 50 acres in the middle of New York or near the middle of the city?

Railroad commuter transportation is the only way to do the job.

Now, in my studies of the commuter issue, I have come upon some startling facts. Take the commuter service breakdowns. Railroad officials frankly admitted to me that the trains don't get proper maintenance. For this, they said, every car should have a thorough renovation every 6 years. Motors, running gear, electrical equipment, interior fixtures, seats, windows, and so forth would be inspected and repaired or replaced if necessary * * *.

But the passenger deficit eats up funds, leaving nothing for proper maintenance work, the New Haven authorities claimed. They added that proper maintenance hasn't been given in the past and isn't being given now.

What are the results? You commuters know what the lack of proper care has done to interiors of the cars. The railroad officials confirmed what you have undoubtedly believed—that the breakdowns occur largely because of poor maintenance. For example, it isn't uncommon in bad weather for water to leak into electrical equipment because of bad gaskets and cause short circuits and stall trains. Gaskets, the train officials said, would be inspected and kept in good condition had the trains been getting the 6-year renovation work.

Failure to provide the work has had a cumulative effect. The authorities told me the renovation jobs would normally cost $10,000 per car. Now, they say, it would cost $66,200 for each motorcar and $52,700 for each without a motor to put them in top-notch shape. They said it would be necessary to "remanufacture" the cars.

The New Haven's 100 new stainless steel cars, purchased in 1954, wouldn't need remanufacture but are due this year, under normal circumstances, for the 6-year renovation work. It doesn't look like this will be done.

Breakdowns, in addition to causing distress by resulting in delays, are serious hazards. I cannot overemphasize this. The railroad people at New Haven contend that they aren't hazards. I ask you, what is a breakdown on tracks crowded during the peak commuter hours?

The railroad has installed certain safety devices in its control towers to regulate switches and signal lights. They also have devices to indicate the position of trains in the vicinity of the switches.

But the switches are not automatic. In addition, there are no speedometers in the multiple-unit cars. One engineer told me experience must serve as the engineer's speedometer. I believe there is too much room for human error to regard breakdowns, especially during busy periods, as anything but hazards to safety.

The recent accident at Rowayton proves the point. It was caused by a human error—the engineer of a train coming to the aid of another that had stalled was misinformed by a dispatcher, so the Public Utilities Commission said, as to the location of the stalled train and the result was an accident. It could have been far more serious.

The conditions on the New Haven have an obviously bad effect on morale of the employees. They appear to have little or no interest in promoting the railroad. I believe that better conditions—and some places where the employees work are very depressing—contribute to morale improvement and see employees do a better job.

Railroad management has told us its commuter line deficit wouldn't be anywhere near as bad if taxes weren't so high. This can't be disputed. Last year, for example, the New Haven paid some $10 million in taxes, mostly to New York. About $600,000 of this went to Connecticut in earnings taxes on passenger operations, the management has pointed out, an amount equal to the cost of giving 60 cars the 6-year renovations.

Whether New York, with its tremendous financial problems, could be of much help in the way of tax relief, if any at all, remains to be answered. Tax relief, admittedly however, isn't the only answer.

Fare increases which might be justified in some instances won't put operations back in the black and reportedly tend to drive away commuters—if the increases are applied without improvements in trains and services or even a guarantee that conditions won't get even worse.

There is also a question of equitable taxation—other forms of transportation don't bear proportionately equal tax loads. These other means of transportation also enjoy enormous amounts of financial aid, from local governments and the Federal Government.

The commuter railroad problem won't be answered by massive grants of Federal aid alone. A Federal transportation policy covering the commuter lines is essential.

Railroads are private businesses that must make profits to survive—and they are here to stay. They will increase in importance with the growth of our cities and suburban areas. Answers to the commuter service problems must be keyed to a long-range program for orderly development of good economic mass transportation systems which include highways, air facilities and other means of travel.

Representative DONALD J. IRWIN.

WASHINGTON, January 15.

Gen. Douglas MacArthur

OF

HON. EDWARD J. DERWINSKI

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, January 25, 1960

Mr. DERWINSKI. Mr. Speaker, as time marches on, great men take their rightful places in the nonpartisan pages of history. In the heat of controversy, our greatest leaders have been subjected to ill-tempered abuse. Years later, in the calm, when a man's true role in history is analyzed, we can properly evaluate his contributions to his country. It is with this thought in mind that I call your attention to the 80th birthday of one of the greatest Americans of all time, Gen. Douglas MacArthur.

A decade ago, he was subject to removal from his command by the ill-advised action of the then President of the United States. General MacArthur was, in fact, punished because he maintained a belief that victory was essential for the protection and integrity of our country. Since we can now look back at that turbulent period, in a quiet and analytical manner, it is apparent that General MacArthur was completely correct in his position, and that the Nation suffered irreparable harm as a result of his being removed from military command.

Mr. Speaker, I take this opportunity to salute this truly outstanding American on his 80th birthday and to remind him that the Nation will be forever grateful for his lifetime of service in defense of his country and the cherished ideals he so steadfastly maintained.

Danger Points to Public Power in 1960

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. HAROLD T. JOHNSON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, January 25, 1960

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following speech by Senator CLAIR ENGLE before the Electric Consumers Information Committee Legislative Workshop, Monday, January 18, 1960:

You and I have been working together toward a common goal for a good many years—so I am glad to have this opportunity to appear before the Electric Consumers Information Committee. I want to talk to you a little about electric utility policies and politics. We both know these subjects rather well. I hope that I can add something to your already extensive information on these subjects.

I am glad that this legislative workshop is working in the interest of the consumer. The consumer is the least represented element in our society today. Under this administration, which took over as a businessman's administration, the consumer has been pretty well ignored. The private power companies of America picture the consumer as a downtrodden taxpayer who is systematically being forced to pay two power bills—his own and that of the fellow who gets power from public projects. We know that the consumer is not only a taxpayer but also a ratepayer. He pays the rates set by the utility—a fact which the private utilities choose to ignore and which this administration has not yet discovered.

In the kind of environment we have had in recent years, it is particularly important that the Electric Consumers Information Committee be more active and vigilant than ever. The groups that support your organization are entitled to special commendation. I speak particularly of the National Rural Electric Cooperative Association, headed by my former colleague in the House of Representatives, Clyde T. Ellis. The American Public Power Association, with Alex Radin, has done fine work. The AFL–CIO has recognized a legitimate interest in the welfare of the consumer. The Farmers Union and the National Grange, as farm organizations, have taken more than ordinary interest in consumer affairs. The Northwest Public Power Association is active and vigorous as was the Hell's Canyon Association during the difficult struggle for that project.

It is necessary for these organizations to keep on the statute books a public power policy that is beneficial to the power consumers of America. These power policies have not received the support of this administration. Congress has been deluged with proposals to water down the laws that make power cheaper throughout the land. Whenever possible the administration of existing laws has been distorted to impair the established national power policy as imbedded in the statute books. So far, none of these laws have been repealed. Sometimes they haven't been executed as they should. But they are still on the books. A Federal Power Commission has been appointed that does not agree with the power policy written by the Congress. The present Federal Power Commission is not interested particularly in protecting the consumer. The Bureau of the Budget has taken a stranglehold on new projects. Federal public power development has been either completely stopped or delayed because the officials in this administration are not in favor of public power.

This will be an active and busy session of Congress. We will have to be adjourned by July 1 or thereabouts to attend the national conventions. In the rush of getting through the appropriation bills and major legislation demands by the administration, it will be necessary for all the electric consumer organizations to be especially alert that some proposal adversely affecting their interest does not get by undetected. There are some matters that will be of particular importance. I will mention them.

First, we may again be faced with a proposal in one form or another involving the so-called "partnership" program advocated by this administration. You will recall that this proposal took specific form first on the Trinity River project in California. Just to refresh your memory: The administration proposed that a private power company be permitted to build the powerhouses on an otherwise completely federally financed project. This would accomplish economy, in the mind of the administration, by saving the cost of the powerhouses to the Federal Government. It is hardly necessary for me to emphasize that the consumers would pay for the powerhouses in any case. In the end, the private power company instead of the Federal Government would own the powerhouses, and the consumer would pay nearly twice as much for the power. This is a costly way of avoiding creeping or crawling socialism.

Last session we defeated the partnership program when the House Interior Subcommittee tabled the bills which would have put it into effect. Congress then proceeded to appropriate $2,400,000 to start Federal construction of the powerhouses. But this isn't enough to firmly nail down the proposition. We will need at least $20 million more for fiscal 1960 to really get these powerhouses beyond the planning and design stage. A California newspaper last week quoted a vice president of the Pacific Gas & Electric Co. as saying: "Our faith in the partnership concept of water and power development is undiminished. We intend to continue our advocacy of this principle on Federal, State, and local projects within our territory of service * * *."

This indicates that the power company hasn't given up. Some effort may be made this year to block the Trinity funds for the powerhouses. Accordingly I welcome the continued attention of your membership to this particular issue.

Another question directly involving public power to the consumer is the proposal to build an intertie line between the Columbia River powerplants and the Central Valley project in California. These are two Federal power systems. This administration now proposes to tie them together with a private line built by a private power company. This scheme, of course, will make the private power company the tollkeeper. A contract was prepared last year to put the proposal into effect, but we stopped it. I am not sure how long it will stay stopped. It is our belief that a Federal line should interconnect the two Federal systems. Power that cannot be used in the Central Valley system or by preference customers can be wholesaled to the private power company on the same basis that nonfirm power from the Central Valley project itself is now sold to the private power company. Let me emphasize that this proposal would not divert power from the Columbia River system for which that system has any need or use, but would provide revenue to that system for kilowatts now going to waste. For the preference customers in California a Federal construction of the intertie is the only method by which their preference can be preserved. In 1951—the 82d Congress—I introduced a bill to provide for a Federal intertie between the Columbia River and the California Central system. The private utilities fought it tooth and nail. Now they are for it, provided they can do it. The economic justification of this intertie has never been in question. The only issue has been whether or not the Federal Government would be permitted to interconnect those two systems. The private utilities defeated legislation to permit that to be done. Now they are for it, provided they can do it. I doubt that the President would sign legislation providing for a Federal intertie. The best we can hope for is to prevent the execution of a contract which permits it to be done by private utilities until after the first of next year—when I hope we will again have a Democratic President.

Third, we want to make sure that none of the pending proposals to wreck the REA achieve the status of law as a part of the last will and testament of the dying Eisenhower administration. The REA can be economized into oblivion by hoisting the interest rates on REA loans or driving the cooperatives toward high-priced money markets of Wall Street. This is clear from the Republican program embodied in legislation pending before Congress. I refer specifically to S. 133 and H.R. 797, among others. At the present time neither of these bills has gotten out of committee, and I hope we keep them there. I suggest that you read the editorial entitled "REA and Tight-Money Policy" in the January issue of Rural Electrification. It points out that the drive to raise REA interest rates is a part of a carefully planned administration tight-money policy. The editorial concludes: "As inflation medicine, this policy is poison." There is growing pressure on public power agencies to make them accept higher interest rates. That pressure will be increased during this session of Congress.

The purpose of these administrative and legislative actions is to reverse the national power policy laid down in the REA Act and other Federal legislation. That policy provides for the lowest possible rates for power produced at public dams consistent with the repayment of the cost of the project. It has, further, historically provided a preference to public power for cities, municipalities, public agencies, and irrigation districts. We have not forgotten that when the President was called to give an example of socialism he named the TVA. The Administration has clearly been alined with the private power companies during the past 7 years. This year may be their last chance to get in their licks.

As part and parcel of the effort to cut back public power development, we have been faced consistently in recent years with a no-new-starts policy. This has been dressed up as an economy measure. The projects which produce Federal public power have been special victims of this no-new-starts policy. We authorized some 32 projects last session by overriding the veto of the President of the United States. I am not sure, however, how fast they are going to start because the Bureau of the Budget can impound the money appropriated to build these projects. Some of the more controversial new starts have not as yet been able to get underway.

For example, Yellowtail Dam on the Big Horn River was authorized in 1944 as part of the Missouri Basin program. Congress has repeatedly confirmed its decision with reference to the need for this project. Each and every year for the past 7 years this administration has found new reasons for not going forward. The people of Montana and Wyoming need this project, both for its water and for its power.

There are a great number of authorized smaller Missouri Basin projects which would yield power but have not been started by this administration—and will not be started unless continuous pressure is exercised.

The seven Colorado River States have a vital interest in the power to be developed in the Upper Colorado River storage project. This administration inherited that project from its predecessor—fully engineered and ready for authorization. The Congress authorized this project under reclamation law, including public transmission lines. Now, as soon as the project is underway private utilities are prepared to help the administration economize and save some money. In this case the economy consists of turning over the public power to the private utility companies who would provide the transmission lines. Here again, as in the Columbia River situation, this power would in the process be freed of the preference clause and would be subject to distribution by a private power company.

In summary, we are fighting a defensive battle in Congress and with the administration to retain what we have in the public power policy of this Nation for the benefit of the consumer.

The executive branch has teamed up with the private utility and the banks to make it tough on every phase of public power. Power producing projects have been the victim of the no-new-starts program. Money has been tightened up on REA cooperatives—and the interest rates have been raised. The so-called partnership has been actively pushed to take the Federal Government out of power production at federally built projects. The power preference for public agencies has been challenged in national advertising by the private power lobby—with the cost of the advertising written off as a business expense. The President described TVA as the best example of creeping socialism—and this attitude has permeated his whole administration. This was the most direct and powerful assault on the electric consumer in the past 30 years.

On the whole, we have sustained the attack rather well. We have lost no major legislative battles—no laws have been repealed. Some have been watered down. We have been hurt, but not ruined.

We can fight 1 more year. We will be vigilant and active in defense of the interests of the electric power consumers. And we can look forward after 8 long hard years to a new administration that will support and implement the 50 years of Federal legislation beneficial to the electric power consumers of America.

Forty-second Anniversary of Ukrainian Independence

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. SEYMOUR HALPERN
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, January 25, 1960

Mr. HALPERN. Mr. Speaker, January 22 was the 42d anniversary of Ukrainian independence in the 20th century. It is, however, far more than just a solemn commemoration for a latter-day event. It justly is emblematic of the solidarity and dedication of a people who had established their own government and society on the rich western steppes when Europe was still in the Dark Ages, centuries before William the Conqueror commanded his armies to cross the channel and assault the Saxon strongholds in England.

The Ukrainian struggle for independence and self-determination today springs from the ages-old tradition of a proud people who have never relinquished their dream despite decades of suppression and adversity.

Those of us who are free call out to you who are in bondage, "Do not despair. We are striving to create a world where justice and peace shall prevail, when once again we shall welcome you as brothers in the legions of the free."

Surplus Property Disposal

OF
HON. THOMAS B. CURTIS
OF MISSOURI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, January 25, 1960

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, October 7 of last year TelePrompTer Corp. conducted for the Department of the Army an experimental closed-circuit television auction of surplus Department of Defense materials. The results of this auction are worthy of the attention of this House as this system may offer one way of improving the return to the Government on the sales of its surplus materials. The Department of Defense alone has some $26.7 billion in salable surplus property, according to the report of the Committee on Appropriations on the 1960 Department of Defense appropriation bills, and an increase of return, however small—even 1 or 2 cents on the dollar—on this property would be of real economic significance.

This auction was conducted simultaneously in six cities, with bidders in each city competing not only with one another but with those in the other cities. Goods for sale were being offered from three locations, making a nine-station circuit to serve this sale. The obvious advantage of this system is that it permits a larger number of potential buyers to enter the bidding for the goods on sale, it expands the market and thereby the competition for these goods.

Goods of an acquisition cost of $2,614,000 were sold in this auction for $534,556, a return of 20.5 cents on the dollar. The overall average for Defense Department surplus sales is in the range of 3 to 5 cents; an estimate of the materials in this sale, including heavy machinery, clothing, and marine engines and machinery, put their likely maximum return at 15 cents. The auction ran for over 8 hours without interruption for technical failure.

As a member of the newly-created Subcommittee on Defense Procurement of the Joint Economic Committee, I find these figures quite interesting. This one experiment, of course, does not prove this as the way in which to dispose of all surplus property, but it does justify further experimentation with it. I would also raise the point that this process might better be turned over to the General Services Administration which, with its experience in the field and its charged responsibility in disposal of surplus Government property, would be best qualified to make use of it.

In connection with the last statement, I would like to enter a portion of a letter of evaluation of this sale written to me by the Honorable Franklin Floete, the Administrator of the General Services Administration:

DEAR MR. CURTIS:* * * The subject sale was conducted by the Department of the Army as an experiment designed to test the effectiveness of this medium in DOD surplus selling. The sale was planned as a departure from traditional, conventional Government sales methods, with a view toward attracting new buyers through a mechanic to broaden market appeal. General Services Administration personnel observed the sale at all property and selling locations.

The contractual services rendered by the TelePrompTer Corp. were efficient and in keeping with good professional standards. It should be reported that the attendance of 479 buyers distributed between 6 viewing locations was less than anticipated, but was adequate to produce spirited intercity competition among bidders. The sale provided valid experience concerning the types of property suited and the geographical and market considerations which are involved in televised selling.

A preliminary evaluation of the test indicates that the application of television to sales of Government property must be limited to select situations. Additional testing may be required before a reliable, conclusive evaluation can be completed.

One important consideration in planning future uses of televised broadcasts is the heavy cost attending the transmission service and equipment.

Sincerely yours,

FRANKLIN FLOETE.

Washington Report

OF
HON. BRUCE ALGER
OF TEXAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, January 25, 1960

Mr. ALGER. Mr. Speaker, as is my practice every Monday, I put my newsletter in the RECORD so that my colleagues as well as others who read the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD may know my views if they are so disposed.

The budget message is of great interest to all of us. For my part, I decided to write the President a letter of commendation well deserved, as my newsletter for this week:

WASHINGTON REPORT BY CONGRESSMAN BRUCE ALGER, JANUARY 23, 1960

THE PRESIDENT:
The White House,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: Good for you. Having studied your budget message, I feel compelled to write you this letter. Moreover, I believe that a majority of Dallas citizens would join me in these thoughts. Undoubtedly numberless others throughout the land feel the same.

Yours is no easy task. We all know that. Presenting and preparing a year's budget for our National Government is tough, but hardly more so than a long list of difficult things that, by law, we require you as President to do. On top of the all important military expenses, there are countless Government functions that must be paid for.

Besides recommending action, you have to assemble, from all branches of Government, estimates of what it will cost to carry out the laws Congress has passed. Congress may than accept or ignore your recommendations, but the chances are that you will be blamed for any inaction by Congress, as often as not by the very Congressmen responsible. Worse yet, many of our people simply do not understand the respective functions of the Congress and the President.

In addition to the necessary expenses, there are endless numbers of costly pet projects that Congressmen, pressure groups, and individual citizens think are needed right now. It's easy for any of us to lose sight of basic objectives and the overall picture. You, of course, must not. It's easy for some to figure that the other fellow's needs are not so important as their own. Easy too, to demand some particular, even worthwhile, spending project—"after all, it doesn't cost much"—without fitting that demand into the whole nationwide framework. In fact, it would probably be hard for many people to realize just how much restraint, self-discipline, and willpower it takes to withstand the pressures for greater spending when preparing the budget. Maybe, over the years, that's why the Government often spends more than it takes in.

Well, we of Dallas, want to compliment you and to encourage you in the statesmanlike attitude toward spending shown by your budget message. You have offered us a balanced budget. You have suggested that we pay down the debt, tipping our hats to our children who will inherit it. You ask us to look forward to the possibility of a tax cut, if we follow this responsible course you have charted.

To do this, you have chosen to delay your request for some of the money for Federal building that is under way throughout the Nation. So, the shoe is pinching us in Dallas. We have high hopes for our Federal building conceived and based on sound economic principles. We expected speedy construction. Now it will be delayed since no money is provided in the current budget, beyond buying the site and preparation of plans, which are going ahead full speed.

Perhaps it would be expected by some, even demanded, that we now solicit you to include the funds necessary for immediate construction of this building, justified by persuasive arguments. It would be easy to forget the national picture and just demand this admittedly worthwhile project.

However, sober consideration and understanding of Federal spending is not new to the people of Dallas. We have on other occasions declined to request Federal aid when we might have had it under the law. From time to time, as a Representative, I have voted, in the name of Dallas people, against boondoggle bills, even when it meant voting against some Dallas project included in a bill. We were prepared then and are now to be self-disciplined and responsible in our attitude toward Federal spending.

It is possible that in this moment of history, under your leadership, responsible people everywhere will rally around your sensible economic course. We, in Dallas, hope so. Surely, it is not too much to ask that we delay some construction, however worthwhile, to accomplish the objectives of sound fiscal policy. We know that it is time we got our house in order. We must not spend more than we take in. We must cut our debt. We should reduce the tax burden on our people.

We cherish our freedoms as dearly as any generation of Americans ever did and we know to what degree they may hinge on our maintaining a sound dollar. Hence, we demand only what we have a right to demand—sound money management.

In a larger sense some may even feel, as I do, that we are at a turning point in history. We should count the blessings of a free society and turn decisively and resolutely away from the false charms of a regimented planned economy resulting from crushing taxation and the big spending that occasions it.

We're behind you and want you to stand firm while we face up to the economic facts of life. Thank you, Mr. President.

Sincerely,

BRUCE ALGER,
Member of Congress.

Gettysburg—Heritage or Horror

OF

HON. JAMES M. QUIGLEY

OF PENNSYLVANIA

Monday, January 25, 1960

Mr. QUIGLEY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks I would like the privilege of inserting in the RECORD an editorial from the Harrisburg (Pa.) Patriot of last Thursday, January 21, in which the need for cooperation among all Americans in both their private and public capacity, and at all levels of local, State, and National governments is stressed if our national shrines are to be preserved from commercial desecration. This editorial highlights the recently formed Gettysburg Battlefield Preservation Association, an organization of private citizens constituted to bend its collective efforts to save the Gettysburg battlefield from the fate of unrestrained commercialization.

The editorial also raises the question about what the State government in Pennsylvania, and the local Adams County and the Cumberland Township officials are doing to protect the battlefield site. The editorial follows:

PRIVATE-PUBLIC TEAMWORK NEEDED TO SAVE SHRINES

In 1958, more than 20 million persons visited historical shrines maintained by the National Park Service. They went to see the battlefields and other places that have figured in the remarkable development of a raw, new world into a powerful, respected nation.

In a shocking number of cases what they see are cheap souvenir stands and housing subdivisions crowding right up to the edge of Government-owned land.

Pennsylvanians need go no farther than Gettysburg to see the process at work. If any spot in America should be treated as sacred soil it should be this place where one of the most decisive and bloody battles in our history was fought; where Lincoln uttered his few words that have become a classic article of faith in democracy. Yet the main highway through the battlefield is lined with motels and souvenir shops. Tracts all about the national park stand in danger of becoming "tourist traps."

Whose duty is it to protect our historical shrines from commercial encroachment? Conrad L. Wirth, Director of the National Park Service, says it should be a joint venture by Federal, State, and local governments with private organizations and individuals chipping in.

As far as Gettysburg is concerned, this appears to be the only way that the battlefield can be protected adequately. The last session of Congress came through with a $450,000 appropriation to buy land but tied up the funds with the stipulation they be used only to get property that has already been commercialized.

The Gettysburg Battlefield Preservation Association has come into being to help fill the gap left by this rather shortsighted Federal legislation. It has incorporated for the purpose of raising funds to buy land in danger of commercialization. Already several thousand persons have sent contributions to the organization's headquarters in Gettysburg.

The Federal Government and private individuals are doing something toward preserving Gettysburg. What about the State government? And officials of Adams County and the townships about Gettysburg? It would seem that both the Commonwealth and the local officials have a strong duty to protect the area. Airtight zoning laws by the localities and cooperative purchases of land by the State would plug up the gaps.

As the National Park Service points out in a recent bulletin, more and more people are discovering history. The growing numbers of visitors to places such as Gettysburg is a big reason for the threat of commercialization. It would be tragic if this rise in the public's appreciation of a rich American heritage should become blunted by quick-buck artists.

I would also like, Mr. Speaker, to insert my testimony given today before the Interior Subcommittee of the House Appropriations Committee, in which I think I point out that all of these local officials are at least making an effort to solve the problems which exist at Gettysburg. I believe, Mr. Speaker, my testimony makes it quite clear that we are still a considerable distance from a solution but as of the moment, I do believe that everybody involved deserves a big A for effort.

It's been my experience that when I am in the Gettysburg area I am asked "Why doesn't Congress do something about the battlefield?" And when I am in the Congress I find myself being asked "But isn't the problem at Gettysburg a local one?" I would suggest, Mr. Speaker, that if preserving the Gettysburg battlefield as a sacred shrine is a national problem it is one that cannot be solved by the Congress or the National Park Service without the full and complete cooperation of all of the local governmental units as well as the local citizenry. By the same token, if the preservation of the Gettysburg battlefield is, in fact, a local problem, it is a problem that cannot be solved by the efforts of the local citizenry and the local governmental officials without the help and cooperation of the National Park Service and the Congress.

In the interest of solving this problem rather than placing the blame for a lack of a solution, I join with the editorial writer in urging private and public teamwork until a satisfactory answer is finally reached.

My testimony follows:

TESTIMONY BY THE HONORABLE JAMES M. QUIGLEY, DEMOCRAT, PENNSYLVANIA, ON THE INTERIOR DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATION FOR 1961 BEFORE THE INTERIOR SUBCOMMITTEE OF THE APPROPRIATIONS COMMITTEE, HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, MONDAY, JANUARY 25, 1960

Mr. KIRWAN, members of the committee, I appreciate this opportunity to testify on the Interior Department, and more specifically the National Park Service, appropriation for fiscal 1961.

Quite specifically, I am here to speak about the Gettysburg National Park which, as many of you know, is located in my district. I think perhaps the best service I can perform is to bring this subcommittee up to date concerning what has happened at Gettysburg since last year.

Without trying to open any old wounds or expressing my own opinion, which varies somewhat with my next statement, let me point out that a minor furor was raised in the Gettysburg area when, last year, Congress as much as said that Gettysburg should protect its own future with zoning and that Adams County, in which the battlefield lies, could help preserve the Nation's shrine by preserving its own holdings there.

Once the understandable disappointment over lack of immediate Federal funds disappeared, Gettysburg and its friends began to work, slowly but in earnest. The second battle of Gettysburg which started with skirmishes in the public press settled down to a serious long-range attack of the problem on four separate fronts. Those attacks are local action with planning and zoning, nationwide action with a privately sponsored fund-raising campaign, executive action in the form of a proposed land exchange and, I hope, further congressional action with appropriations.

Surveying the battlefield front by front, let me tell you about the status of zoning first. Admittedly, as of this moment Gettysburg and the adjacent jurisdictions are still some distance from passing an effective zoning ordinance as stipulated by Congress last year in giving an appropriation for the battlefield. Legally it takes time to set up an effective plan for the future, but I would like this committee to know that the steps have been started. A temporary setback ordinance has been passed by Cumberland Township, which encompasses approximately 95 percent of the battlefield. The enactment of this ordinance was in the nature of a hold-the-line action.

The Fels Institute of the University of Pennsylvania has begun work under a contract approved by the Housing and Home Finance Agency. A comprehensive growth plan for the future will be presented to Cumberland Township in the near future, a plan which I feel certain will contain protection for the battlefield.

Now let me say that I think Gettysburg, which incidentally has its own planning commission, and Cumberland Township, and perhaps Adams County, will eventually all enact planning and zoning laws. They will do this not because of the battlefield, nor because Congress would like them to do so, but because people generally are beginning to realize that planning for the future is the only way to protect their own investments and provide for an orderly development of their communities.

The second front is actually under the command of a military man. It is a front which has received the least publicity thus far and may in the long run do the most good. This is the Gettysburg Battlefield Preservation Association whose president is Maj. William M. Haller, currently stationed at Fort Meade. This group was founded last August and incorporated last month with its nucleus among students of the Civil War. This group has already raised a sizeable amount of money and its forthcoming national campaign should raise a great deal more. Its sole aim is to preserve the battlefield in the best way possible, aiding either with money or land donated to the National Park Service. Here is a group of dedicated citizens who are in the forefront of urging congressional action, yet at the same time they are putting their money where their mail is by following up their letters to their Congressmen with their own donations to the Battlefield Preservation Association.

Then, within the Park Service itself, I'm happy to report that there is in the process of formulation a possible exchange of some historically less valuable property presently owned by the Federal Government for some historically very valuable property owned by Adams County. Just to digress here a moment, may I insert into the record of these hearings the county commissioners' statement of their dilemma in which they find themselves unable to legally donate their land to the Government, much as they possibly might like to do so. I might add they have a further dilemma in that they also have hopes of gaining some money from land sales to help pay for their new and much-needed county home for the aged. And this is where a land swap might help out a great deal. Further, it would satisfy one of the congressional complaints that the Park Service has enough land already. However, I must point out that there is just a limited amount of land that is suitable for swapping and for this reason I would not suggest that a land swap is the full and easy answer to the problem.

The commissioners have thus far been patient, and in their way cooperative men. They have delayed their final actions as long as possible. But this year they must either swap or sell or give up the idea of a new county home. This is why I sincerely hope that the idea of a land swap may be approved soon. And approvals aplenty it will take—like congressional and county court action after the Park Service and the commissioners agree.

On the fourth front I can only hope that you gentlemen will respond to the needs of history and a growing appreciation of the Civil War.

Last year when Congress set aside $450,000 for this purpose it said the money could be used at Gettysburg and Manassas provided they met the stipulations of the Congress. Unfortunately for Gettysburg, Manassas has enacted what is considered to be an effective county zoning ordinance which the Park Service is urging them to make even stronger. Thus there is the probability that all of the money may be used there, for it is in keeping with both the spirit and the letter of the law.

Gettysburg is moving in that direction, successfully, I think on three fronts. I sincerely trust that you gentlemen will provide the fourth front by giving the Park Service the necessary money so that the Federal Government can do its fair share in this worthwhile public effort.

SENATE

TUESDAY, JANUARY 26, 1960

The Chaplain, Rev. Frederick Brown Harris, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Eternal God, we come each with manifold needs. But our greatest need is of Thee.

Lift us, we beseech Thee, above the immediate which so hems us in, and set our lives in the wide horizons of abiding verities.

As Thy servants and the servants of the people of this good land, in this temple of democracy save us from any perversion of power that has not Thee in awe.

In this day of destiny for us and for the world make us worthy of our high calling as keepers of the sacred flame.

We ask it in the dear Redeemer's name. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

On request of Mr. JOHNSON of Texas, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of the proceedings of Monday, January 25, 1960, was dispensed with.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Messages in writing from the President of the United States submitting nominations were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Miller, one of his secretaries.

LIMITATION OF DEBATE DURING MORNING HOUR

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, under the rule there will be the usual morning hour, and I ask unanimous consent that statements made in connection therewith be limited to 3 minutes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

FEDERAL ELECTIONS ACT OF 1959—POSITION OF SENATOR FROM MARYLAND

Mr. BEALL. Mr. President, I was necessarily absent from the floor when the vote on S. 2436, the bill to amend the election laws, was taken. I was inadvertently recorded as being opposed to passage of the bill.

Mr. President, if I had been present and voting I would have voted in favor of S. 2436.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

The following reports of committees were submitted:

AUTHORIZATION FOR COMMITTEE ON ARMED SERVICES TO INVESTIGATE CERTAIN MATTERS RELATING TO THE COMMON DEFENSE

Mr. STENNIS, from the Committee on Armed Services, reported an original resolution (S. Res. 261) authorizing the Committee on Armed Services to investigate certain matters relating to the common defense; and, under the rule, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Armed Services, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized under sections

134(a) and 136 of the Legislative Reorganization Act of 1946, as amended, and in accordance with its jurisdiction specified by rule XXV of the Standing Rules of the Senate, to examine, investigate, and make a complete study of any and all matters pertaining to—

(1) common defense generally;

(2) the War Department and the Military Establishment generally;

(3) the Navy Department and the Naval Establishment generally;

(4) soldiers' and sailors' homes;

(5) pay, promotion, retirement, and other benefits and privileges of members of the Armed Forces;

(6) selective service;

(7) size and composition of the Army and Navy;

(8) forts, arsenals, military reservations, and navy yards;

(9) ammunition depots;

(10) maintenance and operation of the Panama Canal, including the administration, sanitation, and government of the Canal Zone;

(11) conservation, development, and use of naval petroleum and oil shale reserves;

(12) strategic and critical materials necessary for the common defense;

(13) aeronautical and space activities peculiar to or primarily associated with the development of weapons systems or military operations.

SEC. 2. For the purpose of this resolution the committee, from February 1, 1960, to January 31, 1961, inclusive, is authorized to (1) make such expenditures as it deems advisable; (2) to employ upon a temporary basis, technical, clerical, and other assistants and consultants: Provided, That the minority is authorized to select one person for appointment, and the person so selected shall be appointed and his compensation shall be so fixed that his gross rate shall not be less by more than $1,200 than the highest gross rate paid to any other employee; and (3) with the prior consent of the heads of the departments or agencies concerned, and the Committee on Rules and Administration, to utilize the reimbursable services, information, facilities, and personnel of any of the departments or agencies of the Government.

SEC. 3. The expenses of the committee under this resolution, which shall not exceed $190,000, shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers approved by the chairman of the committee.

REPORT OF JOINT ECONOMIC COMMITTEE—MINORITY, SUPPLEMENTAL, AND ADDITIONAL VIEWS (S. REPT. NO. 1043)

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, on behalf of the Joint Economic Committee I submit the report on employment, growth, and price levels, pursuant to Senate Concurrent Resolution 13 of the 86th Congress.

Mr. President, I point out that the report is based on a very thorough study of the whole economic situation as well as the specific issues of full employment, adequate growth, and the stability of price levels. We held hearings on more than 40 days and examined more than 100 witnesses, whose testimony and submitted views comprised approximately 3,700 pages printed in some 13 volumes.

We also authorized, under the direction of Dr. Otto Eckstein, 23 special studies which are either completed now or will come from the Government Printing Office by the end of this month.

The staff members prepared completely on their own initiative and direction, without any prompting on economic matters by the chairman, a staff report of more than 400 pages, which was submitted some weeks ago and has been printed.

This report is the final report of the committee, together with minority views.

My own judgment may be somewhat biased in this matter. We have lived within our appropriations. I think that no comparable public body, or private body, for that matter, has accomplished so much in this field in so short a time with so small an expenditure of funds. Paraphrasing Winston Churchill, I think I can say in the economic world never have so few done so much for so many.

Mr. President, we were very fortunate in having an extremely able staff. Most of the members of the permanent staff were transferred to the special study. I refer particularly to Dr. James Knowles and Mr. Norman Ture. We also had the very able administrative services of Mr. John Lehman.

Furthermore, we formed a special staff headed by one of the most brilliant economists in the country, Dr. Otto Eckstein, an associate professor of economics at Harvard University. We were able to obtain the services of Dr. Warren Smith, a professor of economics of the University of Michigan; of Dr. John H. Kareken, from the University of Minnesota; of Dr. Harold M. Levinson, from the University of Michigan; and of Dr. Padraic Frucht, formerly with the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, and previous to that time on the staff of Lawrence College.

We also had further members of the special staff, and I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point in my remarks the list of the men and the qualifications of the major members of such staff.

There being no objection, the list was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Dr. Otto Eckstein, an associate professor of economics at Harvard University, received his A.B. degree from Princeton in 1951, and then completed his A.M. (1952) and Ph.D. (1955) at Harvard University. His major interest as an economist has been in the fields of public finance and econometrics. Among his published works are: "Input-Output Economics—Its Nature and Use" in Economic Activity Analysis, edited by O. Morgenstern, 1954; "Trends in Public Expenditures in the Next Decade," Committee for Economic Development, April 1959; and for the Joint Economic Committee, "Inflation, the Price-Wage Spiral, and Economic Growth."

Dr. Warren Smith, professor of economics, University of Michigan, author of numerous articles on monetary problems and one of the foremost scholars in his field. Graduate of University of Michigan; Ph.D., University of Michigan.

Dr. John H. Kareken, a monetary economist, is on leave from the School of Business Administration, University of Minnesota. He was born in Buffalo, N.Y., in 1929 and holds a B.A. degree from the University of Buffalo. He received a doctorate at Massachusetts Institute of Technology where he also taught. Since September 1956 he has been associate professor of economics at the University of Minnesota. Dr. Kareken has written widely in the field of monetary policy.

Dr. Harold M. Levinson is on leave from the University of Michigan where he is associate professor of economics in the department of economics. He has specialized in the field of labor economics and is the author or coauthor of several books in that field, including "Unionism, Wage Trends, and Income Distributions," and "Labor Relations and Productivity in the Building Trades." Dr. Levinson also served as price analyst with the Office of Price Administration. He was born in 1919 in Boston, Mass., and is a graduate of the University of Michigan from which he received a M.B.A. in 1942 and a Ph.D. in 1950. He has been at the University of Michigan since 1945.

Dr. Padraic Frucht will cover the international economic aspects of the study as well as being assigned as special economist for the minority. Dr. Frucht was born in 1921 and graduated from Brown University in 1947. He received a Ph.D. from Harvard University in 1956 and comes to the study staff from the research staff of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce. Previous to that he was assistant professor of economics at Lawrence College in Appleton, Wis. His additional fields of specialization are industrial organization, price and allocation theory, and monetary theory and policy.

Assistant economists: Thomas Wilson and Michael Brower, Harvard Graduate School.

Junior economists: George Bleile, Northwestern University Graduate School; Charles Warden, Georgetown University Graduate School.

From the permanent staff: The clerk of the committee, John Lehman, will serve as administrative officer for the study. James Knowles will serve as special economic counsel, with particular responsibility for advance planning, the organization of hearings, and liaison with committee members; Norman Ture, fiscal economist, with the permanent staff.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I also ask unanimous consent to have printed in connection with this report the list of the hearings, study papers, and reports prepared in connection with this general study.

There being no objection, the list was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I wish to thank the members of the committee, both the majority and minority members, for the cooperation which they showed in the conduct of the hearings.

I also wish to say that the minority members were allowed to name a member of the special staff, who was in a sense their special representative.

I do not know the political affiliations of a single member of the special staff. No question about this was ever asked by me, at least.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The time of the Senator from Illinois has expired.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may have 1 additional minute.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Illinois? The Chair hears none, and the Senator may proceed.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I know the staff members are loyal Americans and men who stand well in their profession. They did an honest, conscientious job, without fear or favor.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me upon the same subject?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I should be glad to yield.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will inform the Senator from New York that the Senator from Illinois has a half minute remaining. If the Senator from New York wishes to be recognized in his own right, he will have 3 minutes.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, may I be recognized?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New York is recognized.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I am a member of the Joint Economic Committee. This monumental study, concerning which we have come to different conclusions, but without rancor, represents, on the one hand, rather a triumph of handling by the chairman, who presided over very complicated hearings with the greatest of tact, accommodation to the minority, judiciousness, and desire to bring out all the facts.

I join my dear friend and colleague [Mr. DOUGLAS]. I hope Members will read this study. This is the anatomy of the economy of our country and of our country's place in the economy of the world. I think it is absolutely essential information for every Senator. I hope the report will not merely be filed away. It is short, snappy, and full of important facts. It is not discursive at all. I think it constitutes a great tribute to the fine chairmanship of our colleague from Illinois.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, if I may have an additional minute by unanimous consent, I thank my colleague for his words of praise. They are very sweet.

In particular, I am grateful for his statement that I presided with tact, because I think this is not commonly regarded as one of the virtues which I possess. So these words, in particular, please me very much.

The Senator from New York made a magnificent contribution to the work of this committee, as he does in connection with everything with which he is associated.

Mr. JAVITS. I thank the Senator.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I ask that the report be printed, with illustrations, together with minority, supplemental, and additional views.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the report will be received and printed, as requested by the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I have examined the report of the Joint Economic Committee and I commend it to my colleagues and to the Presiding Officer and to the country. The great debate now under way with respect to the monetary policy has a meaning for every American citizen. Its outcome has a particular meaning, and will have a great influence on the cost of living. I feel the Joint Committee has performed a commendable function, has made a diligent study, and has rendered a competent report.

Although I do not find myself in full agreement with all aspects of the recommendation, I do commend it to the careful examination of every Member of this body. I wish to congratulate the members of the committee upon the service which they have performed.

BILLS INTRODUCED

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. JOHNSON of Texas:

S. 2906. A bill to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to construct, operate, and maintain the Columbus Bend project, Texas; to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs.

(See the remarks of Mr. JOHNSON of Texas when he introduced the above bill, which appear under a separate heading.)

By Mr. MURRAY:

S. 2907. A bill for the relief of Giuseppe Borsa; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. NEUBERGER:

S. 2908. A bill to amend section 307 of the Mutual Security Act of 1954 to provide for a study to be conducted of the advisability and practicability of the establishment of a Point Four Youth Corps; to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

(See the remarks of Mr. NEUBERGER when he introduced the above bill, which appear under a separate heading.)

By Mr. BARTLETT:

S. 2909. A bill to repeal an act entitled "An act extending the time in which to file adverse claims and institute adverse suits against mineral entries in the district of Alaska", approved June 7, 1910 (36 Stat. 459); and

S. 2910. A bill to provide preference right to certain land in Alaska to Jesse Lee Caudill of Palmer, Alaska, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs.

By Mr. JAVITS:

RESOLUTIONS

AUTHORIZATION FOR COMMITTEE ON ARMED SERVICES TO INVESTIGATE CERTAIN MATTERS RELATING TO THE COMMON DEFENSE

Mr. STENNIS, from the Committee on Armed Services, reported an original resolution (S. Res. 261) authorizing the Committee on Armed Services to investigate certain matters relating to the common defense; and, under the rule, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration.

(See the above resolution printed in full when reported by Mr. STENNIS, which appears under the heading "Reports of Committees.")

TO PRINT AS A SENATE DOCUMENT, REPORT ON COLD WEATHER AGRICULTURE

Mr. GRUENING submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 262); which was referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration:

Resolved, That there be printed as a Senate document the report prepared by the Science and Technology Division of the Library of Congress on cold weather agriculture and that there be printed two thousand additional copies for the use of the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs.

COLUMBUS BEND PROJECT, TEXAS

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to construct, operate, and maintain the Columbus Bend project on the Colorado River in Texas.

The Columbus Bend project calls for the construction of the seventh dam in the system of the Lower Colorado River Authority which has harnessed floods of the Colorado and made them serve the people of Texas and the Nation.

I am proud of what we have done in Texas in recent years to conserve and develop the resources of our rivers. But I am particularly proud of what has been done on the Colorado River.

When I represented the 10th Congressional District of Texas in the House of Representatives, I worked hard to get Texas and the Federal Government working together on this lower Colorado project. And I am proud to say that today the six dams of the Lower Colorado River Authority and their related facilities represent a model for development of a basin's water resources.

The new dam authorized to be constructed by the Bureau of Reclamation under this bill would be a valuable addition to the Lower Colorado River Authority system. It will be located downstream from the existing dams, and in addition to controlling inflows below these dams, it will capture water which is released in the production of hydroelectric power upstream. It will provide 180,000 acre-feet of conservation storage and will yield even in the dryest years between 100,000 and 125,000 acre-feet of water for municipal and industrial use which would otherwise be wasted in the Gulf of Mexico.

The Columbus Bend project has been under study by the Bureau of Reclamation and the Lower Colorado River Authority for several years. I understand that a report on the project will made to Congress in a few weeks, but the study has progressed far enough to demonstrate clearly that this will be an extremely worthwhile project for the Bureau of Reclamation to undertake.

I want to make clear that though Federal funds will be used in the construction of this dam, much of the cost of the preliminary investigation was paid for by the Lower Colorado River Authority, and all of the money which the Federal Government will expend in this project will be reimbursed by the LCRA, except the relatively small amount allocated to fish and wildlife benefits.

The report of the Bureau of Reclamation will show the Columbus Bend project to be an excellent investment for the Federal Government. And I know that the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs will give this project its favorable consideration at an early date.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 2906) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to construct, operate, and maintain the Columbus Bend project, Texas, introduced by Mr. JOHNSON of Texas, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs.

POINT 4 YOUTH CORPS: AN OPPORTUNITY TO STIMULATE INTERNATIONAL UNDERSTANDING

Mr. NEUBERGER. Mr. President, I introduce for appropriate reference, a bill to authorize a study of the advisability and practicability of establishing a Point 4 Youth Corps to train young men and women for service throughout the world in U.S. technical cooperation programs.

My bill is identical to a measure introduced January 14, 1960, by Representative HENRY REUSS of Wisconsin. I think Representative REUSS' idea is a good one. I am pleased to introduce a companion bill today.

Mr. President, this bill would have the President conduct the study through a nongovernmental research group, university, or foundation within 1 year.

Objectives of the corps to be considered by the organization conducting the study would be: First, to make additional technical manpower available to carry out economic, medical, educational, and community development programs in underdeveloped friendly foreign countries; Second, to assist in broadening the understanding by the peoples of other nations of the ideals and aspirations of Americans; and third, to offer our young people an opportunity to serve their country in a stimulating way, while broadening their understanding of the problems facing other peoples and nations.

Points to be covered by such a study would include the type of projects which might be appropriate; the role of private organizations; whether service in the corps should be considered as satisfying military service obligations; conditions of employment; training and orientation; requirements for acceptance; administration of the corps; and coordination with existing technical cooperation programs.

Mr. President, Representative REUSS' suggestion represents both a challenge to youth and a possible aid to more effective foreign policy implementation.

Growth of underdeveloped nations is one of the most exciting stories of our time. In Asia and Africa and Latin America there are many important tasks which could utilize the minds and muscle of American young people.

And as Representative REUSS has pointed out—

> The peoples of the developing countries need economic assistance, but even more they can profit from exposure to the ideas of Thomas Jefferson and Abraham Lincoln. Young Americans who are willing to help with an irrigation project, with digging a village well, with setting up a rural school, could be one of our best ways for creating such a picture of America.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 2908) to amend section 307 of the Mutual Security Act of 1954 to provide for a study to be conducted of the advisability and practicability of the establishment of a Point 4 Youth Corps, introduced by Mr. NEUBERGER, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

PROPOSED AMENDMENTS OF HOUSING ACT OF 1950

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill to provide an additional $250 million in loans for construction of college and student nurse-intern housing. The program presently has exhausted for college housing virtually all but $5 million held as a minimum reserve fund, with approximately $144 million in applications pending. Under the bill, $25 million would be earmarked for nurse-intern housing, and another $25 million for related facilities, out of the total $250 million provided.

In addition, I am introducing a second bill, for myself and my colleague, the junior Senator from New York [Mr. KEATING]—and I am sure my colleague will wish to add a word to what I am saying at this time—to amend the Housing Act of 1950 to raise to 12½ percent the maximum amount of college housing loans permitted to be made in any one State, as compared with the present provision of a 10 percent limit on total loan funds available to institutions desiring to build new dormitory or related facilities. New York State, which educates approximately 12½ percent of all U.S. college and graduate students, and California, which has more than 10 percent of such students, have both reached that 10 percent limitation on construction loan funds; and in the case of New York, the backlog of unmet loan applications is more than $10 million for college and student nurses' housing.

Mr. President, the proposed legislation—both the bill introduced by me alone and the bill introduced by me and my colleague [Mr. KEATING]—represents the absolute minimum which is required to meet an emergency situation as the college dormitory and student nurse-intern federally aided housing construction program is facing termination despite the fact that college enrollment figures are soaring and the need for additional facilities is growing still more rapidly.

By 1970, U.S. college and university enrollment is expected to almost double—expanding from today's 3,500,000 students to between 6 million and 7 million 10 years from now. Today there are 850,000 students living in college and university housing facilities. By 1970, 114 percent more—an additional 960,000 students—will seek accommodations on U.S. campuses. If we are to minimize what in any event may result in the severe straining of existing facilities for living and study space, cafeterias and student unions, this Federal college housing loan program cannot be scrapped. It must not be terminated now in this critical era when American youth must equip itself to meet the demands of U.S. world leadership and the challenge of the space age. Only new loan funds made available promptly can help keep college doors wide and properly open in the years ahead.

Since the beginning of this program in 1950, $1,175 million has been authorized of which $1,158,000 has been approved, committed, or reserved. To date, with repayments that have come in, $27 million is left; $22 million of that has been reserved for new housing facilities for nurses and interns, and the remaining $5 million represent a contingency fund. From 1955 through 1958, applications were processed at the rate of $250 million annually.

The popularity of this Federal college housing loan program has been enormous, and its desirability has been recognized by the administration, which asks for its continuance as part of a new program to be administered by the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare. I am cosponsor of the enabling legislation, but at the same time, stopgap legislation is urgently required to meet the tremendous backlog of pending applications fast approaching $150 million.

At the same time, it is equally important that we scale the total amount of loan funds available to institutions in one State far more realistically than the present 10 percent limitation permits. Right now, New York colleges and universities educate one student out of every nine attending such institutions in the United States, although our State is eligible to receive only $1 out of every 10. Thus, this limitation does not take into account the heavier-than-average higher education load carried by New York institutions, nor does it allow for the fact that construction costs for the type of facilities provided under the program run 20 percent higher in my State, figuring out to $5,700 per student rather than the $4,700 average per student in the United States. To me, these are conclusive facts in support of the second bill introduced today to increase the 10 percent limit to 12½ percent, as is presently the case with authorizations under the Federal urban renewal program.

Among the outstanding New York educational institutions with applications pending for housing loans but for which there is no available money right now are Albany Law School and Albany Medical College, Ithaca College, Syracuse University, Cazenovia Junior College, Julliard School of Music, New York City, Keuka College, Montefiore Hospital of the Bronx, and Maimonides Hospital of Brooklyn. Others who have advised me about the value of this program and urged support for its continuance include: Rosary Hill College in Buffalo, the University of the State of New York, Long Island University, Brooklyn College, and Cornell University. These institutions and scores more in other parts of the country will benefit substantially if Congress moves swiftly to bolster through new authorization the all-important college housing and nurse-intern housing program.

Obviously, the allocation which is made now, of only 10 percent to each State, is inadequate to enable us to do the job which, in the highest national interest, must be done.

Mr. President, I introduce the two bills, for appropriate reference, and I ask unanimous consent that the bills may be printed as a part of my remarks.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bills will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the bills will be printed in the RECORD.

The bills, introduced by Mr. JAVITS, were received, read twice by their titles, referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

By Mr. JAVITS:

S. 2911. A bill to amend the Housing Act of 1950 to authorize additional loans for college housing, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 401(d) of the Housing Act of 1950 is amended as follows.

(a) By striking out "$1,175,000,000" and inserting in lieu thereof "$1,425,000,000";

(b) By striking out "$125,000,000" in the first proviso relating to other educational facilities and inserting in lieu thereof "$150,000,000"; and

(c) By striking out "$50,000,000" in the second proviso relating to hospitals and inserting in lieu thereof "$75,000,000".

By Mr. JAVITS (for himself and Mr. KEATING):

S. 2912. A bill to amend the Housing Act of 1950 with respect to the amount of loans permitted to be made in any State.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, that section 403 of the Housing Act of 1950 is amended by striking out "10" and inserting in lieu thereof "12½".

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, I am delighted to cosponsor the bill just introduced by my colleague, the senior Senator from New York [Mr. JAVITS] to amend section 403 of the Housing Act of 1950, as amended, by providing that the existing limitation on the proportion of Federal college housing loan funds available to higher educational institutions within any one State be increased from 10 percent to 12.5 percent.

This proposal was prompted by the fact that current provisions of the Housing Act of 1950 prevent my own State of New York from receiving its fair share of Federal college housing grant-in-aid funds.

Mr. President, I have spoken many times on the overall difficulties experienced by my State as a consequence of its not getting a fair share of total Federal grant-in-aid funds. To illustrate the dilemma which New York faces, the taxpayers of New York State pay $2.95 in taxes to the Federal Government for every dollar received in aid from Uncle Sam. I am extremely interested in seeing positive and direct action taken to give my State a fairer break. The bill which Senator JAVITS and I have introduced today constitutes a concrete step by which fairer treatment can be accorded to my State and other States which are similarly "shortchanged" by the Federal Government.

In the field of higher education, the most recent enrollment figures reported by the U.S. Office of Education show that fall 1959 degree-credit enrollment in New York institutions of higher education exceeds 10 percent of the total enrollment figure for the Continental United States. In other words, it is clear that under present law New York is not eligible to receive its equitable share of Federal college housing loan funds because of the legal limitation on the amount which may be borrowed for dormitories by higher educational institutions within any one State.

There are now more than 120 public and private institutions of higher education in my State. Mr. Charles A. Brind, counsel to the University of the State of New York, has recently informed me that "in the light of the need of New York State—which has over 100 colleges, plus 19 units of the State University—the amount of money allocated to New York State and available to these institutions, with the 10 percent limitation, is exceedingly low."

Mr. President, projections of future university growth in New York State make it absolutely clear that the existing 10 percent limitation is not reasonable. Tremendous growth is anticipated in college and university enrollments in New York State. A recent study—"Needs and Facilities in Higher Education in New York State," published by the University of the State of New York and the State department of education in 1957—indicates that undergraduate enrollments in 4-year colleges alone will increase from the 141,000 in 1955 to a predicted 297,000 in 1970. Moreover, estimates reported by the President's Committee on Education Beyond the High School show that New York is one of nine States which will experience a 50- to 75-percent increase in its college age population between 1958 and 1973.

Mr. President, the 10-percent limit was adopted in 1950. It is clear that the steady rise in the number of students in institutions of higher education in my State has outgrown this 10-year-old provision in the law. In this context, I urge that the Congress consider this proposed amendment favorably because it would insure an equitable share of loan funds to larger States, especially those such as New York State in which expanding institutions of higher education are confronted with tremendous problems in the way of providing adequate college housing.

INSURANCE OF OLDER CITIZENS AGAINST HOSPITAL AND NURSING COSTS

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill to amend the Social Security Act and the Internal Revenue Code so as to provide insurance for our older citizens against the burdens imposed by hospital and nursing costs.

In recent years there has been a dramatic change in the age distribution and composition of our population. In 1900, influenza, pneumonia, tuberculosis, and typhoid still took a high toll. Public sanitation was rare, nutrition was inadequate, and the medical science we know today was in its infancy. A baby girl born in the United States could expect to live 48 years. Today she can expect to live to the age of 73.

Today almost 10 percent of our population—16 million people—are over the age of 65. Forty percent of these are over 75—and the proportion of our population in these older age brackets continues to grow at an accelerated rate.

Only 3 million of these people are employed. And despite many efforts to modernize and improve our social security system—efforts we have reason to be proud of—the average social security benefit is still only $72 a month. If we include income from every source available, it reaches less than $20 a week for three out of every five of these citizens. Four out of five receive less than $40 per week.

No matter how they retrench—no matter how many comforts they had learned to expect which they do without—no matter how many expenses they reduce, it is obvious that the later years of too many of our older citizens will be attended by hardship. The hardship becomes despair when they are faced with illness and the necessity for meeting medical expenses. No matter how drastically their standard of living is cut back they still cannot reduce the demand for essential health care. Ironically, it is just when their income is lowest that their medical expenses become highest. They are most threatened by the costs of serious illness when their earning capacity is exhausted.

This is the time of life when they are most susceptible to chronic illness and long-term crippling and disabling diseases. In recent years, over 600,000 people age 65 or more died annually of arteriosclerosis, hypertension and related cardiovascular diseases. Each year over 135,000 people over 65 are the victims of cancer. Each year some 300,000 are totally disabled as a result of rheumatic diseases.

This is the time of life when the need for health care rises sharply. Even excluding those who are in institutions, people over 65 suffer twice as frequently from chronic sickness as those under 65—they spend 2½ times as many days restricted to their beds—they are forced to limit their activities due to illness six times as often. The magnitude of this problem and the gravity of its effect is indicated by the fact that although their average income is less than $1,000 per year, one out of six spends over $500 for medical care.

A person who has left the active labor force no longer has the benefit of wage increases which can help keep pace with the cost of living. But he still must feel the effect of these increases. Of all these costs, the one which has soared highest, the one which is most inflexible, and the one over which we have the least control is the cost of medical care. In the third quarter of 1959 the composite cost of living was 25 percent above the 1947–49 base period. Medical care, however, was up 52 percent. And hospital room rates were up 110 percent.

Mr. President, the treatment of its older citizens is said by anthropologists to be one of the most basic tests of how civilized a society or nation has become. The bill I offer should help us pass that test.

Although social security legislation, private pension plans, the Hill-Burton Hospital Construction Act, and the recently enacted Federal housing program have all taken tentative steps toward honoring our obligations, we owe our older citizens much more. This bill would help them meet their most serious health needs.

Proposals to provide health benefits for our older citizens have been before us since 1942. We are particularly indebted to Representative AIME FORAND, who has long led the battle for such legislation. In 1958, and again last year, hearings were held in the other body upon the bill he introduced.

Two years ago I asked the staff of the Subcommittee on Labor of the Senate Labor and Public Welfare Committee to undertake a comprehensive study of the problems and needs of our older citizens. Last year a special subcommittee of the Labor and Public Welfare Committee, under the able leadership of the distinguished senior Senator from Michigan, and on which I served as vice chairman, held hearings and will soon file a report dealing with these matters.

But there are obvious deficiencies in our provision for medical assistance to our older citizens that need not wait for a formal report. The hearings demonstrated—although no demonstration was needed—that we have too long ignored the grave medical problems of our older citizens. Studies and commissions and White House conferences will not alleviate this hardship or calm this distress.

The bill I introduce utilizes a mechanism already available. It will assure complete coverage. It permits us to take advantage of experience we have already acquired in providing benefits to our older citizens. It requires no appropriation from the General Treasury and it permits each beneficiary to maintain his self-respect. The program will be financed on the basis of sound insurance principles, under which the beneficiaries of the program pay for it themselves.

The bill does not impose an intolerable financial burden upon anyone and it does not intrude Government regulation upon the private relationship between doctor and patient.

In return for premiums in the form of slightly increased contribution rates under the Social Security Act the bill gives our older citizens the assurance that:

First. They may have up to 90 days of hospital care per year.

Second. In addition, or in place of hospital care, they will be entitled to the skilled services of a nurse, either in a nursing home or in their own home. The combined hospitalization, nursing home, and home nursing service could equal 120 days of combined care. However, 1½ days of nursing home service would count as only 1 day of "combined care" and two home nursing visits would count as only 1 day of "combined care." This should relieve the pressure upon our hospital facilities by offering an incentive for treatment at home.

Third. As outpatients, they will have available to them diagnostic services. Such necessary but expensive hospital services as X-rays, electrocardiograms, laboratory tests, and other diagnostic procedures will be available without the necessity for hospitalization. This, too, should help reduce the temptation to hospitalization.

Fourth. If disabled, they would also be covered.

The procedure for seeking these benefits is patterned after that followed under the many voluntary health insurance plans now in effect. An eligibile person would be admitted to the hospital or nursing home or receive home care or diagnostic benefits by direction of his physician. Payments would be made from the Social Security Trust Fund, and the program would be administered by the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare. In effect, every member of the social security system would receive paid-up health insurance for life in return for a small increase in his contribution rates.

Few people deny the urgency of the need for this medical care. But there are some who prefer to rely upon voluntary health insurance policies. Unfortunately, voluntary health insurance has not and cannot do the job. Although our insurance companies have made a mighty effort, and have enrolled an impressive number of Americans, it is extremely unlikely that they can reach our older citizens. The difficulties which confront both the insurance companies and our older citizens have proved insurmountable. At one time the insurance companies feared that the cost of benefits to our older citizens would be prohibitive, and they both restricted the type of risk and set the premium at high levels. Since then substantial progress has been made. However, it remains a basic economic fact that no program for health insurance for the aged can be effective unless:

First. All persons at all age levels are enrolled so that the premiums can be paid during the long period of youthful good health.

Second. The benefits are sufficient to pay the entire cost of hospitalization and nursing services.

Third. There is some provision for diagnostic services to encourage preventive medicine.

No voluntary health insurance plan can accomplish these objectives.

The very competition between insurance companies tends to either exclude older people or limit their protection. If benefits are restricted the very purpose of the insurance is defeated.

There are those who suggest that we start by building up the rights of those who are still relatively young and abandon those who are already in the older categories. This heartless doctrine is offensive to both the basic premise of our social security system and our status as a great democratic country. The suggestion that each person should assume his own responsibility for his later years was answered poignantly by one witness during the hearings, who pointed out that "it is impossible for a wage earner to put away enough in a lifetime to pay for 6 months in a hospital."

I agree that we must maintain the highest standards of family responsibility and personal thrift. But I am concerned about the futility of imposing on any person or any family an unwarranted, unpredictable, and often unmanageable burden that could easily be borne by an insurance arrangement—insurance that is spread over the working lifetime of each individual.

Mr. President, the time is long past when there was any question about the need for this legislation. This bill addresses itself to a limited and modest objective. It is practical and the aged and disabled people of our Nation have a right to expect its enactment.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there be printed in the RECORD a section-by-section analysis of the bill.

There being no objection, the analysis was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SECTION-BY-SECTION ANALYSIS OF KENNEDY BILL TO PROVIDE INSURANCE AGAINST COSTS OF HOSPITAL AND NURSING CARE

I. The bill contains findings of fact and a declaration of purpose: Congress finds that the present old-age and survivors insurance benefits are inadequate for our older citizens and that it is in the interest of the general welfare for financial burdens resulting from hospitalization and nursing services of our older citizens to be relieved through old-age and survivors insurance.

II. Eligibility for insurance: Any person is eligible for hospitalization and nursing insurance who is entitled to monthly benefits under the Federal old-age and survivors insurance program, including those entitled to disability benefits.

III. Payments for hospital services are limited to the first 90 days of hospitalization in any 12-month period. Payments for nursing home or home nursing services are made if the individual is transferred to the nursing home or to his home from the hospital, or from the nursing home to his home, and if the services are for an illness or condition associated with that for which he received hospital services. The combined hospitalization, nursing home, and home nursing services cannot exceed 120 days. However, 1½ days of nursing home service would be counted as 1 day for this purpose, and two home nursing visits are counted as 1 day for this purpose.

IV. Hospital services are defined to include drugs and appliances furnished by the hospital, laboratory services, ambulance services, use of operating room, staff services, bed and board.

V. Nursing home services include nursing care, related medical and personal services, and bed and board in a home operated in connection with the hospital or in which nursing care and medical care are prescribed by or performed under the direction of persons licensed to practice medicine in the State.

VI. Home nursing service is defined to mean professional nursing care furnished by a community-sponsored nursing service, under the direction of a doctor, or practical nurses under the direction of a community-sponsored nursing agency.

VII. Diagnostic outpatient services mean hospital services furnished to an individual as an outpatient for a diagnosis of illness or injury.

VIII. Every person entitled to benefits under the act is given completely free choice of the hospital, nursing home, home nursing, or diagnostic outpatient hospital service he chooses.

IX. Agreements may be made between any hospital, nursing home or nursing agency and the Federal old-age and survivors insurance trust fund for providing these services. The amount of payments under the agreement is determined on the basis of the reasonable cost incurred or, in the case of a nursing agency, the fee for all patients receiving like services. The agreement shall preclude the hospital, nursing home or nursing agency from requiring additional payments from individuals.

X. No supervision or control over details of the administration or operation, or over the selection, tenure or compensation of personnel shall be exercised by the Government.

XI. All information concerning an individual obtained from him by any physician, dentist, nurse, hospital, nursing home, or any other person, is confidential. Any violation of this provision is a misdemeanor punishable by fine or imprisonment, or both.

XII. Provision is made for not duplicating any of the benefits under this act and benefits received under workmen's compensation.

XIII. In administering this act, the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare shall establish a National Advisory Health Council consisting of the Commissioner of Social Security and eight others. Four of the eight shall be from fields pertaining to hospitals and health activities and the other four shall represent consumers. This Council shall advise the Secretary in the administration of the act.

XIV. In carrying out the act, the Secretary is authorized to utilize the services of private nonprofit organizations which either represent qualified providers of hospital or nursing services or operate voluntary insurance plans.

XV. The Internal Revenue Code is amended to provide for an increase in the taxes of self-employed individuals of three-eighths of 1 percent, an increase in taxes upon employees of one-fourth of 1 percent, and an increase upon the taxes of employers of one-fourth of 1 percent of wages.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 2915) to amend the Social Security Act and the Internal Revenue Code so as to provide insurance against the costs of hospital, nursing home, home nursing service and diagnostic outpatient hospital services for persons eligible for old-age, survivors and disability insurance benefits and for other purposes, introduced by Mr. KENNEDY (for himself and Mr. HART), was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KENNEDY. I yield.

Mr. JAVITS. Is this the Forand bill?

Mr. KENNEDY. No. This bill deals with the problem of medical care for the aged. It is somewhat different from the Forand bill.

Mr. JAVITS. I thank the Senator.

SIMPLIFICATION OF ADMEASUREMENT OF SMALL VESSELS

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, by request, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill to simplify the admeasurement of small vessels. I ask unanimous consent that a letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, requesting this proposed legislation, be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the letter will be printed in the RECORD.

The bill (S. 2916) to simplify the admeasurement of small vessels, introduced by Mr. MAGNUSON, by request, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

The letter presented by Mr. MAGNUSON is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE TREASURY,
January 19, 1960.

The PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE.

SIR: There is transmitted herewith a proposed bill "to simplify the admeasurement of small vessels, and for other purposes."

The bill is the result of a study conducted jointly by the Bureau of Customs and the U.S. Coast Guard. It would amend section 4153 of the Revised Statutes and related laws so as to substitute for the present complicated and costly method of tonnage measurement a system which permits the assignment of tonnages from a table on the basis of overall length and breadth in the case of self-propelled vessels of under 500 gross tons and non-self-propelled vessels of less than 1,000 gross tons.

Enactment of the bill is essential to eliminate the highly artificial and detailed admeasurement of small vessels which encourages distortion of tonnage outturns to such an extent that in many cases, gross tonnage bears little relation to the concept of vessel size which that tonnage is intended to represent under the vessel safety laws. The legislation also will benefit small vessel owners by removing the present restrictions on vessel design and, for the first time, permit them to order a vessel built to the needs of a particular trade or service on the basis of a predetermined, nontechnical assignment of tonnage.

Of material benefit to the Customs Service is the anticipated annual savings of $175,000 now expended for admeasurement services for which the Government receives no reimbursement or equivalent tax return.

A memorandum is attached setting forth the details of the proposed bill and the conditions it is intended to correct.

It will be appreciated if you will lay the draft bill before the Senate. A similar proposal has been transmitted to the House of Representatives.

The Department has been advised by the Bureau of the Budget that there is no objection to the submission of this proposed legislation to the Congress.

Very truly yours,

A. GILMORE FLUES,
Acting Secretary of the Treasury.

AMENDMENT OF CODE RELATING TO DEFINITION OF THE TERM "VETERANS' ADMINISTRATION FACILITIES"—ADDITIONAL COSPONSOR OF BILL

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. President, on June 17, 1959, on behalf of myself and the junior Senator from Alaska [Mr. GRUENING], I introduced a bill (S. 2201) to amend section 601 of title 33, United States Code, with respect to the definition of the term "Veterans' Administration facilities." I ask unanimous consent that the name of the junior Senator from Hawaii [Mr. LONG] be added as a cosponsor of this bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

STATEMENT BY HON. J. EDGAR HOOVER CONCERNING 17TH NATIONAL CONVENTION OF COMMUNIST PARTY, U.S.A. (S. DOC. NO. 80)

Mr. DODD. Mr. President, I should like to draw the attention of the Senate to Mr. J. Edgar Hoover's recent statement concerning the 17th National Convention of the Communist Party, U.S.A. which was held in New York City from December 10 to 13, 1959. Mr. Hoover's evaluation was submitted to the Senate Subcommittee to Investigate the Administration of the Internal Security Act and Other Internal Security Laws.

Of particular significance, I feel, is Mr. Hoover's finding—that the recent visit of Premier Khrushchev to the United States has done much to create an atmosphere favorable to communism among Americans. In one convention discussion, for example, it was stated that, as a result of Khrushchev's visit, the American people have open minds toward socialism.

Mr. Hoover told the subcommittee that "the 17th national convention is being hailed by the Communists themselves as a great milestone in the party's history in the United States." He said that, thanks to the new infusion of morale stemming from Mr. Khrushchev's visit, factional divisions had been eliminated and the party had been converted into a solidly unified force—a "hard-hitting mobile weapon against free American Government"—under the veteran Moscow Communist, Gus Hall.

Mr. President, I feel that Mr. J. Edgar Hoover's statement deserves the widest possible readership, and particularly by American legislators and those responsible for the conduct of our foreign policy.

I ask unanimous consent that Mr. Hoover's statement be printed as a Senate document.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Connecticut? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

COLORADO RIVER STORAGE PROJECT AND PARTICIPATING PROJECTS (S. DOC. NO. 79)

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. President, on January 5, 1960, the Assistant Secretary of the Interior, Hon. Fred G. Aandahl, transmitted to the President of the Senate the third annual report of the Department on the status of the Colorado River storage project and participating projects as required by section 6 of the authorizing act of April 11, 1956 (70 Stat. 105). I request unanimous consent that the letter and accompanying report be printed as a Senate document, together with my statement to the Senate today in connection with the Colorado River storage project status and program, especially with respect to the proposed power marketing area, the cost of power, and the planning for the backbone power transmission system with particular recognition of the interests of the power preference customers under the reclamation law and coordination of Colorado River and power operations.

I also request unanimous consent that a report to the Congress by the Comptroller General on his audit of the upper Colorado River basin water resources development program, Bureau of Reclamation, Department of the Interior, fiscal years 1957–59, together with illustrations, be printed as an appendix to the third annual report of the Interior Department.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from New Mexico? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. President, for the information of the Senate, I desire to make a statement supplementing my request to have the third annual report of the Department of the Interior on the Colorado River storage project printed as a Senate document. These annual reports are required by the authorizing act. The first annual report was printed as Senate Document No. 77, 85th Congress. A supplement was printed as Senate Document No. 96. These reports dealt primarily with the hydrologic basis for financial and operating studies. The second annual report was printed as Senate Document No. 8, 86th Congress.

Before calling attention to salient features of the third annual report, which will become Senate Document No. 79, 86th Congress, 2d session, I present to the Senate a phase of a problem relating to the Colorado storage project, which is vital to the financial and economic phases of the development.

URGENCY OF SETTING UP POWER MARKETING AREA

This point relates to the urgency for the Secretary of the Interior to define the power marketing area for the Colorado River storage project. Preliminary discussions of backbone transmission line layouts have been held by the Bureau of Reclamation with the Upper Colorado Preference Customers Committee, representing electric cooperatives, REA's, municipalities and other nonprofit power users in New Mexico, Colorado, Utah, Wyoming, and Arizona.

Mr. Norton Davis, of my State of New Mexico, is a leader of this organization and has brought the subject to my attention.

Since the nonprofit power organizations will have preference in the purchase of power from the producing units of the project, it is imperative that they know Interior's ideas as to the marketing area, and the cost of power from the upper Colorado system, as well as coordination of river and power operations in the upper and lower basins.

The Bureau of Reclamation has submitted a preliminary outline of a backbone transmission line that would link the power-producing units of Glen Canyon, Flaming Gorge, and Curecanti and provide for interconnections with the Davis Dam-Parker-Davis Dam system in the lower Colorado area. Just how the system envisaged by Reclamation's preliminary outline would meet the needs of the preference customers over a period of 20 years or more will depend on the marketing area which we are urging the Secretary of the Interior to define without delay. Indications are the preference customers will be able to substantiate claims to all firm power to be produced at the upper Colorado project units.

The cost of the power at the bus bar and load centers, based on allocations of construction outlays attributable to this purpose, is, of course, a consideration of equal importance.

Following the presentation of Reclamation's preliminary outline the major privately owned utilities in the area submitted a comprehensive outline of a power transmission grid that would link their systems with the upper Colorado project powerplants. This grid would extend through the States of Arizona, Utah, New Mexico, Colorado, and Wyoming and be linked with systems in Idaho and Montana. It also contemplates interconnection with the potential Four Corners coal-fired power development by the Arizona Public Service Co. and perhaps other utilities on the Navajo Indian Reservation in New Mexico and Arizona.

The cost of power at the bus bars of the major producing plants of the Colorado River storage system—Glen Canyon, Flaming Gorge and Curecanti—is quite important. The transmission costs likewise are a vital consideration, not only to the Government but to the preference customers and the consumers.

Overall, the cost of power should cover returns adequate to amortize the Federal investment. When the costs are calculated, the net revenues over and above operating and maintenance costs, will provide funds as aid to irrigation in the development of the participating projects in the upper Colorado area.

I am writing the Secretary of the Interior urging that he expedite his decision fixing the marketing area of the upper Colorado River power system, as well as forecasts of the cost of power at the bus bar and delivered at load centers. The federally owned backbone transmission grid is authorized by the Upper Colorado River Project Act and was contemplated by the Congress when the measure was passed.

Full protection must be given requirements of preference power customers under the reclamation law. The financial aspects attendant on the Federal transmission grid as an additional revenue producer to aid irrigation in the Upper Basin is, of course, a vital consideration to those of us who have aided in sponsoring the development.

ANALYSIS OF THIRD ANNUAL REPORT

I request unanimous consent to include in my remarks an analysis of that part of the President's budget relating to the Colorado River storage project and of the third annual report of the Secretary of the Interior on the project, as required by law.

There being no objection, the analysis was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Construction on Glen Canyon Dam, the key structure of the Colorado River project, was halted on July 6, 1959, by a strike which continued until January 4, 1960, when an agreement permitted the recall of workers. The prime contractor for the dam construction was ahead of schedule when the strike was called, but the cessation of work absorbed all of the time leeway and more. It is the hope of the supporters of the project that the lost time may be made up so that Glen Canyon Dam, with its 900,000 kilowatt powerplant will be in operation on schedule. The program for filling Glen Canyon Reservoir is yet to be finally resolved without interfering with power production at Hoover and other downstream installations.

We urge the Secretary of the Interior to keep close tabs on the Glen Canyon construction and related schedules to insure completion of the installation as planned.

The report shows that the construction of Flaming Gorge Dam, in Utah, is behind schedule, but that work on Navajo Dam, in New Mexico, is slightly ahead of schedule.

Preliminary construction started on the Paonia participating project in Colorado, and a contract for the construction of Stanaker Dam, Vernal Unit, Utah, was awarded. Definite plan reports were completed on Seedskadee (Wyo.), and South Fork (Colo.) participating units. The report avoids any mention of the Hammond project, New Mexico, for which initial construction funds were appropriated for fiscal year 1960. The 1961 budget provides $1,280,000 for the Hammond project.

BUDGET PROGRAM FOR FISCAL YEAR 1961

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. President, the President's budget for fiscal year 1961 provides a total of $89,600,000—including an unobligated balance of $18 million—for the Colorado River storage project in fiscal year 1961, including two new starts—Curecanti, Colo., storage unit and Florida participating project. If approved by the Congress, this amount will bring the total appropriations for the project to $189,821,000, or about 25 percent of the authorized appropriations for construction of $760 million.

The new construction funds in the fiscal year 1961 budget, in addition to $1,280,000 for the Hammond project in New Mexico, included: $12 million for the Navajo Dam unit; $62,690,000 for Glen Canyon; $18,411,673 for Flaming Gorge; $536,287 for transmission line studies; $970,098 for advance planning of participating units; $2,287,000 for the Vernal unit, Utah; $1,017,956 for the Florida project, Colorado; $1,040,536 for the Paonia project, Colorado; $3,975,956 for Seedskade, Wyo.; $1,444,000 for Smith Fork project, Colorado; and $1,863,626 for Curecanti Dam, Colo., a new start.

Included in the allocation to Glen Canyon construction is $3,500,000 for work to protect Rainbow Bridge National Monument.

Those of us in the Senate who have supported the Colorado River storage project trust the Secretary of the Interior and the Bureau of Reclamation will present justifications to the Appropriations Committees which will support the budget recommendations.

REPORT OF COMPTROLLER GENERAL

I also asked unanimous consent that as an appendix to the third annual report of the Secretary of the Interior, there be printed a report to the Congress by the Comptroller General of his audit of the Upper Colorado River Basin water resources development program, Bureau of Reclamation, Department of the Interior, fiscal years 1957–59. The Comptroller General's report presents many valuable observations and comments on the Upper Colorado River development and attendant problems that speak for themselves. The comments of the Federal Power Commission included in the Comptroller General's report are especially pertinent in the light of the river operations and related power phases of the Upper Colorado River development and its relation to the Lower Colorado River operations.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there further morning business?

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further proceedings under the quorum call be dispensed with.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider executive business.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES REFERRED

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate messages from the President of the United States submitting sundry nominations, which were referred to the appropriate committees.

(For nominations this day received, see the end of Senate proceedings.)

EXECUTIVE REPORTS OF A COMMITTEE

The following favorable reports of nominations were submitted:

By Mr. FULBRIGHT, from the Committee on Foreign Relations:

Robert Cutler, of Massachusetts, to be an Executive Director of the Inter-American Development Bank;

Livingston T. Merchant, of the District of Columbia, to be Under Secretary of State for Political Affairs;

Foy D. Kohler, of Ohio, a Foreign Service officer of the class of career minister, to be an Assistant Secretary of State;

Tyler Thompson, of Maine, a Foreign Service officer of the class of career minister, to be Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary to Iceland;

G. Frederick Reinhardt, of California, a Foreign Service officer of class 1, to be Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary to the United Arab Republic, and to serve concurrently and without additional compensation as Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary to the Kingdom of Yemen;

Ward P. Allen, and sundry other persons, for appointment and promotion in the foreign and diplomatic service; and Dennis A. Fitzgerald, of Maryland, to be Deputy Director for Operations of the International Cooperation Administration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further reports of committees, the nominations on the executive calendar will be stated.

SMALL BUSINESS ADMINISTRATION

The Chief Clerk read the nomination of Philip McCallum to be Administrator of the Small Business Administration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

DEPARTMENT OF DEFENSE

The Chief Clerk read the nomination of Thomas Sovereign Gates, Jr., to be Secretary of Defense.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, this nomination was reported unanimously by the Armed Services Committee. After it was on the calendar, one Senator asked that it be held up until he could be present and until he could get certain information he desired. The Senator did not communicate with me, because I was not in town, but he has communicated with the staff, and has told them he has received the information he desired, and that it is agreeable to him to have the Gates nomination considered.

I know Mr. Gates, and have respect and regard for him, and wish him well in this new assignment, and so informed him prior to the consideration of the nomination by the Armed Services Committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

The Chief Clerk read the nomination of James H. Douglas to be Deputy Secretary of Defense.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I congratulate the President on the elevation of Mr. Douglas to the position of Deputy Secretary of Defense. He had a distinguished record as Secretary of the Air Force. I am delighted he has agreed to accept the increased responsibility of Deputy Secretary of Defense.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

The Chief Clerk read the nomination of Franklin B. Lincoln, Jr., to be an Assistant Secretary of Defense.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I desire to say, with respect to all these nominations, I hold the nominees in high esteem. I concur in the estimate of the majority leader as to their talent, capacity, and dedication to public service.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

DEPARTMENT OF THE AIR FORCE

The Chief Clerk read the nomination of Dudley C. Sharp to be Secretary of the Air Force.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, some representations were made concerning Mr. Sharp's nomination, which we carefully considered. Some questions were raised. The Armed Services Committee gave careful thought to the qualifications of Mr. Sharp, and reported the nomination favorably, and I am pleased the Senate is about to act on his nomination.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

APPOINTMENTS IN THE ARMY

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read sundry appointments in the Army.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the nominations for appointments in the Army be considered en bloc.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the nominations are considered en bloc; and, without objection, they are confirmed.

TEMPORARY APPOINTMENT IN THE ARMY

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read sundry nominations for temporary appointment in the Army.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask that those nominations be considered en bloc.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the nominations are considered en bloc; and, without objection, they are confirmed.

IN THE AIR FORCE

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read sundry nominations in the Air Force.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask that the nominations be considered en bloc.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the nominations are considered en bloc; and, without objection, they are confirmed.

IN THE NAVY

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read sundry nominations in the Navy.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I make the same request.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the nominations are considered en bloc; and, without objection, they are confirmed.

DEPARTMENT OF THE NAVY

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read sundry nominations in the Department of the Navy.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I make the same request.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the nominations are considered en bloc; and, without objection, they are confirmed.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read sundry nominations of line officers in the Navy.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask that the nominations be considered en bloc.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the nominations are considered en bloc; and, without objection, they are confirmed.

MARINE CORPS

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read sundry nominations in the Marine Corps.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I make the same request.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the nominations are considered en bloc; and, without objection, they are confirmed.

QUARTERMASTER GENERAL OF THE MARINE CORPS

The Chief Clerk read the nomination of Maj. Gen. Chester R. Allen, to be Quartermaster General of the Marine Corps.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

MARINE CORPS

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read sundry nominations in the Marine Corps.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I make the same request.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the nominations are considered en bloc; and, without objection, they are confirmed.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read sundry nominations in the Post Office Department.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President I make the same request.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the nominations are considered en bloc; and, without objection, they are confirmed.

IN THE AIR FORCE

The Chief Clerk read the nomination of Joseph V. Charyk to be Under Secretary of the Air Force.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

NOMINATIONS PLACED ON THE VICE PRESIDENT'S DESK

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read nominations in the Army and the Air Force placed on the Vice President's desk.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that those nominations be confirmed en bloc.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the nominations are considered en bloc; and, without objection, they are confirmed.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask that the President be immediately notified of all nominations confirmed today.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the President will be notified forthwith.

LEGISLATIVE SESSION

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I move that the Senate resume the consideration of legislative business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate resumed the consideration of legislative business.

GIFT TO SYRACUSE UNIVERSITY BY MR. SAMUEL I. NEWHOUSE

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I should like to invite the attention of my colleagues to a very extraordinary example of public-spirited action on the part of a private citizen in the State of New York. I bring this matter to the attention of my colleagues in connection with the need for Federal loans to help higher education meet the challenges of our times. I believe it is most pertinent to point out that we in New York State are proud to have great, public-spirited private citizens who are also contributing mightily to this effort.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point in my remarks two articles from the New York Times of today, describing the magnificent gift made to Syracuse University by Mr. Samuel I. Newhouse, a leading American newspaper publisher and the owner of radio and TV stations, who himself was the son of a Russian immigrant family.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SYRACUSE U. GETS JOURNALISM FUND—S. I. NEWHOUSE CONTRIBUTES $2 MILLION TO BUILD CENTER OF COMMUNICATIONS ARTS

Syracuse University disclosed plans yesterday to establish what it described as the world's largest center for the study of journalism, television and other media of mass communication.

The education and research center will be founded with an initial gift of $2 million from Samuel I. Newhouse, the publisher, and his wife. It will be on an 8-acre communications quadrangle adjoining Syracuse's main campus.

"Whatever funds are necessary to complete the center will be provided," Mr. Newhouse said in a statement at his home, 730 Park Avenue.

Mr. Newhouse, who is 64 years old, the owner of 14 newspapers, Condé Nast Publications, and a number of television and radio stations, said he hoped to see the center, which will bear his name, completed within his lifetime.

In any event, Mr. Newhouse added, the center will be the first project of a philanthropic foundation that he and Mrs. Newhouse established in 1935. "Upon my death, the foundation will receive 90 percent of my estate, well in excess of $100 million," Mr. Newhouse said.

SCHOOL TO BE EXPANDED

Half of the center's initial endowment will be used for the construction and operation of the first unit for a school of journalism building and associated activities. This will represent an expansion of the university's 25-year-old school of journalism, which is headed by Dean Wesley Clark.

The other half will be used to finance instructional programs and provide fellowships for graduate work, research in mass media and opportunities for midcareer study by practicing professionals.

Dr. William P. Tolley, the university's chancellor, said:

"While the first unit will provide facilities for the school of journalism, other buildings will be added subsequently for educational television and the whole complex of communications programs in radio-television, audio-visual education, speech, reading, information services, communications research and scholarly publishing.

"The combination of these facilities and the availability of funds for their operation will permit the center to achieve an interdisciplinary and coordinated approach to education and research in the several mass media of far-reaching potential importance.

NEW APPROACH SEEN

"By encouraging the closest relations with the social sciences and humanities and strongly emphasizing graduate work and specialized services for the industry, we hope to develop educational programs in mass media which are fundamental, philosophic and public policy oriented than the current education efforts in these fields."

The chancellor added: "We see in the Newhouse Communications Center a new approach to the study of mass media. The aim is to achieve more distinguished and more responsible academic programs in the communications field."

Frank P. Piskor, the university's academic vice president, will direct a year-long study of curriculum reorganization, staffing and the physical planning required for the expanded center.

The completion of plans and the actual construction of the journalism building is expected to take 2 years.

PUBLISHER WITH A CURE

The restless 5-foot, 3-inch son of Russian immigrant parents, Samuel I. Newhouse has amassed more than $150 million as a doctor of an uncommon sort.

For 38 years, Mr. Newhouse, who donated $2 million this week to Syracuse University, has specialized in buying financially sick newspapers and curing them, sometimes merging them. His medicine works, judging by his ownership of 14 newspapers, composing the third largest newspaper group in the country, and an assortment of magazines, television, and radio stations.

At the age of 64, looking youthful despite chronic insomnia, still bustling on a stopwatch schedule, Mr. Newhouse continues to shop for newspapers.

"I'm having too much fun to quit," he says.

The Newhouse formula for putting a newspaper ledger in the black consists of chopping costs hard and perking up advertising, circulation and mechanical operations while leaving editorial matters to local management.

PAPERS OPPOSED

In Syracuse, two of the Newhouse newspapers—the Herald-Journal, which has backed the Democratic Party, and the Post-Standard, of Republican sympathies—have attacked each other editorially. Mr. Newhouse is a registered Democrat.

In conversation, Mr. Newhouse displays a gentle manner. But in business, "S.I." (he says the I. is just an initial) can be tough. He has not backed off from long, costly labor strife when he has felt that a union was blocking the most efficient operation of one of his newspapers.

Born in New York City, eldest of eight children, Mr. Newhouse went to work at the age of 12 for a lawyer, Herman Lazarus, who sent the youngster on his career 4 years later with the order: "Sammy, go and look after the paper."

A self-styled "brash kid," the young Newhouse took over the ailing Bayonne Times, of which Mr. Lazarus was majority stockholder, and soon turned it into a profitable venture.

He studied in high school, passed his bar examination and, at the age of 26, bought his first newspaper, the Staten Island Advance, for $98,000. Thirty-three years later, he purchased the Birmingham News and its radio and television stations for $18,642,000.

In addition to his Syracuse newspapers, Mr. Newhouse also owns the Jersey Journal, the Newark Star-Ledger, the Long Island Press, the Long Island Star-Journal, the Harrisburg Patriot, and the News in Pennsylvania, the St. Louis Globe-Democrat, the Portland Oregonian, and the Huntsville Times in Alabama. Of his 14 newspapers, 12 were losing money when Mr. Newhouse bought them.

With his newspaper properties flourishing, Mr. Newhouse inquired about a year ago if the Curtis Publishing Co., the leader in the magazine field, was for sale. The answer was no, but Mr. Newhouse did not give up his intention to expand into magazine publishing.

OFFICE ON THE RUN

Mr. Newhouse and his wife, Mitzi, live in a 12-room Park Avenue duplex, but it is hard to say just where Mr. Newhouse's office is. Indefatigably on the move by train and air and in his telephone-equipped black Cadillac, Mr. Newhouse works mainly out of an old, battered briefcase.

He has something of an office at the Newark Star-Ledger, where he shares a pool secretary. Reputed to have an encyclopedic knowledge of the newspaper field, Mr. Newhouse is well known for quick telephoned decisions.

Mr. Newhouse says he has drawn up a will that will keep his newspaper empire intact after his death.

"I don't want any outside interest, such as some banker, dictating how the papers should be run," he declares.

SONS TO KEEP CONTROL

The newspapers will be bequeathed to a philanthropic foundation free of inheritance tax. Mr. Newhouse's two sons, Samuel I., Jr., 32 years old, who is in charge of the Newark Star-Ledger, and Donald Edward, 30, who heads the Jersey Journal, will retain control through the possession of the only voting stock. Mr. Newhouse said this stock would consist of only about 10 shares, and his sons will have to depend on their salaries for their income.

"They will have jobs; if they don't do their jobs well, they will be out of luck," he said.

Mr. Newhouse said he had earmarked 10 percent of his estate for his wife, whom he described as "my heavyweight." (She is 5 feet tall and weighs 74 pounds.) When Mrs. Newhouse married the publisher in 1924, she gave up her school studies in fashion designing. Last year, she was back in the fashion world. Her husband bought Condé Nast Publications, publisher of Vogue, Glamour, and other magazines, and then rounded out these new interests by acquiring Street & Smith Publications. Mrs. Newhouse is on the board of directors of Condé Nast.

Mr. Newhouse, who relaxes at the theater and opera, is off this week on another of his diversions. He will fly to Europe on a holiday and will join Mrs. Newhouse, who is viewing the Paris fashion collections with the Condé Nast editors.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, this kind of benefaction is something which our country uniquely enjoys. The gift of $2 million, plus additional funds as they may be needed, will be used to found the world's largest center for the study of journalism, television, and other forms of mass communication.

Mr. Newhouse, who I have the honor to say is a personal friend of mine, is thus donating the fruits of his labor in this field to the future education of young people wishing to enter the field of journalism, thereby assuring a higher quality of production of this essential element of American freedom, which forms a vital segment of every citizen's life.

Mr. President, I wish to point out that 90 percent of Mr. Newhouse's estate, according to this morning's announcement—his estate being a large one—will go to a foundation established by him, and the first project of this foundation will be the further support of the School of Journalism at Syracuse University.

Mr. Newhouse is thus acting in the finest American tradition of private philanthropy, which is now supporting higher education at the rate of more than $400 million a year, of which American corporations contribute more than one-third.

I should like to point out, Mr. President, that this amount of money barely begins to scratch the surface of the potential of the tax deductible sums of money which could be devoted to education, and I hope that corporations will take a lesson from Sam Newhouse and will themselves be more munificent, as they should be, in their support of higher education.

TRIBUTE TO GENERAL MacARTHUR ON HIS 80TH BIRTHDAY

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, today we observe the 80th birthday anniversary of one of the great soldier-citizens in our country's history, Gen. Douglas MacArthur.

In recognition of his 80th anniversary—which in General MacArthur indicates not age, but ever greater virility, strength, and courage—we, as a people, extend heartfelt congratulations and best wishes for many more years of health and service to his country, to which he has devoted his life.

In the annals of history, the outstanding deeds and services of Douglas MacArthur will be emblazoned also by the kind of indomitable spirit of leadership and commandership which have characterized the service of the great general.

We in Wisconsin are particularly proud to consider Douglas MacArthur a native son, among the many greats who have come from our Badger State.

As commander in chief of the Far East Command and supreme commander of the Allied Powers during World War II, General MacArthur and the forces under him, through their brilliant military operations, wrote inspiring chapters in the history of freedom and the liberation of people.

In civilian life, too, Douglas MacArthur has maintained his traditional, strong, independent mode of thinking and judgment that so characterized his military career.

Throughout his lifetime, General MacArthur has succeeded to many posts of high command, borne responsibilities that would have depressed the shoulders of lesser men, and received a great many honors, recognitions, distinctions, and awards for his outstanding services.

Of even greater value, however, is the undying gratitude in the hearts of people around the globe for the services of this great general in war and in peace.

I ask unanimous consent to have a brief résumé of the military career and accomplishments of General MacArthur, prepared by the Department of Defense, printed at this point in the body of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

GENERAL OF THE ARMY DOUGLAS MACARTHUR

Douglas MacArthur was born at Little Rock, Ark., January 26, 1880. He entered the U.S. Military Academy on June 13, 1899; graduated at the head of his class on June 11, 1903; and was commissioned a second lieutenant of engineers.

Shortly after he was graduated from the U.S. Military Academy, he sailed for the Philippine Islands. Here he engaged in engineering duties, including construction work at Guimaras Island until October 1904. Upon his return to the United States, he served at San Francisco with the California Debris Commission and as Assistant and Acting Chief Engineering Officer, Pacific Division, until October 1905. He was then ordered to Tokyo where he served as aide to his father, Lt. Gen. Arthur MacArthur, until September 15, 1906. While on this detail he was given a confidential mission which took him to many countries throughout Asia.

Upon his return to the United States, he was assigned to duty with the 2d Battalion of Engineers at Washington Barracks, D.C., and, in addition served as aide to President Theodore Roosevelt until August 1907. In February 1908, he was graduated from the Engineer School of Application. He then served as assistant engineer at Milwaukee, Wis. In April 1908, he joined Company K, 3d Battalion of Engineers at Fort Leavenworth, Kans. Here he served as company officer and also as an instructor in the Mounted Service School and the Army Service School. His 4-year tour at Fort Leavenworth was interrupted by periods of service at San Antonio, Tex., and in the Panama Canal Zone.

He was assigned to duty in the Office of the Chief of Engineers from 1912 until April 1913; as Superintendent of State, War and Navy Building, until November 1913; and as a member of the General Staff Corps until September 1917. From April until September 1914, he accompanied our expedition to Vera Cruz as a member of the general staff.

He conceived the idea of the Rainbow (42d) Division and as Chief of Staff helped direct its organization and training. He arrived with this division in France, October 1917, and served with it until August 1918, in the Vancouleure, La Franche, and Rolamont Training Areas; in the Luneville, Baccaret, Esperance-Souain Sectors; in the Champagne-Marne defensive; and in the Aisne-Marne Offensive. He commanded the 84th Infantry Brigade in the St. Mihiel, Essey and Pannes, Woevre, Meuse-Argonne, and Sedan Offensives. He then commanded the 42d Division until November 1918 and served in the Army of Occupation in Germany until 1919.

Upon his return to the United States, he served in the Office of the Chief of Staff, Washington, D.C., until June 1919. He was Superintendent of the U.S. Military Academy to June 1922, during which time he modernized the courses in military training.

From West Point he was sent to the Philippine Islands where he served at Headquarters Philippine Department until November 1922, in command of the District of Manila until June 1923, and in command of the 23d Infantry Brigade at Fort William McKinley to January 1925. Returning to the United States, he commanded the Fourth Corps Area, Atlanta, Ga., to July 1925; and the Third Corps Area, Baltimore, Md., to September 1928. He was selected President of the 1928 American Olympic team which he took to Amsterdam, Holland.

In 1928, he returned to the Philippines where he served 2 years as department commander. Upon his arrival in the United States in September 1930, he commanded the Ninth Corps Area, San Francisco, to October 1930, when he became Chief of Staff of the Army. Funds for national defense were at a low ebb. He first saved the skeleton Army from the economy wave, then modernized it. He set up the four Army and Corps Area organizations, and the GHQ Air Force. The basic blueprints of manpower procurement and industrial mobilization were developed under his direction.

Upon completion of his duty as Chief of Staff in October 1935, he was appointed Military Advisor to the Commonwealth Government of the Philippines. He inaugurated a long-range military training program financed by the Philippine Government. His 10-year plan was based upon universal military service.

As conditions in the Orient became critical, on July 26, 1941, he was designated Commanding General, U.S. Army Forces in the Far East. His command included the Philippine Department and the forces of the Commonwealth government which were inducted into the U.S. Army. When he took over this command the Philippine Department consisted of 18,000 American and Philippine Scout troops. There were ample Filipino reservists but their period of training had not been completed.

The stubborn defense of the Philippine-American forces on Bataan threw Japanese conquest plans out of gear and gained valuable time for the defense of Australia.

In March 1942, President Roosevelt ordered General MacArthur from Corregidor to Australia for the purpose of organizing and leading rescue forces back for the liberation of the Philippines. On April 18, 1942, he was made supreme commander of the Southwest Pacific area and a meager force of Australians and Americans.

With insufficient forces to justify aggressive action, he decided to defend Australia, first by blocking the Japanese advance in New Guinea and then by assuming the offensive. In heavy fighting the enemy was stopped at Gona in December 1942.

The next year General MacArthur assumed the offensive and pierced the strong enemy outer perimeter, between Wewak and Rabaul, by securing the Vitiaz Straits.

Seizure of the Admiralty Islands by a coup de main, February 29, 1944, marked the end of a great swinging move pivoting on New Guinea which had been the basic purpose of operations initiated June 29, 1943, when the Southwest Pacific and South Pacific areas were united under General MacArthur's command. Possession of the Admiralties relieved his supply line from the threat of flank attack from the east and enabled him to change the axis of his advance from north to west. In the Solomons and Bismarcks a strong enemy had been isolated and bypassed.

The way was now open for a shore-to-shore advance to the northwest along the land mass of New Guinea. On April 22, Hollandia, 500 miles west of the Vitiaz Straits, was occupied. The enemy was completely surprised; our losses negligible. The operation threw a loop of envelopment around the enemy's 18th Army which was dispersed along the New Guinea coast east of Hollandia. Throughout the campaign the enemy had lost 110,000 men and the remainder of his original strength of a quarter of a million was bypassed and became strategically unimportant. By the last of July 1944, General MacArthur had occupied key positions along the entire New Guinea coast with campaigns at Wadke, Sarmi, Biak, Noemfoor, Opmarai and Sansapor.

Occupation of Morotai, 300 miles south of the Philippines, on September 15, penetrated the Halmahera-Philippine line and imperiled enemy conquests in the East Indies by the threat of envelopment and air attack.

General MacArthur's landing on Leyte on October 20, pierced the center of the enemy's strategic defensive line which extended from Japan through Formosa, the Philippines, the East Indies, Singapore and Burma. Both enemy flanks thus created were vulnerable to envelopment to the north and to the south. The so-called Greater East Asia Co-Prosperity Sphere was cut in two and the conquered empire to the south occupied by half a million troops, was severed from Japan proper. Fully realizing the importance of Leyte, the enemy reinforced to the limit of his ability and with his air, land, and sea forces made suicide attempts to dislodge General MacArthur from the island. This supreme effort of the enemy failed. His fleet and air arm suffered major defeat and his land forces were annihilated.

On December 15, sites for air bases and naval facilities were occupied on Mindoro which would support Luzon operations and insure domination of enemy sea and air routes in the South China Sea. From Leyte a corridor had been driven from east to west which cut the Philippine-Archipelago in two.

Luzon was invaded on January 9, 1945. The enemy expected a landing, south of Manila. Consequently the Lingayen Gulf landing north of Manila was practically unopposed. This placed American troops in rear of the enemy's main forces, cut his reinforcement and supply lines, and closed his avenue of escape.

By February a great converging movement on Manila was under way. The XI Corps which landed unopposed was driving east from Zambales Coast. The 11th Airborne Division of the 8th Army, which landed without losses on the west coast of Batanges February 1, was moving rapidly north toward Manila. The 6th Army had occupied the entire Central Plain of Luzon and its 37th Infantry and 1st Cavalry Divisions were fighting their way into the outskirts of north Manila.

On February 3, 1945, in a wide envelopment from the east, elements of the 1st Cavalry Division entered Manila, seized Santo Tomas and Bilibid Prison and liberated thousands of internees and prisoners of war. After desperate fighting, Manila was finally liberated on February 23.

By the end of February, Corregidor and Bataan had been occupied.

In March, a vigorous campaign was launched in the Visayans. Palawan, Zamboanga, Panay, Cebu, and Negros were occupied in quick succession. Seizure of the Sulu Archipelago in early April made Tawi Tawi available as a great strategic airbase from which the enemy empire lifeline to the south was within easy air range. By the 21st of April, General MacArthur's control of the entire Visayan group was complete. On the 19th of April, from a surprise landing at Malabang and Parang in western Mindanao, 8th Army units fought their way eastward in a 2-week overland march which brought them to the outskirts of Davao.

In a collateral drive on Borneo, supported by Allied naval and air units, Australian forces occupied Tarakan May 3, Brunei Bay June 10, and Balikpapan July 1. Possession of these objectives made available sources of oil and other needed war materials and completed General MacArthur's tactical control of the entire Southwest Pacific area.

On the 5th of July, General MacArthur declared his Philippine campaign closed. It had been a campaign characterized by great economy in the lives of his men and heavy destruction of the enemy. Twenty-three enemy divisions, or equivalents, had been annihilated, and more than 400,000 Japanese had been killed. Of the Philippine campaign, General MacArthur announced:

Working in complete unison the three services inflicted the greatest disaster ever sustained by Japanese arms.

The objects of the campaign were as follows:

1. To penetrate and pierce the enemy's center so as to divide him into north and south, his homeland to the north, his captured Pacific possession to the south. Each half could then be enveloped and attacked in turn.

2. The acquisition of a great land, sea, and air base for future operations both to the north and to the south comparable to the British Islands in its use as a base for Allied operations from the west against Germany.

3. The establishment of a great strangulating air and sea blockade between Japan and the conquered possessions in the Pacific to the south so as to prevent raw materials being sent to the north and supply or reinforcement to the south.

4. The liberation of the Philippines with the consequent collapse of the enemy's imperial concept of a greater east Asia coprosperity sphere and the reintroduction of democracy in the Far East.

5. The liberation of our captured officers and men and of internees held in the Philippines.

6. A crippling blow to the Japanese Army, Navy, and Air Force.

All of these purposes were accomplished.

On April 6, 1945, General MacArthur was named Commanding General, U.S. Army Forces in the Pacific. Three months later his Okinawa-based Air Force had launched air strikes against Japan itself. On August 14, 1945, President Truman announced the appointment of General MacArthur as Supreme Allied Commander to receive the Japanese surrender and command the occupation forces in addition to his duties as commander of the U.S. Army Forces in the Pacific. In January 1947, he was designated Commander in Chief of the Far East Command, retaining his position as Supreme Commander for the Allied Powers in Japan.

On July 25, 1950, a month after the North Korean Communists had invaded South Korea, General MacArthur assumed command of the United Nations Command in the Far East, organized to direct United Nations Forces in the defense of South Korea.

General MacArthur was relieved as commander of the United Nations Command in the Far East, Commander in Chief of the Far East Command, and Supreme Commander for the Allied Powers in Japan by President Truman on April 11, 1951. He then returned to the United States, arriving in San Francisco April 17.

DECORATIONS

Thanks of the House of Representatives, the Senate, the Philippine National Assembly, the Philippine Congress, and the Australian Government have been expressed to General MacArthur for his part in liberating the Philippine Islands during World War II.

He has been awarded the Congressional Medal of Honor, Distinguished Service Cross with one Oak Leaf Cluster, Distinguished Service Medal with four Oak Leaf Clusters, Silver Star with six Oak Leaf Clusters, the Purple Heart with one Oak Leaf Cluster, and the Distinguished Flying Cross.

His foreign decorations include the Philippine Medal of Valor, Distinguished Service Star, Defense Medal, and Liberation Medal; British Knight Grand Cross of the Bath; French Grand Officer, Legion of Honor Fourragere, and Croix de Guerre with four Palms; Belgian Commander Order of Crown; Netherlands Knight Grand Cross of the Order of Orange-Nassau with Swords (Military Division); Italian War Cross and Grand Corden Order of the Crown; Polish Grand Croix Polonia Restituta and Virtutae Militaire; Hungarian Grand Cross Order of Military Merit; Czechoslovakian Grand Cross Order of White Lion; Yugoslavian Grand Cross Order of Military Merit; Mexican Grand Cross of Military Merit; Ecuadorian First Class Decoration Abdon Calderon, and Greek Medal of Valor.

Following are the citations for his American military awards:

Medal of Honor: "For conspicuous leadership in preparing the Philippine Islands to resist conquest, for gallantry and intrepidity above and beyond the call of duty in action against invading Japanese forces, and for the heroic conduct of defensive and offensive operations on the Bataan Peninsula. He mobilized, trained, and led an army which has received world acclaim for its gallant defense against a tremendous superiority of enemy forces in men and arms. His utter disregard of personal danger under heavy fire and aerial bombardment, his calm judgment in each crisis, inspired his troops, galvanized the spirit of resistance of the Filipino people, and confirmed the faith of the American people in their Armed Forces."

Distinguished Service Cross: "For heroism in the Salient du Feys, France, March 9, 1918. When Company D, 168th Infantry, was under severe attack in the Salient du Feys, he voluntarily joined it, upon finding that he could do so without interfering with his normal duties, and by his coolness and conspicuous courage aided materially in its success."

Oak Leaf Cluster to the Distinguished Service Cross: "As Brigade Commander, General MacArthur personally led his men and by the skillful maneuvering of his brigade made possible the capture of Hills 288, 242, and the Cote de Chatilon, October 14, 15, and 16, 1918. He displayed indomitable resolution and great courage in rallying broken lines and in reforming attacks thereby making victory possible. On a field where courage was the rule, his courage was the dominant feature."

Distinguished Service Medal: "He served with credit as Chief of Staff of the 24th Division in the operations at Chalons and at the Chateau Thierry Salient. In command of the 84th Infantry Brigade he showed himself to be a brilliant commander of skill and judgment. Later he served with distinction as commanding general of the 42d Division."

First Oak Leaf Cluster to the Distinguished Service Medal: "As Chief of Staff of the Army of the United States since November 21, 1930, he has performed his many important and exacting duties with signal success. He devised and developed the four-army organization of our land forces; he conceived and established the General Headquarters Air Force, thus immeasurably increasing the effectiveness of our air defenses; he initiated a comprehensive program of modernization in the Army's tactics, equipment, training, and organization. In addition, the professional counsel and assistance he has continuously rendered to the President, to the Secretary of War, and to the Congress have been distinguished by such logic, vision, and accuracy as to contribute markedly to the formulation of sound defense policies and the enactment of progressive laws for promoting the Nation's security."

Second Oak Leaf Cluster to the Distinguished Service Medal: "For exceptionally distinguished service as Supreme Commander of Allied Forces in the Southwest Pacific since March 1942. Under extremely difficult conditions of terrain, climate, and limited forces and material, he expelled the enemy from eastern New Guinea, secured lodgments on the Island of New Britain, gave strategical direction to coordinated operations resulting in the conquest of the New Georgia group and the establishment of the U.S. Army and Navy Forces on Bougainville Island. He had inflicted heavy losses on the enemy and established his forces in positions highly favorable for the construction of offensive operations."

Third oak leaf cluster to the Distinguished Service Medal: "As Supreme Commander of Allied Air, Ground, and Sea Forces in the southwest Pacific, General of the Army Douglas MacArthur planned and personally directed the campaigns which resulted in the liberations of the Philippine Islands. Strongly entrenched and superior enemy forces were overwhelmed and completely destroyed in a series of decisive operations exploiting U.S. air and sea superiority, coupled with the resolute and courageous fighting of the ground forces. The immediate result of the campaign was control of the China Sea, the isolation of Japanese forces in Burma, Malaya, and Indochina and the termination of coastwise traffic supporting the Japanese armies in central and south China.

"The liberation of the Philippines began with the landings on Leyte on October 20 in which complete strategical surprise was achieved. After bitter fighting under most difficult conditions of weather and terrain, General MacArthur destroyed the Japanese forces which included the noted 1st Division of the Kwantung army. Again surprising the enemy, General MacArthur moved his forces boldly up the western coast of the main Philippine Island and effected a landing on the shores of Lingayen Gulf on January 9, 1945. The flawless execution of this hazardous amphibious approach and landing so disorganized the enemy that in a series of deep thrusts Manila was liberated on February 25. The fortress of Corregidor fell soon afterward in a brilliantly conceived and directed combined land, sea, and air operation. By the end of June only isolated groups of the enemy remained on Luzon.

"While the U.S. 6th Army was so engaged, Eighth Army units cleared the enemy from the southern islands in a series of amphibious operations. By July 4 organized resistance had terminated, completing the liberation of the Philippine Islands and the 17 million inhabitants from Japanese domination. More than 300,000 dead and 7,000 prisoners were lost by the enemy, our casualties in killed, wounded, and missing totaling 60,628. Seventeen of our divisions had opposed and defeated 23 enemy divisions. The Air, Ground, and Naval Forces worked in complete unison to inflict this crushing disaster on the Japanese Army."

For his services in Korea, General MacArthur was awarded the fourth oak leaf cluster to the Distinguished Service Medal and the Distinguished Flying Cross. The citations follow:

Fourth oak leaf cluster to the Distinguished Service Medal: "For distinguished service to the peoples of the United States and the Republic of Korea, and to the peoples of all free nations. Having been designated as the first field commander of United Nations armed forces, and directed, in the common interest, to repel an armed attack upon the Republic of Korea and to restore international peace and security in the area, he has given these forces conspicuously brilliant and courageous leadership and discerning judgment of the highest order. Having been compelled to commit his troops to combat under extremely adverse conditions and against heavy odds in order to gain the time so imperatively needed for the buildup of his forces for the counteroffensive, he has so inspired his command by his vision, his judgment, his indomitable will and his unshakable faith, that it has set a shining example of gallantry and tenacity in defense and of audacity in attack matched by but few operations in military history."

Distinguished Flying Cross: "For outstanding heroism and extraordinary achievement while participating in aerial flights during the period June 29 to October 20, 1950. On June 29, General MacArthur made a flight to Suwom, Korea, during which his aircraft was subject to effective interception by hostile air action. Another friendly aircraft in the area was attacked and destroyed by enemy air immediately prior to General MacArthur's landing, and the Suwom airstrip itself was bombed and strafed during the course of his visit. On July 27 he made a flight to Taegu, Korea, during which his aircraft was again subject to hostile air interception and at which time the ground situation in the immediate area was most precarious. On September 29, General MacArthur made a flight to Kimpo, Korea, again under conditions presenting the threat of hostile air interception and while the Kimpo Airport itself was subject to hostile ground fire. On October 20, he made a flight to the Sukohon-Sunchon area of Korea in order to observe and supervise the paradrop of the 187th Airborne Regimental Combat Team. During this entire operation his aircraft was subject to attack by enemy aircraft known to be based at Sinuiju."

The following degrees have been conferred upon General MacArthur:

Doctor of science: Norwich University; Pennsylvania Military College, 1928.

Doctor of laws: University of Maryland, 1923; Western Maryland College, 1929; University of Pittsburgh, 1932; University of Philippines, 1938; University of Wisconsin, 1942; and University of Queensland, Australia, 1945.

PROMOTIONS

He was promoted to the grade of first lieutenant on April 23 1904; to captain on February 27, 1911; to major on December 11, 1915; to colonel of infantry, National Army, on August 5, 1917; to brigadier general, National Army, on June 26, 1918; to brigadier general, Regular Army, on January 20, 1920; to major general on January 17, 1925. He was appointed Chief of Staff, with the rank of general on November 21, 1930. On October 1, 1935, after serving nearly 5 years as Chief of Staff, he reverted to his permanent rank of major general. In 1936, President Quezon appointed him Field Marshal, Philippine Army. He retired from the U.S. Army with the rank of general on December 31, 1937, but was recalled to active duty as a major general on July 26, 1941, and was promoted to lieutenant general (temporary) on July 27, 1941. He was promoted to the grade of general (temporary) on December 18, 1941, and to General of the Army on December 18, 1944.

Mr. DWORSHAK. Mr. President, today is the 80th birthday anniversary of General of the Army Douglas MacArthur. I am happy to join with his friends throughout the Nation in extending to him congratulations upon reaching this milestone in life.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in the RECORD an editorial entitled "MacArthur at 80," which was published yesterday in the Deseret News of Salt Lake City, Utah.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MACARTHUR AT 80

General of the Army Douglas MacArthur had his harsh critics as well as his vociferous supporters during his brilliant military career. But on one point, there was never any question.

"On a field where courage was the rule, his courage was the dominant feature," read the citation as then Brigadier General MacArthur received the oak leaf cluster to his Distinguished Service Cross in World War I.

Deeds of courage—moral as well as physical—will no doubt be much in the conversation Tuesday as the self-styled "old soldier" sits down with former comrades in arms at his 80th birthday observance. At 80, this ranking officer of all branches of U.S. military services looks back on a career the memory of which simply does not allow him to fade away.

MacArthur graduated from West Point in 1903 with the highest scholastic average achieved there in a quarter of a century. For 2 years he was military aide to President Theodore Roosevelt. Then came World War I, in which he was wounded and gassed, but in which he was successively, the youngest brigadier general of his time, the youngest major general, the youngest division commander.

After the war, he became the youngest superintendent of the U.S. Military Academy, and, at 50, the youngest officer ever appointed Army Chief of Staff.

Possibly the most decorated officer in U.S. history, he holds the Congressional Medal of Honor (for Bataan), three Distinguished Service Crosses, and seven silver stars, in addition to many other decorations, domestic and foreign.

MacArthur was recalled from the retired list in July 1941, 5 months before Pearl Harbor, and made commander of all the Armed Forces of the Far East. There followed Corregidor, the escape by submarine from Bataan, eventually the long island-hopping campaign back to the Philippines as Supreme Commander in the Pacific.

After receiving the Japanese surrender, he served as virtually an American proconsul in Japan. He was Supreme Commander of Allied Forces in the Pacific and later commander in chief of United Nations Forces in the Korean fighting until relieved of his command by President Truman on April 11, 1951.

History still hasn't pronounced its final verdict on that hotly-debated controversy between MacArthur and Truman on the conduct of the Korean war. Without question, the general was insubordinate; without question, the supremacy of civilian control of policy matters had to be established. But whether or not MacArthur's appeal for vigorous action to end the fighting would have involved us, as Joint Chief of Staff Bradley said, "in the wrong war, at the wrong place, at the wrong time, and with the wrong enemy," still is not really known. Russia's mushrooming military strength since that time makes one wonder if perhaps MacArthur wasn't right.

Right or not in that instance, he was an officer of brilliance and dedication, whose name still evokes memories of heroic, if grim, days. We wish him well.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, I am pleased to take note of the birthday today of one of our Nation's great soldiers, General of the Army Douglas A. MacArthur. General MacArthur's more than 50 years of dedicated military service have earned for him the gratitude of all the American people.

To many of us he symbolizes the finest qualities of military ability and devotion to country. His patriotsm is of the kind we like to hold up to our children as something to be emulated.

General of the Army Douglas MacArthur has richly earned his place in American history and the history of the world. He has equally earned an eternal place in the hearts of his countrymen and in the hearts of those people all over the world who benefited from his military skill.

May he enjoy many more years of fruitful and rewarding work, secure in the knowledge that a grateful Nation has recognized and applauded his great services to it.

NOMINATION OF HON. JAMES R. DURFEE TO BE A MEMBER OF THE U.S. COURT OF CLAIMS

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, subcommittee hearings have been concluded in relation to the nomination of Hon. James R. Durfee to be a judge of the U.S. Court of Claims.

Yesterday the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. PROXMIRE] submitted for the RECORD the statement which he made at the hearing. I have been requested to introduce into the RECORD the statement by Hon. James R. Durfee, as he gave it this morning before the subcommittee.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT OF HON. JAMES R. DURFEE TO SENATE JUDICIARY COMMITTEE, JANUARY 26, 1960

Mr. Chairman, I have listened to Senator PROXMIRE's statement with interest. I have known of his outspoken and announced intent to oppose my confirmation to the U.S. Court of Claims by the Senate and of certain charges which he stated he was investigating.

Not until yesterday, however, did I know the basis for his opposition. While I would have preferred to have more time to prepare a reply, I shall not plead surprise. Since the adjournment of the hearing yesterday, I have had the time to prepare a written statement which I now offer for the RECORD.

First, Senator PROXMIRE bases his opposition to my nomination because of my lack of legal qualifications. The committee has already placed in the RECORD communications from the standing committee on Federal judiciary of the American Bar Association, also from prominent members of the bench and bar from my home State of Wisconsin, recommending my judicial qualifications, character, and integrity for the U.S. Court of Claims.

To substantiate his opposition to my judicial qualifications, Senator PROXMIRE has offered a communication from an unidentified member of the Court of Claims bar as follows:

"A man who has been a member of the Court of Claims bar for over 30 years recently wrote me in part as follows:

" 'The largest and most technical civil cases in America are decided in the Court of Claims. Individual suits against the United States sometimes involve millions of dollars. They are brought by railroads, aircraft companies manufacturing warplanes and missiles, etc. A judge of the court should have an extensive background in this work. Tax refund cases, Government contracts, employee pay cases, etc., require the highest degree of experience and legal skill.

" 'You cannot expect the lawyers who actually practice in the court to come forward on this matter at this late date and express their views. That would be putting one's neck on the block in case Durfee was confirmed. The District of Columbia bar, of course, has more lawyers who practice in the court than all the rest of the country put together. It has consistently refused to endorse Mr. Durfee. It did propose through its Court of of Claims Committee the names of three competent and experienced lawyers to the Attorney General.'

"I might add that the District of Columbia bar includes those who serve both sides in cases before the court—both claimants and the Government."

Upon hearing and reading Senator PROXMIRE's statement as to this unidentified communication that "it—the District of Columbia bar) has consistently refused to endorse Mr. Durfee," I sent a written inquiry about this statement by messenger to the president of the District of Columbia bar yesterday afternoon after the recess. I offer a copy of my letter to him for the record.

He replied by written communication, dated yesterday, and I offer a copy of his reply for the record. It reads as follows:

JANUARY 25, 1960.

Hon. JAMES R. DURFEE,
Chairman, Civil Aeronautics Board,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. DURFEE: I have your letter of January 25 in which you quote certain statements made on the morning of January 25 by Senator PROXMIRE to the Senate Committee on the Judiciary which was considering the confirmation of your nomination to the U.S. Court of Claims. You quote Senator PROXMIRE as quoting from a letter from one described to be a member of the bar of the Court of Claims in which it appears that it was stated that the "District of Columbia bar * * * has consistently refused to endorse Mr. Durfee." You ask me as president of the District of Columbia bar whether the District of Columbia bar has "consistently refused to endorse Mr. Durfee"?

I must assume that the term "D.C. Bar" is referring to the Bar Association of the District of Columbia. According to the bylaws of the Bar Association of the District of Columbia, the judicial selection committee is the sole organ of the association that is clothed with the authority and charged with the duty of selecting the names of persons to be recommended by the association for appointment to judicial office and of opposing the appointment to such office of any persons not qualified therefor. As president of the Bar Association, I can state that the judicial selection committee has neither recommended nor opposed any person for the present vacancy on the Court of Claims. Therefore, it is incorrect to state that the Bar Association has "consistently refused to endorse" you or anyone else for the present vacancy on the Court of Claims.

Sincerely,

FREDERICK A. BALLARD,
President.

I have no doubt that Senator PROXMIRE accepted the statement that the District of Columbia bar "has consistently refused to endorse Mr. Durfee" in good faith, even though it now appears that the statement was clearly erroneous.

I might rest my case as to judicial qualifications on the firm recommendations of the standing committee on judiciary of the American Bar Association, and the recommendations of the bench and bar of my own home State now before this committee.

Senator PROXMIRE next calls attention, on pages 2 and 3 of his statement, to the responsibility of the Court of Claims and the large amounts of money involved in its judgments, as much as about $45 million in one case (which was dismissed). If this is one of his criteria for judicial qualifications, may I point out that in just one case before the Board—the New York-Miami Route case decided in 1956—the annual gross revenue to the two carriers then operating this route was likewise about $45 million. The decision in such a case—and there are many more like it—involves judicial analysis of highly technical, complex questions of law and fact.

Finally, after asserting a complete lack of judicial experience as it affects my qualifications, the Senator turns to another tack:

"It might be said that as Chairman of the CAB, Mr. Durfee has enjoyed a kind of judicial experience. The CAB is a quasi-judicial agency of course. It has judicial as well as rulemaking and administrative functions. The behavior of the nominee in his judicial role is for this reason particularly pertinent to his qualifications for this nomination."

I submit, Mr. Chairman, that it is at least inconsistent to first attempt to knock down my judicial experience, and then set it up again in a 16-page analysis entitled "Record of Judicial Behaviour of Nominee."

Senator PROXMIRE has next addressed himself to three charges of allegedly improper conduct involving three free trips which I took. He has stated that on each of these trips, I violated the code of ethics of the CAB.

I first wish to make it clear that my participation in these flights is not something unearthed by Senator PROXMIRE's investigation.

In the first place, my participation in the two inaugural flights, along with other members of the Board and its staff, was announced by press releases issued by the Civil Aeronautics Board and carried widely in the press.

Second, while there was no formal publicity concerning the Pinehurst trip, the trip was covered by at least one national magazine, Sports Illustrated, with a full-page photograph of all present.

Third, on October 3, 1957, the chairman of the Special Subcommittee of the House on Legislative Oversight, investigating the independent regulatory agencies, asked the members of the agencies to submit an itemized list of all gifts, honorariums, loans, payments, free transportation, vacation entertainment, hotel or other accommodations.

I replied on October 14, 1957 in complete detail, as requested. Included in my statement were the three trips referred to by the Senator. My statement has been a matter of record with the House Committee on Legislative Oversight since October 1957.

Shortly after I filed this statement on trips and gifts with the House committee in October 1957 I was advised of an opinion by the Comptroller General on "Inaugural Flights" requested by the House Oversight Committee which was contrary to a previous opinion of our General Counsel. The Board wrote to the Comptroller on March 19, 1958, and expressed concern as to whether his opinion was intended to encompass certain practices surrounding inaugural flights of air carriers subject to regulation by the Civil Aeronautics Board. These flights had been participated in by members and employees of the Board, along with Members of the Congress and other representatives of the Government, representatives of foreign governments, the press and other dignitaries, for the past 20 years.

The Comptroller General replied to our communication on May 20, 1958, and I now offer a copy of his opinion for the record. This opinion has never been publicized as was the earlier one, though it is a matter of public record.

You will note that while in the previous opinion to the House committee the Comptroller unequivocally stated that the practice of free transportation on inaugural flights "is prohibited by 18 U.S.C. 1914," in the opinion to the CAB, the final page, he concluded: "We have no authority to make a binding determination as to the proper interpretation of this statute. Therefore, any contrary construction of our rule in this area is and should be regarded as incorrect."

The Comptroller General continued: "From the standpoint of the audit functions of this office I have no reason to question your determination as to the continued official nature of the flights mentioned or the participation therein by officials of the CAB, or their wives, under the circumstances related. While, in my opinion, such action would not be a violation of 18 U.S.C. 1914, that is, as stated above, a matter for final determination by the Attorney General or the courts."

As I have mentioned, participation in inaugural flights has been continuously and officially approved by the Board since 1940. The airlines involved are required to file a list with CAB of all guest passengers on such flights. They are not permitted to charge any guest on an inaugural flight as this is not construed to be "air transportation" within the meaning of the Federal Aviation Act.

A breakdown of these guest passenger lists over this period of time establishes that a total of 1,184 people have participated and are classified as follows:

	Officials	Family
CAB members	23	4
CAB staff	71	13
Senators and Congressmen	56	7
Congressional staff	7	1
Other Federal officials	90	11

While I and the other members of the Board have been invited to participate in international inaugural flights by both U.S. and foreign air carriers at least 50 times in the past 4 years, I have participated in only the 2 international inaugural flights referred to above. This was not because I felt there was any question of impropriety involved, but because I felt that my primary responsibility as Chairman and administrative head of this agency was to stay home and "keep the store."

In point of fact, the very Board that in 1951 adopted the code of ethics as to "unusual hospitality," to which Senator PROXMIRE has referred, made it clear that Board participation in inaugural flights was not acceptance of the "unusual hospitality" prescribed by the code. I refer to a letter dated October 11, 1951, from the then Chairman of the Board to the Associate General Counsel of the Board:

CIVIL AERONAUTICS BOARD,
Washington, D.C., October 11, 1951.
(Reference No. B-45; reference No. B-1)

To: Associate General Counsel.
From: Chairman.
Subject: Braniff Airways' inaugural flight to Sao Paulo, Brazil.

You and your wife have been designated by the Board as the official representatives of the Board on the inaugural flight of Braniff Airways to Sao Paulo, Brazil, departing Miami on October 12, 1951. Since it is understood that Braniff Airways will pay the expenses of the official inaugural flight group and since you and your wife are the representatives of the Board, the Board considers that section 300.4 of the Procedural Regulations is not applicable to the transportation on Braniff Airways which is involved or to the expenses of yourself and wife during such time as you are part of such group.

DONALD W. NYROP.

Mr. Chairman, I offer a copy of this letter for the record. Since this was the first Board participation in an inaugural flight following the adoption of the Board's code of ethics in 1951, it certainly demonstrates the consistent interpretation by the Board of its code of ethics as applied to inaugural flights.

Mr. Chairman, I trust that this explanation of the background of inaugural flights has established that they are not "unusual" hospitality, but on the contrary, have been considered by the Board and the others who participated as "usual" hospitality, in accordance with long accepted standards.

Maybe we ought to look a little further and see why these many successive members of the Board, over the past 20 years, have approved this common practice, which has also the approval of the Comptroller General.

We in the regulatory field are sometimes told that we should at all times maintain the same judicial aloofness from the industry which we regulate as judges do from litigants. As to matters involved in adjudication following hearings on the record, this is correct. But the Board is not entirely a court. It is also a quasi-legislative body, with powers to make, as well as judge, law in aviation, within the rulemaking limits delegated to it by Congress. In defining these powers of the Board, Congress at the outset directs the Board to encourage and develop an air transportation system properly adapted to meet the present and future needs of the foreign and domestic commerce of the United States, of the postal service, and of the national defense. In essence, we are directed to promote aviation. There are those who criticize these dual quasi-legislative—quasi-judicial functions of the Board as imposing inconsistent standards of ethical conduct, but that is the law under which the Board operates.

Generally speaking, the courts construe and apply the statutory law as Congress writes it in arriving at their judgments. Courts are not expected to promote or develop aviation or any other business. The Board is not only expected to do this: it is directed and required to do it by Congress. We certainly do not go about this promotion and development of aviation in the aloof atmosphere of a court or the strict isolation of a judge's chambers. We work with this industry every day to encourage and develop aviation. That's a very important part of the job that Congress has directed us to do.

As an example, let us consider the promotion and development of U.S. international air commerce. We and the State Department negotiate and bargain for international air routes with foreign countries. In this bargaining process, we consult constantly with our own international carriers, since we are, in a sense, then, acting as their negotiators, not their judges. When the bargaining is over and we have a bilateral air agreement with another country, our designated carrier or carriers are authorized to fly an inaugural round-trip flight over the routes involved, and this authority may be extended to a new type of service. The other country concerned usually grants the same inaugural flight authority to its carriers. The airline invites the guests which usually include U.S. Government officials, foreign government officials, Members of Congress, city and State officials, airline officials, both United States and foreign, and members of the press.

These inaugural flights are intended to promote international good will and cooperation with the foreign countries involved and to develop and encourage U.S. air travel as directed by Congress. These flights are widely publicized both at home and abroad. The arrival in the other country of destination is commonly marked by diplomatic ceremonies, receptions, banquets, and other entertainment by the airlines and governments of both countries. Usually, the members of the Board and staff participating in the flight will take this excellent opportunity to confer further with the aviation authorities of the other country to encourage and develop future air commerce.

For example, I refer to the case of the TWA New York to Rome inaugural nonstop on October 2, 1957, when in addition to meetings of the people-to-people organzation in Rome, another Board member and I and a member of our staff, together with representatives of the State Department twice conferred at length with the Italian Ministry of Aviation and other top Italian aviation officials. We discussed informally the then pending consultations for revision of our bilateral air agreement with the Italian Government, in the interests of our country and both our certificated international carriers to Italy—TWA and Pan American.

The Eastern inaugural nonstop New York to Mexico City on September 15, 1957, as General Adams said yesterday, marked the beginning of a new and better era in our international aviation relations with Mexico. For 10 years we have been vainly trying to get the Mexican Government to give foreign air carrier permits to all of the U.S. carriers holding a certificated authority to operate routes from the United States to Mexico. We had just obtained four new nonstop routes from the United States to Mexico City for a 2-year period. We were desirous of continuing this improved relationship with Mexico. The members of the Board present conferred with the Mexican Minister of Transport and other high Mexican aviation officials with this objective. We participated in several official receptions, dinners and other entertainment furnished by both the Mexican and U.S. officials and airlines. I believe that by this exchange of social amenities and conferences, we did accomplish substantial improvement in our international aviation relations with Mexico, not just for Eastern Airlines but for all our U.S. carriers to Mexico.

This long-established practice of inaugural flights has been recognized for its great promotional value to U.S. aviation and international relations by the press, by the Congress, and by the Board.

As to the trip to Pinehurst, this was a weekend golfing trip as a guest of L. C. Burwell, vice president of Flying Tigers, who resides in Pinehurst, and one of its principal competitors, Overseas National Airways. Also present was Mr. Juan Trippe, president of Pan American, another principal competitor, particularly in the business of transporting passengers and cargo by contract with the Military Air Transport Service and other defense establishments. When the invitation was tendered by Mr. Burwell, I was advised that representatives of these competitive airlines would be present, and also representatives of the Military Air Transport Service, including General Wilson, deputy commander. One of the reasons the trip was organized, as explained to me, was to afford an opportunity for a congenial get-together with representatives of the defense establishments concerned and some of the airlines principally concerned with the MATS civil airlines problem. The carriers and the Board were trying to get a larger allocation of military airlift for all eligible commercial air carriers. This is an objective which, while it lies completely outside the quasi-judicial responsibilities of the Board, does rest well within our responsibility under the Federal Aviation Act to foster and encourage civil and commercial aviation. I have participated in at least 10 or 15 conferences with defense officials and others over the past 4 years for this same purpose—one just last week—and I have testified before committees of Congress as to our efforts in this direction. Congressional committees have repeatedly endorsed the Board's objectives and successful efforts to get more commercial airlift business from the Department of Defense and the Military Air Transport Service.

Mr. Chairman, I trust that I have established that the three trips with which Senator PROXMIRE is concerned do not constitute the acceptance of "unusual hospitality" as proscribed by section 300.4 of the Board's Code of Ethics and as construed by the Board for the past 20 years.

May I now refer to another basis of Senator PROXMIRE's objections? He has called attention to applications for air carrier authority and other proceedings pending before the Board by the air carriers involved in the three trips. Listed in his statement are 2 then pending applications by Flying Tiger and 6 by Overseas National, the hosts on the 1956 trip to Pinehurst; 76 then pending applications by Eastern, the host on the trip to Mexico City, and 15 then pending applications by TWA, the host on the trip to Rome.

Senator PROXMIRE has not pursued this matter further in his statement. He has not attempted to assert that in the final disposition of any of these pending applications, I was improperly influenced to extend any favoritism or bias in favor of the airlines who were hosts on the three trips as to any particular pending case. It is readily apparent that this would be difficult to attempt, for example, with the 76 then pending applications by Eastern for route authority. Since the Senator has not attempted to show that I was in fact improperly influenced in any one of these pending cases by participation in any of these three trips, I shall not attempt any unnecessary rebuttal or further analysis of these cases.

I have referred to the complete statement as to free trips, gifts, entertainment, etc., which I filed with the House Subcommittee on Legislative Oversight in response to the questionnaire which was addressed to all members of the six regulatory agencies being investigated by the committee. I listed in that statement in October 1957 the three trips to which Senator PROXMIRE has referred. Later I testified before the committee and its counsel on four separate occasions: on October 17, 1957; January 27, 1958; November 24 and 25, 1958; and finally, on June 15, 1959. I was questioned at length about practically every phase of the Board's operations, and particularly about ex parte communications and the Board's association with the aviation industry.

The record of my testimony will establish that at no time was I ever questioned on this matter of free trips and there is no reference thereto in the interim report of the Subcommittee on Legislative Oversight, dated April 8, 1958, or its final report, dated January 3, 1959.

Mr. Chairman, this hearing marks for me the culmination of about 10 years in regulation of business in the public interest.

As to the almost 6 years I spent as member and chairman of the Public Service Commission of Wisconsin, I can find no better summary than the statement of Senator PROXMIRE, who was then, I believe, in the Wisconsin Legislature. He is quoted on January 6 of this year in the Wisconsin newspaper which has been his principal informant, as saying of me, "He did a competent job while he served as a member of the Wisconsin Public Service Commission." For this statement, I thank the Senator, and I am sure that he really meant it in good faith

Since April 1956—almost 4 years—I have been a Member and Chairman of the Civil Aeronautics Board. Since October 1957 the Board and five other principal Federal regulatory agencies have been under extensive investigation by the House Committee on Legislative Oversight of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. I have testified four times before this committee, the last time on June 15, 1959. As recently as November 20 of last year, I testified before the Subcommittee on Administrative Practice and Procedure of the Senate Judiciary Committee headed by Senator CARROLL which was also engaged in an investigation of the practices and procedures of the Board and the five other regulatory agencies. During 1958–59 I have testified for a total of 15 times before 9 different committees of the House and the Senate. Not once over these past 4 years has there been any question raised before any of these committees of the House and the Senate as to the propriety or impartiality of my judicial conduct with the airlines regulated by the Board, until yesterday before this Committee by Senator PROXMIRE.

Mr. Chairman, I have been proud of this record of 10 years of highly difficult and demanding service in the public interest. I am still proud of it, and proud to submit it to your judgment.

Mr. PROXMIRE subsequently said: Mr. President, yesterday I placed in the RECORD my statement opposing the nomination of the present Chairman of the Civil Aeronautics Board, the Hon. James R. Durfee, to be a member of the U.S. Court of Claims. Mr. Durfee is from Antigo, Wis. I oppose his nomination very vigorously. At the same time I commend my senior colleague [Mr. WILEY] for having earlier today presented for printing in the RECORD the testimony of Mr. Durfee this morning before the subcommittee of the Committee on the Judiciary. I wish to say to my colleagues in the Senate that, as a matter of fact, it was my intention to do exactly as the senior Senator from Wisconsin has done, and I had prepared my remarks to effect this.

I think that in all fairness the testimony of Mr. Durfee should be printed in the RECORD. While in my opinion it was a masterful presentation, I still very vigorously and very strongly oppose approval of his nomination by the Senate, and intend to do so when it is reached on the calendar. However, I believe Mr. Durfee has made the best possible case for himself in his testimony before the committee.

NEED FOR ADDITIONAL FEDERAL JUDGES IN PENNSYLVANIA

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I urge the leadership on both sides of the aisle, and all my other colleagues, to press for early Senate passage of the omnibus judgeship bill, Senate bill 2673, and ask for favorable consideration of the amendment submitted by my colleague from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTT] and myself, to increase the number of judges authorized, so that we may have three new judges in the eastern district of Pennsylvania and two in the western district.

We must not let it be said that the Democratic 86th Congress failed to pass the legislation necessary to place justice in the Federal district courts on a current basis again. I share the hope and expectation of my party colleagues in Congress that the next administration will be a Democratic one, but I think we would be doing a disservice to the country if we put off action this year on the judgeship bill on the basis of that expectation.

We are dispensing a poor brand of justice when we make litigants and witnesses wait more than a year after the dispute comes to issue before trial. Unless Congress acts without further delay we will be guilty of denying to our constituents the constitutional guarantee of speedy public trials.

I ask unanimous consent that two memorandums, prepared for me by Mr. Will Shafroth, Chief of the Division of Procedural Studies and Statistics in the Administrative Office of the U.S. Courts be printed in the RECORD at this point as a part of my remarks. They set forth the crying need for additional judges in both the western and eastern districts of Pennsylvania, and some very persuasive statistics in support of his contention.

There being no objection, the memorandums were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE JUDICIAL BUSINESS OF THE U.S. DISTRICT COURT FOR THE WESTERN DISTRICT OF PENNSYLVANIA

Two judges were provided for this district by the Judicial Code of 1911 and a third, authorized as temporary by the act of September 14, 1922 (42 Stat. 837), was made permanent by the act of August 19, 1935 (49 Stat. 659). A fourth judgeship, authorized as temporary by the act of August 3, 1949 (63 Stat. 495), was made permanent by the act of August 29, 1950 (64 Stat. 562) and two additional judgeships, one on a temporary basis, were provided by the act of February 10, 1954 (68 Stat. 8). From August 7, 1946, to May 31, 1955, the district enjoyed the partial services of a roving judge appointed to serve all three districts in the State, but on the latter date the roving judgeship expired and the judge holding that position succeeded to a vacancy in the middle district. The western district now has six judgeships, one of which is temporary. Court is held at Pittsburgh and Erie.

Following the addition of two judgeships in 1954, the number of civil cases filed continued to increase and the court continued to lose ground for the next 4 years with an increase in the backlog of 658 cases, or 43 percent.

The record of the civil cases filed, terminated and pending for the 4 years was as follows:

Civil cases commenced, terminated, and pending, fiscal years 1955 through 1958

Fiscal year	Commenced	Terminated	Pending June 30
1955	1,197	1,039	1,701
1956	1,287	1,166	1,822
1957	1,241	1,045	2,018
1958	1,311	1,128	2,201

This is a record of increasing filings, a static number of terminations and a constantly increasing backlog. The result has been a median interval of more than 2½ years from filing to trial in 1958, compared with a national median of only 1 year.

A significant change occurred in 1959. The number of civil cases filed dropped from 1,311 to 961, largely as a result of the jurisdiction statute of July 25, 1958, and the cases disposed of increased from 1,128 to 1,359, the net result being a decrease of almost 400 in pending cases.

The figures for the year are as follows:

Fiscal year 1959:

Commenced	961
Terminated	1,359
Pending June 30	1,803

During the first 6 months of the current fiscal year, July 1–December 31, 1959, civil cases filed have begun to increase again. But with the help of some visiting judges the number of cases disposed of has also increased so that the number of pending civil cases decreased during the 6-month period. At the end of December they were 24 percent less than a year earlier. The figures for the civil cases for this period are as follows:

1st 6 months, fiscal year 1960:

Pending July 1	1,803
Filed	489
Terminated	626
Pending Dec. 31	1,666

Even with this gratifying result, the court faces a formidable load of pending cases, a large number of which—estimated at from 400 to 450—will eventually reach trial.

The marked improvement in the situation of this district stems principally from three factors:

1. The installation and implementation of a system of pretrial procedure, which sets a time for the completion of discovery and other preliminary matters, and assures that each pretried case is ready for trial.

2. The adoption of a practice of empaneling standby juries which are always ready for instant use in any courtroom as soon as a jury in a case being tried is sent out to deliberate. This means a continuous calendar of trials with practically no calendar breakdowns and a maximum use of the judges' trial time.

3. A program of visiting judges which has provided much needed assistance during jury terms.

Chief Judge Wallace Gourley and his court deserve credit for their industry and the enthusiasm with which they are making a success of these methods of improved court administration.

The fact remains, however, that the court is still far from up to date in its work. The jury cases tried this fall were mostly from 30 months to 3 years old. Nonjury cases are assigned after issue has been joined and each judge handles his own nonjury cases separately. Generally speaking, these dockets are relatively current and nonjury cases, for the most part, can be tried within 6 months of filing.

A report from the clerk on November 19, 1959, shows the following number of civil cases at Pittsburgh pending over 6 months.

Jury cases over 6 months

1. Not at issue	12
2. Inactive for some reason: waiting decision of another court, parties or lawyers ill, or good reason for continuance	4
3. Cases on trial, tried, awaiting decision or in process of settlement	29
4. Awaiting trial:
(a) Antitrust	11
(b) F.L.S.A. (Fair Labor Standards Act)	1
(c) Tax	11
(d) Patent	1
(e) Land Condemnation (not usually tried to a jury)	116
(f) F.E.L.A. (injuries to railroad employees)	342
(g) Negligence	536
(h) Contract (diversity)	45
(i) Other	13

Nonjury cases over 6 months

1. Not at issue	0
2. Inactive for some reason—waiting decision of another court—parties or lawyers ill or good reason for continuance	2
3. Cases on trial, tried, awaiting decision or in process of settlement	16
4. Awaiting trial:
(a) Antitrust	1
(b) F.L.S.A.	5
(c) Tax	25
(d) Patent	9
(e) Land condemnation	1
(f) F.E.L.A.	3
(g) Negligence	10
(h) Contract (diversity)	25
(i) Other	34

Out of a total of 1,252 cases over 6 months old—jury and nonjury—over 70 percent were either suits by railroad employees for injuries under the Federal Employers' Liability Act or other negligence suits.

The following table shows pending civil cases as of June 30, 1959, by age and nature of suit:

Nature of suit	Total	Less than 6 months	6 months to 1 year	1 to 2 years	2 to 3 years	3 to 4 years	4 to 5 years	5 years and over
Total	1,803	361	261	612	389	115	34	31
U.S. cases, total	328	79	34	65	69	45	16	20
Private cases, total	1,475	282	227	547	320	70	18	11

Other diversity	27	8	4	8	4	2	1
Admiralty	42	22	6	7	5		1	1

It is apparent from this table that there are many old cases on the docket of this court and that the great majority of the cases are personal-injury suits for damages.

Court is held at Erie twice a year, but the docket there is light and cases which are ready can always be tried during the regular terms of court.

The criminal docket in this district is not heavy and the criminal cases, speaking generally, are not the subject of extended delay.

The Judicial Conference last March recommended that the present temporary judgeship be made permanent and two more judgeships be added.

Respectfully submitted.

Chief, Division of Procedural Studies and Statistics, Administrative Office of the U.S. Courts.

THE JUDICIAL BUSINESS OF THE U.S. DISTRICT COURT FOR THE EASTERN DISTRICT OF PENNSYLVANIA

There are eight judgeships presently authorized for the eastern district of Pennsylvania compared with four judges at the beginning of 1940. A fifth judgeship on a temporary basis, created in 1940, was made permanent in 1946, two additional judgeships were created in 1949, and one more in 1954. In September 1952 the Judicial Conference of the United States recommended two additional judgeships for the district, one of which was provided by the act of February 10, 1954. The Conference immediately renewed the recommendation for a ninth judgeship and since that time has asked that two more judgeships be created for the district, bringing the total recommendations of the Conference for new judgeships to three, in addition to the eight now in existence. The service of a roving judge was lost to the district in 1955 when Judge Follmer who served three districts became a judge of the middle district. The principal place of holding court in the district is the city of Philadelphia, one of the largest centers of population in the country, and the district also embraces the Allentown-Bethlehem-Easton area which is also very heavily populated.

The business of the district increased rapidly from 1948 to 1958. During that decade, civil cases filed annually rose from 1,489 to 2,487 and private civil cases, which on the average take much more time than Government cases, from 1,087 to 2,116, virtually doubling. Two judgeships were added in 1949 and one in 1954, but the pending civil caseload also doubled as the court, because of the increasing incoming load and some extended lapses due to delays in filling vacancies was unable to keep up with its workload. The pending civil caseload of 4,141 on June 30, 1958, was the second largest in the country for comparable districts and amounted to more than 500 per judge compared with a national average of 270 per judge.

Civil cases filed during the fiscal year 1959 were 11 percent less than during the previous year as a result of the jurisdictional statute passed on July 25, 1958, raising the jurisdictional amount in diversity of citizenship and some Federal question cases and making other changes which curtailed jurisdiction. As a consequence, the court terminated more cases than were filed as is shown by the following:

Civil cases filed, fiscal year 1959	2,001
Civil cases terminated	2,160
Civil cases pending at end of year	3,992

The pending civil caseload on June 30, 1959, was 499 per judge compared with the national average of 250.

The median time from filing to disposition, from filing to trial, and from issue to trial for the last 3 years has been as follows:

Median time intervals elapsing in civil cases tried

Fiscal year	Number of cases tried	Months from filing to disposition		Months from filing to trial		Months from issue to trail
		Pennsylvania (eastern)	National median	Pennsylvania (eastern)	National median	Pennsylvania (eastern)	National median
1957	211	28.0	14.2	26.3	12.3	23.4	9.0
1958	200	26.0	13.9	24.1	11.9	22.8	8.9
1959	196	26.7	15.3	25.0	13.3	23.2	10.3

It is obvious that the district continues to lag far behind the national median in the time required for getting cases to trial, and the delay is far longer than is desirable for a prompt dispatch of judicial business. As of last June it was requiring 23 months from trial order to trial in jury cases and 20 months in nonjury cases.

During the past 6 months there has been an increase of 7 percent in the number of civil cases filed, and in the months of November and December the increase exceeded 15 percent.

The comparison of the first 6 months of this fiscal year with last was as follows:

	Pending, July 1	Filed	Terminated	Pending, Dec. 31
1st 6 months fiscal year 1959	4,141	991	936	4,196
1st 6 months fiscal year 1960	3,992	1,059	1,017	4,034
Percent change	−4	+7	+9	−4

While pending cases were reduced by 162 in the year ending December 31, 1959, they still exceeded 4,000 and were larger than in any other comparable district except the southern district of New York. Despite the decrease in civil cases filed last year, the caseload per judge of cases filed was 251 compared with the national average of 215, and an additional increase appears inevitable this year. The cases pending on June 30, 1959, included many antitrust and patent cases.

The criminal calendars in this district are kept up to date and the number of criminal cases is not large although there are some long trials. In 1959 there were 312 criminal cases filed resulting in a total of 59 criminal trials.

The present high caseload, the long delays in the calendars, and the difficulty and complexity of much of the litigation are the reasons for the recommendation of the Judicial Conference at its March 1959 session of three additional judgeships for this district.

Statistical tables concerning the business of the district are attached.

Respectfully submitted.

THE DEFENSE DEBATE

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, amidst all the charges and countercharges concerning our Defense Establishment, the recent testimony of Gen. Nathan F. Twining before the House Defense Appropriation Subcommittee is most instructive. General Twining, as Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, speaks with authority and with all the information at his fingertips. That is more than can be said for many of his critics.

General Twining and Secretary of Defense Gates have recently made clear their informed opinion that our country, along with the free world as a whole, is stronger militarily than the Soviet Union, and that we will continue to be superior to the Communists in this field.

It should be emphasized that none of our military leaders is preaching complacency. None of them says we can rest on our oars. To the contrary, our military men have stressed that proposed military programs must go forward vigorously. They have merely stated their informed opinion that the funds proposed for these tasks in the President's budget are sufficient to do the overall job. That is the responsibility of these military experts and we should all recognize that fact.

The view of Secretary Gates, General Twining, and others is that we must remember the overall view of our military capabilities and must not be misled by those who weep and wail about single aspects of our Defense Establishment. It is true, of course, that we must be concerned when any part of our military program lags, and steps must be taken to speed those projects along.

But the important quotient—which many of the self-styled armchair strategists have conveniently overlooked or misunderstood—is our deterrent might as a whole. Our retaliatory power gives us a clear edge over the Soviets. The rocking-chair corporals who are so quick to criticize have so entangled themselves in the trees that they have lost sight of the forest. It is an understandable but grievously shortsighted mistake.

It is particularly ironic to hear all this criticism coming from Members of Congress who last year refused to give the President and his military advisers the funds they asked for. They cannot have it both ways, and the sooner that fact is faced up to and the lure of partisanship is overcome, the better it will be for the welfare of our Nation and our standing in the eyes of the world.

I have no doubt that the American people are ready and willing to make all the sacrifices necessary to keep our Nation strong and secure. But they want the facts. They do not want to be "kidded" about our defense capabilities. They should not be misled by carping critics bent on personal advancement.

Mr. President, I do not object to constructive criticism and scrutiny of our defense setup, but I do most emphatically object to making a political football out of our Nation's security. Discussion of our Military Establishment, like comment on our foreign policies, is sound and healthy, but only if it is done in a constructive way.

For my part, I intend to continue to be guided in my actions and my votes by the real needs of our Defense Establishment and by testimony of the President and military experts who really know what they are talking about. I intend to continue to be guided by my confidence that the American people will respond to whatever is needed of them. They need not be bamboozled by distortion and innuendo. I hope more people will recognize these facts. I hope the days ahead will bring more reason and light, and less partisan tomfoolery to this whole subject.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have excerpts from General Twining's testimony before the House committee, as reprinted in the Washington Post of January 24, printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the excerpts were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TWINING TESTIMONY CRITICAL OF THOSE WHO DEGRADE UNITED STATES

General TWINING. Today we hear and read a tremendous volume of material comparing the strength of the United States and the free world with that of the Soviet Union and the Communist bloc.

All too often the writers and commentators are inclined to degrade the capabilities of the American people and the peoples of the free world. At the same time, the efforts of the Soviet Union and the Communist bloc are reported in glowing terms.

The plain and unadulterated truth of the matter is that the moral, military, physical, and economic strengths of our people and of our allies have been adequate to resist and deter Communist aggression. I am confident that this will continue to be the case.

We cannot, however, in this day of exploding worldwide competition on all fronts, be content to maintain the status quo. We must also realize that the preservation of our freedom in the years ahead may require greater sacrifices from us than those made by Americans who have walked before us.

Our Nation is not defenseless. Our Nation is not populated by a people who are ready to knuckle under to a rocket-rattling dictatorship. I am quite certain that the American people will fight with all weapons available in the national arsenal, should such a fight be required to preserve our freedom and that of our allies.

Mr. MAHON. Now it is obvious to me that in this presentation you have had in mind some of the critical things which have been said with respect to the capability of the United States and the Department of Defense. You have had in mind, I think, various columns in the press and statements made by various political and nonpolitical figures. I think we are all interested in one thing, and that is facing up to the truth and to the facts of life from the standpoint of national defense.

General Twining, you spoke very feelingly about our defense capabilities. While you have not said so, I had the feeling as you spoke—and most of your discussion was off the record—that probably you feared that the United States was being sold short in the eyes of the American people and in the eyes of the world with respect to our military prowess.

What is your feeling about that?

General TWINING. We are in a position now, as you say, when we can annihilate each other. We must not let that ever happen. That is why we are having all of this business going on—disarmament and all that. The only way we can deal with this fellow is not to tell him how deficient we are today; we are prone to do this at times, because it gets us more money. It is the democratic system and I am not bucking it, but I think it is very dangerous.

We have great strength, we are a powerful country, and I do not think we should downgrade our capabilities as a nation to the Russians. That is what gives me cause for concern—this downgrading of our capability. It looks like we are going to get licked every day. I am afraid that the public will become frightened some day. It sometimes appears to me that there is an element in the country that thinks, "Gentlemen, we better be Red than dead." It is a serious thing.

My point is, let us not downgrade our capability at a time when we are entering upon negotiations which may lead to peace and disarmament. We want to deal from strength. We have terrific strength in the military and in our country. We know what we have. We do not know what he had, although I believe that our intelligence system is improving all the time.

I did not mean to be complacent at all. I am still concerned by the same possibilities that you are, that an enemy might some day launch an attack and that would be awful. We would take a lot of losses in our population and we would have to strike back and do the same thing to him. I do not think it is going to happen.

Mr. MAHON. You have confirmed to me your feeling that you are deeply disturbed by the possibility that we might convince the opponents that we do not have the fighting strength which you feel we have.

General TWINING. That is right. If he thinks we are not confident of our national capability he may assume that there is an open gate for him. Similarly, we should not build up in our own people this lack of confidence in our national capability.

Mr. MAHON. You do not feel, I assume, that the American people would be in any way disposed to knuckle under to the rattling of missiles as a result of this controversy over the relative strength of the people of the two countries?

General TWINING. Not at the moment, but I am afraid that such an attitude could be generated or could be building up if our Nation is portrayed continually as second best.

(Later in the testimony, General Twining made an additional observation after furnishing the committee a declassified version of part of his off-the-record testimony concluding with the statement that he did not believe any nation possesses the ability to destroy the United States, or attack it, without receiving unacceptable damage in return.)

General TWINING. All I am trying to do is the right thing in this defense business. You cannot afford to go overboard either way, too strong or too weak. People have to know the truth about what we have. Let them make up their minds.

SPEEDING THE MAIL

Mr. CARLSON. Mr. President, the ever-increasing volume of mail in the United States requires the constant effort on the part of the Post Office Department and the Congress to encourage and to develop programs that will modernize the Department, in order, first, to speed the handling of the mail, and second, to reduce the financial cost of the Department to our citizens.

During recent years, under the direction of Postmaster General Arthur Summerfield, great progress has been made in modernizing our postal operations.

The Postmaster General foresees an expenditure of $2 billion in the next 4 years for modernizing the postal operations.

As a member of the Post Office and Civil Service Committee, I was impressed by an article written by John C. Perham, which appeared in the January 11 issue of Barron's National Business and Financial Weekly.

In view of the excellent study made by the writer, I ask unanimous consent that the analysis be printed in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SPEEDING THE MAIL—U.S. INDUSTRY IS HELPING THE POST OFFICE TO MECHANIZE

(By John C. Perham)

In the Christmas season of recent memory, the American people outdid themselves in many ways. Besides attending church in greater numbers than ever before and ringing up record retail sales, they sent each other more cards, letters, and packages than in any previous year. Volume of Christmas mail, says the Post Office Department, ran some 4 percent above the not inconsiderable total of a year earlier. To get all the deliveries made by December 25, the men in blue had to divert 40 million pieces of surface mail to the airlines, and press into use every other available bit of equipment.

The massive job, however, was made somewhat less burdensome by the Department's ability to muster more modern machinery than ever before to handle it. For the first time, to illustrate, the Post Office had the help of a giant mechanical sorter, the first American-made equipment of its kind. The semiautomatic machine, built by Burroughs Corp. and installed in a post office at Detroit, sorts letters a dozen times faster than it can be done by hand.

In recent months, too, the Post Office has taken some other impressive steps toward renovating its long-obsolete plant and equipment. Its 40-man Office of Research and Engineering, set up 5 years ago to help mechanize operations, has completed the basic industrial engineering for more than a score of futuristic post offices throughout the country. On 11 of these, construction already is under way. The Department also has effected a major mechanization of 6 of its facilities and is working on 11 more. In Providence, it has commissioned International Telephone & Telegraph Co. to build the first wholly mechanized post office in America. Meanwhile, it is negotiating with Food Machinery & Chemical Co. for construction of a still more advanced experimental installation at Oakland, Calif.

For the next 4 years, Mr. Summerfield and his lieutenants foresee outlays of no less than $2 billion for further modernization. They hope to enlist $1.5 billion of private capital for the construction of 12,000 new post offices. These buildings would be equipped, and certain major Government-owned post offices mechanized, with $500 million of Federal funds—Congress willing. For a great many U.S. companies, public and private, big and small—and especially those in the business-machine, materials-handling and communications industries—the project opens up an inviting, if highly competitive, opportunity, for sale of a wide array of up-to-the-minute equipment. For the Post Office, if its hopes are realized, it will mean lower costs and improved working conditions. For the public, it should mean faster and more efficient mail service.

The progress already achieved is highlighted by a brief look at the situation that prevailed just a few years ago. When Mr. Summerfield took office in 1953, the U.S. postal system already was the largest and most complex in the world. Its 41,000 post offices, and 19,000 vehicles were handling some 1,200,000 parcels and 50 billion other pieces of mail a year. Its 510,000 employees exceeded the number on any private payroll in the United States except that of American Telephone & Telegraph Co. The Department was taking in more than $2 billion a year in revenues.

Unhappily, the postal system also was one of the most antiquated in the world. Since 1938, Congress had appropriated no funds for construction of a single new facility. In its myriad operations, including culling letters from other mail, facing letters in the right direction for cancellation, sorting and dispatching, the Department was relying on methods and equipment devised for the most part in the days of Ben Franklin. Only the year before, Mr. Summerfield's predecessor had reported: "Many phases of mail-handling operations inherently depend upon the eye, the brain, the hand and the foot, and as yet no robot has been invented to learn schemes, decipher addresses, or sort and effect the delivery of mail."

No one today belittles the difficulty of developing a machine to read addresses, or to handle a product-mix as varied in size, shape, weight, color, texture, and rigidity as mail and parcel post. But in 1952 no one in the United States even was trying to invent a mail robot. The Post Office research staff consisted of three men, none an engineer. Neither the Department nor Congress was interested in doing anything fundamental to stem the mounting complaints of poor service. Although European engineers had been working for decades on improved mail handling, there was no U.S. machine—even in the blueprint stage—which could do any of the basic mail-handling chores.

Not until 1958, in fact, did Congress formally recognize the need for modernizing the creaking system. Even then, it refused to earmark special funds for the purpose, recommending instead that the Post Office continue as best it could the preliminary engineering that had been under way for 5 years on a shoestring basis. The following year, however, when Mr. Summerfield requested $88.5 million for modernization and mechanization, he actually got $80 million. In the current fiscal year, for the first time, he has the funds to get the program rolling.

Meanwhile, the volume of mail has mounted so rapidly that mechanization is now the only alternative to postal paralysis. During the latest fiscal year, the Post Office handled 20 percent more mail than it did in 1953, with about 7 percent more employees—that is, some 550,000 persons will process 61 billion pieces, plus 1 billion parcels. Because volume is determined by population and prosperity, there is no end in sight to the enormous year-to-year increases. Furthermore, manual methods grow increasingly costly. In fiscal 1958, the postal deficit, largely because of wage increases, reached a record $890 million.

The mechanization program is aimed primarily at the mass operations involved in processing mail within post office buildings. It reaches out, however, to include all repetitive operations, wherever they occur. Thus it also covers such incidental, but time-consuming, activities as making change, dispensing stamps, tying knots and making up the payroll, as well as moving mail between work stations, accounting for money orders, making local deliveries and encouraging self-service. On all these fronts, progress is being made.

Some minor mechanization was accomplished quickly, either because it involved only standard machines or small outlays or promised large and immediate savings. As early as 1954, for instance, Mr. Summerfield was able to put automatic cashiers and stamp dispensers behind postal wickets in big cities. At about the same time, privately owned B. H. Bunn Co. of Chicago modified its twine-tying machines, designed to handle commercial packages, to cope with bundles of letters. Also in 1954 the Post Office mechanized payroll and other records with International Business Machines equipment.

In internal transportation, the job was more specialized. Here the Department's engineers themselves took a hand. The most urgent task was to replace all portable equipment which required manual effort to push, pull, lift, carry or store letters. The engineers came up with a conveyor system of power and gravity rollers known as "Mail Flo." Stacked from the floor in four levels, Mail Flo conveyors carry trays of letters from culling to sorting areas and from one manual sorting station to another. The trays are routed automatically by signal cards on their sides, which contact sensing devices. These, in turn, activate switches which divert the trays to the desired destinations.

The first production of Mail Flo Systems was done by privately owned Rapid Standards Co. of Grand Rapids, which subcontracted the control equipment to Control, Design & Fabricating Co. of Detroit, also privately owned. The first such system was installed in Detroit late in 1956; by mid-1960, 16 post offices will have them.

Mechanization of money orders has been going on for 6 years. The first stage, now completed, involved the accounting procedures. After a series of tests, the Post Office settled on an I.B.M. system, replacing paper order forms with three-part punch cards which provide a money order, a Post Office record, and a receipt for the applicant.

These cards eliminate the former application form. Now the customer fills out the money order itself, except for the amount, thus reducing issuing time by about 40 percent. The Department's record and the paid money order eventually are shipped to a money order center at Kansas City, where I.B.M. equipment does the once-tedious job of reconciliation and auditing.

Mr. Summerfield set up the punchcard system in expectation of also mechanizing the issuing of money orders. Development work on punch machines for this job has been going on and 11 companies currently are delivering prototypes. They include Standard Register Co. of Dayton; A. Kimball Co., subsidiary of United Shoe Machinery; Burroughs Corp.; and International Postal Supply, acquired last summer by Friden, Inc., of San Leandro, Calif. Wade S. Plummer, Director of the Department's Office of Research and Engineering, says that "large orders probably will be placed before summer."

Other inviting targets for modernization are involved in local deliveries. Here the now-familiar red-white-and-blue paint job on Department vehicles, which replaced the traditional olive drab, symbolizes a new approach more than paint deep. Studies had revealed that the Department was operating an uneconomic variety of vehicles, many of them overengineered for the job. It also was using too many foot carriers. As a result of these revelations, the Department decided to standardize its vehicles and to develop new lightweight ones. In the process, it doubled its fleet, to 36,000 vehicles. The newer ones, along with specially designed bicycles and caddy carts, have been used to speed deliveries in the suburbs and to motorize carrier service in the city.

For the Post Office, General Motors' Chevrolet Division, Chrysler's Dodge Division, and International Harvester's Metropolitan Body Division have produced 3,765 ¾- and ½-ton trucks with righthand drives. These are for use in suburbia, where each truck saves about three-quarters of an hour a day because the driver need not leave it to reach the mailboxes.

The vehicle program also has included the development and production of Mailsters, glorified three-wheel motorcycles of a quarter-ton each. Main supplier has been Cushman Motor Works, Inc., since 1957 a subsidiary of Outboard Marine Corp. of Waukegan, Ill. Last summer, in pleading with Congress for funds to buy 4,900 new 2-cylinder models at approximately $1,000 apiece, Post Office spokesmen testified that each of the 5,700 1-cylinder Mailsters then in use had saved the Department a dollar a day, as compared to foot-carrier service, thus paying for themselves in 3 years.

Meanwhile, the Post Office is joining in the march toward self-service. Most familiar example is the use of duplicate mailboxes or coporative mail racks for presorting of mail by the customer, by local or out-of-town destinations. Assisting in self-service, too, are a variety of vending machines. The Post Office has contracted for the development of models ranging from stamp dispensers which are able to make change to complete customer-operated postal substations. International Postal Supply, for instance, received a contract to develop a stamp and postal card dispenser, now being evaluated in the Department's new Washington, D.C., test laboratory.

Privately owned Electric Vendors, Inc., of Minneapolis, one of the leaders in the field, has produced 1,500 change-making stamp machines and currently is negotiating an order for 1,000 more. It also has developed another vender which offers three denominations of stamps, two sizes of stamped envelopes, writing paper, books of stamps, postal cards, and sheets of stamps, makes change, and contains letter drops. The Post Office has ordered 20 of these machines, designed for use in railroad stations and air terminals.

The earliest contender in vending machines was Pitney-Bowes, Inc., of Stamford, Conn., which for more than 40 years has been turning out postage meters for use by U.S. business. Back in 1939, Pitney-Bowes offered the Department a coin-operated public postage meter called the Mail-O-Mat, which stamps a letter for any amount from 1 cent to 33 cents, cancels it, makes change and automatically deposits the letter in a mail drop.

At first, the Department felt there was no way for the machine to pay for itself. Now, however, on the theory that full-value vending machines will provide both added convenience and labor savings, the Post Office is showing active interest. On a larger scale, both Food Machinery & Chemical Corp. and the Post Office laboratory have developed substations for round-the-clock suburban operation.

In its own physical handling of mail, the Department faces even more pressing problems—among them the sorting and dispatching of parcel post. Sorting involves facing the package so the address can be read, and assembling it with others of like destination. The packages then must be tied in sacks, stored and dispatched to trucks. Traditionally, the work has involved much lifting, throwing and dumping.

Privately owned Nelson Greller & Associates of Hyattsville, Md., working under Department contract, came up with the first parcel sorter, which was installed in the Baltimore post office in 1956. This accomplished a lot—made 21 separations, reduced the floor space required for sorting, increased productivity, and so on—but not quite enough.

Several other companies now are taking up the challenge. Jervis B. Webb has installed in the Washington post office a parcel sorter which permits pushbutton dispatching to 32 destinations.

Another newcomer in this field is Aerojet-General of Azusa, Calif., a subsidiary of General Tire & Rubber. The company's Atlantic Division, acquired as Ordnance Engineering Corp. in 1956, specializes in automation, and now is completing the design of a parcel sorting system for the Cleveland post office. This installation, according to Dr. John Atanasoff, head of the division, will mechanize more of the parcel post operation than any existing system. The Department also is looking at parcel sorters developed for railroad use by Stewart-Warner of Chicago, and privately owned Alvey-Ferguson Co. of Cincinnati.

Once parcels are sorted and sacked, they must be stored, however briefly, before being assembled by truckload. Fortunately, today's monumental post office buildings, otherwise the bane of the Department, provide in their upper reaches the space required for overhead conveyors to help with such storage.

In 1955 Mechanical Handling Systems, Inc., of Detroit put its engineers to work to adapt overhead conveyors, developed for processing industries, to post office use. In 1957, it installed a monorail conveyor for sacks in the main Chicago post office. More recently, it has completed a $1.5 million conveyor system in Washington, D.C., and now it is finishing a $3 million job in Chicago. Mechanical Handling's system provides pushbutton dispatching to several storage areas and pushbutton callout of the sacks in loading sequence. (This business, however, hardly has made the company prosperous. It lost money both in 1958 and in the first half of 1959.)

Other competitors are such privately owned companies as Alvey-Ferguson, Jervis B. Webb, Rapid Standards Co. of Grand Rapids and C. F. Butz Engineering of Boston. General Electric, Cutler-Hammer, Binks Manufacturing Co. of Chicago, and several small privately owned concerns produce control equipment for the parcel-handling sorters and conveyors.

Obviously, Mr. Summerfield's most important job, and the most difficult, is processing letters. First step is to cull them from the mass of thick envelopes, small packages, and other assorted shapes and sizes of mail. Attempts at mechanization here date back to 1953. More recently, Emerson Radio & Phonograph's Emerson Research Corp. has developed a culling machine of tremendous capacity.

At the moment, however, the Department appears to favor a smaller machine, designed by American Machine & Foundry Co. of New York under Government contract. Completed early in 1959, it separates letters and cards from bulkier mail at the rate of 30,000 pieces an hour. Post Office engineers now are modifying the prototype, which cost roughly $20,000.

The Post Office also is looking closely at a culler developed in Europe by I.T. & T.'s German subsidiary, Standard Elektrik Lorenz, A.G. This machine was tested in 1958 at the West Berlin post office and similar equipment was installed last July in Washington. An improved model will go into the post office which I.T. & T. is building at Providence.

The second stage in processing letters is to face and cancel them. "It is our intention," Mr. Plummer says, "to develop a machine * * * which will take the clean letter mail product from a culling machine at a rate of approximately 30,000 pieces an hour, determine the position of the stamp on the envelope, perform a cancellation and face and stack the output. Progress in the development of this equipment has been particularly successful and most major technical problems have been solved."

American Machine & Foundry and I.T. & T.'s German subsidiary both have built facer-cancelers for use with their respective cullers. Pitney-Bowes, however, appears to lead the field. In 1956 the company decided, as part of its diversification program, to broaden its line of mail-handling equipment, which then consisted primarily of canceling and postage metering machines. Its research led it to Werkspoor, N.V. of Amsterdam, makers of railroad, packaging, and drilling equipment and also of mail-handling machines. One of the latter had been shown at the New York World's Fair in 1939. The companies agreed to join in working on mail equipment and Pitney-Bowes became Werkspoor's U.S. agent.

One of their first projects was development of a facer-canceler, which they undertook without benefit of Government contract. By 1957 their machine was far enough along for testing in the Stamford post office, and a year later the Department ordered 25 more, which now are operating in Washington, Detroit, Philadelphia, and other large cities. Last October it signed a $2.25 million contract for 75 of an improved model. This was the Post Office's first volume order for basic mail-handling equipment.

The Pitney-Bowes facer-canceler, like I.T. & T.'s, handles approximately 30,000 pieces an hour. Both machines, using optical scanners, determine the position of the stamp by the contrast between its color and that of the envelope. This method, however, has its drawbacks, because the scanners can be fooled by a trademark or by an envelope much the same color as the stamp. The Post Office consequently is searching for a way to give stamps a foolproof identification. One of the companies reportedly at work here is Nuclear-Chicago Corp. of Chicago, which specializes in the design and manufacture of instruments to detect radioactive materials and use them for control purposes. Both the Post Office and the company refuse to discuss the latter's $250,000 postal assignment.

The third step in processing letters, and a key one, is sorting. This area has seen the greatest advances of all. For more than 2 years, the Department has been studying two European letter sorters installed in the Washington, D.C., area.

The first of these machines brought to the United States was the Transorma, developed by Werkspoor in the mid-1930's. This was bought by the Brazilian and Argentinean Governments in the early 1940's, and installed by Pitney-Bowes in the Silver Spring, Md., post office in May 1957, at a cost of $117,000. The Transorma has 5 keyboards, at which 5 operators can sort 15,000 letters an hour.

The second sorter, a six-operator machine, was installed in the Washington post office in 1958 at a cost of $170,000. It was produced by I.T. & T's Belgian subsidiary, Bell Telephone Manufacturing Co., which had begun work on it shortly after World War II at the invitation of the Belgian Government. The first unit was installed in a post office in Antwerp in 1951. Since then, others have been put in there, at Brussels and in Israel. Bell currently is negotiating for 4 more for Ghent and Liege, building a pilot installation for Cairo and 11 units for the Providence, R.I., project. The Bell machine sorts about 18,000 letters an hour.

Years before it began examining foreign machines, the Post Office had begun work, with the Bureau of Standards, on a letter sorter designed specifically for U.S. needs. Subsequently it asked Rabinow Engineering Co. of Takoma Park, Md., a privately owned firm headed by a former Bureau of Standards engineer, to develop the design elements and principle of operation for a sorting machine.

In July 1958, the Department turned over the Rabinow designs to Burroughs Corp. for production engineering and manufacture of 10 machines for a total of $1.8 million. A month later, the Post Office awarded Pitney-Bowes the $1.5 million job of improving the basic Rabinow design and building a multiple-unit machine. Burroughs' first sorter went into operation in Detroit in October, as the star of a postal-machine show opened amid fanfare by Postmaster General Summerfield and Burroughs President Ray E. Eppert. The first Pitney-Bowes sorter is being tested in that company's laboratory, and the larger model is scheduled for delivery in April.

These U.S.-made machines, each manned by 12 operators, can sort 36,000 letters an hour to nearly 300 destinations. Once faced and stacked, they are fed automatically into reading position for the operator before moving on to the conveyor. The operator reads the address and punches the keyboard, activating a mechanism which releases the letter from the conveyor when it reaches the point of transfer to the desired destination bin. These machines, even now, cost less than half as much per operator-station as the European ones. Among the companies doing preliminary work on their own for this market are U.S. Industries' Robodyne Division; Aerojet-General's Atlantic Division; and I.B.M.

The limiting factor in all today's sorters is the operator needed to read addresses. Consequently, the Department has tried printing a code in magnetic ink on each envelope, which could be read by machine. U.S.I.'s Robodyne Division has developed a prototype code-printing machine, now on a standby basis, and the Bureau of Standards is working on a universal code for magnetic reading or other application.

The Post Office also has been attacking the reading problem directly. It is working on a machine that will automatically read the address on, and sort, letter mail. Carrying on this work for the Department is Intelligent Machines Research Corp., of Arlington, Va., acquired early in 1959 by Farrington Manufacturing Co., of Needham, Mass.

I.M.R.'s founder, David H. Shephard, now a Farrington vice president, shortly after World War II invented an optical scanner which can read numbers and printed words and punch corresponding holes in a card or transfer the data to tape. The machine, which requires no special ink or paper, has been in commercial production since 1958. More than a score now are in use for processing dividend and travelers' checks, subscriptions, credit card invoices, and the like.

Capacity of the address reader I.M.R. has been developing for the Department gradually has been raised until it now can recognize 13 capital letters and 17 in lowercase. This degree of sophistication enables it to handle the 20 post office names selected for the research project. Says Mr. Plummer: "The machine theoretically can process 75 percent of all letter-sized mail having typed or printed addresses."

In October, the Department awarded Farrington a contract to develop an advanced, transistorized machine capable of reading 10,000 letters per hour and sorting to 40 destinations. The new contract also calls for research into the reading of handwritten addresses. Meanwhile, the Post Office is working on equipment to cull typed and printed envelopes from those with handwritten addresses—yet another illustration of the unfolding complexities of postal mechanization.

As the elements of a mechanized mail system are developed, one by one, the need is increasingly urgent to put them together under optimum conditions, as a guide to expanding their use. A continuing experiment to furnish just such information is the $20 million post office, Project Turnkey, which I.T. & T. is building at Providence.

The company was a logical candidate for the job since it can furnish more of the basic paraphernalia—culler, facer-canceler, and sorter—than anyone else. The Department will own the equipment, but I.T. & T. is financing the construction of the building and will be the landlord.

The Providence project is under the jurisdiction of Intelex Systems, Inc., a subsidiary which markets in the United States products made by I.T. & T. affiliates aboard. According to project manager E. H. Roorback, I.T. & T. expects to sell foreign-made equipment to the Post Office in only experimental quantities. Although details remain to be worked out, Mr. Roorback says there's no doubt that the company will begin production of mail-handling equipment in the United States.

The major operating equipment for Project Turnkey will be supplied by Intelex. The 11 letter sorters, costing about $100,000 apiece, are due to arrive from Antwerp in the spring. Many other suppliers, however, are working on subcontracts. Jervis B. Webb, for one, will install a $500,000 parcel sorting and conveying system.

On this project, Intelex is attempting to make use of the latest industrial developments. Thus, the company hopes to design a container suitable for trucks, railroad cars, and planes and one which large commercial mailers will be able to load themselves.

The new post office will have a daily capacity of 2 million pieces of mail and parcel post. It will handle all mail to and from Providence and is expected incidentally to improve service for more than 100 other post offices in southern New England. The building, which will share a 14-acre site with a heliport, is now about half done, and scheduled for completion later this year.

In constrast, Food Machinery & Chemical's Project Gateway post office at Oakland, Calif., is in the very early stages. So far, the concept has been developed, but not the machinery. According to H. A. Oldenkamp, manager of the company's central engineering laboratories, one objective is to reduce the number of mail handlings from 10 to 2. Although final contracts have not been signed, Mr. Plummer looks for a working post office by 1964.

Even the latter venture is only an intermediate stage in the pursuit of radically new methods to speed the mails and reduce costs. Although the Post Office once delivered mail by Regulus, it is not now working on either guided missiles or satellites as message carriers. It is, however, busy on facsimile transmission of letters.

Since early last year, it has been testing a facsimile line between Washington and the west coast, using standard slow-speed channels. Late in the fall it began tests on high-speed microwave facsimile transmission between Washington and Detroit. Mr. Plummer seems confident that this speed mail eventually will turn out to be fabulous. It promises to make Mr. Summerfield's aim of next-day delivery between any two U.S. cities a reality. Moreover, according to one preliminary estimate, coast-to-coast operation will cost less than a quarter as much as airmail does today.

Last July, the Department awarded a $140,000 research contract for facsimile to I.T. & T. Until recently, certain segments of industry reportedly hesitated to work with the Post Office in this field, because they feared Federal incursions into their territory. The Department now has reassured them on that score, and has been able to enlist the aid of the whole communications industry and its suppliers. I.T. & T., meanwhile, acknowledges that it is working with privately owned A. B. Dick Co. of Chicago, Stewart-Warner and Electronic Communications, Inc., of St. Petersburg.

On every front, then, the Post Office and U.S. industry are cooperating in efforts to shift to machines more of the burden of carrying today's mounting volume of mail. Clearly, the Department still has a long way to go to achieve efficiency comparable to that of many a private enterprise. Moreover, it can't attain that goal without continuing support from Congress. Nonetheless, the steps already taken, within post office buildings and without, augur further improvements in service to the public. For many a firm specializing in business machines, materials handling or communications, the post office should be an inviting market for a long time to come.

THE IMPORTANCE OF NATIONAL RESOURCES DEVELOPMENT

Mr. GRUENING. Mr. President, this morning, before the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs, the distinguished Governor of California, the Honorable Edmund G. Brown, delivered a thought-provoking and dynamic statement on the importance of national resources development, with particular reference to the bill, which is now before the committee, S. 2549.

I ask unanimous consent that this excellent address be printed in the body of the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT REGARDING S. 2549 BY HON. EDMUND G. BROWN, GOVERNOR OF CALIFORNIA, BEFORE COMMITTEE ON INTERIOR AND INSULAR AFFAIRS, WASHINGTON, D.C., JANUARY 26, 1960

I wish to express my sincere thanks to your committee for this opportunity to appear before you. I especially am grateful for the honor and courtesy you have bestowed upon me by convening at this time to hear my statement.

The members of this committee are keenly aware of the importance of full resource development to the welfare of our Nation. An inventory and program for national resource development becomes increasingly necessary with the addition of our two newest States and their different types and abundance of natural resources.

This bill provides the method for coordinating information and policies which can lead to a sound and positive approach to the development of our natural resources. As I have already written Senator MURRAY, population is multiplying beyond any earlier estimates, our needs for food, water, and other natural resources are spiraling. Nothing on the domestic scene is of greater importance to future generations of Americans than sound policies and effective programs to make use of our multitudinous natural resources, land, water, energy, air, minerals, forests, and fisheries.

To illustrate by 1950 in comparison to 1900 the American people were taking from the earth 2½ times more bituminous coal, 3½ times more iron ore, 4 times more zinc, 26 times more natural gas, and 30 times more crude oil. Since 1900, the total withdrawal of water has doubled about every 25 years.

Perhaps it will be helpful if I defer for a few minutes some comments on the importance of this legislation to the people of the entire Nation and speak more specifically about the West and the West's role in the future of our country. This is the geographic area that offers the elbowroom for population and economic expansion. Its proper development is vital to our survival as a world power.

I have spent my entire life in the West and I have witnessed what has been, and still continues to be, perhaps the greatest mass migration of human beings in history. The West has been able to absorb this tremendous influx of new residents not only because of its vast expanse of virgin lands but also because of enlightened Federal investment in its natural resources during the 1930's and 1940's.

However, especially in the years since 1952, the Federal administration's perspective of the national necessity for westward expansion appears to have become dim and distorted. Preoccupation with budget balancing and an almost servile eagerness to bend to the will of selfish interests has been substituted for vision and courage. The pioneer has been replaced by the budgeteer. High interest rates have become more important than high dams.

The development of the West—a great storehouse of natural resources—is a challenge and opportunity for the entire Nation. America's booming population demands more space for economic expansion, for living area, and for recreation. Just space itself is an increasingly precious and scarce resource for human existence in this age of mounting urban density, air pollution, and traffic congestion.

Already the country's expanding population is spreading over the wide reach of the West. The census of our 11 Western States is growing at almost twice the rate of that of the rest of the country. And this is just the beginning.

Failure by the Federal Government to recognize and prepare more fully for this irrepressible westward movement could have disastrous economic and social effects on every section of the Nation. Preparing the West for the vast new populace certain to rise there is essential for a nation whose population is expected to soar to 370 million within just 50 years. There can be no relief from that situation if the basic development of the West is allowed to stagnate for lack of resource programs. In the East, the South, and Midwest, it would mean increasingly overcrowded urban areas and an ultimate ceiling on national development.

Fortunately, this need not happen. Federal investment in the water resources of the 11 Western States will pay huge dividends in terms of ample living space, agricultural land, and industrial expansion capable of sustaining an ever-growing citizenry. All of that will help provide and spread the revenue base for the public services necessary for our increasingly complex society. Federal investment in the devolpment of our water resources will also pay off by providing flood control which would save countless lives and prevent untold millions of dollars in property damage. Finally, it will stimulate to a tremendous degree a booming recreation industry that is contributing substantially to our national economy and can do so far more in the age of shorter working hours which lies ahead.

It is simply good business for the Federal Government to recognize and invest in the vast potential of the West in the interest of the entire national economy. A study based on Federal internal revenue collections reveals that farmers and townspeople on and in the vicinity of Western reclamation projects paid $340 million in income taxes during the 1958 fiscal year. A very sizable share of those payments came from nonfarm residents whose occupations stemmed from irrigation farming activities. Federal taxes from those areas alone have totaled $3½ billion since 1940, 11 percent more than was spent for project construction since the start of the reclamation program in 1902. These tax payments are in addition to regular project repayments which return, in the form of water and power revenues, 92 percent of the funds expended for reclamation projects.

The benefits of western development are manifest for the entire Nation in private as well as public ways. Thus a growing and prosperous West provides a constantly expanding and more lucrative market for eastern industries. The $53 billion market of the Western States was three times the export market of the United States in 1956.

For example, the turbines, the generators, the complex electrical equipment necessary for western waterpower projects spell jobs, prosperity, and a broader tax base in Schenectady, N.Y.; Gary, Ind.; Pittsburgh, Pa.; and other eastern and midwestern manufacturing centers.

Similar benefits also will accrue to the entire Nation as a result of informed and intelligent development of fish and wildlife programs, the proper use of our vast forests and rangelands and national and regional parks throughout America.

Important as this legislation is to the West, it is even more important to the entire Nation. It is essential if we are to meet the needs of our people during the next 50 years. They will not be met by the shortsighted policies of the past 7 years. Full employment of our people in the years ahead demands full employment of our natural resources.

And may I at this point commend your committee, Senator MURRAY, for the farsighted attitude you have taken not only toward the development of our own Nation's natural resources, but also in studying the relative rate of progress of the United States and other countries in resource development.

I have in mind particularly the recent intensive study made by your committee and the Public Works Committee of the Senate of the water resource development programs of the Soviet Union. I would venture the prediction that, in the long run, the rate of development of our natural resources and of our productive capacity could have more effect on the standing of the United States among the nations of the world than our progress in missile development, for our storehouse of natural resources and our ability to use these resources wisely provide the real foundation for the strength and continued vigor of our Nation.

We should bear in mind, too, that the so-called undeveloped nations of the world—nations which in most cases are not yet committed to the East or the West—may be more impressed by the manner and rate of development of our natural resources than our armed might.

So I commend your committee and the Public Works Committee for your study of the Russian program of water resource development. I have read your subcommittee's report with great interest, yet also with great concern. It is most disturbing and disheartening to learn that the Russians' present rate of growth in electric power capacity is faster than that of the United States. It is deplorable, too, to learn that the Russians have built bigger dams, bigger turbines, and longer and higher voltage transmission lines than we have.

For many years we took pride in the fact that Grand Coulee was the world's largest dam. Today, a Russian dam already in operation has relegated Grand Coulee to the No. 2 position, and soon another Russian dam will lower Grand Coulee to the third position.

It is significant that much of the Russians' progress and the slippage in our program have taken place during the period when our administration has expounded the backward-looking, unproductive "no new starts" policy—a policy which the administration has seen fit to reverse only this year as the elections approach. While the Russians, on their side of the Bering Sea, have proceeded with vigor in building massive dams and water resource projects, we have just begun, under the prodding of a Democratic Congress, to plan the giant Rampart Canyon project on our side of the Bering Sea in Alaska.

In the past we have not needed the example of the Russians or any other nation to think in big terms and act in big terms. I do not believe we need such examples today. The challenge is clearly here, if we but face up to it. In our great and expansive West, different time zones and different river flow conditions make obvious the need for interconnections of our regional power systems. We need extra high voltage transmission systems which will be operated on a common carrier principle to transmit power generated by both public and private power utilities. Such long-distance transmission lines would not only make possible more effective utilization of our water resources, but also would provide for the best development and use of our fossil fuels. Yet, in the face of this crying need for giant transmission facilities, a recent report of the Bonneville Power Administration calls for a completely inadequate interconnection between the great Northwest and northern California systems.

I am convinced that the people of the West and the people of the Nation will not be satisfied with such myopic planning—planning that does not show faith in our future. This week, therefore, I am ordering the employment by the State of California of a consulting engineering firm to make a study of plans for a truly adequate extra high voltage transmission interconnection between the Bonneville Power and Central Valley systems. I am hopeful that other affected States will join in such a study. I want to emphasize that I am in complete agreement with our neighbors in the Pacific Northwest that in building any tieline between our regions, first rights to any usable power should remain in the region of origin for use by both public and private agencies.

The need for planning and building high voltage regional interconnections in the West—and, in fact, the entire country—is but one example of the need for the bill which is being discussed before your committee today.

To summarize, Senate bill 2549 gives promise that future Federal resource programs will receive the national attention they deserve and it holds out the promise that resource development programs will be devised on a scale and scope that the Nation's welfare demands.

In closing I call your attention to this advice inscribed on the wall behind the Speaker's chair in the House of Representatives:

"Let us develop the resources of this land; call forth its powers; build up its institutions; promote all its great interests, and see whether we also in our day and generation may not perform something worthy to be remembered."

PRESIDENT'S PROPOSED BUDGET FOR HEALTH INADEQUATE: HOSPITAL CONSTRUCTION GRANTS CUT $60 MILLION

Mr. NEUBERGER. Mr. President, Dr. Howard A. Rusk, the distinguished medical editor of the New York Times, wrote an excellent article for the New York Times of January 24, 1960, assaying President Dwight D. Eisenhower's proposed budget for health.

Dr. Rusk points out that at first glance, the $255 million increase the President asked Congress to appropriate to the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare for the current fiscal year would be sufficient to meet the needs of our growing population and our expanding Federal health, educational, and welfare services.

However, on close scrutiny of the proposed budget for health, Dr. Rusk concludes that this assumption is not accurate:

First, Congress last year voted $3,466 million or $296 million more than the President requested. Added to this is $21 million in supplemental appropriation requests by the administration for the current year, making a total of $3,486,961,000.

Thus the funds requested by the President for the coming fiscal year are actually $56 million less than the combined appropriations and requested supplemental for the current year.

Mr. President, one of the primary changes in requested appropriations for major programs within the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare is the appropriation for hospital construction grants. Despite outstanding achievements made since the inauguration of the Hill-Burton program on August 13, 1946, President Eisenhower has recommended that this program be cut by $60 million.

HILL-BURTON FUNDS IMPORTANT TO OREGON

The Hill-Burton program administered through the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, has been very successful in my State of Oregon. Since the inception of the program, 67 projects have been approved for a total cost of $49.9 million of which the Federal share is $12.2 million. Upon completion, 3,044 beds and 10 health units will have been made possible under the Hill-Burton program in Oregon as of December 31, 1959. Towns in Oregon with a population less than 2,000 in the 1950 census, such as Bandon, John Day, Florence, Gold Beach, Heppner, and Enterprise, have been able to build the hospitals and medical facilities the people in their communities and surrounding areas needed which they might not otherwise have been able to finance. The hospital construction program has been, and still is, very vital to my State in general, and the individual communities particularly. This same program has been equally effective in our other States.

APPLICANTS BEAR MAJOR PORTION OF COST

Mr. President, applicants in Oregon have financed $37.7 million of the total cost of $49.9 million allocated for 67 projects in Oregon. Residents of our State have, thus, borne the major share of the cost of this program. The applicants' share in Oregon was 76 percent and the Federal share of the cost was only 24 percent.

If Congress were to accept the President's recommendation of a $60 million reduction, it would mean a substantial decrease in construction of needed general, mental, and tuberculosis hospitals, as well as nursing homes, diagnostic and treatment facilities, chronic disease, and rehabilitation facilities. The Federal contribution often means the difference between initiating a project or not initiating it. Thus, elimination of these funds would drop construction by far more than $60 million.

Mr. President, in view of the existing need and the many local applications to participate in this program—a desire to cooperate with the Federal Government even though they must provide a far greater share of the cost—it is my strong conviction that Congress must do the same this year that it has done the previous 2 years and increase the $125 million the President has recommended to a far more realistic figure. Last year the administration recommended only $101,200,000 for Federal grants for hospital construction. Congress, however, was able to increase the amount to $185 million. As in previous years, the great demands for additional hospital and medical facilities of our Nation must be adequately met, and this cannot be done under the appropriation recommended by President Eisenhower for the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the article by Dr. Howard A. Rusk, appearing in the January 24, 1960, New York Times, be printed at this point in the RECORD. I also ask unanimous consent that the summary of approved projects under the Hill-Burton program in Oregon, together with the names of the projects approved in Oregon under the Hill-Burton program, both of which were prepared by the division of hospital and medical facilities of the Public Health Service at my request, be printed in the RECORD following my remarks.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Times, Jan. 24, 1960]

THE BUDGET FOR HEALTH—PRESIDENT'S PROPOSAL FOR MORE FUNDS ASSAYED AND SHORTCOMINGS ARE FOUND

(By Howard A. Rusk, M.D.)

In his budget message for fiscal 1961, President Eisenhower asked Congress to appropriate to the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare $255 million more than he had requested for the current fiscal year. The amount is $3,431 million, compared with the $3,176 million requested last year.

At first glance, it would seem that an apparent increase of more than a quarter of a billion dollars would be sufficient to meet the needs of our growing population and our concepts of expanding Federal health, educational, and welfare services.

Close scrutiny of the 70 pages of fine print of the budget devoted to the Department, however, shows that this assumption is not accurate.

First, Congress last year voted $3,466 million, or $296 million more than the President requested. Added to this is $21 million in supplemental appropriation requests by the administration for the current year, making a total of $3,486,961,000.

CHANGES ARE NOTED

Thus the funds requested by the President for the coming fiscal year are actually $56 million less than the combined appropriations and requested supplementals for the current year.

The primary changes in requested appropriations for major programs within the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare are:

Implementation of the National Defense Education Act, an increase of $11,300,000.

Vocational rehabilitation of the handicapped, up $4,833,000.

Environmental health activities, including research and training in radiological health and air and water pollution, up $6,116,000.

Grants to the States to assist needy aged, blind, and disabled persons and dependent children, up $39,500,000.

Construction grants for construction of waste-treatment facilities, down $25 million.

Hospital construction grants, down $60 million.

Health-research construction grants, down $5 million.

Assistance for schools in federally affected areas, down $4,007,000.

Direct Federal construction, down $13,765.

Completely eliminated in the new budget is the current $1 million appropriation for grants to schools of public health.

Based on past experience, there are two major items concerning health in which Congress will probably not agree with the President. These are appropriations for hospital construction and for the National Institutes of Health.

Last year the President recommended $101,200,000 for Federal grants for hospital construction. Congress, however, increased the amount to $185 million. It is quite probable it will be of the same mind this year and will increase the $125 million the President has recommended. This is what happened the last 2 years.

Identical action was taken by Congress on the appropriation for the National Institutes of Health. A year ago President Eisenhower recommended that the appropriation remain the same as the previous year, $294 million, but Congress increased it to $400 million, the largest increase ever made in 1 year for medical research and training.

There are two new programs recommended in the President's budget that are comparatively small in cost, but of great importance. An appropriation of $700,000 is recommended for cooperative research in the welfare field. This is a sound recommendation. During the coming fiscal year more than $2 billion in Federal funds will be spent to provide assistance to the needy, yet we actually know little about the causes of financial dependency and the best methods of reducing it. This new research effort to determine such facts makes good commonsense.

The second new program is an appropriation of $4,694,000 to support scientific activities and research in health, education, and welfare in foreign countries. Such research would be financed with foreign currency, commonly called counterpart funds, owned by the United States as the result of sales of surplus agricultural products.

The President recommended that $3,707,000 be allocated to the National Institutes of Health and $930,000 to the Office of Vocational Rehabilitation for this purpose. This recommendation is most practical.

AID TO NEW KNOWLEDGE

The funds to be used cannot be taken from the countries of their origin under our agreements with them. They are also in excess of the normal requirements of the United States.

With good planning, however, they can be used to great advantage in developing new knowledge that will be of value not only in the nations concerned but also in many other parts of the world, including the United States.

SUMMARY OF APPROVED PROJECTS UNDER THE HILL-BURTON PROGRAM IN OREGON AS OF DECEMBER 31, 1959

Program to date: Since the inception of the program, 67 projects have been approved for a total cost of $49.9 million of which the Federal share is $12.2 million. Upon completion, 3,044 beds and 10 health units will be provided as follows:

THE MISSILE PROGRAM

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, Mr. Hanson W. Baldwin of the New York Times is widely recognized as one of this Nation's most impartial, keen-minded, analytical observers of military affairs.

Last week Mr. Baldwin wrote three carefully reasoned, perceptive articles on defense matters which deserve the attention of every Senator—indeed, every thoughtful American.

His article on "The Defense Budget," appearing in the Times for January 21, 1960, sets forth in brief terms the great strength and versatility of the forces we will maintain in the year ahead.

A series of two articles on our missile programs is particularly informative and timely in view of the Russians' long-range shot into the central Pacific last week.

Mr. Baldwin, a Pulitzer prizewinner widely respected for the correctness and completeness of his reporting, notes in some detail the amazing accuracy of our own long-range missiles. I was particularly impressed with the fact, clearly noted in both of these articles, that the United States has developed an overall missile defense in great depth. We are in no way dependent upon any single missile.

Mr. Baldwin supports this conclusion by reporting in some detail not only on our ballistic missile program, but also on the several other nuclear weapons systems we have in being or advanced stages of development which together give us a strong deterrent force.

Chief among these are the Hound Dog missile, now operational with our B–52 bombers, and the Navy's Polaris missile, which is developing great reliability and what Mr. Baldwin terms "phenomenal accuracy."

From this two-part, highly objective appraisal of our missile position vis-a-vis that of Russia there emerges a total pattern of great strength, versatility, and depth in the Defense Department's several missile programs. Mr. Baldwin has performed a valuable service by reminding us that one spectacular shot into the mid-Pacific does not tip the scales of our missile achievement one iota. He has made a significant contribution to our consideration of the Nation's actual position in the field of missile readiness by presenting in brief, factual form an analysis of the several elements of our existing strength.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Mr. Baldwin's three articles "The Defense Budget" of January 21, "The Missile Gap" of January 22, and "Data on Missiles Support Optimism Over U.S. Defenses" of January 23, be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE MISSILE GAP—HARDHEADED APPRAISALS SUPPORT GATES IN OPTIMISTIC PICTURE OF U.S. DEFENSES

(By Hanson W. Baldwin)

Moscow's claim yesterday of a 1¼-mile circular error in a 7,766-mile rocket flight caused raised eyebrows but no excitement in the Pentagon.

The first of a number of Russian missile shots into a new impact area in the central Pacific, whether or not it was as accurate and as successful as the Russians asserted, is unlikely to influence materially the vigorous and aggressive presentation of the administration's defense policies just initiated.

Secretary of Defense Thomas S. Gates, Jr., Gen. Nathan F. Twining, Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, and Under Secretary of State Livingston T. Merchant tipped the administration's hand in their opening testimony in Congress this week.

Their composite testimony totaled, in the opinion of some Congressmen, the rosiest picture of the U.S. defense posture presented to Congress for a long time. The balance of military power is still "heavily in our favor," Secretary Gates said. Even a Soviet surprise attack with all available missiles could not eliminate our nuclear retaliatory capability.

THE MISSILE GAP

Mr. Gates even cast considerable doubt on what has come by dint of constant repetition to be accepted as a fact by many in the Nation: a missile gap between the United States and the Soviet Union in the next few years. He indicated that if the Russians produced intercontinental ballistic missiles at our present maximum estimate of their potential capabilities they might have a "moderate numerical superiority" in the next 3 years. But the United States has many other nuclear weapons systems, which, collectively, tip the balance of deterrent power "heavily in our favor."

This is an election year. The Democratic opposition is already attempting to make a campaign issue out of the deficiencies in our military posture and is emphasizing particularly the alleged "missile gap." The Republican administration, on the other hand, has been aroused and stung by the opposition attacks. The President, in particular, is known to have been greatly angered by the criticisms voiced in "The Uncertain Trumpet," a book recently published by Gen. Maxwell D. Taylor, U.S. Army, retired, who completed 4 years as Army Chief of Staff last June. The President's mood, particularly about defense matters, is typified by his recent heated response to a somewhat pointed news conference question about defense:

"I've spent my life in this, and I know more about it than almost anybody I think in the country."

Is, then, Mr. Gates' testimony rhetoric, the opening guns of the defense in an election year; or is it solidly based on factual appraisal?

A COMPOUND ANSWER

The answer to this question is almost certainly compound. Mr. Gates has too much integrity—he is a public servant who is no politician and owes no man anything—to give other than his honest opinion. But he is aware, as is the White House, that the Pentagon case has not been put skillfully or forcefully in the past.

The administration feels that the public image of relative American weakness that has been created—partly by Communist propaganda, partly by undoubted Communist achievements, partly by the special pleading of the individual services, partly by opposition criticism, partly by inept administration presentations of our strength—is grossly exaggerated. Mr. Gates, therefore, is certainly determined to put his best foot forward, not only for domestic political reasons but also because he is keenly aware that a strategic deterrent is no stronger than the enemy thinks it is.

But at the same time his optimistic statements are based on hard-headed comparative appraisals of our own and of Soviet strength. The Secretary spoke of new intelligence estimates of Soviet missile strength, which he described as "very significant."

These estimates were not made public, but in an explanatory conference later the Secretary got onto slippery ground when he admitted that the new estimates took into account what the Russians intended to do in missile production, rather than, as in the past, merely estimating their capabilities.

In the intelligence field this issue of intentions versus capabilities is one of the oldest of pitfalls, and many experts have come a cropper by trying, in effect, to read the enemy's mind.

Nevertheless, the new intelligence reports do include an estimate of current Soviet long-range missile strength and of current Soviet missile production that, in comparison with our own current status, is by no means discouraging.

DATA ON MISSILES SUPPORT OPTIMISM OVER U.S. DEFENSE—AMERICAN WEAPONS PROVE ACCURACY—SOVIET MIGHT IS FOUND EXAGGERATED

(By Hanson W. Baldwin)

The factual, rather than the political, motivation for the administration's new public relations policy of aggressive optimism about the Nation's defense posture has some firm foundations.

Our own missiles have demonstrated amazing accuracy, and widely published reports of tremendous Soviet missile strength are not supported by substantiated intelligence information. Here are some of the reasons for the newly expressed optimism:

Despite reports of 100 or more Soviet missile bases, there is still solid factual proof of only two long-range missile-launching sites—those long used by the Soviet Union for its test launchings at Kapustin Yar, near Stalingrad, and Tyuratam, near the Aral Sea.

Until this week's 7,762-mile rocket shot from Tyuratam to an impact area in the central Pacific, only one Soviet missile has been tracked to a full 5,000-mile flight to land in the northern Pacific. All the rest of the long-range shots—and there have not been many—have impacted in the sea of Okhotsk or near Kylucki, the Soviet impact area on the Kamchatka Peninsula, a distance of 4,300 miles from Kapustin Yar and 3,850 miles from Tyuratam.

PROBABLE CIRCULAR ERROR

The approximate probable circular error of these Soviet intercontinental ballistic missiles has been estimated as possibly 7 to 10 miles, a much greater error than the Soviets claimed this week for their 7,762-mile shot.

It is quite possible that their new and more powerful rocket now incorporates an improved inertial guidance system that permits greater accuracy. On the other hand a "C.E.P." (circular error probable) for any weapons system cannot be determined except as an average of numerous flights.

The average circular error of the Atlas D missile, which is now being delivered to the Air Force as an operational missile, has been for the last eight 5,000-mile range shots considerably less than half of the 2-mile error the President revealed in his state of the Union message. The D missile, with radio-inertial guidance, has demonstrated phenomenal accuracy, sufficient if it can be continued to destroy any point target (as well as an area target, like a city).

The Atlas E, scheduled for first flight shortly after midsummer, is a "bird" that will have complete inertial guidance as well as a lighter engine and longer range. This means that a whole salvo of 9 or 10 missiles can be fired simultaneously from the same base, whereas the radio-inertial system, because of possible mutual interference by radio transmissions, is limited to about three simultaneous firings from one base.

The new E missile may not develop the same accuracy as the current model and it must be stressed that all the firings, except one performed by a Strategic Air Command crew at Vandenberg Air Force Base on the Pacific coast, were by experienced "missileers" down an instrumented range at Cape Canaveral, Fla.

Nevertheless, U.S. missile experts are confident that the problem of accuracy with the ICBM has been solved and available facts indicate we are equal to or ahead of the Russians in this field.

The Navy's Polaris missile, designed for launching from submerged submarines, registered equally phenomenal accuracy in one recent flight (with guidance equipment installed) of more than 900 miles. (The full 1,200-mile-range missile has not yet been tested and none has yet been fired from a submarine.) It landed almost on top of the target, in fact almost within the length of a city block from bullseye.

There is some evidence to suggest that the Soviet air defense system is not so effective as it had once been credited with being. The Hound Dog missile, now operational, launched from B–52 bombers in flight, adds considerably to the problems of the defense. To the admitted U.S. superiority in manned bomber strength, has now been added the first small nucleus of intermediate range and intercontinental range ballistic missiles.

All this collectively adds up to a reassuring reappraisal of present U.S. deterrent strength relative to that of the Soviet Union and to a short-term future that appears to be less black than had been painted in many quarters.

Many officers agree with the statement by Secretary of Defense Thomas S. Gates, Jr., that "there is no deterrent gap" and is not likely to be one within the foreseeable future.

Others go further and say they doubt that a "missile gap," a Soviet superiority in numbers of long-range missiles, will, in reality, develop. There is, however, no unanimity on this point. Most officers from all services are worried about the long-term future and would like to see our calculated risks today and tomorrow reduced.

More funds for defense and a reallocation of the defense budget are urged by many.

THE DEFENSE BUDGET—SLIGHT BUT SIGNIFICANT CHANGES NOTED IN AMOUNTS EACH SERVICE WILL GET

(By Hanson W. Baldwin)

Funds for a standby air alert for the Strategic Air Command, more intercontinental ballistic missiles, and a cut in Air Force and Navy personnel and piloted planes were proposed Monday in the President's defense budget.

There were no sharp surprises in the 1961 budget; most of the changes, cuts and strength figures had been forecast, some of them months ago. The defense section of the President's budget message was confident in tone. There was no recognition of the so-called missile gap, either present or impending.

The trend of the Eisenhower administration toward a reduction in numbers of men and operating units continues in the 1961 estimates.

But the percentages of the defense dollar that go to the various services shift slightly but perhaps significantly for the first time since the new look was adopted in President Eisenhower's first term.

The Air Force proportion of new obligational authority is slightly reduced, the Navy's slightly increased. About 23½ percent of the new funds requested is earmarked for the Army, almost 30 percent for the Navy and Marines, almost 44 percent for the Air Force and the remainder for the Department of Defense.

In actual estimated expenditures, as contrasted to new obligational authority, there is little shift from last year. The total funds requested, $40,577 million in new obligational authority, maintain the level budget concept of the administration.

The budget makes no mention of a cut in personnel. Actually, however, the Navy's strength at the start of the fiscal year on July 1, 1960, is to be 619,000 men, 11,000 fewer than the 630,000 that had been scheduled for the end of the current 1960 fiscal year. Similarly, the Air Force goes down from a prior scheduled 845,000 to 825,000. Actually, most of these cuts have already been absorbed during the current fiscal year. The Navy's most recent strength figures totaled less than 617,000 men; the Air Force numbers about 832,000. Army and Marine strength will remain the same, with total Armed Forces of about 2,489,000 men and women.

The Navy will operate some 43 fewer ships, and its active aircraft inventory will be sharply reduced from an originally planned 9,200 planes on June 30, 1960, to about 8,348 on June 30, 1961.

The Air Force comes down from a planned 102 wings on June 30, 1960, to 91 on June 30, 1961, and drops from an originally planned total of 19,982 planes to 18,885 for the same dates. Actually, some of these cuts have also been absorbed during the current year.

The Army retains 14 divisions, adds 1 infantry battle group, 1 missile command, and 9 antiaircraft missile battalions. The Marines remain at 175,000 strength, with 3 divisions and 3 air wings.

The reduction in the number of the Strategic Air Command's wings from 40 to 38 is partly compensated for by new planes and more missiles. The increase in the number of ballistic missiles is modest and had long been tentatively planned—once the first of our ICBM family, the Atlas, had proved its accuracy.

Seventy more of the giant ocean-spanning rockets are now programed, bringing to 27 squadrons, 10 missiles to a squadron, the total now scheduled with funds provided from prior years, the current year, and the 1961 budget.

The present "mix" calls for 14 Titan and 13 Atlas squadrons, but this is subject to change.

The Navy gets a somewhat larger shipbuilding program than had been expected, with 3 more Polaris missile submarines included and funds for long-lead-time items for another 3, bringing the grand total now programed to 15.

The President's budget message took little note of the major criticisms of the administration's defense policies. The budget was not increased; in new obligational authority it was slightly decreased.

It was not reallocated to any major degree either as between the services or between offense and defense.

Two among many controversial items that are sure to produce a lot of oratory on Capitol Hill are the reduction of the Air Force's supersonic B–70 bomber program to two prototypes and the request for funds to construct a conventionally powered, rather than a nuclear-powered, aircraft carrier. Both were dictated in considerable part by budget considerations; both are likely to evoke opposition.

Congress may vote funds for more missiles, as it did last year, and certainly in an election year each major item of the defense budget will receive close scrutiny. But when the tumult and the shouting dies, the approved budget will probably differ only slightly in final totals from yesterday's Presidential recommendations.

ADDRESS ON CHILDREN AND YOUTH BY EX-SENATOR HERBERT H. LEHMAN, OF NEW YORK

Mr. NEUBERGER. Mr. President, one of the genuine problems confronting America in the 1960's is the proper development of children and youth. All of us are concerned over rising levels of juvenile delinquency, which has attained disturbing proportions. Yet we know that the youth of our country is sound today, as it has always been sound throughout our eventful history.

But many grave problems face our youth in this modern era—lack of adequate housing, crowded schools, slums and all that they imply, dope addiction, alcoholism, and many other pitfalls.

One of the thoughtful students of this urgent and critical situation is our former colleague from the State of New York, the Honorable Herbert H. Lehman, who has not only served in the Senate but was also Lieutenant Governor and Governor of that great State. His experience is vast.

On January 14, 1960, ex-Senator Lehman addressed himself to this question when he spoke before the general convention session of the National Retail Merchants Association at their 49th annual convention. I should particularly like to call attention to the eight specific problems listed by Senator Lehman in his challenging and informative address. They are as follows:

First. Many of the Nation's classrooms are overcrowded.

Second. There is a shortage of many teachers.

Third. Some students who have ability drop out before finishing high school.

Fourth. Opportunities for some children are blocked because of discrimination.

Fifth. Many children still live in slums.

Sixth. Some youths have physical handicaps which could have been prevented or can be cured.

Seventh. About one-fourth of all the children in the Nation live in families with very low incomes.

Eighth. Over a million youths are apprehended by the police every year for the kind of conduct roughly termed "juvenile delinquency."

The speech by former Senator Herbert H. Lehman, Mr. President, is so pertinent a discussion of many of the questions which we are considering in this 2d session of the 86th Congress, that I ask unanimous consent that his address entitled "Creative Opportunities for Children and Youth" be printed in the body of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CREATIVE OPPORTUNITIES FOR CHILDREN AND YOUTH

(Address of the Honorable Herbert H. Lehman, at the general convention session of the National Retail Merchants Association's 49th annual convention, Terrace Ballroom, Hotel Statler, New York City, Thursday, January 14, 1960)

I deeply appreciate the opportunity extended to me by Mr. Nathan Gold, your president, and Mr. Alfred C. Thompson, your president-elect, to participate in this very significant session.

This year is the golden anniversary of the White House Conference on Children and Youth.

Let me say first that these conferences have a historical base. In the early 1900's people became alarmed about the plight of widows and orphans and the children of families with disabled husbands. Such children were being taken away and placed in orphanages or in similar institutions. It was estimated that 143,000 children were torn away from their parents for reasons of poverty alone and sent to live in institutions. This situation became so alarming that in 1909 President Theodore Roosevelt called a White House conference to consider the plight of dependent children. In issuing his call, he said: "Home life is the highest and finest product of civilization. Children should not be deprived of it except for urgent, compelling reasons. Surely poverty alone should not disrupt homes."

This conference had several results. First, a Mother's Pension Act was passed in 1911 which, together, with the Workmen's Compensation Act, became the first social insurance measures adopted in the United States. Second, the U.S. Children's Bureau was created to help promote and protect the interests of children and their mothers. Third, the Child Welfare League of America, a federation of child care agencies, was formed to help raise and maintain standards of care for agencies sheltering needy, neglected and dependent children who were living away from their own homes. Fourth, the White House Conference became an established custom, taking place every 10 years with representatives of children's groups, religious agencies, civic leaders, educators, and others interested in the welfare of children, assembling in Washington under White House sponsorship.

There have been five such conferences held under White House auspices. The one to be held in March of this year will be the sixth. Over the many years has come one clear and simple conclusion from these conferences:

It is of course trite to say that our greatest asset—our most valuable national resource—is the children and youth of our Nation. There can be no question of that.

The Conference theme for 1960 is "To Promote Opportunities for Children and Youth To Realize Their Full Potential for a Creative Life in Freedom and Dignity."

This report will be based on:

1. Study and understanding of (a) the values and ideals of our society; (b) the effects on the development of children and youth of the rapid changes in this country and the world; and (c) how family, religion, the arts, government, community organizations and services such as health, education, and welfare, and the behavior of adults in their interactions with children and youth deter or enable individual fulfillment and constructive service to humanity.

2. Examination of the degree of achievement of previous White House Conference goals and recommendations.

3. Determination of the action that individuals, organizations, and local, State, and National Government can take to implement conference purposes.

You are to be congratulated on your wholehearted acceptance of the objectives of the White House Conference on Children and Youth. I am delighted to know that the board of directors of the sales promotion division will urge retail stores throughout the country to implement the results of the Conference at the local level.

This is a vital and important public service you are undertaking. Too many times in the past the attitudes of some industrialists and merchants has been that the business of business is only business. But local retail merchants, almost better than anyone else, come to know the many problems that people and communities face in the process of everyday living.

And retail merchants also know from firsthand experience that they should help in whatever ways they can to make their communities, their States, their country, a better place in which to live so that every child can grow, and come to enjoy the pursuits of liberty and happiness.

There is no more rewarding experience in my opinion than helping to make it possible in every way we know, for children to grow up and make the maximum use of their abilities. In my career as Governor of New York and as a U.S. Senator, I have felt an understandable pride at the part I took in making it possible for children, youth and families to have an opportunity to obtain better housing, better health services, better recreational facilities and better educational opportunities.

I believe all of us—in private and public life, in business and in government—wish, for the sake of our own sense of self-worth and in order to repay in some part the debt we owe society, to contribute our services in trying to make a better world for our children and our children's children.

While I have a tremendous pride in what we have done in our Nation for our children and youth, there are still vast gaps in our services for children and youth:

Many of the Nation's classrooms are overcrowded.

There is a shortage of many teachers.

Some students who have ability drop out before finishing high school.

Opportunities for some children are blocked because of discrimination.

Many children still live in slums.

Some youths have physical handicaps which could have been prevented or can be cured.

About one-fourth of all of the children in the Nation live in families with very low incomes.

Over a million youths are apprehended by the police every year for the kind of conduct roughly termed "juvenile delinquency."

These are hard, real facts.

If I had more time I could continue with additional findings of official agencies which describe a series of other needs of children and youth warranting your attention, and each of your members will begin to focus. Find out what your local needs are and begin to help work with others on them. Become members of the boards of your local agencies and see for yourselves at firsthand what the problems are and what needs to be done. Take an active role yourself in local public and voluntary groups. Support your public agencies that are concerned with children and youth and help them adapt to changing community needs.

One of the very important areas in which your association can help is with respect to work experience opportunities for young boys in your communities. We need to enlist the support of enlightened employers to permit more young people to hold part-time jobs in offices and stores, after school, on Saturdays, and during vacations. Under appropriate safeguards, young boys can learn good work habits, develop a sense of responsibility, and gain some idea of their future vocational aptitudes. This means that employers would have to make a little extra effort to make the work experience meaningful. But such experience, I believe, would pay great dividends. It would help in the fight against juvenile delinquency. It would help prevent future dependency. It might reduce the number of school dropouts. It is a suggestion which I hope your members will explore along with other groups in each community.

During my service as Senator I was chairman of a Senate committee which gave careful study to the problem of juvenile delinquency in the United States. We heard testimony from many groups interested in this matter. I was appalled at the vast amount of conversation on the subject, but the lack of any real action to try and solve the problem. It was—and still is—a topic like the weather. I found many responsible businessmen, parents, and citizens who wanted to discuss it and grumble about it, but very few people felt they could do anything specific about it.

But something can be done about juvenile delinquency. After many months of diligent effort our committee reported out a bill on the subject to make a start in a nationwide campaign against juvenile delinquency.

My bill authorized the establishment of a National Council on Juvenile Delinquency to be composed of outstanding men and women concerned with this problem. They were to make recommendations to formulate a national program and policy to combat delinquency. The bill also authorized funds to strengthen existing local and State programs, to encourage local demonstration projects, research and training of personnel.

It was not a grandiose program, it was not a cureall; but it was a solid step forward which would have helped to set us on a road to meet the challenge of juvenile delinquency.

As my last official legislative act in the Senate I was successful in getting the bill passed by that body. However, the bill has never passed the House of Representatives. Lack of community support is probably a key factor in the apathy over this legislation. You can help overcome this apathy.

Here is a vital area for your association to look into. Juvenile delinquency legislation is not a partisan political issue. Juvenile delinquency affects fathers and mothers, irrespective of their political beliefs. It hits families with low incomes, middle incomes, and, yes, even those with high incomes. It affects families in the slums and in the suburbs. It is a dread disease that knows no class, race or social status.

One of the most puzzling developments among young people is the vandalism which frequently occurs. Most vandalism seems so senseless and wasteful to each of us when we read the evening paper. But sociological studies have shown that such acts have a definite purpose to the delinquents who commit them. It has been found that they express a deep-seated hostility toward the community. Chaotic and conflict-ridden neighborhoods and slums breed much of the vandalism.

There is something you can do about this in your communities.

We are spending millions of dollars to find the causes of cancer, heart disease, and other ailments. Yet, we spend practically nothing to discover the factors causing juvenile delinquency or to develop successful ways of overcoming it. This is penny wise and pound foolish.

Juvenile delinquency should be more than a happy hunting ground for the headline-hunters. Every so often some public official, or would-be public official, gets into the newspapers with a proposal to cure juvenile delinquency by getting tough or by getting soft; by beating the juvenile delinquents or by beating the parents, or both; by equipping policemen with longer clubs; by treating all juvenile delinquents as though they had the measles, or by putting them all into jail. These are but a few of the prescriptions I have read in recent weeks. I suppose there is a germ of truth in all of these ideas, although certainly none of them provides the answer to the problem.

The trouble is that the problem itself is not clearly understood. Most of all, it needs experimental study and extensive experience through compassionate work with children and youth, by trained experts. Surely the answer is not just more policemen equipped with heavier clubs. These are our children we are talking about—your children and mine. We need to bring to bear upon this problem every resource that we have and can mobilize. Not only the Federal Government, but every unit of government in the Nation—and every force in the community—needs to do what it can. This is truly a community problem.

But not enough is yet known about what we can do. Certainly, however, it is clear and generally acknowledged that Federal leadership is required, and some Federal money. The past failure of Congress to enact legislation making it possible for a start to be made toward finding a solution to this grave and growing problem is one of the most reprehensible failures of which the Congress and the administration can be charged. Those responsible for this failure in the past have assumed an intolerable responsibility.

This year the administration and the Congress must be separately and collectively held to account on this matter. As a matter of fact, there is reason to believe that Congress will give serious consideration this year to juvenile delinquency legislation. I hope that the legislation will go at least as far as the legislation I proposed several years ago, and which the Senate approved at that time. I hope that funds will also be allocated to the National Institute of Mental Health and to the Children's Bureau for research, demonstration projects, and training of personnel in this area. It is imperative that we begin to make a nationwide attack on this problem. We need your cooperation in this effort.

Another vital area in which you can help is to arouse public opinion to the need of amending the social security law to provide that all needy children be eligible for assistance. I think we have fenced the aid to dependent children in with so many restrictions that we have lost sight of its fine and basic purpose—to help needy children in their own homes so that none need suffer that ultimate deprivation, loss of home and family.

To accomplish this, the aid to dependent children provisions must be broadened, liberalized and humanized so that every needy child is found qualified to receive help. Let us give that help without too many strings attached. For those strings today are hurting not only our children, but the entire community.

The National Retail Merchants Association can make a valuable contribution by encouraging its membership to work not only at the local, but at the State and national levels on the many problems affecting children and youth. The White House Conferences on Children have been a great stimulus to activities on behalf of children and youth. But the problems facing youth are not simply problems which can be taken up only once every 10 years. They are an ever-present challenge, day in, day out. I would hope you would include on the agenda of your association's work, as a permanent concern, the needs of all children and youth.

A dynamic society such as ours faces many serious challenges in the years ahead. Because of vast technological advances, our future generations must have much more intensive technical proficiency than any previous generation. We are living in a world of tremendous change. These changes require knowledge and understanding among all our citizenry. It means we must have an intelligent, able, healthy body of men and women. This means we will have to spend much more for education, health, and welfare in the future. And that will mean more money out of our pocketbooks into the public treasury.

The growing number of children in our Nation will place many burdens upon local communities that will raise continued pleas for State and national financial aid and leadership. To understand these needs and these trends will be important. You can help in this very important endeavor.

Our Nation must have the creative spirit, the abilities, the vigor and resourcefulness which comes from youth. It must help them to become good citizens, good parents, and good leaders for the future. Whatever it costs us in taxes to accomplish these purposes, it is a good investment. That is how I urge you to look at the money we must spend on the education, health, and welfare of our children and youth. The funds required are not simply ordinary expenditures; they are an investment in your future in our Nation's future.

Fifty years ago, when President Theodore Roosevelt called the first White House Conference on children, he said: "No child should be deprived of home life because of poverty"; and he added, "The interests of the Nation are involved in the welfare of this army of children no less than in our great material affairs."

This statement is still well worth pondering. There are those who think of America's greatness solely as its material accomplishments. But this is only part of the story. Our concern must be for the value of each individual, for family life, for the creative potentialities in every person.

I would like to repeat the theme for the conference this year: "To promote opportunities for children and youth to realize their full potential for a creative life in freedom and dignity."

I believe that these statements form an excellent basis for the National Retail Merchants Association to develop a nationwide program. I hope you will help activate every community in which you have a member to take a greater interest in its children and youth. I hope you will participate in every State in the Nation in the planning for the services for children and youth that are needed in the coming decade. And I trust you will not forget that your interest, your attention, your activity, must also be focused on legislation, appropriations, and programs at the national level, too.

I look forward to learning about the progress of your important work. I know each of you and the Nation will be richer for your interest and your efforts on behalf of children and youth.

A NATION'S CONCERN: WATER

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. President, probably the best informed writer on resources problems in the United States today is Roscoe Fleming, author-columnist for the Denver Post, and contributor to many other publications.

On December 14, the Christian Science Monitor published an article on water resources by Mr. Fleming which is the finest popular summary of our situation in regard to this resource which I have seen.

The article is especially fine because the author gives the public a concept of the importance of the work being done by our Select Committee on National Water Resources, and a further understanding of the potential value of S. 2549, the Resources and Conservation Act of 1960, on which the Interior and Insular Affairs Committee is starting hearings this week.

I ask unanimous consent that Mr. Fleming's article be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Christian Science Monitor, Dec. 14, 1959]

A NATION'S CONCERN: WATER

(By Roscoe Fleming)

(By 1980 the United States could be a water-shy nation if proper forethought, planning, and action are not taken to stop waste, pollution, and other misuses of this valuable resource. A warning is sounded here in unmistakable terms.)

DENVER.—One of the United States greatest resource problems and greatest opportunities are alike embraced in one word—water. Many communities are feeling water shortages for the first time. The humid East is beginning to experience the pinch that the dry West has had to live with from the beginning. And the 250 million or more Americans of 1980 will need usable water in huge new drafts, for new uses and thirsty industries. The Nation's needs for fresh water have doubled each quarter century. And the pace grows faster.

Water is the resource necessary to develop all others, so the country must provide usable water in advance of all other resource development. And since the prime duty of each generation is to provide for the next, this generation's children will judge it in some degree by what shall have been done in this realm. From this standpoint there is already a water emergency, even though most communities still have what they need, most of the time.

Says H. L. Nace of the U.S. Geological Survey: "We have been using, misusing, polluting, and generally wasting water as if there would never be a tomorrow. It must be managed with the understanding that there will be a tomorrow, and a very long one, we hope."

Many communities are already seeing the door of opportunity slowly closed in their faces, for lack of this one resource. But those with a large, sure supply of fresh water lose no opportunity to brag of it as first among all their attractions for new industry.

PUBLIC SEEMS UNCONCERNED

Yet most water discussion seems confined to people already concerned with it, and mostly on the technical level, as happened at the most recent National Reclamation Association convention in Denver. The general public largely refuses to become concerned—as long as water comes out of the taps.

As a people, Americans have been spoiled. They get worked up about water only when the well runs dry or conversely, in time of flood. For one thing, most of their ancestors came from a humid environment. And water has traditionally been so plentiful and cheap that people in the United States have grown to expect thrifty management of it as a matter of course, and tend to think that water, like air, should be free or almost so.

Most city dwellers pay only 5 to 8 cents a ton for this prime necessity of life, delivered, purified, and always on tap in their homes. At this rate the householder can fill the hot-water tank in his basement for a penny or less. Yet water managers sadly know that the public reacts automatically and violently to any suggestion of higher water rates.

Paradoxically, where water is less plentiful, as in the reclamation West, it may come even cheaper. The average irrigation farmer pays about a penny for a thousand gallons, or more than 4 tons, delivered all the way from the mountains to nourish his crops. If he has to pay more, he grumbles that he cannot make a living at the high cost of water. This is quite often true.

The big fact about the U.S. water supply is that nature still provides much more than the Nation could consume, but that with present means only a small fraction of it can be utilized. Most water is still "wild," captured in the hills like an animal, leashed, and led to where it is put to work.

The weather, which supplies the water, wavers erratically in time between drought and cloudburst. In space also, the supply varies from less than 5 inches yearly in some areas, to more than 100 in others. The continental United States as a whole has an average of about 30 inches of precipitation, but its western half gets about half as much as its eastern one.

In a normal year about 5 billion acre-feet of water falls, or 5.5 trillion tons (an acre-foot contains 325,851 gallons). The United States still actually uses only about 10 percent of this, or 3 inches out of 30. So, what is there to worry about?

ATMOSPHERE RECLAIMS MUCH

Well, for one thing, about 3.5 billion acre-feet, or 70 percent, goes back into the atmosphere by evaporation, transpiration, or sublimation—the latter meaning return to the air from the frozen form, not even pausing to melt.

The remaining 30 percent or 9 inches of precipitation becomes runoff, from which man dips for his needs. But so far he is dipping only about one-third—the rest is so distant from where he needs it, or is otherwise so unavailable, that it costs more than it's worth.

However, precipitation and runoff are not the only potential sources. It has been raining on this continent for billions of years, and much water has remained—both underground and on the surface. The region around the Great Lakes is so soaked with glacial melt that the Great Lakes themselves hold nearly one-fifth of the planet's fresh surface waters, or 5,500 cubic miles.

Then Americans build dams as industriously as beavers. About 2 million man-made reservoirs, large and small, now dot the Nation's surface. The 1,300 largest contain 278 million acre-feet alone; and the whole grading down in size to farm ponds and even to swimming pools, contain 300 million acre-feet or more. If all were thrown together, these would constitute a mighty new lake almost as large in area as Lake Michigan.

This dam building will go on apace, but according to U.S. Geological Survey experts, it gets more expensive in each basin in proportion to the amount of water usefully stored, until at last it will become uneconomical in all basins. Even now, the United States pays in terms of water lost to evaporation from such artificial reservoirs alone at least 33 million acre-feet yearly.

Underground—not just in the soil around the roots of plants, but farther down—there is even more water, many billion acre-feet of it. But for much of it the cost of pumping is again prohibitive; and much of it is so mineralized it can't be used without treatment. This is true of much surface water also.

Again, as to this ground water, it has taken nature many thousand years to store it, while this Nation can by comparison use it all up in a flash. It is a mine, not a renewable resource. The people of Madison, Wis., for example, drink water that fell as rain about the time of Jesus. In some areas this slowly accumulated supply has already been pumped out, so that people are beginning to have to pack up and move on.

The problem is also economic. Much of the fresh water supply, even in the driest regions like the Southwest, is still to be developed and will come only slowly into use as water becomes more precious and more worth development. Undoubtedly the populace will continue to use up surface waters until, in the words of one veteran conservationist, "few American rivers will live to reach the sea." Actually, a trickle will always reach the sea, but in most instances only enough to carry off the trash.

DISTRIBUTION NOT ANSWER

Can complete distribution of surface water solve the problem? No, for as Mr. Nace also points out, "This would require so complicated and fabulously expensive a system of transbasin diversions as to be impracticable." It would also bring on new water wars, since nothing arouses the people of a major basin like the suggestion that they should share its waters with others, even though they themselves have plenty for now. There is always a tomorrow, you know.

The largest potential source of fresh water, the one most easily and cheaply developed, lies in stopping waste of the available supply in such menial tasks as carrying off our sewage and industrial detritus.

Much waste is so commonplace as to be overlooked. One dripping faucet can waste a bathtub full of water daily. A large city, suffering from drought, found that nearly 10 percent of its precious supply was going through air-conditioning apparatus, then running off down the sewer. A recycling regulation fixed that. A backyard swimming pool may use up more water during a season than the family uses for all other purposes; and the garbage disposal units now installed in millions of American homes are water-wasters.

Always Americans have sought the nearest stream to rid themselves of wastes, and do so still. In 1956 the Public Health Service was empowered to proceed against pollution of interstate streams. Its first major acts were to move against two cities of nearly 100,000 persons each, which are still dumping raw sewage into the communal river. And new types of waste, chemical and atomic, are constantly developing.

Yet scarcely any man-polluted waters are as expensive to redeem as sea water, despite all the excitement about converting the latter.

The Public Health Service has said that $5 billion would permit a good beginning at cleaning up our polluted rivers. Present grant-in-aid Federal appropriations are at $50 million yearly. And there is argument over continuing to appropriate that much.

Water can also be saved, more largely in the West, by reducing seepage; by eliminating water-wasting plants like the tamarisk, the manna plant of the Bible, now spread over millions of Western acres, and by cutting down evaporation. A general Western yardstick is that only about half the water in the reservoir actually reaches the crops. Even then, it is likely to be carelessly used.

CHEMICAL RETARDS PROCESS

Evaporation control is promising, particularly by using hexadecanol, the chemical which spreads over a water surface only one molecule thick, but can retard evaporation greatly. Application is so cheap that even a very partial efficiency will pay. As water grows in value, so will this practice spread.

When all such ways of saving water have been exhausted, however, there still remains the possibility of increasing the absolute supply.

Some means of doing this include:

Cutting forests selectively, as on the western mountains, permitting to reach the ground snow that otherwise remains up on the evergreen branches by billions of tons and softly and silently vanishes away in the first Chinook wind of spring. Experimentally, such cutting has proven able to increase runoff by nearly one-third.

Making snow reservoirs by covering huge mountain drifts, or crevasses packed with snow, with some substance that will slow down melting and evaporation. Plain sawdust works well.

Seeding the clouds to increase rainfall. In mountainous country at least, this could apparently increase precipitation 10 to 15 percent if pursued consistently year round. Nothing is more needed than a several year complete program of seeding research to cover a whole river basin. And again, this method is so cheap in terms of extra water produced, that its use is bound to increase as water grows more precious.

Finally, freshening salty water. This is already being done in many places where water is most scarce. For one example, Coalinga, Calif., a town of 6,000 persons, now freshens all its water for drinking from local brackish sources, rather than shipping in fresh water 45 miles by tank car.

Ultimately—as again is already being done in many places—this will mean tapping the greatest waterhole of all, the 314 million cubic miles of ocean, a prospect toward which an elaborate Federal program now is being carried out.

Secretary of the Interior Fred A. Seaton confidently predicts that this technique will ultimately free mankind from total dependence on nature's casual supply of fresh water.

Dovetailing into all these ways of saving, reclaiming, and claiming water are, of course, advances in knowledge of weather and climate to enable the Nation better to gage and to space possible supply ahead of time.

COOPERATIVE WILL LACKING

But do all these ways and means together mean easy and rapid conquest of the Nation's—and the world's—total water problem?

By no means. For perhaps the most stubborn obstacle of all is the inflexibility of human institutions, made more inflexible by the failure of men to work together, and their propensity even to work against each other, in respect to water supply.

Ever since the old hollow-log water main days in Boston, Baltimore, and Philadelphia, water supply has been jealously regarded as a local project, and communities have reached out taproots and fought for water, much as plants contend for it underground.

Thousands of public and private organizations even today contend for the available supply. Each group in turn thinks it should have first call—and often falls into an unrealistic resistance to any change or sharing whatsoever.

Marion Clawson, of Resources for the Future, notes what he calls an obsession of westerners to expand irrigated farming with water that may actually be much more needed for expanding cities or industries. And this is only one example.

Maj. Gen. John S. Bragdon, the White House aid for resource development, studied the Trinity River Basin in Texas and found more than 50 agencies claiming priority to use of its waters—even while Houston, in the next basin, is laying plans to tap the Trinity across the divide.

Most basins of any size have even more than 50 such agencies. Plenitude of water seems to have little effect. If the biggest such regional feud is over the insufficient waters of the Colorado River in the Nation's driest corner, the next biggest is around the Great Lakes, whose 16.5 billion acre-feet would surely seem to provide enough for all.

But, however local agencies may fight among themselves, they unite against what they call Federal domination. They welcome Federal money, but not overall control, or even Federal guidance. Associate Reclamation Commissioner Floyd E. Dominy told the Reclamation Association at Denver:

"I sometimes see a tendency to seek so many safeguards by negative action, and so much concern about Government interference with your operations, that it has a tendency to stalemate any progress on new works. * * * There are too many groups striving first to serve their own localized interests."

REPORTS OF LITTLE AVAIL

The need for a national water policy becomes more evident all the time, but the reports of a half-dozen national commissions, unanimous on that point, have fallen on sterile soil. Local water people seem to listen for a moment, then go on fighting. Such has been the fate of two Hoover Commission reports, that of the President's Materials Policy Commission of 1952, a water resources commission created by Mr. Truman, and others of less scope.

Students of politics note, however, that all these were creatures of the executive branch, with Congress represented scantily if at all—which may be one reason they were largely ignored in the lawmaking body. Also, the staff director of the latest and perhaps the most promising such body points out that each prior one, in effect, dwelt only on one phase. So says Theodore Schad, of a Senate select committee chosen from among the membership of four committees that each deal largely with water. Mr. Schad thinks this inquiry will be by far the most thorough ever made. The committee will hear from all 50 States, from all Federal and many regional and local agencies having to do with water, and from a score of other groups. Its findings will be studied and summarized in depth by a task force from resources for the future.

And behind it looms the possibility of an even wider inquiry into all U.S. resources of which, as has been seen, water is the one common denominator. This is one object of a bill sponsored by Senator JAMES E. MURRAY, Democrat, of Montana, with 27 cosigners. If Congress itself gets deeply involved on its own motion in these huge and most-needed inquiries, perhaps the United States will start getting somewhere at last in the national solution of resource problems that daily grow more demanding.

NARCOTICS AND JUVENILE DELINQUENCY

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. President, for several months now, the Senate Subcommittee to Investigate Juvenile Delinquency, of which I am chairman, has been inquiring into the problem of narcotics and marijuana use among our country's teenagers. To date, we have concentrated primarily on the source of supply for illicit drugs with particular emphasis on illicit smuggling along the United States-Mexican border.

Last Friday and again this morning, we questioned witnesses from the Department of Treasury's Bureau of Narcotics and Bureau of Customs on Federal law enforcement in the narcotics field.

Unfortunately, too many of our citizens tend to think that the illicit narcotics traffic across our southwestern border affects only those States sitting on the border or located a short distance away.

This is not the case. Illicit narcotics have a way of traveling fast and far to fill the demand of addicts. The narcotics menace to our boys and girls has been recognized as a major factor in juvenile crime in cities all over the country.

At hearings in New York City last September when we investigated the acute juvenile gang problem existing there, both Mayor Wagner and Police Commissioner Kennedy urged more intensive Federal effort in stopping the narcotics traffic.

Our committee held 2 weeks of hearings in California last fall during which we were repeatedly told of the narcotics danger confronting our youth.

Public officials and individuals from the border States have told us of the near crisis caused by dope smuggling through their cities.

The nationwide concern over this problem is easily discernible by reading editorial comment from all parts of the country.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that two of these editorials—one from the Houston (Tex.) Post, entitled "Narcotics Big Factor in Juvenile Crime"; and one from the South Bend (Ind.) Tribune, entitled "Juvenile Delinquency Factors"—be printed at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the editorials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Houston (Tex.) Post, Sept. 25, 1959]

NARCOTICS BIG FACTOR IN JUVENILE CRIME

If anyone knows about juvenile crime it should be the mayor of New York, whose city has been ravaged by youth gang wars in recent months. It may be assumed that Mayor Robert F. Wagner spoke advisedly, at least as to his own jurisdiction, in telling the Senate Subcommittee on Juvenile Delinquency that narcotics, as a factor in teenage crime, is an increasing problem. He thought the most important role the Federal Government can play in attacking the criminal aspects of our youth problem is that of combating narcotic traffic.

This subcommittee has begun a series of hearings in cities over the country. It probably will hear much the same kind of testimony that a similar group heard a few years ago, or perhaps more. After receiving the previous committee's report, Congress passed a tough antinarcotics bill. The Government has an army of agents watching the main points of entry where dope is smuggled into the United States. They may be doing a good job, but apparently there are not enough of them to cover thoroughly the Nation's borders.

The Federal narcotics law is stringent. About the only way the Federal Government can strengthen the attack would be to tighten up enforcement. But surely the drug evil, even though it may be growing, is not the only major cause of the spreading lawless spirit among youngsters with its attendant increase of teen-age-killings. The New York gang fights have been waged between organized bands of beatniks from various slum districts. The city government, stung by criticism from different quarters, has finally been aroused to launch a determined cleanup, with promised police reinforcements.

Gov. Nelson Rockefeller has suggested Federal legislation for more effective control of sale of dangerous weapons in interstate commerce, Federal aid for youth work camps, tighter control of narcotics traffic, Federal aid for treating narcotics addicts, and special grants for research in juvenile delinquency.

These proposals merit full consideration as emergency measures. At the same time, there is room for stronger law enforcement in most if not all cities. If the new Senate committee investigation does no more than spur local and State authorities to renewed efforts to curb juvenile crime and delinquency, it will have been well worth while.

[From the South Bend (Ind.) Tribune, Sept. 25, 1959]

JUVENILE DELINQUENCY FACTORS

The chairman of the Senate Subcommittee Investigating Juvenile Delinquency is quoted to the effect that the decision to begin in New York City was not intended to attract undue attention to New York City's siege of young gang terror. The problem with which the Senate investigators are concerned is a national one.

Major crime with the juvenile delinquency complexion is creating crises in other big cities. The New York City mayor told the investigating Senators that, despite the recent sensational publicity, his community ranks 18th among the larger cities in major crimes perpetrated by juveniles.

The Senate subcommittee is commissioned to determine what, if anything, might be done by the Federal Government. As a witness in the opening hearing the New York City mayor stated that the Federal Government has heavy responsibility.

He emphasized the illegal narcotics traffic relationship with the increase in more serious crimes on the juvenile level. "(Illegal drug) importation and distribution in the United States," he said, "is big time crime, well financed, well organized, and certainly beyond the police powers of any city or State."

This is true. The Federal Government should deal with it.

Impliedly, some new Federal legislation is needed. The Senate subcommittee is likely to recommend this.

Aside from the narcotics problem, Uncle Same may have incentive to act in support of the States and cities as they strive to curb juvenile delinquency and reverse the major crime trend among the younger Americans.

In New York City, the mayor said, there is increasing effort to prevent development of juvenile delinquents into major criminals. "We have not abandoned these youths, these teenagers," he told the U.S. Senators, "nor will we until by their own acts they become criminals. Then they are, and will continue to be, treated like any other criminals."

Prevention is still most important. In cases where prevention isn't effective the young major criminals should not be dealt with softly because of their age.

AUTO MANUFACTURERS PLAN POLLUTION PROTECTION FOR CALIFORNIANS: WHY NOT FOR THE REST OF US?

Mr. NEUBERGER. Mr. President, I noted with keen interest recent press reports that beginning with model year 1961, auto manufacturers intend to install on all new cars offered for sale in California an inexpensive device which will lower substantially the amount of unburned hydrocarbons which automobiles emit through their exhaust system.

According to researchers at General Motors, the new discovery will permit a reduction of about 40 percent in unburned hydrocarbons released into the atmosphere by motor passenger vehicles.

This is good news. Surg. Gen. Leroy Burney has reported the belief of the U.S. Public Health Service that air pollution is a casual factor in lung cancer. Motor vehicle exhaust fumes containing unburned hydrocarbons and noxious gases are recognized as the major contributing factor to air pollution in urban areas.

WHAT HAPPENS TO THE REST?

But what about the rest of us? Why have auto manufacturers chosen to discriminate against non-Californians? What about those of us who by choice or necessity are not residents of the Golden State? Why should not the health-protecting advantages of this new device be extended to those living in Portland, New York, and Miami, as well as San Francisco, Sacramento, and Los Angeles?

Los Angeles has perhaps experienced unique difficulties with air pollution. But my own hometown of Portland, Oreg., faces severe air pollution problems. So does Seattle, Wash. So does Washington, D.C. Why should these cities receive less consideration by the auto manufacturers than the town of Weed, Calif., with a population of 3,403 persons living in a rural atmosphere?

Furthermore, do the auto manufacturers believe that motor passenger vehicles sold in California never leave California or that vehicles not sold in the State never enter California?

The California country is no longer isolated from the rest of the Nation by the rugged mountains that border it on the east nor the broad Pacific which constitutes its western boundary. Each year millions of tourists spread exhaust fumes from one end of the State to the other. An estimated 3.5 million persons—sightseers, businessmen, new residents—drove their cars across the State line into California last year.

POLLUTION A NATIONAL PROBLEM

California's population increased by about 4 million in the last decade, a 37.5-percent rise. According to national averages, one in three of these new residents owned an automobile. The problem of auto air pollution is a national one and cannot be confined within State boundaries.

I suggest that the auto manufacturers give us all a break, and provide this new antismog device on all new models. Americans living in the other 49 States have no more desire to contract lung cancer than their counterpart in California.

I have written to L. L. Colbert, president of the Automobile Manufacturers Association, suggesting that car producers install on all 1961 models the inexpensive device which they propose to attach to models offered for sale in California. I trust that they will reconsider and provide for other citizens the same protection which the people of California have apparently secured.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that an Associated Press news story reporting the AMA announcement be printed in the RECORD at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Post, Jan. 15, 1960]

NEW DEVICE CUTS DOWN CAR FUMES

DETROIT, January 14.—Four General Motors research men told in detail tonight how they found, almost by accident, a way to cut by about 40 percent the amount of unburned hydrocarbons which automobiles send into the air.

Health authorities, particularly in California, believe that when hydrocarbons are mixed in the atmosphere they contribute substantially to the harmful properties of smog.

Demands for some method of eliminating or severely cutting back the amount of hydrocarbons emitted by cars have led researchers to concentrate on exhaust fumes.

The GM researchers—Paul A. Bennett, Marvin W. Jackson, Chester J. Murphy, and Richard A. Randall—in a paper for the annual meeting of the Society of Automotive Engineers, said they found vapors coming directly from the crankcase of a car are virtually as important to the overall problem as exhaust pipe gases.

They said they came upon this while trying to develop an engine performance test for evaluating crankcase lubricants.

The researchers came up with an inexpensive system of piping and valves which feeds the crankcase gases back into the engine at a point below the carburetor.

The Automotive Manufacturers Association, which coordinate industry research, has announced that manufacturers would install the devices on all new cars offered for sale in California not later than the start of the 1961 model year.

ITHACA COLLEGE, ITHACA PLAN

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, one of the outstanding institutions which will benefit from the proposed legislation on college loans—and, incidentally, the present Presiding Officer [Mr. CLARK] is a great advocate of this program—which I have introduced today would be Ithaca College, a small New York State liberal arts college which has worked out and is introducing a new concept in higher education designed to meet great challenge to our educational system posed by the urgent necessity for our expanding youthful population to achieve the best and the highest kind of learning.

In order to meet higher costs, rising enrollments, and the faculty shortage Ithaca College is introducing a plan whereby it hopes by intensified, cohesive study during the first 3 years to offer senior courses at a higher than usual college level; and by reducing the number of course offerings to save faculty manpower and increase teachers' salaries, using the teachers to maximum advantage upon subjects of highest priority.

I ask unanimous consent that there may be incorporated in the RECORD as a part of my remarks an article on this subject entitled "Education in Review."

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Times, Oct. 4, 1959]

EDUCATION IN REVIEW—COLLEGE TREND IS TOWARD FEWER COURSES AND A TIGHTER CURRICULUM

(By Fred M. Hechinger)

"How many books do you have in your library?" asked the high school senior during his college admission interview. The dean said that there were about 350,000 volumes. The young man looked up disapprovingly and pointed out that another college, he had been told, had 4 million books. The dean smiled and replied: "When you've finished the 350,000 we'll see whether we can get you some more."

Actually, the numbers-minded student was using much the same yardstick that many colleges have been applying when relating academic greatness too closely to the number of courses listed in the catalog. It is partly a matter of institutional pride, partly the result of academic competition. When colleges, except perhaps for a few of the top names, had to recruit students, they often worried about keeping up with their rival academic Joneses. They were aided and abetted by research-minded faculty specialists, each jealously guarding his special course—no matter how few students were taking it.

The important new trend is in the opposite direction. For several years, critics of fragmentation have been speaking out against the self-service curriculum.

RUML'S MEMO

In his book "Memo to a College Trustee," Beardsley Ruml this year wrote: "This tendency to increase the number of courses was called enrichment and was considered a good idea. More recently such increase has been called proliferation and is no longer believed to be as good an idea as it once was."

The new direction, which parallels a trend in high school reform, is toward a combination of a more carefully mapped out undergraduate program, a deepening of the content of general education, combined with a more direct lead-in to specialized work, an attempt to permit at least some students to speed up or intensify their efforts and greater insistence on independent work.

In recent years, there have been advance hints of this trend—as when Amherst revised its curriculum in 1947 and introduced a stiff required program for the first 2 years. This included a special mathematics-physics course and a tough descriptive writing course, followed in the sophomore year by an all-college course in "Problems of American Democracy" which demands intensive independent and group study. Colgate University at about the same time introduced a core curriculum leading to a sequence of courses in "American Ideals and Institutions in Their World Setting." Columbia College, which had been pioneering as early as 1937 with "Contemporary Civilization," toughened that course.

This year, the University of Pittsburgh switched gears by putting itself on a new trimester plan which will enable some students to begin their professional studies about a year earlier.

The list could be extended, but the pattern is clear. This week, pushing the trend further, Ithaca College, in Ithaca, N.Y., announced an experiment in modern higher education. It lists frankly the debits of the earlier competitive era.

ITHACA'S PLAN

Higher education, says Howard I. Dillingham, president of the college, has been criticized for "lack of economy, insufficient preparation of students for advanced work in graduate and professional fields, and the gradual and continuing fragmentation of individual disciplines to the point that the scholar has frequently become a specialist who knows more and more about less and less."

The Ithaca plan points out that elective offerings during a student's undergraduate years are often so scattered that he comes to graduate school with insufficient preparation in both general education and the basic knowledge in his major field. "Some colleges with fewer than 1,500 students, for example, offer as many as 40 biology courses," the report says; this may lead an undergraduate majoring in biology into concentrated specialization in plant physiology while leaving gaps in his basic knowledge of the field. The graduate school must fill those gaps.

Ithaca College bluntly attributes some of these failings to interdepartmental rivalries which, for example, make the government and history departments argue over which shall teach international relations, with the result that both end up giving practically the same course. It describes as window dressing the introduction of courses in the earlier days of competition for students. And it concludes that the resultant curriculum has become too expensive to handle and that too much valuable energy is thus diverted to an economic struggle for survival.

REQUIRED COURSES

The Ithaca plan, to counter this trend, will require all students in each of these special areas—science, social science, and the humanities—to take a required curriculum, covering general education plus the basic knowledge of the special area, during their first 3 years. This is followed by a concentration in the special field of interest during the fourth year.

Thus, all science students (with a slight variation for physicists) will study the same essential courses in biology, chemistry, and mathematics, plus 1 year each of Western civilization, literature, American history, and philosophy. They also must complete a second college-level year of a foreign language, after having completed 2 years of language study in high school. Actually, it may be questioned whether the plan's language requirements are not kept too low, in view of the increasing demand for linguistic ability among scientists. In their fourth year, the science students will have the option to specialize in their field.

All the nonscience students will be required to take a closely related 3-year sweep of world history, literature and philosophy, reinforced by such additional required courses as economic theory, the history of political thought and comparative government. On the science side, the nonscience students are to get only 1 year of biology, and it might be asked whether this is enough. The fourth-year option, partly tutorial and partly seminar, will be in the special fields such as history, government, economics, literature, philosophy, or foreign languages.

THE TARGETS

All students will be required to take an expository writing course in which students would learn to work with content based upon their other courses. Students will be assigned extensive summer reading.

The Ithaca plan aims at goals which have become new targets of American higher education:

(1) It hopes, by intensified, cohesive study during the first 3 years, to offer senior courses at a higher-than-usual level.

(2) By reducing the number of course offerings, it will save faculty manpower, increase faculty salaries, and use teachers to better advantage.

In higher education, as in most human endeavor, there is, of course, a tendency to make a virtue of necessity. The catalogs of two decades ago showed good educational reasons why the elective system, with a wealth of courses to choose from, was an escape from the educational straitjacket. The pendulum swung to the extremes deplored in the Ithaca report. Now it is swinging back. It is, of course, important to guard against new extremes—just as it is important to keep in mind that Ithaca is speaking for, and about, the small college of 1,500 students—not the university which can support a greater choice of courses without watering-down quality.

But the trend toward depth rather than fragmentation is sound, even though dollar and enrollment pressures gave birth to it. Institutions, like people, often do their best thinking under the pressure of necessity.

THE LATE ADM. ROSS T. McINTIRE

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, the recent death of Adm. Ross T. McIntire, the first Chairman of the President's Committee on Employment of the Physically Handicapped, 1947–54, recalls the start of the Nation's program to meet employment problems faced by handicapped persons, including a quarter of a million World War II disabled veterans.

Maj. Gen. Melvin J. Maas, USMCR, retired, who succeeded Dr. McIntire as Chairman of the President's Committee, said:

Ross McIntire was the bone and sinew of the President's Committee from its beginning. In his quiet but forceful way he engineered the foundations of the program that today has captured the imagination of millions. He was not only a great Navy surgeon general and a great leader of the American Red Cross blood program, but he was a great American and an inspiration to all privileged to work with him.

Gen. Graves B. Erskine, USMC, retired, now Assistant Secretary of Defense for Special Operations, praised Dr. McIntire as a person who helped the handicapped to be understood and a man who gave the Committee a very high degree of leadership.

General Erskine was Administrator of the Retraining and Reemployment Administration, from which the Committee originated.

Robert Ramspeck, vice president of Eastern Airlines, a former Vice Chairman of the President's Committee, said:

During one early period when Dr. McIntire was Chairman of the President's Committee, it was my privilege to work very closely with him after he had named me Vice Chairman, and Chairman of the Executive Committee.

I came to know and appreciate his deep interest and feeling for the problems of the handicapped and to appreciate how much of his time, talents, and energy he put into the program.

Dr. McIntire was Cochairman of the People-to-People Committee for the Handicapped and had presided at a committee meeting the Friday before his death.

Edward L. Keenan, now Chief of Manpower for the Office of Civil and Defense Mobilization, former Deputy Director of the Bureau of Employment Security, and former Chairman of the early Federal Interagency Committee on the Handicapped said:

In the old days when this Committee was first getting started, Dr. McIntire was a tremendous help. He brought people into the Committee from outside to give it prestige.

Perhaps an example of Dr. McIntire's grasp of the problem was contained in an address he made before the annual meeting, November 4, 1948, when he said:

Our job is to find ways and means to channel from these organizations that you set up in private industry * * * means of rehabilitation and the training and preparation of men and women for employment.

This Committee must find positive means of providing the channels that will not only promise a man a job but get him one.

Born in Salem, Oreg., in 1889, Dr. McIntire received his medical degree from Willamette University Medical School—now the University of Oregon—in 1912. He was commissioned as assistant surgeon in 1917 and became chief of the Navy's Bureau of Medicine and Surgery, with rank of rear admiral in 1938. He served as Surgeon General of the U.S. Navy throughout World War II and was directly responsible for the planning and practical application of the vast program of medical care and supply for the Navy and Marine Corps during the war.

He was awarded the three stars of a vice admiral in 1944, 2 years before his retirement.

Admiral McIntire also served as personal physician to the late President Franklin D. Roosevelt.

After his retirement from the Navy, he was national director of the American Red Cross blood program for several years.

He served the final years of his life as executive director of the International College of Surgeons, an organization with 13,000 members representing 64 nations. Under Admiral McIntire's leadership the college continued to play a major role in many of the exciting surgical and medical developments of recent years. Under Admiral McIntire the college continued to be a valuable instrument for helping to extend the gift of better health and longer life to many peoples in underdeveloped areas of the world.

When Admiral McIntire was laid to rest in Arlington National Cemetery a Navy chaplain in a simple funeral oration said that words could not do full justice to the life of Ross McIntire, but rather that he would charge the audience with the kind of message the admiral would want to give:

If you would honor me, carry on the work in which we have been engaged, you who minister to the body and to the mind.

Admiral McIntire was my good friend and his death is a personal loss to me. But more than this, Admiral McIntire's death is a loss to our entire Nation for he was a dedicated public servant through many years of war and peace and he was ever the champion of medical care and better health for all our people.

His dedicated life and distinguished service to humanity stand as a challenge and an inspiration to men of science and to men of good will everywhere.

"I SPEAK FOR DEMOCRACY"—ESSAY BY TOM CASTEN, OF WINDSOR, COLO.

Mr. CARROLL. Mr. President, a young man from Windsor, Colo., put forth some excellent and stimulating thoughts in his prize-winning State entry in the 1959–60 "Voice of Democracy" contest sponsored by the National Association of Broadcasters. He is Tom Casten, 17 years old, a student at Windsor High School. Next month his entry will be judged along with contest winners from the other 49 States.

His community and State have added reason to be proud of Tom, as he is one of the 50 outstanding Boy Scouts and Explorers representing the various States who will participate in ceremonies honoring the golden anniversary of Scouting, in Washington early in February.

I ask unanimous consent to have his essay, "I Speak for Democracy," printed in the body of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the essay was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

I SPEAK FOR DEMOCRACY

(By Tom Casten, Windsor, Colo.)

Seventeen years ago a baby boy took his first look at the world. Now, this same boy is giving you his ideas on the subject of democracy. Seventeen years certainly isn't a very long time to formulate a strong opinion about something as abstract and complex as a system of government. But wait, you do not know what has caused these opinions to form. In 17 years, this boy has never been deprived of food, shelter, or security—the three basic wants of man. Yes, I am this boy, and I do have opinions about my Government. That is why I speak for democracy.

But why should I tell you about democracy? Most of you have had more than 17 years to learn about it. Everybody knows of the advantages of this system—or do they?

Does everyone appreciate the freedom involved when he buys an issue of some paper? Does everyone know how fortunate he is to be able to read the words of some editor, who is sounding off, because the city he lives in says that he must put a leash on his dog?

Does everyone realize how fortunate he is in being allowed to choose his own religion?

How about the treatment he will receive if he is accused of breaking a law? Does everyone appreciate this freedom?

I could continue with similar questions, but each would be answered with, "Sure, I already know about that." But what if I asked, "Are you ready to die for democracy?" The answer might still be yes. My dad and my uncles, along with several million other men were on the battlefield prepared to die defending democracy.

But I don't ask you to die: I ask more. I ask you to live for democracy. I ask you to be among the people who compose and control our democracy.

I don't speak in order to show you the benefits of our system. You can see them for yourself. Rather, I would ask you to look at these benefits, think about them, and then dedicate yourself to retaining them. I ask you to be proud of this system and proud to say to everyone, "It's good."

The world is made up of many different people, some intelligent and thoughtful, some with rich ideas, some selfish and some rather thoughtless. If you do not speak for democracy, the selfish and the thoughtless people, who never shut up, will be heard. Democracy will reflect the image of the people who control it. I ask you to live for democracy, so that this image will be a good one, ever improving. Any one of us will do very little, but collectively, we will keep our wonderful system. I want this system to stay intact and grow, because I have lived 17 happy years, and I would like to live 70 more. But there is more involved than personal enjoyment.

Someday, another boy will be born; many boys and girls will be born; one may even bear my name. But it makes no difference. I want this boy to be able to enjoy life the same way I am able to enjoy life. I want him to be allowed to drive a car, to hunt and fish, to worship as he pleases, to have food and shelter, and security, and most important, to be allowed to express his ideas freely. This is why I speak for democracy.

ECONOMIC REGULATION OF THE ALASKA RAILROAD

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. President, has the business of the morning hour been concluded?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CLARK in the chair). Is there further morning business? If not, morning business is closed.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. President, I ask that the Chair lay before the Senate the unfinished business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1508) to provide for economic regulation of the Alaska Railroad under the Interstate Commerce Act, and for other purposes.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The bill before the Senate is in the form of a committee amendment.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. President, the bill S. 1508 amends the legislation which created the Alaska Railroad so as to provide that 180 days after the enactment of the bill the Alaska Railroad shall be made subject to part I, pertaining to the regulation of railroads, of the Interstate Commerce Act and related acts, including the Safety Appliance Acts, the Boiler Inspection Act, the Employer Liability Act, and others.

In addition, the bill provides that applicable statutes regulating intrastate transportation enacted by the State of Alaska shall apply to the Alaska Railroad as though privately owned.

The bill is tailored to fit the Alaska Railroad by excepting from the jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission the necessity for approval by that body of any extension of the railroad or approval of the issuance of securities by the railroad.

Furthermore, the Interstate Commerce Commission is admonished in establishing accounting requirements for the Alaska Railroad to consider the needs of other named Government agencies.

The free pass provisions of the present law are proposed to be superseded by the free pass provisions of part I of the Interstate Commerce Act.

It is my belief that the passage of the proposed legislation will bring more consistency to the regulatory pattern of transportation in Alaska. At present, motor carriers, water lines, and others engaged in interstate and foreign commerce in surface transportation are subject to ICC regulation. It is only simple justice that the Alaska Railroad should be given the same measure of regulation as the privately owned carriers which are engaged in serving Alaska and with which the Alaska Railroad competes. The Interstate Commerce Commission is suited for the job of regulation through its long experience in the field.

Quite recently the Alaska Railroad announced a freight rate increase. Only this morning I received a letter from Under Secretary of the Interior Bennett, which said in part:

> We are told that if the railroad were subject to the Interstate Commerce Act, it is virtually certain, if not altogether certain, that no public hearing would be scheduled.

After receiving that letter, I called the Interstate Commerce Commission, talked with a member of that agency, and was informed that since approximately 70,000 requests for rate changes come before the ICC annually, naturally public hearings are not held with respect to an overwhelming majority of such requests. But further, and more pertinently, I was informed that if a public hearing were demanded in the case of the Alaska Railroad, for example, by the State government, it is highly unlikely—altogether improbable, in fact—that the ICC would not accede to such a request.

In this connection, I believe that the Secretary of the Interior, Hon. Fred Seaton, has recognized the public interest by agreeing to hold a public hearing in Alaska, or perhaps more than one hearing, before the increase is made effective. In this regard, I should say that he is more mindful of the economy of Alaska than was the Federal Maritime Board in its recent action concerning ocean freight rates.

Mr. President, minority views were filed on the bill under consideration. I ask unanimous consent to include in the RECORD with my remarks a statement which gives the arguments against the bill and also gives my reply.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ARGUMENTS AND ANSWERS TO THESE ARGUMENTS AGAINST REGULATION, UNDER S. 1508, OF THE ALASKA RAILROAD

The arguments against regulation and the answers to the arguments are given in sequence below:

A. Arguments in opposition to regulation advanced by the Department of the Interior:

1. Argument: The Alaska Railroad is operated as a public service in much the same manner as a municipally owned electric plant and consequently does not require regulation.

Answer: The comparison of the operation of the Alaska Railroad to that of the municipally owned electric plant is particularly inept and inaccurate. A municipally owned plant is controlled locally and not by interests several thousands of miles away. The Alaska Railroad is, in fact, subject to absentee control by the Secretary of the Interior located in Washington. Further evidence that the Alaska Railroad is not controlled locally in the same manner as a municipally owned electric plant is demonstrated in the Anchorage hearings on October 24, 1959, in which the General Manager of the Alaska Railroad stated that he was not aware that a general rate increase was being planned. A rate increase was announced Christmas Eve to be effective January 25, 1960. The following colloquy from the record demonstrates this point:

Page 109:

"Senator BARTLETT. Now, is any consideration being given now as to a general rate increase?

"Mr. MANLEY. No, sir."

Page 112:

"Senator BARTLETT. So your situation, then, is that even with this loss of oil revenue, your operating revenues are in a satisfactory state, even though not as high as you would desire; and that you foresee no need in—if the future is as the recent past—for a general rate increase?

"Mr. ANDERSON. That's my idea; yes, Mr. Senator.

"Senator BARTLETT. Thank you, Mr. Anderson."

The Manager of the Alaska Railroad on January 22, 1960, stated that the proposed increases were indefinitely postponed, and that hearings would be held in Alaska on the increases. No date has as yet been set for the hearings.

2. Argument: Rates are already as low as management can make them while still covering costs and under the terms of S. 1508, Alaska Railroad rates may be pushed higher with serious harm to the development of Alaska's resources, particularly if a fair return on investment is to be achieved.

Answer: It has not been proven but only stated to be the opinion of the management of the Alaska Railroad that rates are as low as management can make them and still cover costs of operation and that to push rates higher would cause serious harm to the development of Alaska. Regulation of rates involves not only the absolute level of the rates but the distribution of the costs of transportation by establishing rates to apply among the various items of freight and localities. In other words, rate relationships as between ports, between inland destination, and between items of traffic, are often as important as the absolute level of freight charges in dollars and cents. These matters are for an experienced regulatory body to handle that takes into account not only the welfare of the Alaska Railroad but the general public interest including the interests of other forms of transportation competing with the Alaska Railroad. It should be reiterated that there is nothing in the Interstate Commerce Act that would require a fair return on the investment of the Alaska Railroad. Such a requirement was placed in the law by the Transportation Act of 1920 but was deleted from the law by the Emergency Transportation Act of 1933.

3. Argument: That higher rates on the Alaska Railroad might cause diversion of traffic to other transportation media, thus penalizing shippers without improving the railroad's net margin over costs.

Answer: It is true that higher rates generally cause diversion of traffic to competitors, causing the shippers who continue to ship with the transportation agency having the higher rates to bear a greater proportion of the cost through the rates they pay. In view of this simple economic fact, it is both amazing and alarming that the Secretary of the Interior did not hold public hearings in order to ascertain what effect the increase in railroad rates, announced to become effective January 25, 1960, would have on the Alaska Railroad and shippers using it. If the ICC had had jurisdiction, public hearings would have been held to make a record on which the economic effect on both the shippers and the railroad could be determined. It is gratifying to learn that shortly before it became effective the increase was suspended and announcement was made of a public hearing on the subject at a time to be announced later.

4. Argument: That the present system of fixing rates on the Alaska Railroad through the administrative control of the Interior Department has provided shippers with a reasonable rate structure and has assisted in the development of Alaska; consequently, the shippers and the general public would not be benefited by imposing on the Alaska Railroad the additional expense involved in dealing with a regulatory agency, unless a need for regulation by an outside agency can be shown.

Answer: It is only within the opinion of the Interior Department that the administrative control exercised by the Department of the Interior in Washington has provided shippers with reasonable rates. It should be reiterated that rate relationships as between forms of traffic and localities are technical matters that can be handled adequately only by an experienced regulatory body. The Department of the Interior does not have the expertise for regulating rates that ICC has gained because of its function in the regulatory field since 1887.

In other words, the Secretary of the Interior is a member of the executive branch of the Government with numerous custodial and other related functions in the area in which he operates. The Secretary's duties are different from those required of the Interstate Commerce Commission. The Commission is expert in regulatory matters which require hearing, careful weighing of the evidence, and decisions that take into account the various provisions of the Interstate Commerce Act designed to foster fair treatment for carriers and the public alike. The Secretary of the Interior is, at present, in his regulation of the Alaska Railroad, not bound by such laws. The claim of additional expense to Interior to deal with a regulatory agency is not convincing. If the Secretary of Interior is giving adequate attention to regulation at this time, the expense involved would be lessened by having this function taken over by an outside regulatory agency.

5. Argument: That if regulation by an outside agency is to be considered, Interior recommends that—no legislation be enacted unless it also specifies definite ratemaking standards to guide the regulatory process. * * * If legislation should be enacted, we recommend that Congress determine the ratemaking standards and make no delegation of authority to the ratemaking body other than the power to apply such standards.

Answer: The Interstate Commerce Act establishes legislative standards to cover the entire regulatory process including ratemaking. Part I of the act is specifically designed for regulation of railroads and contains not only ratemaking standards but general standards to be followed by the Commission in order to protect the public interest. In regard to the argument of Interior that a fair return would be required on the Government investment in the Alaska Railroad, the ICC has stated that such a return would not be required under ICC interpretation of the present law. However, to insure that the promotional aspects of the Alaska Railroad and its service to the military shall be given due consideration in establishing the general level of rates, and to insure that the private shipper in Alaska will not have to assume a disproportionate share of this burden, an appropriate amendment to S. 1508 is being offered.

6. Argument: That because of its statutory direction to support the Alaska Military Establishment, the railroad is not free to operate in the manner normally contemplated for regulated industries.

Answer: It is true that the railroad service required for the military is not always the same as that rendered to private industry. The regulated railroads of the United States, however, render service to the Military Establishment under the Interstate Commerce Act without requiring any special dispensation for the military other than section 22 of the Interstate Commerce Act that allows the Defense Department to receive free or reduced rates from railroads without regard to the regulatory process. There is no reason why the Interstate Commerce Act, which imposes few restraints on the actual physical operation of the railroads, cannot be applied to the Alaska Railroad as well. Any operations required for the benefit of the military would not be hindered by that law.

7. Argument: That S. 1508 might force an unintended change in the railroad's accounting system which would involve additional cost.

Answer: Conferences were held with both the Interstate Commerce Committee and the General Accounting Office, the groups concerned with prescribing standards for the accounting system of the Alaska Railroad. It was ascertained that both groups wanted exclusive authority to establish such regulations. It was also established that the uniform system of accounts required by the Interstate Commerce Commission could be adjusted to meet the requirements of the General Accounting Office. Accordingly, authority to prescribe accounting standards was given the ICC with an amendment to the original bill that admonishes the Commission to take into account the needs of other named Government agencies in establishing accounting standards for Alaska Railroad.

B. The minority views on S. 1508 embody the following objections to regulation of Alaska Railroad:

1. Objection: We are not opposed on principle to outside regulation of the Alaska Railroad, provided a need for such regulation can be shown. However, no case has been made to show the necessity of such outside regulation. In any case, the railroad is immediately under the administrative direction of the Secretary of the Interior. If any complaints against railroad practices or policies should be found to have merit, changes or corrections can be most easily made by administrative action of the Secretary, without the interposition of an outside agency. By this means, the conflict of jurisdiction and policy over the railroad which is inherent in the bill can be avoided.

Answer: This argument against regulations assumes that the Alaska Railroad is best regulated without public hearings, without shippers being afforded a chance to be represented by counsel, and that administrative action in private by the Secretary of Interior is superior to the time-honored method of action after hearing those with differences of opinion as to the proper regulatory action to be taken. In the case of the recent proposed rate increase, to be effective January 25, 1960, no arrangements were made initially to hear complaints in order that changes or corrections can be most easily made by administrative action of the Secretary without the interposition of an outside agency. Afterward the Secretary of Interior, upon request, instructed the Manager of the Alaska Railroad to postpone indefinitely the proposed increases and to hold hearings in Alaska.

2. Objection: We do not believe as a matter of principle that the Federal Government should accept State regulation of the most fundamental aspects of the operation of any Federal agency. It is no disrespect to any State to point out that State and Federal objectives may conflict. The railroad is owned by the Federal Government. It represents a substantial investment. Its operational costs, maintenance, and improvements must ultimately be met from the Federal Treasury through appropriations, if they cannot be met out of railroad revenues. If State regulation should result in thrusting losses or other burdens on the railroad, the Federal Treasury would ultimately suffer the loss.

Answer: Alaska is now a State in the United States and should have the authority of all such sovereign States. Included in that authority should be the power to regulate intrastate freight rates. In these days of frequent assertions that States rights should not be impaired, it should be a relatively simple matter to give the State of Alaska regulatory authority over the intrastate rates that shippers must pay on the Alaska Railroad. There are ample safeguards in the Interstate Commerce Act that would protect the Federal Treasury from extensive losses or burdens imposed by intrastate rates prescribed by the State of Alaska for the Alaska Railroad. This safeguard is contained in the requirement that the ICC has jurisdiction over and must declare unlawful intrastate rates that impose undue burdens on interstate commerce. This provision serves to allow ICC to require States to increase their intrastate rates to adequate levels when the rates are so low as to require the interstate shipper to pay more than a fair share of the transportation costs.

3. Objection: Only 10 to 20 percent of the traffic of the railroad is interstate within the meaning of the Interstate Commerce Act. In a letter to Senator MAGNUSON of February 11, 1957, the Chairman of the Interstate Commerce Commission said: "In our opinion, economic regulation would not be a success if 50 percent or more of the traffic is to be exempt." On the basis of this advice, ICC regulation of interstate traffic on the railroad would be a meaningless gesture.

Answer: The ICC in a subsequent letter to Senator MAGNUSON, dated June 16, 1959, answers this objection. The letter indicates that the general manager of the Alaska Railroad, in attempting to show that very little Alaska Railroad traffic would be subject to ICC regulation, stated that "approximately 90 percent tonnagewise—80 percent revenuewise—of the traffic of the Alaska Railroad moves on local billing." The minority apparently jumped to the conclusion that because of traffic moved on local billing that it was bound to move in intrastate commerce and be free from ICC regulation under this bill. As pointed out in the ICC letter, the fact of local billing does not necessarily indicate that a shipment moves in intrastate commerce. The courts have held on this point that the original intention in moving the traffic determines whether or not it is to be considered interstate commerce.

In order that the record may adequately disclose the ICC's position on this point, I intend at the proper time to ask for inclusion in the RECORD of the letter of June 16, 1959, to Chairman MAGNUSON from the Honorable Kenneth H. Tuggle, of ICC.

4. Objection: The bill contains no standards or statement of objectives to guide the Interstate Commerce Commission in its regulatory function in any way. The Department in its report requested Congress, if the bill were to be considered favorably, to set forth such standards, but the committee declined the challenge.

Answer: The Interstate Commerce Act is composed of standards and objectives to guide the ICC in its regulatory function. In addition, S. 1508 makes the necessary adjustments in the act to allow it to apply properly to the Alaska Railroad by providing that there be no restriction on securities issued by the railroad nor restrictions on its authority to expand its lines. A further adjustment is being offered in the form of an amendment to insure that the ICC will take into account the promotional and military aspects of the railroad's operations in order that private shippers will not have to pay unduly high rates to subsidize such activities. As has been pointed out, the Interstate Commerce Act does not require a fair return on a fair value of the Alaska Railroad's property. It should be emphasized that until the standards of the Interstate Commerce Act can be applied to the Alaska Railroad by ICC, rate increases may be made by the Secretary of the Interior without notice or hearing.

5. Objection: The minority maintains that the Railroad Labor Act gives employees the right to strike, and that the right to strike against the Federal Government should not be granted to groups of its employees.

Answer: The amendment offered by Senator SCHOEPPEL, dated July 8, 1959, is acceptable, and provides: "On page 8, lines 9 and 10, strike out 'Title I of the Railway Labor Act (45 U.S.C., secs. 151–163);'."

6. Objection: The minority states that solution of the peculiar regulatory problems presented by the Alaska Railroad is not easy and that a thorough study of the rates by all transportation agencies, both within Alaska and between Alaska and the old States should be made.

Answer: Solution of the regulatory problems of the Alaska Railroad should be solved by referring them to a competent regulatory body. A thorough study of the rates of the Alaska Railroad should be made by such an expert regulatory body in preference to action by a study group that is stalling for time, a technique frequently used in Washington to delay decisions on important problems in the last few years.

7. Objection: We know of no substantial complaint against the present mode of regulation of the railroad, via the administrative authority of the Secretary of the Interior. The railroad is a public service agency. The Secretary, its supervisor, is a public servant. We have no evidence that any complaints against railroad practices have been neglected by the Secretary.

Answer: Had the minority sent a member to Alaska to hear the testimony concerning the regulation of Alaska transportation rates last October and November, they would have found that there are substantial complaints. For instance, the port of Valdez is being throttled by the rates established by the Secretary of the Interior on the Alaska Railroad. While complaints are made, many others would probably be made if there were not a general fear of retaliation by the Alaska Railroad. The Secretary may be a fine public servant but his background and the laws under which he operates do not qualify him to be a regulator of railroads.

8. Objection: Since the Alaska Railroad is a major factor in the transportation network of the new State, and since most of its traffic cannot in any case be brought within the regulatory framework of the ICC, it may be that the most acceptable solution to this unusual problem would be to rely upon the Secretary to enforce upon his subordinate agency compliance with policy direction from Congress and tariff adjustment procedures which parallel ICC requirements even more closely than they do now.

Answer: It has not been proved that most of the traffic of the Alaska Railroad cannot be brought within the regulatory frame of the Interstate Commerce Act. As for the proposal for having the procedures of the Secretary of the Interior closely parallel those of the Interstate Commerce Commission in order to give more satisfactory regulation, it should be pointed out that the procedures should be those of the ICC and should be administered by the Commission. It is noteworthy that during the House committee hearings on this same legislation, a Department of Interior witness suggested that the ICC give advisory opinions to the Secretary of the Interior which he could accept or not. This admission of the need for regulation is constructive. There is no need to have advisory opinions by the Commission. Final opinions by an ICC having jurisdiction in the usual way would be more satisfactory.

In conclusion, it should be pointed out that the objection against having one Government agency regulate another is without merit. The Interstate Commerce Commission regulated successfully the Federal Barge Lines, a Government owned operation, for many years. The Maritime Commission regulates Government ships in regard to rates, and the parcel post rates of the Post Office Department are regulated by the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. President, it was also stated, and generally agreed to, as I recall, that the ICC regulations would not be appropriate if more than 50 percent of the railroad's traffic were intrastate in character. A witness for the Alaska railroad stated that approximately 90 percent, tonnagewise, and 80 percent, revenuewise, of the traffic of the Alaska Railroad moves on local billing.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in the RECORD a letter dated June 16, 1959, written to the chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, the distinguished senior Senator from Washington [Mr. MAGNUSON], by the Honorable Kenneth H. Tuggle, at that time the Chairman of the Interstate Commerce Commission, in which answer is given to the contention that more than 50 percent of the railroad's business is intrastate.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

JUNE 15, 1959.

Hon. WARREN G. MAGNUSON,
Chairman, Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee, U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR MAGNUSON: During the hearings before your committee in May 1959 on the three Alaska transportation bills recommended by the Interstate Commerce Commission (S. 1507, S. 1508, and S. 1509), opposition to S. 1508, which would subject the Alaska Railroad to the Interstate Commerce Act, was advanced by Mr. R. H. Anderson, general manager of the railroad.

At page 160 of the transcript, in the paragraph numbered 3, Mr. Anderson expressed doubt that the proposed bill would achieve its apparent purpose insofar as the Alaska Railroad is concerned. In attempting to show that very little railroad traffic would be subject to ICC regulation, he stated that "approximately 90 percent tonnagewise—80 percent revenuewise—of the traffic of the Alaska Railroad moves on local billing."

We agreed with this witness as to the intrastate nature of the movement of coal and some petroleum. We recognize also that military traffic might fall under section 22 of the act. We do not question the accuracy of his statements respecting the proportion of traffic now moving under local billing, but we submit that the fact of local billing does not necessarily indicate that a shipment moves in intrastate commerce.

Of the total 400,000 to 500,000 tons of dry cargo passing through Alaskan ports, it is estimated that as much as 80 percent, or 300,000 to 400,000 tons of this traffic, may be subject to regulation. Some of this through traffic would move inland by trucks, but a large part would be handled by the Alaska Railroad. Moreover, a large part of that tonnage would fall within the manufacturers and miscellaneous group. This is largely high rated, profitable traffic for which there is strong competition between rail and motor carriers. A similar situation would likely prevail in some degree for the tonnage classified as forwarder traffic. We do not believe the Commission will be able effectively to fulfill its existing obligation to regulate motor carriers and freight forwarders unless the railroad, too, is subject to the Interstate Commerce Act.

The tables following show by commodity groups the relative importance of the commercial traffic handled by the Alaska Railroad in terms of volume and of revenue. It will be noted that the manufactures and miscellaneous group accounts for about 60 percent of the tonnage for each of the years shown. The revenue furnished by this group was in a range from 82.8 percent of the total revenue from commercial traffic in 1955 to 73.8 percent in 1958. In 1958, forwarder traffic produced 6.8 percent of the tonnage and 11.2 percent of the revenue.

Source: Department of the Interior, "Reports of the Alaska Railroad."

At page 161, in paragraph No. 4, Mr. Anderson quotes from a letter dated February 11, 1957, addressed to you by the then Chairman of the ICC, as follows: "In our opinion, economic regulation would not be a success if 50 percent or more of the traffic is to be exempt." This statement was based on conditions obtaining prior to statehood, and was followed by a reference to our proposal that the privilege of reduced rates for Government shipments on traffic to, from, and within Alaska except in time of war or other national emergency be eliminated. It was based on the assumption that section 22 rates were being negotiated at levels substantially below those for commercial traffic, and that military and other exempt traffic would continue to constitute more than 50 percent of the total. It was also made at a time when we had recommended that the Congress substantially amend section 22.

As we pointed out on page 45 of the transcript of the present hearings, our proposals at this time are aimed at regulating surface transportation with respect to Alaska in the same manner it is now regulated in the other States, and we indicated our understanding that rates being negotiated by Defense officials, currently controlling the major portion of Government traffic in Alaska, are not at depressed levels, but on the contrary have served as a pattern for civilian freight rate levels for all modes of carriers.

As military traffic to and from Alaska is not being carried at depressed rate levels, the application of section 22 should not interfere with effective regulation of commercial traffic. The volume of military traffic, moreover, is decreasing. This is indicated by the fact that from the level of 1954 the waterborne traffic carried by military transport had declined 23 percent by 1957 and 43 percent by 1958.

We appreciate this opportunity to supplement the record in support of S. 1508. If we have failed to cover any point on which you need our further comments, we shall be glad to give it our immediate attention.

Respectfully submitted.

KENNETH H. TUGGLE,
Chairman.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. President, along the same line, I should like to offer a further statement on the matter, and ask unanimous consent to have it printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

In this connection, I have read several Supreme Court and U.S. court of appeals decisions bearing upon the problem. It appears to me an opinion by the U.S. Court of Appeals, 10th Circuit, on December 19, 1951, Wycoff Company, Inc. v. Public Service Commission of Utah et al., 195 F. 2d 252, states the law that is being followed at the present time. A portion of this decision is set out below:

"The legal principles which guide us in determining whether an intrastate shipment is, in fact, such or is a continuing part of an interstate shipment are clear and well defined. The difficulty as always comes when we seek to apply them to a given state of facts. As stated by the Supreme Court in United States v. Erie R. Co., 280 U.S. 98, 50 S. Ct. 51, 53, 74 L. Ed. 187, 'the nature of the shipment is not dependent upon the question when or to whom the title passes * * *' or whether 'the transaction is initiated or completed under a local bill of lading which is wholly intrastate, * * *' nor yet 'by the fact that there may be a detention before or after the shipment on the local bill of lading.' If there is a continuing intent that the goods shall be transported until they reach a designated place, the entire transportation is a continuing one, notwithstanding that there may be a temporary stoppage en route for a particular purpose. In Walling v. Jacksonville Paper Co., 317 U.S. 564, 63 S. Ct. 332, 335, 87 L. Ed. 460, the Supreme Court reaffirmed these principles in the following language: 'If the halt in the movement of the goods is a convenient intermediate step in the process of getting them to their final destinations, they remain "in commerce" until they reach those points.' "

In other words, the cases appear to clearly hold that although there may be a temporary stoppage of goods en route to a particular place, if there is the intention of the parties that the goods shall be transported until they reach a designated place, then the entire transaction is tied together, and would be considered as interstate commerce.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. President, I offer an amendment to the committee amendment. I send the amendment to the desk and ask to have it stated. It is designated "1–25–60—B."

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BARTLETT. I am glad to yield.

Mr. BUTLER. Has the committee amendment been agreed to?

Mr. BARTLETT. No. I am offering an amendment to the committee amendment.

Mr. BUTLER. This amendment is to the committee amendment?

Mr. BARTLETT. Yes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment offered by the Senator from Alaska to the committee amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. It is proposed to amend the committee amendment on page 8 and on page 9.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alaska desire to have the amendment read in its entirety?

Mr. BARTLETT. No, Mr. President.

Mr. BARTLETT's amendment to the committee amendment is as follows:

On page 8, strike out lines 16 through 25, inclusive, and on page 9, strike out lines 1 and 2, and through the words "United States" in line 3, and insert in lieu thereof the following: "except that so long as such railroad or railroads continue to be both wholly owned and operated by the United States of America or by one of its departments, corporations, or agencies: (1) the Interstate Commerce Commission in determining the lawfulness of rates or charges maintained, or from time to time proposed to be maintained, by such railroad or railroads, shall give due consideration, among other things, to the national public purposes which to a substantial extent prompted the construction, expansion, maintenance, and improvement thereof, with particular reference to the requirements of the national defense, as well as promotion and development of natural resources, and shall to the extent warranted by the facts recognize for valuation and cost-finding purposes a segregation of both capital investment and operating expenses which are found to be solely attributable to such national public purposes, distinguishing them from normal railroad common carrier investment and operational expenses; nor shall such rates and charges be deemed to be unlawful solely because they fail to yield sufficient revenues to cover any amounts for taxes not actually required by law to be paid or provide a return on capital investment; (2) approval of the Interstate Commerce Commission shall not be required for any extension of such railroad or railroads or for the issuance of securities; and (3) that in carrying out its duties under section 20 of the Interstate Commerce Act as amended, the Commission shall consider the needs of the Comptroller General of the United States, the Secretary of the Treasury, the Director of the Bureau of the Budget, and the Secretary of the Interior pursuant to provisions of law with respect to the accounting, auditing, financial reporting, and budgetary requirements of such railroad or railroads."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Alaska to the committee amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, the Senator from Kansas [Mr. SCHOEPPEL] is unavoidably detained. There is at the desk an amendment by him, identified as "7–8–59—B," which I offer on his behalf and ask to have stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Kansas to the committee amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. In the committee amendment, on page 8, lines 9 and 10, it is proposed to strike out "title I of the Railway Labor Act (45 U.S.C., secs. 151–163);".

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, it is my understanding that there is no objection to this amendment and that it is to be accepted by the Senator from Alaska.

Mr. BARTLETT. The understanding of the Senator from Maryland is correct, and the committee accepts the amendment which has been proposed to the committee amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment to the committee amendment is agreed to.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that remarks prepared by my distinguished colleague from Kansas [Mr. SCHOEPPEL] in connection with this amendment to the committee amendment, be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR SCHOEPPEL

I rise to speak in opposition to S. 1508, a bill which would apply the provisions of the Interstate Commerce Act, as amended, to the Alaska Railroad.

I am opposed to passage of this legislation for several reasons. I followed the hearings closely during the past session of Congress.

From a study of the hearings on a previous bill, S. 1448, I could discern no sentiment whatever among the various segments of the transportation industry in favor of enactment of that legislation. I do not believe that the transportation picture has changed materially since that time. While it is true that statehood poses many new problems for the new State of Alaska, I do not believe that regulation of the Alaska Railroad by the Interstate Commerce Commission is one of the pressing problems confronting the new State.

According to information which I have received, only 10 percent by volume or 20 percent by revenue of the railroad's traffic would fall under the jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission as interstate commerce. The Chairman of the Interstate Commerce Commission wrote to Senator MAGNUSON on February 11, 1959, as follows: "In our opinion economic regulation would not be a success if 50 percent or more of the traffic is to be exempt."

The present legislation would vest in the Interstate Commerce Commission control of only a small percentage of the railroad's traffic. I personally cannot see, and I believe the Department of Interior estimates will bear me out, that the percentage of traffic defined as "interstate" will increase to 50 percent in the foreseeable future.

I invite the attention of the Members of the Senate to the agency comments which have been included in Senate Report No. 435. Particular attention should be given to a letter submitted to our committee by the Department of the Interior on May 7, 1959. You will note that the then Acting Secretary of the Interior, Elmer F. Bennett, stated:

"The Alaskan Railroad is a federally owned transportation artery, extending a distance of 470 miles (main line) from the port cities of Seward and Whittier through Anchorage, its headquarters, to Fairbanks. There are four short branches. The railroad was constructed under authority of the 1914 legislation cited above, and was completed in 1923. For many years it has been operated under the direction of this department.

"The purpose of this operation is not to earn a profit, or a return on the Government's investment, but rather to perform a public service in assisting in the development of Alaska. Therefore, the railroad has generally not been run in strict accordance with all the financial considerations proper to a privately owned railroad, where such financial objectives conflicted with the developmental purposes for which the railroad was built.

"The railroad has energetically sought to pare down costs to the lowest practicable level, and also to develop new industry which would generate revenue-producing traffic. By these and other means it has been able to show a small net margin of revenue over costs (including depreciation) during each of the past 6 years. Simultaneously, the railroad has deliberately refrained from increasing the charges for its services to the point that would have been necessary to earn a substantial return on investment. On the contrary, freight and passenger rates have been systematically kept down to levels just sufficient to cover costs.

"In short, the Alaska Railroad has been and is operated after the manner of a municipally owned electric plant, which aims to provide the best possible service at the lowest possible rates. Such municipally owned electric plants and other publicly owned utilities are not commonly subjected to rate control by outside regulatory commissions in this country, since by the terms of their mandates they are already engaged in serving the public interest, and there is no necessity for regulation to protect the public. S. 1508 fails to take cognizance of this sharp distinction, well recognized in American practice, between publicly owned facilities operated solely in the interest of the consumer or in this case the shipper and traveler, and privately owned facilities which are properly entitled to a fair return on the investment of their stockholders."

I agree with the Interior Department's view because I cannot see the need for Interstate Commerce Commission regulation of Alaska Railroad rates. As indicated, rates are already as low as the management of the railroad can make them and still cover its costs. I can only foresee, as a result of regulation of the railroad, increased rates being paid by the citizens of Alaska for goods carried by the railroad for its customers.

I have long held the opinion that the Alaska Railroad has been efficiently operated, rendering good service, and that it carries its national defense role very well.

Although I am a believer in regulation of transportation in the ordinary case, I find good reasons to oppose regulation of the Alaska Railroad as provided in S. 1508. First, one Federal agency should not be placed under another Federal agency for regulatory purposes. Second, I believe that it is both unnecessary and unwise for a Federal agency to be placed under State regulation. Yet that is precisely the result of an amendment adopted by the committee to S. 1508. Under the language as written into the bill, permission would be given to the State of Alaska to regulate intrastate operations of the Alaska Railroad with the same authority that other States regulate privately owned railroads. The new State of Alaska could assume control over every aspect of the railroad's intrastate operations, including the rates on a major portion of its traffic. By such regulation the State could thus control the railroad's financial condition and earning ability. It is entirely possible that the State, through its rate policy, could inflict operating losses on the railroad. In such a situation the Federal Government would be helpless to control it.

It is my view that responsible legislating on our part would call for exemption of a Federal agency from the control of a State government. In reaching this conclusion, among several reasons, I place great emphasis upon the fact that an enormous function of the railroad is to give logistic support to our Nation's military and air bases located in Alaska.

In such a situation as I have already discussed—the weakening of the railroad by State control and unwise regulation or policies—our national defense might suffer.

From my years of experience I believe I know how rate cases are handled. In every instance there is a desire on the part of private carriers to earn a fair return on their invested capital. In the case of the Alaska Railroad, the management has endeavored to make a marginal profit which would merely cover its costs and provide for some small measure of improvements and betterments. I am certain that the Secretary of the Department of the Interior and various managers of the Alaska Railroad have kept in mind the various goals set forth in the enabling act. A principal one is to "aid in the development of the agricultural and mineral or other resources of Alaska and the settlement of the public land therein."

The committee has not endeavored to set up any special rules for treatment of the Alaska Railroad if regulation should come. It would not seem to me to be equitable to attempt to establish a rate basis on the entire investment of capital in the present facilities of the railroad. From my knowledge of its operations, the railroad appears to have had many millions of dollars spent on it because of its national defense role in Alaska. To date, the railroad has not been required by the Congress to earn and return to the Treasury interest on its investment. Under such a policy, it is understandable that rates have been kept at the lowest practicable level.

In the event that the railroad should be forced to establish a pattern of rates which would permit a return to the Treasury of a fixed rate of return on its capital investment, then I can foresee only increased rates in store for the State's shippers and consumers will pay increased prices because of these higher rates. According to the Department of the Interior, if such a course of action should become necessary, the amount of the overall general rate increase would be at least 20 percent.

The Department of the Interior asked the committee to write into the bill "definite ratemaking standards to guide the regulatory process." As reported from the committee, S. 1508 does not contain any such ratemaking standards. In my opinion, it is a matter of congressional policy as to whether or not the railroad's rates should be set at levels to earn a fair return for the Federal Government. I believe the bill is deficient in this important respect. I am informed that the railroad would be reluctant to change its low-rate policy without a direct congressional mandate. The Interstate Commerce Commission should not be asked to "read the mind" of Congress and to propose a rate policy under a bill which sets no standards for the Commission to apply in this particular case.

In my opinion, the Railway Labor Act should not be applied to the Alaska Railroad. As introduced, S. 1508 said little or nothing about labor relations although the Railway Labor Act automatically covers carriers subject to part I of the Interstate Commerce Act. A committee amendment has now been proposed to make it even more clear that the railroad is subject to the Railway Labor Act.

The Railway Labor Act was written in the light of labor relations as they were found to exist on privately owned carriers. It is based upon the existence of the right to strike but seeks to channel disputes through mediation, arbitration or "emergency board" fact-finding processes, in the hope that the right to strike will not be invoked. Alaska Railroad employees could not participate in the final step of this procedure, namely, the establishment of an emergency board, without making a threat to effect a serious interruption in interstate commerce. The committee amendment would therefore seem to contravene for the Alaska Railroad, the general prohibition against strikes by Federal employees.

The Railway Labor Act's provisions are manifestly inappropriate for a Government-operated facility.

The Alaska Railroad has long been a pioneer among Federal agencies, in its good working relationships with its employees. Most employees are union members, and the railroad recognizes and regularly bargains with union representatives, in the setting of wages and other matters. A wage pattern has been established under which Alaska Railroad employees receive stateside wages plus a cost-of-living differential more than sufficient to compensate for the actual difference in cost of living in Alaska, plus fringe benefits which are enjoyed by the employees of no other railroad in the country.

Under the provisions of S. 1508 the Alaska Railroad would be subject to the provisions of the Interstate Commerce Act under which the Interstate Commerce Commission could require the Alaska Railroad to use a uniform system of accounts such as any other class carrier would be required to maintain. At the present time, the Alaska Railroad maintains accounting principles and standards prescribed by the General Accounting Office and the railroad is subject to an annual audit by GAO.

Under S. 1508, conflicting requirements could be imposed with respect to accounting practices. The railroad's accounting is a modern business type and it is apparent that the changeover would impose additional costs, be wasteful and expensive and would undoubtedly hamper the administrative efficiency of the railroad.

I think the Department of the Interior has done a very good job of regulating the Alaska Railroad through the administrative control exercised by the Secretary of the Interior. Its operations are guided by the public interest. It has no motive other than to provide good service at low rates. The appropriate committees of the Congress have admonished the railroad officials on numerous occasions not to incur operating deficits. Rates have been set at the lowest practicable levels consistent with these instructions. To my mind there has been shown no need for regulation by any outside agency to protect the shipper from excessive rates. It is my understanding that no charges have been sustained that the Alaska Railroad engages in unfair practices or operates in a manner that would not be permitted to a private carrier under Interstate Commerce Commission regulation. I am informed that very few complaints have ever come to the Secretary of the Interior regarding railroad practices. I do not believe that the Secretary would condone competitive practices which are unfair or which would be considered violations of proper ratemaking or service standards.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to include in the body of the RECORD at this point statements relating to the capital investment of the Alaska Railroad, the defense mission of the railroad, labor relations of the Alaska Railroad, and proposed terminal charge increase by the Alaska Railroad. These are matters which should be considered as a part of the legislative history of S. 1508.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CAPITAL INVESTMENT IN THE ALASKA RAILROAD

The Alaska Railroad was constructed under the authority of the act of March 12, 1914, which authorized the President to select a route or routes connecting the navigable waters of interior Alaska and one or more coalfields with an open water port or ports on the southern coast of Alaska, and authorized an appropriation of $35 million for that purpose. In 1919 the original $35 million authorization was exhausted, and additional sums were authorized. During and after World War II additional facilities were constructed, and since that war an extensive program of rehabilitating the entire line has been carried out. Total appropriations by the Federal Government to June 30, 1958 have amounted to slightly more than $169 million. Additional funds for improvements and betterments have been expended by the railroad during recent years from retained earnings.

The railroad capital account shows an aggregate proprietary interest of the United States, as of June 30, 1958, of $132 million including invested and donated capital and retained earnings of the railroad. On the asset side total assets on that date were given as $135 million broken down as follows:

Current assets	$16,000,000
Land	90,000
Buildings (depreciated value)	8,443,000
Other structures and facilities (depreciated value)	70,401,000
Equipment (depreciated value)	18,238,000
Nonoperating property (depreciated value)	5,620,000
Additions and betterments in progress	15,591,000
Property awaiting disposal	26,000
All other assets and debits	1,578,000

Much of the cost of construction of Alaska Railroad facilities has been due directly to military requirements. Of the four branches, two, the Whittier and Eielson branches, were built for the direct service of military requirements; the other two, Matanuska and Healy, were built to tap coalfields of which the military are the predominant customer.

After the branch to the southern port of Whittier had been built during World War II, the railroad should, on purely economic grounds, have discontinued its service to the other southern port of Seward. However, it was the military decision that two southern gateways to the railbelt should be maintained in operating condition at all times; therefore, the railroad at great expense rehabilitated the Seward-Portage line and constructed a new modern dock at Seward.

In like manner the railroad has had to invest in rolling stock and other facilities far beyond purely civilian requirements in order to serve national defense. For example, the railroad recently advised the congressional appropriations committees that it proposed to purchase a rotary car dumper at a cost of about $110,000. The dumper was justified on the grounds of estimates of sharply increased tonnages of coal shipments resulting from the new military installation at Clear.

DEFENSE MISSION—THE ALASKA RAILROAD

In enacting the Organic Act of the Alaska Railroad in 1914, the Congress gave the railroad two missions: first, the settlement and development of Alaska, and, second, national defense, the "transportation of coal for the Army and Navy, transportation of troops, arms, munitions of war." The defense value of the railroad was dramatically brought home during World War II when Alaska became a key strategic area.

The major defense installations of Alaska, Fort Richardson, Elmendorf Air Force Base, and Ladd and Eielson Air Force Bases, as well as the Clear missile site now under construction, are made possible and served by the railroad. Approximately 58 percent of tonnage movements and 42 percent of revenues are from direct Army shipments, without attempting to compute how much additional tonnage is indirectly related to the defense mission.

The defense importance of the Alaska Railroad has been consistently recognized by the Congress. For example, in 1948 the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce reported in reference to the railroad's rehabilitation program:

"From examination made by the committee it is apparent that there will be no diminution in traffic owing to the tonnage proposed to be handled for defense purposes. This is of sufficient quantity to require extensive rehabilitation of the property, and probably additional equipment will be required beyond that now being received as surplus. The maintenance of the defense establishment will continue to require coal from Healy into the Tanana area and from Matanuska into Anchorage. This can be carried practically only by rail. On such ground the current program appears warranted" (H. Rept. No. 1272, 80th Cong., 2d sess.).

Similarly the seventh report of the Preparedness Subcommittee of the Senate Committee on Armed Services, 82d Congress, 1st session (committee print), stated:

"Because the principal supply centers for the Army and Air Force are located at Fort Richardson, the railroad plays a most important part in the planning of the movement of military supplies. Practically all of the transportation over this railroad is northbound both for military and commercial use."

The subcommittee added that "the Alaska Railroad is required to operate many nonprofit-producing services, most of which are due to military requirements."

One of the more notable of many defense features of the railroad is the recent rehabilitation of the Seward-Portage section of line and the construction of new dock facilities at Seward.

At present, the railroad must for military reasons operate two southern terminals on the coast of the Gulf of Alaska, Whittier and Seward, although either port would be entirely adequate to handle the entire volume of freight to and from the railbelt. Of the two, Whittier, a modern port constructed by the military during World War II, with a tide-water route approximately 52 miles shorter than the route from Seward inland, offers the railroad distinct operational advantages.

At the end of World War II the railroad proposed to use Whittier as its principal port and to abandon Seward when the Seward-Anchorage highway was completed. However, with the outbreak of the Korean conflict, the military determined that two year-round rail ports were necessary for the defense of Alaska. Whittier now serves as the exclusive military rail port and the railroad was forced to rehabilitate the Seward-Portage section of the main line and to rebuild the port dock facilities. The Congress appropriated more than $13 million for this purpose.

In 1952 Assistant Secretary of the Army Karl Bendetsen appeared before the House Appropriations Committee in support of the Department of the Interior's request for funds for the Seward dock and the Seward-Portage rehabilitation. Assistant Secretary Bendetsen, speaking of the use of both Whittier and Seward, said: "Taking into account that current and projected peacetime requirements of the civilian and the military would utilize both links and the fact that mobilization needs would also require them, we feel that this constitutes a wise investment in national security."

At the same hearing the commander in chief, Alaska command, Lt. Gen. W. E. Kepner, stated:

"I am of the firm opinion that the abandonment of a major rail line now in existence in Alaska is extremely hazardous. There is no practical alternative to rehabilitation of the Alaska Railroad line between Seward and Portage and the providing of adequate dock facilities at Seward that can meet the strategic requirements imposed by the magnitude of the Alaskan defense effort.

"Therefore, I strongly recommend that the Alaska Railroad line between Seward and Portage be rehabilitated, with adequate dock facilities at Seward, so that the railroad may continue to take advantage of the existing labor market and community facilities at Seward; and further, that military operation of the port of Whittier be continued."

The Alaska Railroad is vital to the conduct of the defense mission in Alaska, both in peace and war. Its operations, and in fact the construction of its physical facilities, have been closely keyed to defense needs during peacetime. In the event of active hostilities, the railroad would of course direct all its energies and the use of all its facilities to the primary purpose of supplying the needs of the military.

Labor Relations on the Alaska Railroad

For many years the Alaska Railroad has been a leader, among Government agencies, in recognizing and dealing with union representatives representing its employees. Wages, working rules, and the like are generally arrived at so far as possible through the give-and-take of collective bargaining. When agreements cannot be reached in this manner at the local level, in some cases the disputes have been referred to higher headquarters. Through this general method agreements have been reached from time to time with most of the same unions representing railroadmen on stateside privately owned railroads.

It is not to be denied that disputes have arisen which have proved difficult to settle, and where extremely prolonged negotiations have occurred. For example, a wage dispute with the operating unions is currently before the Secretary on appeal, and a final settlement has not yet been agreed upon. A recent wage dispute with the nonoperating unions was finally referred to a board of arbitration for decision, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior. Although the railroad management did not agree with the majority decision of the board of arbitration, the Secretary of the Interior did approve the board's award.

The general wage scale on the Alaska Railroad is based fundamentally on the wage scale of the Northern Pacific Railway, with an appropriate differential to allow for the highest cost of living in the railbelt of Alaska. Views differ as to the extent of this difference in the cost of living. The board of arbitration referred to above apparently concluded that the difference amounted to approximately 37 percent.

Wage rates on the Alaska Railroad are actually set in many cases at considerably more than 37 percent higher than the rates for comparable jobs on the Northern Pacific. As a result of the arbitration award referred to above, wages for nonoperating employees average about 45 percent higher than for comparable stateside jobs. As to operating employees, a recent (May 3, 1959) departmental order set these wages at levels of not less than 37 percent higher than the Northern Pacific rate for each job, with the rate for some jobs running higher.

When these wage scales are actually applied in practice, the compensation received by many of the men has been exceedingly generous. Following is a tabulation showing the pay actually received by a number of the operating employees during 1958, compared with the annual salaries of the highest-paid managerial employees of the railroad:

Wage employees:
P. J. Funkhouser, trainman	$14,658
J. L. Decicco, engineman	14,291
J. N. Smith, engineman	13,839
V. T. Pierelee, engineman	13,753
O. H. Nichols, trainman	13,377
Executive employees:
General manager	22,000
Assistant general manager	15,375
Comptroller	14,100
Superintendent of operations	14,100
Chief engineer	13,500
Chief mechanical officer	13,500
Assistant to general manager	13,500
General traffic manager	12,500
Personnel officer	12,000
Assistant comptroller	12,000
Assistant chief engineer	12,000
Master mechanic	12,000

In addition to the wage scales described above, Alaska Railroad employees receive fringe benefits generally greater than those received by employees of privately owned railroads in the old States. Among these benefits are:

Civil service retirement rights, which are generally more generous than under the Railroad Retirement System;

Annual leave accruing at the rate of 13 to 26 days per annum, compared with leave of generally 5 to 15 days per annum for stateside railroads; and Group life insurance, of which the Alaska Railroad pays one-third of the cost, a fringe benefit frequently lacking on stateside railroads.

In summary, wage employees of the Alaska Railroad receive higher wages (even after allowing for the higher cost of living in Alaska), more fringe benefits, and at least equal rights (other than the right to strike), when compared with any other railroad wage employees under the American flag, or anywhere else in the world.

Proposed Terminal Charge Increase by the Alaska Railroad

On December 24, 1959, the Alaska Railroad announced a proposed increase, effective January 25, 1960, in the terminal charge increment in its through tariffs between west coast ports and inland points on the railroad. The proposed increases would have amounted to 5 cents per 100 pounds for carload freight, and 10 cents per hundred pounds on less than carload freight.

The effective date of these proposed increases has now been postponed indefinitely, on the basis of protests by members of the Alaska congressional delegation, and the railroad has announced plans for a hearing in Anchorage, with an ICC examiner if possible, before any further action is taken. However, the background information as to why the railroad considers such increases are necessary is of interest.

By its notice of December 24 the railroad gave the same 30 days statutory notice which would have been required if it had been under the jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission. The proposed increase was not general but applied only to the (approximately) 15 percent of the railroad's tonnage that moves across the dock at Seward for inland Alaska Railroad destinations.

The local tariffs of the railroad were not to be changed. It happens that most of the railroad's freight, such as coal, oil, and cement, moves at local rates from Seward or Whittier, and was not affected by the proposed increase.

The proposed increases, as stated above, were in reality terminal charge increases which were included in through rates between west coast ports and inland Alaska rail points. Terminal work at Seward for the railroad is performed by the Northern Stevedoring & Handling Corp. under contract. This contract requires the railroad to reimburse the contractor for increased costs by reason of longshore wage increases. Under this contract the railroad's longshore payments to Northern Stevedoring & Handling Corp. have been raised several times. The latest increase occurred in October 1959, and was particularly large because the longshore wage differential over Seattle was at that time increased from 25 to 30 percent.

The Alaska Railroad is not run for profit. It would absorb increased longshore costs if it could do so without the danger of becoming a deficit operation. The increase was proposed because, in the judgment of the general manager, these costs could not be absorbed. The probable cost to shippers of the proposed increase would amount to about $150,000. Even with this increase there would be no guarantee that a deficit could be avoided for the current fiscal year.

It is important to recognize that the Federal Government has invested in the neighborhood of $175 million in the Alaska Railroad and has never asked or received a single dollar of interest on this investment. If ever any small surplus occurs on a year's operations for the railroad, it is merely a surplus over out-of-pocket costs, never a return on the Federal Government investment.

Under normal ICC rules a proposed increase of this sort would receive almost automatic Interstate Commerce Commission approval, if the railroad could show that the increase was necessary for the purpose of recouping the railroad for a reasonable share of the increases in its out-of-pocket costs for longshoring, including those caused by the last longshore wage settlement. It is hoped that the hearing to be held will develop the facts fully, so that a prompt decision may be reached on the merits of the case.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment, as amended.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. President, I should say that the committee amendment initially agreed to is designed for one particular purpose. Objection was made to this bill, during its consideration by the committee, on the ground that Alaska Railroad freight rates would be raised, and very measurably, if the ordinary practices of the Interstate Commerce Commission were applied.

This amendment is designed to remove any necessity for such application, because it does two things. In the first place, it spells out, as a matter of legislative determination, the fact that the ICC shall take into account, in respect to rates, the prime purpose of the Alaska Railroad in promoting the economic development of Alaska. Likewise, it takes into account the military importance of the area served by the Alaska Railroad. So that the objection that, if the Interstate Commerce Commission has regulatory jurisdiction of the Alaska Railroad, its rates will be almost automatically increased, is no longer valid. That need not happen, and will not happen unless rates are to be increased for normal reasons.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment, as amended.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MOSS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further proceedings under the quorum call be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

RESOURCES AND CONSERVATION

Mr. MOSS. Mr. President, for many years America has been told that she is mortgaging her future. We are told exactly what each child born into these United States will have hanging over his head as his share of the national debt.

We are not told, however—significantly, we are not told in the same stories—what assets our unborn descendants will have to balance this liability. If we are really concerned about their future, it is far more important to know that the minerals, the farmland, the forests—above all, the water—that they will need will be available.

Our great financial institutions have tremendous liabilities. They could not be big otherwise. They also have tremendous assets. And it is to determine the question of what we Americans as a Nation have in the way of our most important assets—our natural resources—that this proposed legislation has been drawn.

On almost every other subject we have endless statistics to guide our actions, public and private, in the economic field. But on this question, nobody now reports to the people whether we are gaining or losing in relation to requirements for natural resources, or whether the foreseeable requirements of the Nation 10 and 20 years hence can be supplied on a sustained yield basis.

Throughout our national history, too many Americans have had a tendency to hold the belief that we have everything, and plenty of it. Consequently, we have been wasteful and prodigal in the exploitation of our land, forests, minerals, and water. Despite the efforts of many dedicated people, we find ourselves face to face with the absolute fact that the resources we have been heedlessly exploiting are not limitless. We have had droughts and water shortages, mineral deposits have been exhausted, land has been laid waste by floods and erosion, timber supplies have become strained. In short, every thinking person must be aware to some degree that while America is still a land of plenty, gifted by nature, there is a limit, finite and inexorable, to the fundamental basis of our strength, our natural resources.

We need to establish a permanent mechanism for the study and development of comprehensive programs for the protection and utilization of all natural resources, including soil, water, timber, grazing land, fisheries, wildlife, and recreational, scenic, and scientific values. S. 2549, the proposed Resources and Conservation Act of 1960, would provide the mechanism we need for such an appraisal.

The distinguished chairman of the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs [Mr. MURRAY] is now conducting hearings on S. 2549, of which he is the author, and of which I have the privilege of being one of the original cosponsors.

The hearings will provide the Senate with comments and suggestions from all sections of the Nation and from all sectors of economic life. I am confident that the testimony will bring to our attention important considerations and suggestions which will improve the effectiveness of the measure.

In my service with the Interior and Insular Affairs Committee and the Committee on Public Works I have been impressed by the valuable information and suggestions that have come from testimony at hearings. I have observed that, along with the usually excellent technical reports on pending legislation that the committees receive from the Corps of Engineers, the Bureau of Reclamation, and the other Government agencies, important additional information is brought out by local witnesses at hearings. After all, this is only natural, because the people who live with problems, who are vitally concerned in how they will be solved, frequently have an insight into them and a gift for analysis and solution which technical men cannot match.

I had such an experience in a striking way during the past fall. The Select Committee on National Water Resources, under the able chairmanship of the distinguished senior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. KERR], honored me and my State of Utah by holding one of its hearings in Salt Lake City. It was an excellent hearing and an enlightening one.

The point that I wish to make is that the testimony on Utah's specific water problems was developed entirely by local Utah witnesses. By prearrangement of the chairman, all of the testimony of the Federal water experts will be presented directly to the select committee in Washington, thus affording the maximum time for the local people.

At that hearing, in addition to the Governor, who made a masterful statement in a field in which he is an authority, the witnesses included a number of representatives of water-user organizations, county officials, businessmen's groups, chambers of commerce, and other citizen groups. There were some 25 witnesses, and more than 250 people at the hearing. Let me emphasize that this was not a hearing devoted to building some new project in the State, which is the type that customarily brings out a large number of proponents. This was a hearing about the long-range problem of planning for Utah's resource development and conservation, and how to meet the requirements of the 50 percent population growth which we must expect in the not-too-distant future. Testimony covered a very wide range of subjects because resource development and conservation touch almost every aspect of agriculture, business, industry, and Government affairs.

At this point, I want to pay special recognition to a group of exceptionally well-informed and hard-working citizens who confirm my convictions about the need for the Resources and Conservation bill. I refer to the League of Women Voters. Recommendations from the league carry weight because they are based on intensive study of the facts and the issues, and because the organization is scrupulous in maintaining objective non-partisan approaches to the questions.

The League of Women Voters of the United States, as well as the Utah League, has endorsed the Resources and Conservation bill, and supports its early enactment. At the Utah hearing, the league testimony was presented by its State president, Mrs. Paul B. Porter, whom I want to compliment for a remarkably able statement.

I have discussed this Salt Lake City hearing—and it is typical of the other select committee hearings which were held in all sections of the country—because it is impressive evidence that our citizens, farmers, businessmen, professional men, and others have a perspective and grasp of the overall problems of managing natural resources in relation to the impending great increase in population and industry. These hearings demonstrated to me that this is a real and present concern to the people we represent, and it is a problem which so far has not been approached on an overall basis by the technical staffs in the Government.

It is manifestly unfair to criticize Government agencies because they have not engaged in the kind of overall resource planning which is needed now. Each of the agencies has been assigned a specialized and limited mission—flood control, or soil conservation, or forest resources, or reclamation, or range management, or wildlife, to name a few.

As a result of this restricted approach by each of the agencies and departments, no single group puts all of the separate pieces together to see where we are coming out. To repeat: Nobody reports to the people whether we are gaining or losing in relation to requirements for natural resources, or whether the foreseeable requirements of the Nation 10 and 20 years hence can be supplied on a sustained yield basis. These are the questions that underlie the testimony at the hearings this fall.

One problem which needs analysis, for example, is what tempo should be set for reclamation development. My State of Utah, and all of the other Western States, are dependent upon a sustained program of water resource development because water storage and regulation is the basis of our agriculture, commerce, industry, and even the very life of our communities, both rural and metropolitan. The current slowdown of reclamation development could cut off our economic life, and could turn us into a backward area of the Nation.

We are told that reclamation has been slowed down because we already have a surplus of agricultural production and reclamation would aggravate the surplus. This is directly contrary to the facts, but it seems to be given credence. The crops raised on irrigated lands are not the ones in surplus. The Department of Agriculture reports that we must continue to support developments which will put more water on land if we are to prevent food and fiber shortages for the growing population and industry. The production from about 3½ million acres of additional irrigated land is needed in the West to meet the requirements of 1980. And in order to have those lands in production by 1980, we must start very soon on the construction of the projects which make reclamation and irrigation possible. Unfortunately, there now is no place in the Government where facts like this are analyzed and acted upon.

It is startling to realize that producing enough food to sustain our expanding population will mean converting some 75 million acres of forest lands into cropland and pastures. This would have a very serious impact on timber supplies—almost one-third of the growth on all commercial forest lands would be lost—and would result in a serious curtailment of the important recreational uses of forest areas. Are we wise therefore, in curtailing reclamation developments which could prevent the necessity of turning a good deal of the acreage of forests into cropland later on?

As I have pointed out, at the present time there is no place in the Government where this problem is recognized, and no one charged with supplying well-founded answers. However, under the Resources and Conservation bill S. 2549, this responsibility would fall to the Council of Resources and Conservation Advisers and to the Joint Committee on Resources and Conservation. How will the proposed Resources and Conservation Act operate?

The President will submit to the Congress each year a resources and conservation report. This report will set forth the condition of the Nation's natural resources with particular reference to multiple purpose use; trends in their management and utilization; the adequacy of available natural resources to meet the Nation's needs; a review of all conservation programs and activities and their anticipated effects; and a program for implementing the national policy, including suggested legislation.

The President may supplement this report with additional reports or suggestions for legislation concerned with natural resources conservation and development at any time.

Assisting the President in the preparation of the report will be a three-member Council of Resources and Conservation Advisers, appointed by the President with senatorial approval. These advisers are to be qualified by training, experience, and accomplishments to analyze and interpret natural resource policy and to formulate recommendations.

The Council may utilize whatever sources of information, services, and facilities, public or private, which may be available either through cooperation or by employment of its own staff.

The annual report of the President to the Congress is to be referred to a Joint Committee on Resources and Conservation. This is to consist of eight Members of each legislative body, reflecting the political complexion of the House of Representatives and of the Senate.

This committee will make a continuing study of the President's report and means of coordinating programs in furtherance of national policy. By May 1 of each year the committee will file a report with the Senate and with the House of Representatives, which can be used as a guide for the various congressional committees dealing with natural resources. Supplementary reports and recommendations may be made by the joint committee whenever desirable.

The act will enable the Federal Government to develop a consolidated, well-informed, well-coordinated program which can be revised and updated as circumstances may warrant.

The approach taken by the resources and conservation bill is one which has been used very effectively in economic and financial matters. The Employment Act of 1946, which also was authored by the Senator from Montana [Mr. MURRAY], established a Council of Economic Advisors in the office of the President, and a Joint Economic Committee in the Congress. Each year they make a current appraisal of economic and financial conditions and recommend to the President and to the Congress what legislation is needed in the fields of business, employment, and finance. For 12 years, these annual appraisals and recommendations have been of great value to the Government and to the people at large. Leading economists feel that this committee's appraisals have been of decided benefit in dealing with recessions, inflation, and unemployment.

In the same way, and by similar methods, the resources and conservation bill would give us the tools to bring natural resources in balance with the needs for forest products, agricultural products, minerals, and recreation. For the first time in the Nation's history it would be possible to determine exactly what we possess; what will be needed in the future; and the necessary programs of development and conservation required to maintain our present strength at its peak and yet insure the continued strength of our Nation far into the future.

We have learned from experience with the Employment Act that this is a good method. We know that an understanding of our national aims in the conservation of our natural resources is urgently needed. I am convinced that we should move ahead by early enactment of the resources and conservation bill.

NASSER'S BLACKMAIL MUST BE REPUDIATED

Mr. YOUNG of Ohio. Mr. President, Secretary General Hammarskjold of the United Nations has been attempting to find the key that will prevail upon President Nasser to open the Suez Canal to Israeli shipping.

It is hoped that Secretary General Hammarskjold's efforts have the full support of our Government. Assurances to this effect were given by Francis O. Wilcox, our Assistant Secretary of State for International Organization Affairs, on December 29, 1959.

Since then the silence from the administration has been deafening. This despite the fact that President Eisenhower told the American people on February 20, 1957, that "Egypt bound itself to free and open transit through the Suez Canal without discrimination."

This administration still asserts its support of free and unrestricted use of the Suez Canal. Yet it was noticeably silent, too, when the World Bank approved a $56 million loan to the United Arab Republic for widening of the canal.

It is inconceivable to me that the World Bank would grant this assistance to a nation which has continually flouted the basic principles of the United Nations for the administration of the Suez Canal.

Although the World Bank is not an agency of the U.S. Government, we are the largest contributor to it. I assert that the State Department should have brought all possible pressure against the making of this loan.

Since the Suez incident in 1956, we have been extremely generous in our aid to and support of President Nasser and the United Arab Republic.

Through the good offices of the United Nations we advanced $5 million for the reconstruction of the Suez Canal.

Last year alone our Government approved the sale of $105 million of agricultural commodities in exchange for local currency, most of which will be loaned back for industrial development.

During the last fiscal year we gave over $10 million in technical and economic assistance.

Mr. President, it is right that we show this concern for the economic well-being of the Middle East. Perhaps the only means by which we can attain some sort of reasonable stability in this area is by the economic betterment of its teeming, hopelessly poverty-stricken masses.

President Truman had the vision and the foresight to see this blighted land as the flowering area it once was in ancient times. He forsaw, but did not have the time or support to implement his vision, that only with a higher living standard, education, communications, and development of its latent waterpower could this area become a productive, stable element in the free community of nations. We have—unfortunately after the Communists first made tremendous inroads—taken the first steps in this direction.

In spite of this, Mr. President, Nasser continues his violent harangues against Israel in a reckless display of belligerency.

This fact alone could not be great cause for alarm. It is the usual course that dictators and demagogues resort to when their position is threatened or when they feel the need to bolster their prestige.

His incredible misrepresentation and re-writing of the Suez incident and Sinai Campaign of 1956 by itself is harmless enough. His ridiculous assertion that the poverty-stricken United Arab Republic will soon be making its own guns, tanks, and airplanes is hardly cause for alarm. His bellicose statements are of little meaning with a United Nations Force between Egypt and Israel coupled with the fact that Nasser himself knows from experience that his forces are no match for Israel.

However, President Nasser's continued further interference with Israeli cargoes is cause for alarm and calls for positive affirmative action on the part of the United States.

There is no need for me here to go into the crystal-clear provisions of the 1888 Constantinople Convention which guarantee free access to the Suez Canal for all nations. Nor shall I dwell on the repeated declarations of the United Nations condemning the ban on Israeli transit by Egyptian authorities. This is all well known.

It is tragic enough that the free world has continually allowed him to ban Israel's ships from the canal. However, he at least has, since 1957, permitted non-Israeli ships to carry Israeli cargoes through the canal.

Now he bans any ship carrying cargoes registered in the name of Israeli owners. From a practical viewpoint, this requirement will create havoc in Israel's commercial relations with other nations and their businessmen. It is almost impossible to maintain normal commercial relations under these conditions.

Apart from practical considerations, there is a serious moral issue involved because of our previous commitments. In February 1957 President Eisenhower assured Israel that if she would withdraw her forces from the Sinai Peninsula, the society of nations would guarantee her free access to the Suez Canal.

Israel withdrew, and her cargoes, though not her shipping, were allowed to pass unmolested. Are we now to renege on our assurance to this tiny bastion of democracy in the Middle East? Are we again going to allow Nasser to blackmail us into allowing him to violate all principles of international law and order?

I assert that to do so would be a stain on our Nation's honor as well as a tragic diplomatic blunder.

We and the United Nations must no longer wink at President Nasser's defiance, at his impounding of Israeli cargoes, at his broken pledges.

Is this how we buy a dictatorship's friendship, by silent acquiescence? I hope not.

Must we betray the friendly state of Israel for the uncertain affections of the dictator, President Nasser?

While we remain silent, President Nasser coolly blackmails us with one of the oldest games in international affairs. He says, "If I can't get it from you, I'll get it elsewhere."

And we all know what he means by "elsewhere." He refers to the Soviet Union.

I am informed that only recently, Cairo radio had the effrontery to warn the United States not to try to block the world bank loan for Suez Canal improvement. It threatened to turn for aid "elsewhere" if we did.

Our silence only encourages such outrages. We must make it clear to Nasser that we will not be bluffed.

Mr. President, it is time for the President to use the full power of his office in bringing this matter to the attention of the United Nations and in urging that body to insist that the United Arab Republic adhere to international law.

It is not the time to reward with a $56 million loan, furnished in great part by American taxpayers, a Nation that has backed down on its treaty commitments and has violated and continues to violate the principles of the United Nations and the commitment to officials of this Nation and of the United Nations.

It seems to me fantastic that the World Bank should even consider making a $56 million loan to Nasser's United Arab Republic, so-called, at this time. The discriminatory policies of the United Arab Republic are intolerable to those of us who are citizens of the free world. If we allow the discriminatory and violent policies of Nasser to continue against Israel, then we in America have no right to object to violations of international law by larger and stronger powers.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

JUVENILE DELINQUENCY ACT OF 1959

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of S. 694, Calendar No. 819.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. YOUNG of Ohio in the chair). The bill will be stated by title for the information of the Senate.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. A bill (S. 694) to provide Federal assistance for projects which will demonstrate or develop techniques and practices leading to a solution of the Nation's juvenile delinquency control problems.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Alabama.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, with an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That this Act may be cited as the "Juvenile Delinquency Act of 1959".

FINDINGS AND POLICIES

SEC. 2. (a) The Congress hereby finds and declares that juvenile delinquency diminishes the strength and vitality of the people of our Nation; that such delinquency is increasing in both urban and rural communities; and that its prevention, control, and treatment require intensive efforts on the part of private and governmental interests.

(b) The policy of the Federal Government shall be to assist in the prevention, control, and treatment of juvenile delinquency.

TITLE I—DEMONSTRATION AND STUDY PROJECTS

SEC. 101. (a) For the purpose of demonstrating and developing improved methods, including methods for the training of personnel, for the prevention, control, and treatment of juvenile delinquency, there is hereby authorized to be appropriated for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1960, and for each of the four succeeding fiscal years such sum, not to exceed $5,000,000, as the Congress may determine.

(b) The sums appropriated under this title shall be available for grants or contracts to carry out projects for demonstrations and studies which, in the judgment of the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare (hereinafter in this Act referred to as the "Secretary") hold promise of making a substantial contribution to the discovery, the development, or the evaluation or demonstration of the effectiveness, of techniques and practices, including techniques and practices for the training of personnel, for the prevention, control, and treatment of juvenile delinquency. The Secretary may make such grants to States and municipalities and to other public and private nonprofit agencies, including institutions of higher learning or research: Provided, That the Secretary shall require each grant recipient to contribute money, facilities, or services to the extent the Secretary deems appropriate. He may enter into contracts for such projects with public or private organizations or agencies or with any individuals.

(c) Payments under this title may be made in advance or by way of reimbursement as may be determined by the Secretary, and shall be made on such conditions as the Secretary finds necessary to carry out the purposes of this title.

TITLE II—TECHNICAL ASSISTANCE SERVICES

SEC. 201. (a) The Secretary shall make studies, investigations, and reports with respect to matters relating to the prevention, control, and treatment of juvenile delinquency, including the effectiveness of programs carried out under this Act, cooperate with and render technical assistance to States and municipalities and other public and private agencies in such matters, and provide short-term training and instruction in technical matters relating to juvenile delinquency.

(b) The Secretary shall, in connection with all grants and contracts provided for in title I, collect, evaluate, publish, and disseminate information and materials for agencies and personnel engaged in programs concerning juvenile delinquency.

TITLE III—NATIONAL ADVISORY COUNCIL ON JUVENILE DELINQUENCY

SEC. 301. (a) There is hereby established in the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare a National Advisory Council on Juvenile Delinquency (hereinafter referred to as the "Council"). The Council shall be composed of the Secretary or his designee, who shall be Chairman, and twelve members appointed without regard to the civil service laws by the Secretary. The appointed members of the Council shall be persons (including persons from public and voluntary organizations) who are recognized authorities in professional or technical fields related to juvenile delinquency or persons representative of the general public who are leaders in programs concerned with juvenile delinquency. The Council shall advise the Secretary on the administration of this Act.

(b) Before any grant or contract is made under title I, the Council shall review the project involved and shall submit its recommendation thereon to the Secretary. The Council may also recommend to the Secretary projects initiated by it. The Secretary is authorized to utilize the services of any member or members of the Council in connection with matters relating to this Act for such periods, in addition to conference periods, as he may determine.

(c) Appointed members of the Council, while attending meetings of the Council or otherwise serving at the request of the Secretary, shall be entitled to receive compensation at a rate to be fixed by the Secretary, but not exceeding $50 per diem, including travel time, and while away from their homes or regular places of business they may be allowed travel expenses, including per diem in lieu of subsistence, as authorized by law (5 U.S.C. 73b–2) for persons in the Government service employed intermittently. Notwithstanding the foregoing or any other provision of law the Secretary may accept the services of appointed members under this section without the payment of compensation therefor (and with or without payment of travel expenses or per diem in lieu of subsistence).

(d)(1) Any member of the Council is hereby exempted with respect to such appointment, from the operation of sections 381, 283, 284, and 1914 of title 18 of the United States Code, and section 190 of the Revised Statutes (5 U.S.C. 99), except as otherwise specified in paragraph (2) of this subsection.

(2) The exemption granted by paragraph (1) shall not extend—

(A) to the receipt of payment of salary in connection with the appointee's Government service from any source other than the private employer of the appointee at the time of his appointment; or

(B) during the period of such appointment, and the further period of two years after the termination thereof, to the prosecution or participation in the prosecution, by any person so appointed, of any claim against the Government involving any matter concerning which the appointee had any responsibility arising out of his appointment during the period of such appointment.

TITLE IV—GENERAL PROVISIONS

SEC. 401. (a) The Secretary is authorized to make regulations governing the administration of this Act.

(b) The Secretary shall include in his annual report a full report of the administration of this Act.

(c) There are hereby authorized to be included for each fiscal year in the appropriation for the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare such sums as are necessary to administer the Act.

(d) The term "State" in this Act includes the District of Columbia, Virgin Islands, Puerto Rico, and Guam.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, the bill before the Senate, cosponsored by the distinguished senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. HILL] and me, and reported by the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, is a modest proposal for a start, through a national approach, toward the solution of the problem of juvenile delinquency. It proposes a limited amount of Federal aid for communities, States, institutions, and organizations which are doing pilot work, the results of which may be useful to the entire Nation.

The bill comprises four titles. The first title authorizes an annual appropriation of not to exceed $5 million for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1960, and each of the 4 succeeding fiscal years, for the purpose of demonstrating and developing improved methods for the prevention, control, and treatment of juvenile delinquency. The Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare is authorized by the bill to make such grants to States and municipalities and to other public and private nonprofit agencies, including institutions of higher learning or research, provided that the Secretary shall require each grant recipient to contribute money, facilities, or services to the extent the Secretary deems appropriate.

Title II of the bill provides that the Secretary shall make studies, investigations, and reports; render technical assistance to States, municipalities, and other public and private agencies; and provide short-term training and instruction in technical matters. The Secretary is also directed to collect, evaluate, publish, and disseminate information and materials for agencies and personnel engaged in programs concerning juvenile delinquency.

The third title of the bill provides for the establishment of a National Advisory Council on Juvenile Delinquency in the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare to advise the Secretary on the administration of the act. It provides that before any grant or contract may be made under title I, the Council shall review the project involved, and submit its recommendation thereon to the Secretary.

The fourth title, covering miscellaneous subjects, provides among other things for a full annual report to be made by the Secretary on the administration of the act. This title also defines the term "State" to include the District of Columbia, Virgin Islands, Puerto Rico, and Guam.

The bill was the subject of extensive hearings before a subcommittee of the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, of which I had the honor to be the chairman. The hearings have been printed, and a copy is on the desk of each Senator. Four hundred and five pages of testimony were taken on 5 separate days last spring. To me, they establish beyond a peradventure of doubt that the bill is badly needed; that juvenile delinquency is increasing; that our States, municipalities, and counties have not been able adequately to cope with it; that modest Federal assistance is needed in order to help out in a bad situation.

Let me cite a few statistics in support of these statements. One out of every two cities having a population of 10,000 or more in the United States has no special police officers assigned to work relating to juveniles. One hundred thousand children are held in jail each year when they should be in other types of institutions. They are children who have been guilty of some form or other of juvenile delinquency. Five out of every ten counties in the Nation have no juvenile probation service. Six out of every ten juvenile probation officers have no social work training. Three out of every ten State training schools have no staff social workers. Four out of every ten State training schools have no staff psychologists.

Juvenile delinquency has been increasing throughout the country during recent years.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in the RECORD some statistics compiled by the Federal Bureau of Investigation and contained in a publication entitled "Uniform Crime Reports, United States, 1958 Edition," which was issued on September 2, 1959.

There being no objection, the statistics were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Rate of major crimes per 100,000 population in metropolitan areas.

[Per 100,000]

Chicago metropolitan area	943.5
Philadelphia metropolitan area (includes Bucks, Chester, Delaware, Montgomery, and Philadelphia Counties, Pa.; Burlington, Camden, and Gloucester Counties, N.J.)	916.8
New York, N.Y., metropolitan area	1,145.3
St. Louis, Mo., metropolitan area	1,634.5
Los Angeles, Calif., metropolitan area	2,507.6
Washington, D.C., metropolitan area (includes Alexandria, Arlington, and Fairfax Counties, Va., Montgomery County, Md.)	981.5
Atlanta, Ga., metropolitan area	1,336.1
Birmingham, Ala., metropolitan area	1,212.2
Columbia, S.C., metropolitan area	1,365.2

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, these statistics indicate very clearly that juvenile delinquency is not merely a problem which exists in the slums of our northern cities; it is also a rural problem. It is, if anything, more prevalent in other sections of the country than it is in the greater metropolitan areas.

I have cited these figures simply to show that delinquency and crime are not the problem of any one area; the problem is nationwide. I believe the time has come to deal with the problem on a national scale.

Senators will want to know the position taken on the bill by the administration. I am happy to say that in a letter dated May 1, 1959, which appears on page 6 and the following pages of the committee report, the Acting Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare concludes a thoughtful discussion of the problem with the statement:

In the light of such considerations, it appears that the approach of conferring authority to make special project grants for research and demonstrations, as in S. 694 or S. 765, or for training, as in S. 766, is to be preferred at this time over the more comprehensive authorizations in the other bills.

The last paragraph of the letter reads:

The Bureau of the Budget advises that it perceives no objection to the submission of this report to your committee.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that this letter and another letter addressed to the chairman of the committee, the distinguished Senator from Alabama [Mr. HILL], signed by Mr. Phillip S. Hughes, of the Executive Office of the President, Bureau of the Budget, and which appears on page 8 of the report, may be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF HEALTH,
EDUCATION, AND WELFARE,
Washington, D.C., May 1, 1959.

Hon. LISTER HILL,
Chairman, Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: This is in response to your requests for reports on S. 694, S. 765, S. 766, S. 1090, S. 1091, and S. 1341, bills to authorize Federal assistance for a limited number of years in the control of juvenile delinquency.

S. 694 and S. 765 would authorize Federal grants to States and certain public or nonprofit organizations for developing or demonstrating methods for juvenile delinquency control which are of national or more-than-one-State significance. S. 766 would authorize Federal project grants for training of personnel for work in this field. S. 1090, titles V through IX of S. 1091, and S. 1341 would authorize, in addition to such project grants, formula grants to States to strengthen and improve local juvenile delinquency control programs.

There is an undoubted need for a concerted attack on the mounting problem of juvenile delinquency. For the ninth consecutive year (1948–57), juvenile delinquency cases have continued to rise. The increase in the number of these cases coming before juvenile courts during this period was almost five times greater than the increase in the child population of juvenile court age (10–17).

Even if juvenile delinquency remains fixed at the 1957 rate, the number of juvenile delinquency cases may be expected to increase by 140,000 in 1962 and by 205,000 in 1965 simply because of the known increase in the number of children 10 to 17 years that will occur by these years. The States are already falling further and further behind in dealing with this problem.

One important area requiring greater emphasis and encouragement concerns the development of new techniques and practices leading to a solution of this problem. For many years States and communities have relied mainly on two measures of rehabilitation of delinquent youth—namely, probation service in the community or care in an institution. It has long been known that juvenile delinquency is caused by many factors. A wide variety of treatment measures are needed. Yet only a small beginning has been made in developing comprehensive programs for the care and treatment of delinquent youth. In a few places new measures are being tried, such as central reception and classification centers, group therapy, and street group workers for working with neighborhood gangs. However, much more experimentation and study are needed in the development of other measures, as well as the evaluation of the effectiveness of present measures.

There is also abundant evidence of the need for training of personnel. Most of the personnel already employed in serving delinquent youth lack the necessary training to enable them to do an effective job of rehabilitating these youth; only 1 out of 10 juvenile probation officers has completed social work training, while more than 4 out of 10 lack a college degree and are not even eligible for professional training. There is also need for developing a reservoir of trained personnel to enable expanding existing services; for example, about one-half of the counties in the United States have no probation services at all for delinquent youth. Finally, training courses need to be made widely available if there is to be any significant increase in the numbers of persons trained.

While the need for the development of improved techniques and practices of juvenile delinquency control and the need for training of personnel can be met in important measure by nationally directed efforts, the focal points of any successful attack on the problem must be the States and the communities. States and communities need to be helped and encouraged to strengthen and improve their juvenile delinquency programs through evaluation of their present activities, development, and demonstration of new or improved techniques, provision of needed training to State and local personnel, and more effective coordination between the many public and voluntary agencies working in this field.

We are in accord with the objectives of all of these bills of enabling the Federal Government to give greater assistance and leadership in coping with juvenile delinquency. While the Federal Government could make a significant contribution through each of the approaches suggested by the bills—project grants for research and development of improved techniques, project grants for training, and formula grants to States for strengthening State and local programs—the rate at which the Federal Government should proceed and the amount of funds it should devote to any of these approaches during any particular year must necessarily be determined in the broad context of all national needs. In the light of such considerations, it appears that the approach of conferring authority to make special project grants for research and demonstrations, as in S. 694 or S. 765, or for training, as in S. 766, is to be preferred at this time over the more comprehensive authorizations in the other bills.

Should the committee decide to report out one of these bills, we would appreciate an opportunity to offer suggestions for technical improvements.

The Bureau of the Budget advises that it perceives no objection to the submission of this report to your committee.

Sincerely yours,

ELLIOTT L. RICHARDSON,
Acting Secretary.

EXECUTIVE OFFICE OF THE PRESIDENT,
BUREAU OF THE BUDGET,
Washington, D.C., May 6, 1959.

Hon. LISTER HILL,
Chairman, Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.

MY DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: This is in response to your requests for reports on S. 694, S. 765, S. 766, S. 1090, S. 1091, and S. 1341, bills to authorize Federal assistance for a limited number of years in the control of juvenile delinquency.

S. 694 and S. 765 would authorize Federal grants to States and certain public or nonprofit organizations for developing or demonstrating methods for juvenile delinquency control which are of national or more than one State significance. S. 766 would authorize Federal project grants for training of personnel for work in this field, S. 1090, titles V through IX of S. 1091, and S. 1341 would authorize, in addition to such project grants, formula grants to States to strengthen and improve local juvenile delinquency control programs.

The unfortunate consequences of juvenile delinquency are self-evident. Similarly, there is no question about the desirability of programs to reduce juvenile delinquency. However, at present only a small beginning has been made in developing programs whose effectiveness has been tested and proved. In addition, thoughtful consideration must be given to the sound and appropriate balance between Federal, State, and local responsibilities and to the overall Federal budgetary considerations.

In the circumstances, the Bureau of the Budget believes that first consideration should be given to research and demonstrations, such as are contemplated in S. 694 or S. 765. Such research and demonstrations, by evaluating existing methods and developing new techniques for juvenile delinquency control, would provide a much-needed base for strengthening of our national effort in this field. However, we would recommend against formula grants to States to strengthen and improve local juvenile delinquency programs, as in S. 1090, S. 1091, and S. 1341 at the present time.

Sincerely yours,

PHILLIP S. HUGHES,
Assistant Director for Legislative References.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Pennsylvania yield?

Mr. CLARK. I prefer to complete my brief statement, which will take only 3 or 4 minutes more; then I shall be happy to yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. LAUSCHE. I understand.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, when we began to consider the bill in committee, we were confronted with the fact that the bill as initially sponsored by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. HILL] and me did not contain any specific provision for training. The overwhelming weight of the evidence in the testimony before us satisfied me that training was at least as important as demonstration projects and the collection and dissemination of information, if not more so. At that time we were hopeful that we could get the bill through the Senate and the House before the end of the last session of Congress, but we had advice from our friends in the other body that it would be easier to achieve that result if we did not add a training provision. So, unfortunately, we were unable to embody such a provision in the bill.

Obviously we are confronted with a different situation now at the opening of the 2d session. For that reason, I submit, on behalf of myself, the Senator from Colorado [Mr. CARROLL], the Senator from Michigan [Mr. HART], the Senator from Missouri [Mr. HENNINGS], the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE], and the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. KEFAUVER], an amendment which will add a new title II, Training of Personnel. The new title proposed is identical to the training title contained in the bill reported by the Juvenile Delinquency Subcommittee last summer. I ask that the amendment be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated for the information of the Senate.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 7, line 12, it is proposed to strike out "$5,000,000" and substitute therefor "$2,500,000".

On page 8, after line 9, insert a new title II and renumber subsequent titles and sections accordingly:

TITLE II—TRAINING OF PERSONNEL

SEC. 201. (a) For the purpose of training personnel, employed or preparing for employment in programs for the prevention, control, and treatment of juvenile delinquency, there is hereby authorized to be appropriated for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1960, and for each of the four succeeding fiscal years such sum, not to exceed $2,500,000, as the Congress may determine.

(b) Sums appropriated under this title shall be available for grants or contracts to carry out programs for the training of such personnel, which in the judgment of the Secretary hold promise of making a substantial contribution to the prevention, control, and treatment of juvenile delinquency. Such programs may include the development of courses, fellowships and traineeships, with such stipends and allowances including travel and subsistence expenses as the Secretary may determine to be necessary. The Secretary may make such grants to States and municipalities and to other public and private nonprofit agencies, including institutions of higher learning: Provided, That the Secretary shall require each grant recipient to contribute money, facilities, or services to the extent the Secretary deems appropriate. He may enter into contracts for such programs with public or private organizations or agencies or with individuals.

(c) Payments under this title may be made in advance or by way of reimbursement as may be determined by the Secretary, and shall be made on such conditions as the Secretary finds necessary to carry out the purposes of this title.

On page 8, line 21, and on page 9, line 17, after "title I", insert "and title II".

On page 9, line 18, after the word "project", add "or program", and on page 9, line 20, after the word "projects", add "or programs".

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, when we came to vote on the bill in the full committee, there were two objections to the bill as originally proposed. The reasons for the objection to the bill were set forth in an eloquent dissent by the distinguished Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE]. His dissent was based largely on the ground that the training section had been deleted from the bill.

The supplemental views of the senior Senator from New York [Mr. JAVITS], who wanted a more comprehensive measure, were also based largely, although not entirely, on the fact that there was no training provision in the bill.

I have had occasion in the last few days to ask the clerk of the committee to poll the members of the committee on the question whether they would now approve of the addition of a training section amendment, and they have indicated in substantial unanimity, on the Democratic side, that they would favor such an amendment. It is for that reason that I have offered it.

I am conscious of the fact that two members of the committee who did not choose to file minority views did indicate their objections to the bill. I am certain that if they still feel now as they did then, they will advise us of their reasons at this time. But the bill with the training amendment in it, has the overwhelming support of the members of the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare. I hope it will be passed speedily by the Senate.

Mr. President, I shall yield first to the Senator from Ohio; then to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, is my understanding correct that if this measure is adopted, it will constitute the entrance by the Federal Government into active participation in the fight against juvenile delinquency?

Mr. CLARK. The Senator is correct. It is hoped that a juvenile delinquency bureau or agency in the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare will be able to do substantially the same work in this field as the Children's Bureau has done for so long and so successfully as a part of that department.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Do I further understand that what has been proposed is merely a beginning of what is contemplated to become participation by the Federal Government?

Mr. CLARK. I would hope that the Senator is not correct in what I assume are the implications of his remarks. I, for one, would never want to see the Federal Government become very deeply involved in operations in this field. I think it is primarily a local responsibility, with some State overtones. However, I believe the Federal Government is in a far better position than any State or locality to do the moderate things which are called for in the bill and which will cost only a modest amount of money. Those things are: To help finance, on a grant-in-aid basis, with some matching funds or services, special demonstration projects to test theories for the handling of juvenile delinquency; to collect, evaluate, and disseminate information, so that the juvenile authorities in the Senator's State of Ohio and elsewhere can know the latest achievements—if any—in my State; and furthermore, to make it possible to start a training program, so that over the course of the years we may be able to have some really qualified personnel working this area.

Mr. LAUSCHE. In dealing with the training program, does the Senator from Pennsylvania mean that the Federal Government would begin carrying the expense of training social workers, policemen, probation officers, psychoanalysts, psychiatrists, and others, to fight juvenile delinquency?

Mr. CLARK. I think the best way to answer the Senator's question is to read from the text of the amendment which I have just offered, which calls for an authorization for the expenditure of $2,500,000, and then states:

Sums appropriated under this title shall be available for grants or contracts to carry out programs for the training of such personnel, which in the judgment of the Secretary hold promise of making a substantial contribution to the prevention, control, and treatment of juvenile delinquency. Such programs may include the development of courses, fellowships, and traineeships, with such stipends and allowances, including travel and subsistence expenses as the Secretary may determine to be necessary. The Secretary may make such grants to States and municipalities and to other public and private nonprofit agencies, including institutions of higher learning: Provided, That the Secretary shall require each grant recipient to contribute money, facilities, or services to the extent the Secretary deems appropriate.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Then, it is the concept of this bill that our present universities and other institutions of teaching have not been adequate in the development of social workers, trained police officers, trained parole officers, trained judges, and other services which have a relationship to the fight against juvenile delinquency?

Mr. CLARK. Yes, I think that is true, and that statement is certainly justified on the basis of my own personal experience in this regard.

Mr. LAUSCHE. I should like to hear the Senator's view on this question. I take it that we have about 55 million families in our country.

Mr. CLARK. If the Senator says so, I will agree with him.

Mr. LAUSCHE. I think there are about three members to each family, and there is a total population of about 165 million. We have our schoolteachers, rabbis, ministers, and priests. We have our social workers, police officers, judges, sheriffs. Is it the view of the Senator from Pennsylvania that if this great army of people who are entrusted with the development of the moral character of our youth have not been able to do the job, the Senate of the United States will be able to do it by trying to perform a function that belongs to the segments indicated and to local and State governments?

Mr. CLARK. No; I would not agree with the Senator in that regard. If the Senator was present at the beginning of my exposition of this bill, he will recall the shocking government statistics which I read indicating the serious lack of personnel qualified to prevent, control, and treat juvenile delinquency.

I am sure he would agree with me, because he has wide experience with this general subject, that it is really shocking to see how really few qualified persons are working in this area. I would call these statistics to his attention, and I hope he has read them, because I feel that they prove the desperate need for more trained personnel. If the Senator would take the time to pursue the hearings which were held on this bill, and read the statements of distinguished gentlemen from the States of Washington, Oregon, Pennsylvania, New York, Maryland, and other States, I am sure his fine and analytical mind would be persuaded that these persons were not talking anything but straight common sense. The facts are clear.

Mr. LAUSCHE. I heard the Senator's statement from the very beginning, but I wish to point out that if we are to indulge the hope of curbing the increase in juvenile delinquency, it will not be adequate to start treating the child after he has been spoiled, but the efforts must be directed toward the moral fiber of adults, who rather universally influence the actions of juveniles and who set the examples that debase the character of our youth.

Mr. CLARK. Let me say to my friend that I, of course, agree with everything he has said with such fervor, eloquence, and obvious sincerity. Clearly, the place where the most effective work can be done is in the homes, the schools, and the churches; but the work has not been done sufficiently, and juvenile delinquency has been an increasing problem, which must be met if we are to carry out our legislative responsibilities. I should merely like to add this comment: While I agree with everything the Senator has said, what he has said, in and of itself, is not going to cure the situation.

Mr. LAUSCHE. The Senator from Pennsylvania has described the scarcity of what I would call trained social workers, trained policemen, trained psychoanalysists, trained psychiatrists, and, I suppose, trained parents; but may I ask the Senator from Pennsylvania if there is not a similar scarcity in practically every category of workers and professional people in our country? There is not an adequate number of teachers or an adequate number in many other professional categories. The only profession in which there is an adequate number is the field of law. We have too many lawyers.

Mr. CLARK. I agree with my friend. He and I are lawyers, and perhaps we are in surplus.

Mr. LAUSCHE. How would the Senator proceed with the $5 million a year to develop a sufficient number of adequately trained policemen, judges, and the other categories I have mentioned?

Mr. CLARK. In the first place, let me say the $5 million would make an extremely limited contribution to finding the answer to the very serious problem which my friend has mentioned, but I cannot answer the question any better than I did a moment ago by reading to the Senator the provisions of the amendment with respect to training, and add, with respect to demonstration projects, that there appeared before our committee, in the course of the testimony, I would say 15, at least, and probably 25, representatives of institutions, private and public, who were desperately anxious to conduct demonstration projects, for which they could not get local, municipal, or State funds.

In my judgment, having heard what they wanted to do, there was not one of them who did not feel that demonstration projects would have a substantial benefit in determining how to deal with this serious problem.

Mr. LAUSCHE. I assure the Senator from Pennsylvania that I have a deep concern about this problem. I have studied it for practically 29 years, from the first time I appeared as a judge in a court, and I know the significance of the problem. But I should like to hear the Senator's opinion as to whether or not, if the U.S. Congress began putting its finger vigorously and in every possible way upon the exploiters and the crooks who are setting a bad example for our youth, we would not be achieving more. I now speak of payola, radio deceit, labor racketeers, exploiters in the sale of drugs.

Every day we read in the newspapers descriptions of those who rob the public. When we see the little fellow standing at the corner, deprived of some of the things of life that he wants, we can well understand why he embarks on a delinquent way of life. My point is that we are trying to treat the symptom without getting to the cause.

Mr. CLARK. I think there is much truth in what my friend has said. I hope he will not leave the Chamber before I have an opportunity to comment on what he has said.

Mr. LAUSCHE. No; I am staying.

Mr. CLARK. It seems to me this problem is similar to many national and international problems. It has to be attacked on all fronts at once. What the Senator has said about payola is correct. What he has said about crooks and thieves having a bad influence on juveniles is correct. Merely to state the problems, however, is not enough. It is not enough to preach sermons in church. It is not enough to say to a parent, "You should put your child on your knee and say, 'Oh, be a good boy, Johnny,'" or to say to a teacher that she should tell him, "Be a good boy." We have been trying that for generations, and the situation is growing worse. I say this is merely another approach to a solution of a serious national problem. The approach outlined in the bill was recommended to us by so able and sincere a man as John C. Davenport, commanding officer of the Juvenile Bureau, Cincinnati Police Division. I commend the statement of Officer Davenport, which appears on page 24 of the hearings. I am sure the Senator from Ohio will read that statement with an open mind, and I have no doubt it will be as convincing to him as it was to me.

Mr. LAUSCHE. I may say to the Senator from Pennsylvania that I read that statement. Mr. Davenport pointed out that there are now 14 agencies in Cincinnati dealing with the juvenile delinquency problem and, that a certain group had achieved a rather remarkable result as compared with the failure of another group.

Mr. CLARK. The Senator is correct. I shall read from page 27 of the hearings:

> Senator CLARK. Is there any indication in your community of a lack of trained personnel?
> Mr. DAVENPORT. Definitely.
> Many of these boys I have mentioned are financial burdens on their family, coming from this group that is having a hard struggle the way it is, and money I think, is becoming increasingly important, as a way of life for boys when they reach the adolescent age.
> If this type of youth is not provided some way in which they can make an honest dollar they are often inclined to be less particular in how they get money.

Then he went on to endorse the bill which we are debating on the floor today.

Mr. LAUSCHE. My recollection is that Mr. Davenport endorsed the bill on the basis of a question put by the Senator from Pennsylvania, in which the Senator from Pennsylvania asked, in effect, "Do you have adequate money in Cincinnati to do this job on your own, or do you need money from the Federal Government?" The answer was, "We have done a limited job, but we could do a better job if we were provided with more money."

Is that correct?

Mr. CLARK. I think the Senator is correct.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Then, reduced to its essence, the bill is the beginning of the Federal Government providing money to local and State governments to do the job of providing personnel and training personnel to fight the juvenile delinquency evil?

Mr. CLARK. To a limited extent, and to a substantially lesser extent than we have already done in the field of housing, of urban renewal, of hospitals, of health, of all the other things to which I know my good friend from Ohio so seriously objects.

I honor the Senator for his position. There is an ideological difference between the Senator from Ohio and me, and between the Senator and those of us on this side of the aisle who are constantly supporting those programs. I honor my friend for his views. I simply happen to disagree with him.

Mr. LAUSCHE. There is not a substantial ideological difference. My view is that the problem has to be fought. It should be fought by getting at the causes, and not by treating the symptoms. It should be fought primarily by those agencies which from time immemorial have been responsible for the guidance of youth and the development of moral character. I have grave doubt about the Federal Government arrogating to itself the final judgment that it will be able to solve this problem merely by pumping money into a program of training, and so forth.

Mr. CLARK. I think my friend has—I am sure inadvertently—quite distorted the purpose of the bill. The Federal Government is arrogating nothing to itself, except its ability to give a modest amount of money to local, State, and private agencies who are struggling desperately to treat not the symptoms, but the cause, of the disease and who are running out of money.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Then, the Senator from Pennsylvania is of the opinion that the Federal Government is financially in a better position to do the job than Cincinnati, or the State of Ohio, or Philadelphia, or the State of Pennsylvania, or other local and State governments?

Mr. CLARK. No, I think no such thing. I am sure the Senator would not want to put words in my mouth. I know he does not.

What I think is that this resembles many other Federal programs. Some programs are many years old, such as the famous Hill-Burton hospital program, which has been on the books since the early days when the distinguished Senator from Alabama came to the Senate. There are other programs, such as those for urban renewal and housing. Like those programs, this calls for a coordinated attack at all levels of government—first local, then State, then Federal.

I will say to my friend again, as I am afraid I have said before in friendly disagreement many times, that in my judgment, the Federal income tax provides a fairer allocation of money for these things than any system of real estate taxes; or wage taxes, which are not graduated; or sales taxes, which bear unduly heavily on the poor. I, for one, am confident that the small amount of Federal money which we are proposing to put into this program can more justly, more equitably, and more fairly be raised at the Federal level than in Philadelphia, or Cincinnati, or Columbus, or Cleveland, Ohio.

I do not want to see the real estate taxes in our cities go any higher. We have to deal with juvenile delinquency. The cities are being bled pretty nearly white, trying to do the job now. Rather than raise the real estate taxes of the Senator from Ohio and my own, I would rather see raised the income taxes of the Senator and myself. I hope we will not come to that, either.

Mr. LAUSCHE. I think the Senator from Pennsylvania and I are in agreement as to what ought to be done to cure the fiscal problem confronting the Federal Government.

Mr. CLARK. I think we are, too.

Mr. LAUSCHE. I am glad to state what is the Senator's position and mine, as I believe it to be.

Mr. CLARK. We should close those loopholes.

Mr. LAUSCHE. We should quit delaying the paying of our obligations and placing them upon the shoulders of our children and our children's children. We should carry our obligations ourselves, if we contemplate spending the money.

Mr. CLARK. I agree with my friend.

Mr. LAUSCHE. The probability is that I will go along with this measure.

Mr. CLARK. This is indeed good news.

Mr. LAUSCHE. The fear I have is that this will merely be the beginning of the development of a gigantic new Federal program under which we will try to do a thing which properly belongs to other agencies.

Mr. CLARK. Let me say I shall stand shoulder to shoulder with my friend from Ohio to prevent that from coming to pass.

Mr. LAUSCHE. I thank the Senator.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I now yield to my distinguished colleague the senior Senator from Missouri.

Mr. HENNINGS. I thank my able and distinguished friend the senior Senator from Pennsylvania. My remarks on this matter will be relatively brief.

First, I should like to commend both the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLARK] and the able and learned Senator from Alabama [Mr. HILL] for having sponsored the bill and for having been instrumental in getting the support of the other members of the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare and bringing the bill before the Senate for consideration.

I had the honor of joining with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLARK], the Senator from Colorado [Mr. CARROLL], the Senator from Michigan [Mr. HART], the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE], and the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. KEFAUVER] in cosponsoring the amendments.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent at this time to add the name of the junior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. DODD], an able and diligent member of the Subcommittee To Investigate Juvenile Delinquency, of the Committee of the Judiciary, who has taken a very active part in its hearings.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. President, as chairman of the Subcommittee To Investigate Juvenile Delinquency of the Committee on the Judiciary for the past 3 years, and as a member of the same subcommittee for the 3 previous years, I have been exposed over those years to the problems relating to juvenile delinquency. Moreover, through various phases of my own activity and work before I was elected to the Senate, I have been exposed to the problem and its effect on the United States.

The reports of the subcommittee for the past 3 years have continually warned the Congress of the threat to our Nation posed by an ever-increasing rise in juvenile crime which, is as we have found from coast to coast, permeating every stratum of our society.

For the 10th straight year, Mr. President, the United States has experienced an increase in juvenile crime. Never before in the history of our Nation has there been such a persistent rise in antisocial behavior by young people. In this decade of delinquency—for lack of a better, more comprehensive or perhaps more accurately descriptive term—we find appearances by young children before the juvenile court for delinquency increased more than 2½ times. This figure becomes all the more startling when we realize that the child population in this age group increased by only one-third.

Recent studies and hearings of the subcommittee have revealed a series of shocking facts respecting the delinquency problem in the United States. For the past year for which we have complete figures, the year 1958, there was a total of 700,000 appearances in our juvenile courts by children and youths in the age group of 10 through 17.

There were apprehended by the police, an estimated 1,800,000 youths under the statutory denomination and limitation of delinquency. Now there are approximately 2 million children in our country in the 10- to 17-year-age group who have a record of one or more adjudications before juvenile courts, which means that 20 percent, or one in five, of our adolescent male population has appeared before a juvenile court.

I may say parenthetically that we have this morning continued, in the city of Washington, the second of a series of hearings relating to the use of narcotics and marijuana. The foundation for these hearings was laid by hearings held on the west coast during the adjournment of Congress, in the month of November.

These conditions are shocking and distressing beyond belief. When I talk about these things, I do not speak from the standpoint of an expert. I am suspicious of experts in this field, because it is so vastly complex and so unfathonable in so many of its aspects that I think anyone pretending to a complete expertness, or suggesting that there is a panacea, by the same measure displays a quantum of ignorance upon this whole subject.

If we only hold the rate of increase of delinquent acts at the level experienced in 1958, we can look forward to the disheartening fact that there will be 800,000 juveniles appearing before the courts in 1965, and more than 900,000—almost 1 million—by 1970.

In this statement I am talking about those who appear before courts. I am not speaking of the ones who are not apprehended. I am not discussing the cases which are adjusted by the juvenile police squads and other law-enforcement officers before they reach a court. I am speaking, of course, of cases which are docketed, or where there is an appearance before the courts.

I spent a number of years of my life as a felony prosecutor. I found, in a large city, a metropolitan area of almost 2 million—and later I was district attorney of that city, after 6 years of court room trial experience—that in case after case, as we pulled out what we called the pink card, the record card, there was a juvenile record, a record that the young man, or in some cases, unhappily, young woman, who was charged with a felony, a penitentiary offense, had been in and out of juvenile courts repeatedly, time after time, year after year.

At the end of this long road of misfortune and misdoing, they arrived in a court having jurisdiction over felonies, where, in many cases, there was little choice but to recommend to the court that they be sent to penal institutions—and by that I mean penitentiaries, so-called "big houses."

If the rate increases at the same pace at which it has increased during the past 10 years—and there seems to be no indication that it will deviate too greatly—we can expect more than 1 million children to appear before the courts in 1965, and more than 1.4 million by 1970.

As was pointed out in the last report of the committee—and I am glad to note the presence in the Chamber of the able Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. WILEY], who has taken a very active part in the work of this subcommittee—these figures represent known or recorded juvenile delinquents in our society. Under the able chairmanship of the distinguished Senator from Tennessee [Mr. KEFAUVER], who preceded me in the chairmanship, inquiries were made into many phases of this problem. I was a member of the subcommittee under his chairmanship. I consider membership on this subcommittee as important as my membership on any of the 15 committees or subcommittees upon which I serve in the Senate. We developed many distressing facts which pointed to a severe crisis in our national life, as a result of young men and young women violating laws. I am not talking about peccadilloes and minor offenses. I speak of crime committed by young people.

We held hearings on juvenile gangs in New York, at the close of the session of Congress last fall, at the request of the judges and the Mayor of New York. The Governor of New York appeared as a witness. The authorities in New York do not believe that this is a problem which should be taken lightly.

The authorities in Philadelphia, where we held hearings, do not consider this situation a minor problem. The able Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLARK], who has been so effective in bringing this bill to the floor of the Senate, sat with the committee. The Governor of Pennsylvania thought the hearing was of sufficient importance to justify his coming from Harrisburg to attend the hearing.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HENNINGS. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. I wish publicly to state the admiration which I have expressed privately to the Senator from Missouri on previous occasions for the effective work which he has been doing in this field for many years.

I recall very well the hearing in Philadelphia at which he presided. At that hearing extremely valuable testimony was adduced, which was of great help to us, although taken by another committee, in connection with the preparation of the pending bill.

The Senator from Missouri, the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. KEFAUVER], the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE], and many other Members of this body—the Senator from Alabama [Mr. HILL] perhaps as much as anyone else—were toilers in this vineyard while I was still in short pants. I approach this problem very much as a Johnny-come-lately.

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. President, I do not believe that the distinguished Senator from Oregon, the Senator from Tennessee, and my friend the senior Senator from Alabama would like to appear as venerable ancients, in this or any other respect, in comparison with the Senator from Pennsylvania. He has been the mayor of a great city. In Chicago, Mayor Daly thought the problem was of sufficient importance to justify him in coming before the committee and testifying. Public officials of New York asked the committee to come to New York, not merely to look into the subject of gangs, but gang murders, felonies, and assaults. The conditions which exist in this and many other large cities are such that it is not safe for law-abiding people, or anyone else, to walk the streets at night in many places in a community, for they may be set upon, plundered, sometimes mutilated, feloniously assaulted, or, indeed, murdered. This is no problem involving merely social workers and psychiatrists, valuable as their services may be at times. This is a stark fact confronting the American people.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator further yield?

Mr. HENNINGS. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. I should like to clarify the record by pointing out that we in the Middle Atlantic States wear "plus fours" longer than those in many other sections of the country, and take to shorts more quickly. [Laughter.]

Mr. HENNINGS. I believe that in some sections of the country if we took to shorts we might have to take to the hills at the same time. [Laughter.] I am sure the Senator's disclosure will be duly noted. He may note his exception.

Mr. CLARK. The Senator is quite correct. I hope it will be duly noted. [Laughter.]

Mr. HENNINGS. We know that there is, what has been termed a great mother lode of maladjustment which has never been detected by formal law enforcement agencies or other delinquency fighting groups. This larger group of hidden youth law violators commits thousands of delinquent acts which are never detected. I need only to refer to the offense of vandalism, and its annual cost, to substantiate this statement and illustrate graphically the tremendous scope of the picture of delinquency.

I happen also to be chairman of the Subcommittee on National Penitentiaries. As such I visit many of these institutions. For 3 days during the Christmas vacation I was in Alderson, W. Va., where I saw some of the young and older women who have been sent to that institution. I saw the manner in which that institution was conducted. In fact, Mr. Bennett, the Director of the Bureau of Prisons, with whom I have worked very closely, because he is an exceedingly fine and able career man in this field, said it was the first time in his experience that he had seen a Member of the Senate stand in the receiving line for 3 hours and shake hands with every inmate of a penal institution, which Mr. Bennett and I did.

I have seen the State prisons. I have spent months, in total, since I have been on the Prisons Subcommittee, seeing the ravages, the end product, of all the things we are talking about, which require preventive measures, not punitive measures. Unhappily, under our present halting progress toward what we might call civilization in this world, we must apply punitive measures, because we have not yet found the key which might be applied to prevent the rising and alarming increase in this character of offenses.

I see the senior Senator from New York on his feet, and I am glad to yield to him. He, too, has taken part in our hearings. He knows that the Governor of the State of New York appointed a special task force to go into this subject. The Governor of New York thought the subject sufficiently important to come from Albany to tell about his problems in this field. Many other governors, mayors, police chiefs, and officials having to do with this perplexing, this distressing, and this enormously important problem have appeared before the subcommittee.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Missouri for yielding to me. I shall qualify myself by stating that not only have I been very much interested in this problem ever since I was a Member of the House of Representatives, but when I was attorney general of New York we established a temporary State commission on youth and delinquency, which I had caused to be organized, and which issued a report which, in my opinion, is a landmark on this subject. I shall speak about the subject in my own time later. However, because I have such great regard and affection for the able Senator from Missouri and for his services in this field, and because I had the honor to appear before the subcommittee at the hearing which he conducted, I should like to ask him a question.

The argument will be made during the debate that this is not a problem in which the Nation should intervene; that this is a State problem, that it is a municipal problem, but that it is not a field in which we should pass Federal legislation. I should like to ask the Senator from Missouri whether, based upon all his experience, he does not agree with me that the significance of this proposed legislation is that the problem is not only national, but is international. It is national because it is getting beyond the capability of the States and municipalities to handle, and international because the report that we cannot control our own children is giving our country a bad name throughout the world.

It is as simple as that. It is a national problem, and I am perfectly willing to debate it upon that basis. The Nation ought to take a hand in solving the problem. I should like to ask the distinguished Senator from Missouri for his view on that point.

Mr. HENNINGS. I appreciate very much the remarks of the senior Senator from New York. He made a very substantial contribution to our hearings.

The fact is inescapable that the problem has become national in scope. That is evidenced by the fact that local officials have said they do need the things the Federal Government can furnish them to deal with this many-faceted problem, and that the States themselves do not consider this purely a local or State problem. As a former distinguished attorney general of the largest State in the Union, I should like to ask the able Senator from New York whether he, with his experience as attorney general, does not think that New York, as well as other States of the Union, needs help?

Mr. JAVITS. I certainly do. That is the reason why our Governor testified. That is why I testified. I say we do, for this reason: Many of the crimes referred to are in the Federal establishment. For example, the stealing of automobiles brings youngsters into the Federal courts. Many of these young people are confined in Federal institutions. There is a tremendous amount of brainpower and skill applied to the treatment of this situation, throughout the country, not only in New York City or in New York State. It is a very difficult and extremely elusive problem. The deprivations which are caused are not confined to New York. I am sure that there are juvenile delinquents in Vermont and New Hampshire and Connecticut and Massachusetts and in other States, who perform their acts in New York, and vice versa.

It is high time we did something about it.

Mr. HENNINGS. The Senator has put his finger on the point. The conditions are as he has described them. For example, a motor vehicle theft involves a violation of a Federal law if it involves the interstate transportation of the stolen motor car. We are talking also about matters relating to narcotics and marijuana, matters relating to runaway children, and matters relating to innumerable things I could mention. They transcend the boundary lines of States, and they have reached the stature of creating a national problem about which the Nation must do something, and it must continue working to do something toward its solution.

The argument could be made, "Why study this subject so long?" We have been studying other subjects a long time in this country. There are many problems we have undertaken to solve, and in connection with which we have found that merely passing laws did not solve them. There are many persons, such as judges and prosecutors and chiefs of police and juvenile officers in police departments, and youth boards who, both in unofficial and official capacities, think this business is not to be met merely by handwringing and saying, "Ain't it awful." They believe in getting down and taking their coats off and doing something about it.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HENNINGS. This is our responsibility. I yield now to the distinguished Senator from Tennessee, the former chairman of this subcommittee.

Mr. KEFAUVER. I thank my distinguished colleague. I am happy to be a cosponsor of the amendment of which the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLARK] is the chief sponsor, and of which the distinguished chairman of the subcommittee, the Senator from Missouri [Mr. HENNINGS], is a cosponsor.

Mr. President, I speak for this amendment with conviction and vigor. As a former chairman of the Juvenile Delinquency Subcommittee, I have heard firsthand about this most distressing problem confronting our people. The hearings conducted by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. HENNINGS] have shown the problem is increasing. Senator HENNINGS is doing a splendid job as chairman of the committee and I commend him most highly.

I have introduced a number of bills in previous sessions which call for a broad national approach to the growing problem of juvenile delinquency. This problem has been increasing steadily for the past 10 years. It is one of the most serious major problems in the United States and few communities have escaped the impact of its continuing national rise.

With the increased mobility of population, the expansion of suburban areas, and more transportation, among other trends, juvenile delinquency can no longer be thought of as being confined within the boundaries of neighborhoods, local communities, or even States. Rural and urban areas, alike, are confronted with the problem. It has become in cases almost a virus, spreading through the youth of our country, reaching out to infect and injure our very heritage. Its effects are violence, disrespect for human values and property values, and a most dangerous weakening of moral structures.

It has ever been the case that our future as a nation lies from year to year in the hands of the young teenager. As her or she stands on the threshold of maturity, ready to take over the responsibilities of government, business, or the professions, an answer must be found to this virus and to the threats it implies.

Mr. President, I have been chief sponsor or cosponsor of a number of bills which I feel most seriously would go a long way toward solving this growing and dangerous problem. I regret that the Congress has not seen fit yet to pass legislation of this nature. It is my earnest hope that the Congress will, at this session, come to grips with the juvenile delinquency problem by giving our people these proposed measures so that we can begin to make up for the time we have lost in trying to combat the problem.

S. 765 and S. 766, on which I was a cosponsor, went to the Labor and Public Welfare Committee. S. 765 called for Federal funds to set up juvenile delinquency demonstration and study projects. S. 766 called for Federal funds to provide trained personnel who could work in this field.

The committee reported out a clean bill—S. 694—which provides for $5 million a year for 5 years to implement demonstration and study projects such as those called for in S. 765. But S. 694 contains no provisions for the training of personnel.

The amendment now before the Senate would correct that deficiency in S. 694, without calling for any more money.

Arthur H. Bernstone, the chief counsel of the Juvenile Delinquency Subcommittee of the Senate, has provided a concise analysis of this bill and the proposed amendment. I ask unanimous consent that this analysis be printed in the RECORD following these remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(See exhibit 1.)

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, I should like also to pay special tribute here to the diligent work of my able colleague, the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. HENNINGS], in this most important field.

I also desire to commend highly my distinguished colleagues the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. HILL] and the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLARK] for their continued effort and knowledge in this field. S. 694 is their bill.

The problem is of mutual concern and interest to all of us who have tried so hard for so long to provide some answers to it. I feel that every Member of the Senate recognizes the urgency and seriousness of the problem, and the need for the pending legislation.

I ask my colleagues to support S. 694 and the amendment, and join with those of us who propose it, so that both may go through by a unanimous vote.

MAJOR PROVISION OF UNAMENDED S. 694

The major provision of S. 694 authorizes Congress to appropriate for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1960, and for each of the four succeeding fiscal years not more than $5 million for juvenile delinquency demonstration and study projects. This money would be distributed by the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare to States, municipalities, and public and private nonprofit agencies, including institutions of higher learning or research.

HOW UNAMENDED S. 694 WOULD BE APPLIED

Some typical projects for which this money might be used are projects centered around (1) youth employment studies to discover the effects of intense efforts of a community to find jobs for idle juveniles: (2) studies of juvenile gang activities and the directing of gang energies toward useful ends; (3) studies of the effects of intensive psychiatric treatment of juvenile offenders; (4) studies of the effectiveness of group therapy of juvenile delinquents; (5) studies of the effects on juvenile delinquency of intensive recreation programs within a community; (6) studies of the effectiveness of intensive probation services within a juvenile court; and (7) studies of the effect of intensive work in hospitals for the rehabilitation of juvenile narcotic users.

NEED FOR AND COST OF AMENDMENT TO S. 694

Wherever our subcommittee has held hearings, almost invariably we have heard of the great need for trained personnel in the juvenile delinquency field. It is imperative that Federal leadership and aid be given for this. The proposed amendment to S. 694 authorizes Congress to appropriate for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1960, and for each of the 4 succeeding fiscal years not more than $2,500,000. It also reduces the sum provided for those years for demonstration and study projects mentioned above from $5 million to $2,500,000. Thus, the amendment costs no extra money.

HOW AMENDMENT WOULD BE APPLIED

The Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare would supervise the distribution of this money for training. The money could go to States, municipalities, and public and private nonprofit agencies, including institutions of higher learning. It could be used for developing courses, fellowships and traineeships. The aforementioned courses could be taught in universities or elsewhere. This amendment provides that the Secretary shall require each grant recipient to contribute money, facilities, or services to the extent the Secretary deems appropriate. Personnel trained might work in all areas of juvenile delinquency, such as, for example, juvenile courts, juvenile correctional institutions, welfare agencies supervising foster home placement of juvenile delinquents, youth guidance centers, and police forces.

Mr. KEFAUVER. I should like to ask the Senator from Missouri whether the amendment provides any additional money, or merely divides the $5 million which is to be authorized between projects and training of personnel for the handling of juvenile problems.

Mr. HENNINGS. The Senator is precisely correct. However, I do not believe the amount is sufficient.

Mr. KEFAUVER. I do not think so either.

Mr. HENNINGS. It is merely a drop in the bucket compared with the needs of the problem.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HENNINGS. I yield to the distinguished Senator from Alabama.

Mr. HILL. First I should like to commend the distinguished Senator from Tennessee [Mr. KEFAUVER], the former chairman of the investigating subcommittee and also the distinguished Senator from Missouri [Mr. HENNINGS] for the very fine and effective and devoted work they have done and are now doing in connection with this very grave problem.

Mr. HENNINGS. I thank my good friend from Alabama.

Mr. HILL. I should like to call attention to the fact that the expenditure of $5 million has the approval of the Bureau of the Budget. I would also like to call attention to one or two excerpts from the testimony of the Assistant Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare, Elliot L. Richardson, who was speaking at the time for the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, and, of course, speaking for the administration. Secretary Richardson declared:

Obviously, however, more can and must be done to help these thousands of boys and girls in our society whom we have classified as "delinquent" when society, in some way, has failed.

Then Secretary Richardson said:

You have already referred, Mr. Chairman, to the report which we have just filed with you on legislation pending before this subcommittee.

That was the report which carried the approval of the Bureau of the Budget for the sum of $5 million.

Mr. Richardson added:

And I would like to refer to that only to make clear for the record that we—are in accord with the objective of all the bills pending before this subcommittee which would enable the Federal Government to give greater assistance and leadership in coping with the problem of juvenile delinquency.

Meaning the Department—

Then Mr. Richardson said:

I think, Mr. Chairman, a great deal is summed up in the word "leadership" in this connection, and that a Federal agency, simply by virtue of its situation, is in a better position to give impetus to the kind of collation of existing data as well as stimulus to the support of new investigations that you refer to.

He referred there to the investigations needed to help solve this problem. Then Mr. Richardson went on to say—and this goes right to the Clark amendment as well as to the bill itself:

If we were writing our own ticket in this, given $5 million I think our probable reaction would be to include some money in each of the areas of research to develop new knowledge, the demonstration of knowledge, and of training.

That is exactly what the Senator from Pennsylvania, in the bill and the amendment, proposes to do. Mr. Richardson then went further and said:

I think within whatever limits seem necessary to the committee and to the Congress, it would be desirable to have a substantial degree of flexibility.

In other words, flexibility to do just what is proposed here—to give to the department the flexibility to attack the problem, and to make the most effective attack possible with the funds given.

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. President, I am very glad that the distinguished Senator from Alabama saw fit to incorporate that statement in the RECORD and to make his observations with respect to it. I could cite a number of illustrations of what is happening. We read about them in the newspapers every day. Perhaps we do not pay too much attention to them until they strike close to home, as they frequently do.

Judge Samuel S. Leibowitz, of New York, testifying before the committee in February 1959, said:

We have got to bear in mind that we are not dealing with the same kind of kids that we dealt with 20 and 25 years ago. We are dealing with a precocious, hardened kid.

The judge then went on to describe the murder of an innocent citizen by a 17-year-old hoodlum who rang his doorbell in a holdup attempt.

In July of 1959, Mr. Robert Taber of the Philadelphia Board of Education told the subcommittee:

It is with a sense of urgency that I appear before a subcommittee of the Judiciary Committee of the U.S. Senate to give testimony concerning juvenile delinquency. Since I appeared before your committee last, the problem has become increasingly acute. Innocent persons continue to become the victims of violent and murderous attacks committed by juveniles who are emotionally disturbed or whose minds and behavior are distorted.

During the late summer of 1959, the gang problem reached crisis proportions. The people of New York City, and indeed of the Nation, were shocked into an awareness of the seriousness of predatory juvenile gangs when in an 8-day period four young children were killed as a result of gang conflicts. At the behest of New York City officials and an invitation from a U.S. Representative, the subcommittee went to that city to hear the mayor tell us that his city was faced with an "epidemic of crime committed by teenagers."

Although the problem of gangs as outlined in New York is primarily a community one, like other juvenile delinquent behavior, it is not peculiar to any one locale. The subcommittee's files are filled with reports which show conclusively that this problem permeates all levels of our youth population, rural as well as urban, so-called better neighborhoods as well as slums, majority groups as well as minority groups.

I could go on, but I think the point has been made. The States until now have apparently been unable to cope with this ever-increasing juvenile delinquency rate. I feel that by now it has been made abundantly clear that Federal leadership and Federal moneys are required by the States if we are to decrease this appalling rise in juvenile crime which has now been going on unabated for 10 years.

Now, what kind of help is necessary? At hearings held throughout the country during the last 6 years, I have been firmly convinced that one of the major ingredients to be found lacking in every part of the United States in terms of an all-inclusive, effective delinquency program is the tremendous lack of trained personnel in this field. It was with a great degree of sadness that the members of the subcommittee saw one of the major portions of our delinquency program introduced in the 86th Congress eliminated from congressional consideration last year. I refer to that portion of our program which would have provided Federal moneys to aid the States in the training of personnel. This deletion was in spite of the fact that no other aspect of the delinquency problem transcends this major need. I was very much pleased to learn that the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare had reconsidered and that a majority of the committee decided that such an amendment as we now have before us is necessary, for this is the only way in which the Federal Government can maintain its share of the responsibility for developing adequate delinquency fighting machinery.

Witness after witness before our committee, in every part of the Nation, pointed to the shortage of trained people as the major roadblock to local efforts to handle the problem of juvenile crime.

The specific amendment we have under consideration, I feel, would give impetus to the States to employ trained personnel in treatment services. This is highly desirable. We on the subcommittee have seen firsthand the damage that is done, the wastage of human lives that follows when youngsters in trouble with the law are handed on from one untrained worker to another.

I may quote, for the interest of the Senate and for the approval of the distinguished senior Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE], a statement by Hon. Donald E. Long, of Portland, Oreg., who represents the feelings of a good many judges in the United States. He told the Juvenile Delinquency Subcommittee of the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare that, in his opinion, the training provisions of any Federal legislation were most important to meet the needs of the present generation.

Judge Long pointed out that of the 3,000 juvenile courts in the United States, many of them have county judges, and only half of the counties in our country that are dealing with delinquents have even minimal probation services.

The judge stated further that a study by the National Probation and Parole Association indicated a need for 15,000 probation officers dealing with the problems of juveniles. Yet at the time of the study there were only 2,100 probation officers dealing with children alone and 3,400 serving both children and adults. What makes matters even worse, only 1 out of 10 of these probation officers had completed any type of training for the job. In addition, 4 out of 10 lack a college degree. When this occurs, we compound the seriousness of an already bad situation.

In the opinion of Judge Long—

> Many of them [the probation officers] were qualified, but it is staggering that they had not the skills and the training that they should have * * * in dealing with the behavior problems of the children coming to the various juvenile courts.

It is for this reason the judge concluded that—

> Priority first should be given to a training program to assist the volunteer organizations, to assist the States and local communities in providing, under the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, an efficient program of training.

From another part of the country, the Senate Judiciary Subcommittee on Delinquency heard in Philadelphia from Dr. E. Preston Sharp, executive director of the Youth Study Center and one of the outstanding authorities in the field of delinquency, who stated:

> There are training schools and institutions for the rehabilitation of delinquent children, and one of the most difficult tasks is the training of persons who work with and live with the children. We have to go out on the street and select them on the basis of personality adjustment and background and give them a couple of days of orientation and put them to work.

It is inconceivable to me that these situations can be allowed to continue in this Nation. I have, and I hope every Member of the Senate has, become painfully aware of the confusion and evil the result from this paucity of trained workers in the delinquency field. From an analysis of recent waves of violence in New York, it appears certain that the major contributing factor was a tremendous shortage of available personnel to meet a problem that all authoritative persons knew was approaching rapidly.

Mr. President, I know this is a disheartening picture I am painting, but I feel compelled to do so. With knowledge of these facts, I am certain the Congress will act.

Former Senator Herbert Lehman, who was chairman of a subcommittee of the Labor and Public Welfare Committee which worked so hard to put a juvenile program through Congress, but to no avail, said within the last several days:

> The past failure of Congress to enact legislation making it possible for a start to be made toward finding a solution to this grave and growing problem is one of the most reprehensible failures of which the Congress and the administration can be charged. Those responsible for this failure in the past has assumed an intolerable responsibility.

I point out that my remarks today not only go to the need for the amendment to S. 694, but for the entire bill. The special projects section of this bill will insure us greater success in preventing delinquency. For example, many cities have the desire to inaugurate programs directed at the so-called hard-to-reach youth. These are oftentimes the gang youth whose main emphasis is the destruction of life, limb, and property, and whose main form of recreation is the gang fight or "rumble" with its attendant annual death toll. The head of one such program already in operation in the city of New York told the committee that their street club workers working directly with gangs reported 425 pending "rumbles" to the police and averted 192 possible killings.

With such dramatic results, I can think of no greater purpose to which our special projects bill could be put to use than for the development and refinement of similar programs in other cities with regard to this problem.

In conclusion, it must be emphasized that the pending amendment calls for the expenditure of no additional funds. The pending bill provides $5 million a year for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1960, and $5 million a year for each of the succeeding 4 years for juvenile delinquency control projects. The amendment would divide this sum between such projects and the training of personnel. This is a minimal, token sum to be asked from the Congress of the United States for the children of our Nation.

As I have pointed out in my remarks, and as I pointed out last year and in many preceding years, there is a desperate need for not only new programs and projects to prevent and control delinquency—as provided for in S. 694—but there is this desperate need for trained people who can work in our probation departments, in our social work agencies, in our rehabilitative institutions, our clinics, our police departments, and in all the other crucial institutions. Unless Congress supplies the added support of the Federal Government, it will have failed to do its part in our efforts to reduce appreciably our annual loss of children to this ravaging social disease called delinquency.

Mr. President, with a knowledge of the facts, I believe Congress in its wisdom and in its high sense of the performance of its duty will act. Having had many, many years of observation of the work in this field, I certainly subscribe to the effort which is being made to combat this great problem.

I again compliment my colleagues who are members of the Labor and Public Welfare Committee, the great and able Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLARK], the able and distinguished Senator from Alabama [Mr. HILL], and others, who have enabled us to present this matter today.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Missouri for his great help and comments.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, will the Senator from Missouri yield before he takes his seat?

Mr. HENNINGS. I yield.

Mr. HILL. I hold in my hand a booklet prepared by the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, which deals with the subject matter which will be before the White House Conference on Children and Youth. That Conference, as the distinguished Senator from Missouri knows, will be held in March of this year.

Mr. HENNINGS. Yes; as the distinguished Senator from Alabama knows, the Conference is a national event.

Mr. HILL. Yes; this year's Conference will mark the golden anniversary of the White House Conference on Children and Youth. This booklet has been prepared for this Conference.

The honorary Chairman of the Conference is, of course, the President of the United States. The honorary Vice Chairman is the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare. A number of other distinguished persons also serve as vice chairmen.

The booklet contains a foreword by the Honorable Arthur S. Flemming, who is Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare and is chairman of the Federal Interdepartmental Committee on Children and Youth. On page 24 of the booklet, Mr. Flemming makes this statement:

> Juvenile delinquency in the United States, as measured by the number of delinquency cases handled by juvenile courts, increased in 1958 for the 10th consecutive year. In that year, the Children's Bureau estimates that 470,000 delinquency cases (excluding traffic violations) were handled by the courts—an increase of 7 percent over 1957,

Mr. Flemming, in the booklet prepared for the Conference continues by saying:

> The services that have been set up to help delinquent children are far from adequate. In the first place, there are not enough of them. And in the second place, those that are available do not have enough sufficiently well-trained workers to provide the kind of service that is needed.

This pamphlet, which was prepared, as I have said, under the direction of the Secretary of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, for the golden anniversary of the White House Conference on Children and Youth, reveals many distressing facts about juvenile delinquency and the compulsion of the need for action in this matter.

I thank my distinguished friend.

Mr. HENNINGS. I thank my friend, the Senator from Alabama, who is well versed in this field, as he is in so many others, for his contribution to this discussion.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, there is an old adage derived from no less authority than the Bible itself to the effect that the love of money is the root of all evil. Although extremely broad in its context, this adage, while possibly a slight exaggeration, has a sound basis in human experience. It is much sounder, indeed, than the somewhat similar sounding adage which apparently is gaining favor as the motto of the United States Congress. I refer, of course, to the apparent assumption in recent years that money is the cure of all evil.

In recent years, programs have been proposed which would utilize the all-powerful dollar to solve the problems of agriculture, race relations, education and foreign policy—just to name a few; in fact, the Congress has attempted to solve all problems with money whether they be National, Statewide, or local. With the proposal for a Juvenile Delinquency Act, however, we have reached the absurdity of attempting to substitute money for parental responsibility and guidance.

The fact that juvenile delinquency has increased materially in the postwar years is substantiated beyond doubt by authenticated crime reports. The recent newspaper articles on juvenile crime are alarming and a source of continuing distress to me and, I am sure, to the overwhelming majority of Americans. Were there to be any sound reason for belief that money, or the studies to be secured thereby, could contribute to the solution of problems which foster juvenile delinquency, I would think that the sum authorized to be appropriated in this bill was unconscionably inadequate. It further occurs to me that were it possible for money to provide a solution, the State and local authorities, in whose field of jurisdiction this question resides exclusively, would long since have found the ways and means to provide sufficient funds for this purpose. Certainly the local and State officials, being so much closer to the problem than we, could be no more immune to the feelings of alarm caused by the shadow which juvenile delinquency has cast on our society. It is not a problem, however, which prevails only in the United States; but if news sources are to be believed, it is one of increasing importance to almost every industrialized nation of the world. The widespread existence of the problem, however, in the United States, no more makes it a matter for national legislation than does its worldwide existence make it a matter for regulation or treaty through the United Nations. No matter how farflung the existence of juvenile delinquency, it remains a problem that can be solved only in the home and the church and the school, with the assistance and cooperation of the local community.

Many of those who have had experience with those to whom we commonly refer as delinquents are of the belief that a child's personality is formed almost beyond change within the first 3 years of its life. During this formative period there is no substitute for a mother's tender loving care and a father's firm guidance. The presence or absence of parental responsibility in this period is primarily a moral question and can be solved only by moral forces. There is no supreme intelligence at the national level, nor are there sufficient financial resources within the United States, as wealthy as our Nation is, which can make a substantial difference in the exercise and fulfillment of parental responsibility.

Surely we could not conscientiously believe that studies at the national level could contribute materially to the solution of problems which promote juvenile delinquency any more than studies at the national level could solve other moral problems which have existed in our society. The only purpose which will be served by the passage of a Juvenile Delinquency Act would be to lessen the acceptance of those to whom it really belongs. Let us deceive neither ourselves nor attempt to deceive the public. Our best contribution to the prevention of juvenile delinquency can be through the example we, as public figures, set in our public and private lives, and such an example is not promoted by the exhibition to the public of the belief that money is the cure of all evils, even juvenile delinquency.

Mr. President, the Constitution of the United States contains the fields of jurisdiction which were delegated to the United States by the States. The National Government has jurisdiction only in those fields which have been delegated to it by the States under the Constitution. The field of juvenile delinquency has never been delegated to the National Government by the States. It was not delegated when the Constitution was written in 1787, and it has not been delegated by any amendment to the Constitution since that time. Therefore, the Government has no jurisdiction within the field of juvenile delinquency.

Juvenile delinquency is a matter, first, for the home and the church and the school, and then the local community; and certainly if we are going to bring government into it, the State government and not the National Government, should be the instrumentality to assist the local communities in seeking a solution to this problem.

There is no authority whatever under the Constitution for the Federal Government to enter into the field of juvenile delinquency; and I think it is a great mistake for us to be going into new fields that require additional expenditures at the very time when the survival of our Nation is at stake from threats by Communist forces. It is my opinion that we would do well in this country if we concentrated on national defense in order to provide for our very survival, first and foremost, without going into new fields, and we should be eliminating certain expenditures in the nondefense field, in order to provide more adequately for the national defense.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I desire to speak very briefly on the amendment to the bill. I first wish to extend my very sincere thanks to the chairman of the subcommittee, the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLARK] and to the chairman of the full committee, the Senator from Alabama [Mr. HILL].

In regard to this issue these two statesmen have demonstrated that they are interested only in finding for themselves the answer to the question, "What are the facts?" The position they have taken on this amendment is clear evidence that they have satisfied themselves about the facts and are lending their great leadership in the Senate to support what, in my opinion, is now a well-rounded juvenile delinquency aid bill. I stressed the word "aid," Mr. President, for reasons which I shall bring out momentarily.

First, as to the amendment, it represents a consistent position of mine which I advocated shortly after the start of the hearings on this matter, and I happen to be a member of the subcommittee that had jurisdiction over it. It is a position which the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLARK], and the ranking Republican member of the committee, the Senator from New York [Mr. JAVITS] will recognize as one which I aggressively put forward.

Upon the conclusion of the first 2 days of hearings, I sensed that the testimony had not pointed up the need for training personnel in the handling of juvenile delinquency problems—there were too many policemen and probation officers struggling with a problem they were not equipped to understand; too many areas in our country where nobody was assigned to alleviate this social phenomena.

For this reason I asked the chairman for the privilege of an additional day of hearing to cover the training item. I prevailed upon a citizen of Oregon who also happens to be an authority in this field to make a trip to Washington in order to get his advice on this matter. Judge Donald E. Long, whose biographical sketch can be found at page 210 of the hearings, has been for 20 years the presiding judge of the Court of Domestic Relations and Juvenile Court of Portland, Oreg.

With his testimony and that of others, I think it is fair to say that the case for training became crystal clear. The result was that in the executive session of the subcommittee, we marked up a bill which included training as well as demonstration projects.

Prof. John R. Ellingston, representing the Minnesota Legislative Interim Commission on Juvenile Delinquency, Adult Crime, and Correction, presented compelling testimony, along with Judge Long, in support of a training program amendment.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there be inserted in the RECORD at this point in my remarks the testimony given before our committee by both Judge Long and Professor Ellingston, setting forth their views on the bill and their emphasis of the need for a training program.

There being no objection, the testimony was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT OF HON. DONALD E. LONG, JUDGE, MULTNOMAH COUNTY COURTHOUSE, PORTLAND, OREG.

JUDGE LONG. A number of years ago, I think it was 20 years ago, I prepared an annual report on juvenile delinquency, and entitled it, "Understanding Delinquency." And after 22 years in dealing with behavior problems in children I would now entitle my annual report, "Trying To Understand Juvenile Delinquency."

I want to say at the outset, in my opinion there is no dramatic solution to the problems of youth. I do believe firmly that the Federal Government needs to exert some leadership to the various States and communities in pointing out ways of developing techniques, demonstration pilots, to see whether or not with the most skilled people we have now in our community we can arrive at some better way of treating the behavior problems of children.

Now, I have considered the bills before the Senate and also the bills that are in the House, Representative GREEN, of Oregon, her bill; and Mr. ELLIOTT'S bill, of Alabama; your bill; the bill of Mr. JAVITS; and Mr. HENNINGS' and others, and have come to the conclusion that both have merit, that both approaches have merit.

Senator CLARK. Let me interrupt you long enough to say, I do not know whether you knew it or not, but the subcommittee in the House has made some changes, largely, although not entirely, technical in nature in the Elliott bill, which is more or less identical with the Hill-Clark bill, and is reporting it out to the full committee.

Mrs. GREEN, from your State, is not in agreement with that and wants a somewhat more ambitious program and this should perhaps be background for you in further testimony.

Judge LONG. Yes, thank you.

In my opinion the training provision in the Green bill and in the other Senate bills is much more important than the provisions of providing for development of techniques and demonstrations. We have a severe lack of qualified personnel in the United States dealing with these problems. We need to do something about the need.

We have 3,000 juvenile courts in the United States, many of them county judges. Half of all the counties in the United States that are dealing with juvenile delinquency have no probation services whatsoever.

There was a study made by the National Probation and Parole Association several years ago and I think they have previously testified that there is a need for some 15,000 probation officers dealing with these problems and assisting juvenile courts.

At that time we only had in the United States 2,100 probation officers dealing with children alone, 3,400 serving both juveniles and adults. Out of this number only 1 out of 10 completed his social work training. Many of them were qualified but it is staggering that they had not the skills and training that they should have in my opinion in dealing with the behavior problems of the children coming to the various juvenile courts.

And that is the reason, I feel, that priority first should be given to a training program to assist the volunteer organizations to assist the States and local communities in providing under HEW an efficient program of training.

Senator CLARK. Let me interrupt you there to lead your mind into this field, and perhaps to some extent to be the Devil's advocate.

I think we would all admit the validity of the factual statement which you have made. There is an alarming shortage of qualified people within this field.

My query is to what extent will a bill at the Federal level authorizing the expenditure of a modest amount of money be effective in overcoming this situation? In other words, would we be treating the symptom instead of the disease? And is not the disease the fact that there is a shortage, in many an area in our American life, of qualified personnel—of which this field of social service work in juvenile delinquency is only one, that in a measurable degree that is due to the fact that our system of awards and punishments across the whole board of the selection of careers is a very ineffective and inefficient one?

A good deal of this has to do with compensation, but not all of it. We tend to reward on a very high level bright young men and women who go into advertising. We tend to penalize those who go into social work or teaching, perhaps even politics, not only in terms of monetary award, but in terms of prestige, status. A colored television engineer is held up to high praise. A social worker is thought of as a do-gooder. A politician is a fool on a stump, making a speech.

Is it going to help much in getting more people into the field of juvenile delinquency to appropriate a few million dollars for training at the Federal level?

Judge LONG. I feel that when we once reach the point of trained and skilled workers in juvenile courts, and I am speaking entirely for the juvenile court programs—I think in every area dealing with behavior, I will just leave the juvenile court for a moment—I am fairly convinced that we need to meet the need of adequate staffs throughout the United States in order to meet these problems.

However, I do want to make a point of one thing, and that is that I think there has been a great lag and we need to do a great deal more, and that is in the school social worker program. I think until we are able to reach the child, even a preschool child, and the children in their early grades in school where they have been aggressive, having been indulged, and find them with adequate school staffing of school social workers to go into the home and help the inadequate parent and disturbed parent and help the child that we can have all the demonstrations and techniques in the world, spend $10 million or $15 million a year, we are not going to reduce juvenile delinquency substantially until we try to treat the roots, until we get down to the children.

I did want to make that point, that I am not talking only of a juvenile court case. We had 600,000 cases reported several years ago and it is predicted that by 1965 we will have a million boys and girls referred to the juvenile courts and we must meet their problems adequately.

Senator CLARK. I thoroughly agree with you.

I am only pointing out that before you can train you have to recruit. And I would like to get your thinking as to how we could recruit more and better individuals, young people, as they come out of our schools and colleges into this desperately undermanned profession.

Judge LONG. I think we will have to set up some scholarships, have to help many of these young people that are interested in our field so they will be able to go on to schools. I think that is one way to do it.

I think we are going to have to help States in setting up training institutes to get a lot of these people who do not have the qualifications, briefly, but to get them stimulated and interested in the field.

Senator CLARK. Do you have in your mind any distinction between the level at which this work should be done? I mean how much of this can be done at the local level, how much at the State? To what extent does the Federal Government have a legitimate interest in this field? You know from your experience on the Hill that once you say the words "States rights" around here, a valiant band rallies around that flank and talks about Federal bureaucracies.

Judge LONG. I think it is primarily the State's responsibility and community's responsibility. However, the States and communities are not assuming their responsibility and they need the leadership of the Federal Government. I think they should participate wherever possible.

Senator CLARK. Those who disagree with you would say that that leadership should come from the grassroots of the people to force their State governments to make an effort. My own experience has been that they rarely do.

Judge LONG. My experience has been that it does not come up from the grassroots. You have got to interpret to the grassroots the need and when the people have had it interpreted they will go forward.

Senator CLARK. I am not sure my friend from Oregon would entirely agree with that.

Judge LONG. I know the time is limited and this subject is inexhaustible.

Senator CLARK. You take your time. We brought you all the way across the country to hear what you think. You take plenty of time.

Judge LONG. May I just leave the juvenile court for a minute and get into the police departments and sheriffs' departments in the United States, where we need specialized separate units dealing with children, because they are the ones that have the first contact with the delinquent boy or the delinquent girl.

Senator CLARK. Do you have such a division in Portland?

Judge LONG. Yes; we do.

Senator CLARK. Does it work pretty well?

Judge LONG. It works well. We have good liaison between the court and the juvenile division. They understand the philosophy of the juvenile court and we try to help them and have inservice training with them.

Half of the middle-sized communities in the United States have no such juvenile divisions and one-fourth of all communities under 10,000 people have nothing at all.

So I think we need a well-planned program under the direction of training police officers and sheriffs' officers in the techniques of handling juveniles. I think that is very important.

Now, we go further in another area of detention, not only detention in our juvenile homes but detention in our schools, State schools.

Last year alone we had over 100,000 boys—mostly boys—and girls, held in jails throughout the United States and any number of other facilities where they were held were totally inadequate.

We need to do a lot in the training field of correctional institutions, boys' and girls' schools; they are terrifically lagging in qualified personnel. Very few of them have psychologists, full time or part time; to get psychiatric help you usually have to go to the State hospital and those are the things I think that we need to emphasize and focus our attention on under a centralized program of direction.

Senator CLARK. Judge, if you had your way, would you confine Federal assistance to training, or would you also authorize the support of research pilot projects?

Judge LONG. Senator CLARK, if I had my way and had $5 million a year, to be realistic I would spend $4 million in training and I would spend $1 million in developing of techniques and demonstration.

Senator CLARK. That is a very candid answer.

With respect to that $4 million, do you think its expenditure should require matching funds from States or localities?

Judge LONG. I would like to see matching funds. I am not too optimistic that many of our States would match funds.

Senator CLARK. There has been some testimoney here to the effect that, using the analogy of Federal housing legislation, we should bypass the States and deal directly with the local communities as in the case of urban renewal. A matching is required of one-third at the local level. Two-thirds is paid by the Federal Government.

There are those who have testified before this committee that one cannot expect many of the States to move into this field of matching funds. The suggestion has been made that rural control of the legislatures tends to make them not particularly sympathetic to this problem even though there is an awful lot of rural delinquency.

Do you have any views on that?

Judge LONG. Yes; I do. That worries me. I would prefer that the local communities, like your urban renewal which we have now in Portland, Oreg., a rather large project there, where the city and county are participating, that southwestern and southeastern and eastern and western Oregon are not interested in.

What concerns me is that we may be able to get some of the larger communities to participate, possibly not on a State level but what are we going to do with all these rural areas where they have no services whatsoever? That I think is where we need to give real leadership. And that is where we cannot expect participation on the part of the State.

Senator CLARK. Is it your view, and I realize this must be an empirical judgment, but is it your view that on a per capita basis there is just as much delinquency on the farm as there is in the city slum?

Judge LONG. I think the studies indicate, and while I live in an urban district, that there are substantially as many behavior problems in the rural as in the urban areas.

Senator CLARK. This is certainly not the American current view, because we have been brought up to believe that life on the farm is healthy in what is called the American way of life, that that tended to turn out normal and well-adjusted youngsters, whereas those who grew up in what are referred to as the ghettos of our big cities were in an environmental condition where it was difficult for them to develop normally, that the major problem was in the slum districts. I take it you do not agree with that?

Judge LONG. No; I do not. When I was growing up we did not have juvenile courts to amount to anything, and yet I recall quite a bit of delinquency as we would term it today. We did not have the automobiles, which I think has been a great contributing factor in taking the children away from the homes. Where the mother used to be able to go out to the back porch and call them, now they are 50 miles away. We have many more such exposures we did not have then.

I would say we need to strengthen our child guidance clinics. We have child guidance clinics in my community; I think you have yours in Philadelphia. They are inadequately staffed and cannot take care of the emotional problems of children and these are the potential delinquents that come to the juvenile courts later on. In my own community we could have a staff twice as large and not meet our needs.

We need more family counseling agencies. We have to deal with the parents. When you are trying to direct the thinking of the child and improve the child's attitudes you have to work with the parents to try to get them to do a better job and gain in strength.

Senator CLARK. Let me interrupt you, because unfortunately I have to go to another committee meeting and hope to get back. Senator MORSE will continue the hearing in my absence.

Do you feel from your experience that there is enough known about the art of treating juvenile delinquents so an adequate training program can go forward and be relatively successful without much further research in determining just how these children should be handled?

Judge LONG. Yes; I do. I feel that in developing new techniques, if we are going to be able to come out with some new techniques, a demonstration project is a long-term program; we will not do it in 2 or 5 or 10 years.

Senator CLARK. As I understand it, you think we should make a start?

Judge LONG. Yes.

Senator CLARK. And the major emphasis should be on training?

Judge LONG. Yes. We will take a group, whatever you agree upon, what you are going to develop, with psychiatric, psychological, psychiatric social workers, in a small group of boys who are severely disturbed and work with them to keep them from going to the penitentiary. I do not know how badly damaged they are. Only time will tell what the outcome of the project will be. I feel, as I said a moment ago, that the training program should have priority.

Senator CLARK. Thank you, Judge.

The record will show that Senator MORSE will take the chair at this point.

Senator MORSE. Judge Long, I want you to proceed in your own way until you present your testimony in chief and then I have a series of questions I want you to answer for the record. I want you to take all the time you want in order to make your case.

Judge LONG. In an attempt to conserve time I have covered the subject quite well together with my statement which is in the record.

I would like to say, referring back to the statement that will be in the record, that I had prepared that as a member of the Advisory Council of Judges to the National Probation and Parole Association. We have worked on these problems for some 7 years under foundation money.

At the recent meeting in New Orleans, I led the discussion not on the Senate bills, because they were not before us, but on H.R. 772, Representative GREEN's bill, and H.R. 3404, Mr. ELLIOTT's bill.

We had at this meeting in New Orleans the outstanding judges, juvenile court judges, in the United States, such as Judge Alexander, of Toledo, and I will not name them because they are all in the record. There were 16 of us.

They approved of the bills; however, they stated that positively and by unanimous vote that the training of personnel was much preferable and should have priority.

Senator MORSE. May I interrupt at that point? When it appeared that you might not be able to come and testify this morning you wrote to the chairman of this subcommittee, Senator CLARK, of Pennsylvania, under date of May 28, a letter in which you discussed the meeting of the Advisory Council of Judges to the National Probation and Parole Association, which you have just referred to.

That letter I think is so pertinent to our discussion this morning that I would like to have your permission to put your letter into the record. It includes the letter that was written to you and signed by I. Richard Perlman, chief of juvenile delinquency statistics section, program analysis branch of the division of research.

Do you have any objection to that being in the record?

Mr. LONG. None at all.

Senator MORSE. I would like to have that in the record.

(The letter follows:)

CIRCUIT COURT OF OREGON,
FOURTH JUDICIAL DISTRICT,
Portland, Oreg., May 28, 1959.

Hon. JOSEPH S. CLARK,
Chairman, Subcommittee on Labor and Public Welfare, U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: May I thank you for inviting me to give testimony on pending juvenile delinquency bills (S. 694, S. 765, S. 766, S. 1090 and S. 1341) at a public hearing beginning Thursday, June 4. Due to my previous commitments and the shortness of time I will not be able personally to be present to testify. However, I would like to make a few observations.

When the Advisory Council of Judges to the National Probation and Parole Association held its meeting in New Orleans on April 18 and 19, 1959, bills H.R. 772 and H.R. 3464 were on the agenda for study and discussion by the juvenile and domestic relations courts section. Members present were:

Paul W. Alexander (chairman), division of domestic relations and juvenile court, court of common pleas, Toledo, Ohio.

Walter H. Beckham, juvenile and domestic relations court, Miami, Fla.

Charles O. Betts, district court, county courthouse, Austin, Tex.

Leo B. Blessing, juvenile court, parish of Orleans, New Orleans, La.

John J. Connelly, Boston juvenile court, Boston, Mass.

Harold N. Fields, Marion County juvenile court, Indianapolis, Ind.

Thomas D. Gill, juvenile court for the State of Connecticut, Hartford, Conn.

Theodore B. Knudson, district court of Minnesota, family court division, Minneapolis, Minn.

Donald E. Long, circuit court of Oregon, courthouse, Portland, Oreg.

William B. McKesson, district attorney, Los Angeles County, Los Angeles, Calif. (former Los Angeles juvenile court).

Frank W. Nicholas, division of domestic relations and juvenile court, court of common pleas, Dayton, Ohio.

Donald A. Odell, juvenile court, Los Angeles County, Los Angeles, Calif.

Monroe J. Paxman, juvenile court, Provo, Utah.

Joe W. Sanders, family court for the parish of East Baton Rouge, Baton Rouge, La.

W. W. Woolfolk, Fulton County juvenile court, Atlanta, Ga.

Victor B. Wylegala, Erie County children's court, Buffalo, N.Y.

Dorothy Young, juvenile court of Tulsa County, Tulsa, Okla.

After a full discussion, the judges unanimously adopted a motion in support of both bills recognizing the great need for Federal leadership and assistance to help the States and local communities strengthen their services and methods for controlling and treating juvenile delinquency. The discussion brought out the unanimous opinions that the two greatest needs for Federal assistance are for training of personnel and for research. For this reason the motion favored the provisions of H.R. 772, which specifically include grants for training personnel as well as for special projects.

The above-named judges did not have before them for consideration the above-numbered bills. I shall make no effort to evaluate the relative merits of the Senate measures except to comment on one feature contained in several of the bills and that is to state unequivocally that one of the most acute needs in meeting the problem is the development of qualified, skilled, and professionally trained personnel to work on a National, State, and local level for the prevention, treatment, and control of juvenile delinquency.

The committee will undoubtedly be interested in the following letter:

"DEPARTMENT OF HEALTH,
EDUCATION, AND WELFARE,
"SOCIAL SECURITY ADMINISTRATION,
"CHILDREN'S BUREAU,
"Washington, D.C., March 4, 1959.

"Hon. DONALD E. LONG,
"Judge, Domestic Relations Department, Fourth Judicial District, Circuit Court of Oregon, Portland, Oreg.

"DEAR JUDGE LONG: Mr. Sheridan has asked me to respond to your request for information that would indicate the need for training of personnel in the juvenile correctional field. While complete data are not available to show the full extent of need, the following statements will offer some clues:

"POLICE SERVICES

"The police deal with more delinquents or potential delinquents than any other agency. Furthermore, the police are usually the delinquent child's first contact with authority. Because of this crucial position, it has been generally accepted that every member of the police department should have some special training in the handling of juveniles and that there be in each police department a separate unit having highly specialized responsibilities for the department's handling of juveniles. When the establishment of such a unit is not practicable, the specialized responsibility should be lodged with one or more officers.

"While most of the large urban communities have established specialized units for improving police services with juveniles, only about one-half of the middle-sized communities and only about one-fourth of communities under 10,000 population have established such units.

"While all police officers should have some special training for handling juveniles, those assigned to the specialized responsibilities need to have an even more intensive specialized training. This can usually be obtained at institutes specifically designed for this purpose, such as the Delinquency Control Institute of the University of Southern California. An alternative would be a carefully designed inservice training program operated within the police department itself.

"JUVENILE PROBATION SERVICES

"Juvenile courts can carry out their specialized judicial function only if a well-trained, competent probation staff is available to them. Once an adjudication is made, the court depends on the probation officer for information upon which to base its disposition, taking into consideration the needs of the child and the community. These abilities and skills require training—a 2-year course of graduate study in a school of social work, according to the National Probation and Parole Association, the Children's Bureau, and the National Council of Juvenile Court Judges.

"At present, there is a serious deficiency in both quantity and quality of probation staff. Only about one-half of all the counties in the country have probation services available for juveniles. Testimony in 1954 by a spokesman for the National Probation and Parole Association to the Senate Subcommittee To Investigate Juvenile Delinquency indicated that at that time we needed 15,000 full-time juvenile probation officers. Yet, in 1957, there were roughly only 2,100 local probation officers serving juveniles only and an additional 3,400 serving juveniles and adults.

"The urgency for training of probation staff is very evident when we realize that of the presently employed probation officers, only 1 out of 10 has completed his social work training. More than 4 out of 10 lack a college degree, a requisite to admission to a school of social work. Thus, a training program must not only produce qualified staff where they are lacking but it must work toward raising the standards of the present unqualified staff.

"DETENTION CARE

"Adequate detention programs appropriately staffed should be available to provide a constructive experience to all children requiring care in secure custody pending disposition by specialized courts.

"While no valid count exists regarding the availability or quality of staff of detention homes, we do know that many of the specialized facilities in which children are detained are inadequately staffed. Furthermore, we know that roughly 100,000 children are being held in jail annually and an unknown additional number held in inappropriate facilities such as training schools, etc. Trained personnel are lacking for existing facilities and will be in even shorter supply if and when adequate specialized facilities for detaining delinquent children and youth become available.

"INSTITUTIONAL CARE

"Institutional care programs require a variety of trained staff to carry out their functions of treatment and rehabilitation of juvenile offenders. As with detention care programs, institutional programs are understaffed and they are overcrowded. Almost half of the State training schools are operating beyond their capacity. Half of them care for more than 150 children (the maximum size generally recommended). Six out of ten of our State training schools do not have a staff psychiatrist either full or part time: 4 out of 10 have no full- or part-time psychologist on their staff; 3 out of 10 do not even have a full- or part-time social worker. These are the clinical staff essential to the proper functioning of an institution. In addition, many of the institutions have poorly prepared cottage parents and other types of nonclinical personnel. Many lack sufficient numbers of this kind of staff.

"Finally, the comments made above regarding probation officers apply to parole or aftercare workers. The same training and skills are necessary and serious shortages exist. It is hardly possible for an institution to do more than give a child a good start. This work is negated without proper postinstitutional planning and supervision.

"The above deficiencies in quality and quantity in staff personnel represent the present situation. If delinquency continues to increase at the same pace as it has for the past decade, then the shortages will be even more acute.

"The implications of these shortages for a program of staff training are many. First, the types of professional personnel needed (social workers, psychiatrists, psychologists) are those that are already in short supply in all types of programs. Secondly, the present state of affairs (overcrowded conditions, overworked staff, lack of necessary auxiliary services, remoteness from professional stimulation), discourages professional personnel from entering the correctional field. Any program for training of personnel for corrections must, therefore, recruit prospective candidates into the field and provide the appropriate professional training needed. Many people believe that the situation can be helped by making funds available for (1) stipends to encourage students to enter the field and secure their professional training and (2) enabling already overburdened professional schools to expand their facilities. In addition nonclinical personnel working in the corrections field must be trained to carry out their functions appropriately. This requires intensive inservice training programs, carefully planned and organized.

"I hope this information will be of some assistance to you. If you have any further questions, please do not hesitate to write me.

"Sincerely yours,

"I. RICHARD PERLMAN,
"Chief, Juvenile Delinquency Statistics Section, Program Analysis Branch, Division of Research."

Thanking the committee for the privilege of commenting on the Senate bills, I am,

Sincerely yours,

DONALD E. LONG,
Presiding Judge, Court of Domestic Relations.

Senator MORSE. And then I would like to say this further:

It deals with the problem that faces this subcommittee and will subsequently face the full committee.

The Senate once passed a bill sponsored by Senator Lehman, of which I was proud to be a supporter. The Lehman bill in my judgment faced up to the totality of this problem, faced up to the serious nature of the growing cancer of juvenile delinquency in our body politic, suggested what the experts at that time thought was a reasonably adequate program for a start of an attack on juvenile delinquency as far as Federal contribution and participations were concerned.

Now we have before us a choice of bills, one a broader bill that would deal with training and research about which you have been testifying, and the other a much more limited bill, sponsored by two great Senators, Senator CLARK and Senator HILL, but certainly a bill not nearly as broad as the Lehman bill formerly passed by the Senate.

Now, this choice is one of the difficult problems that confronts each Senator in the legislative process.

Do you vote for something that you know is inadequate? Do you do so, knowing that even its authors are perfectly honest and frank to say it is not as good as they would like to have it, but which they think there is some political chance of getting passed, and which, to the extent of its provisions, will do some good? Or do you hold fast to what you consider to be at least the minimum program that ought to be adopted? Some call it the choice between half a loaf and no bread at all.

My record shows it is very difficult to get me to go for half a loaf, because I usually find it but a figure of speech. I usually find you do not even get a crumb, but only a cellulose wrapping that is not edible.

We are going to have quite a debate in this committee on this choice.

I will finally vote for anything that will do some good, but I will hope that those of us that believe we ought to be voting for more than is contained in the Hill-Clark bill will be sufficiently persuasive so that we can at least persuade the Senate to go as far as we went in the Lehman bill, because time has passed and the Lehman bill is none too adequate for today.

I want you to keep that in mind as you and Professor Ellingston testify here this morning because we need help and lots of help on the facts and we will have to make the legislative political decisions.

In the long run, under our system of checks and balances, I cannot as a Senator ever vote for legislation that I think is less than adequate to meet the need of people on the basis of any argument that if I insist on voting for more I am going to get vetoed. We have got our democratic procedures for handling that kind of problem in American life.

Nor am I going to be moved very much by the fact that because we are engaged in a great drive to balance the budget that I must put a dollar sign on American boys and girls. I do not intend to. Because I know they are the greatest wealth we have. The real wealth of America is to be found in those boys and girls. The survival of America in the long run—and this is no platitude but a statement of cold reality—depends on the kind of boys and girls we have and the training we give them.

What would be a reasonable program in the light of our juvenile delinquency needs for adoption in 1959? That is the program I am going to vote for. If I am beaten on that program and am forced to vote for a lesser program, I will vote for that. I am frank to tell my colleagues that. Some people say you should not say that; you should say you will vote against the lesser program. If it is still the program that will do some good, I will still vote for it. If it is a program that will do harm I will vote against it.

I think you and Professor Ellingston should, as it were, sit in my seat as a Senator a moment and see some of the problems of legislative decisions you have to meet when you have the kind of choices that are going to be presented in this committee.

I voted, for example, against men that are just as sincere in their point of view on civil rights as I am but I voted against them in 1957. I was the only northern Democrat that voted against them in 1957. Why? Because I felt that the civil rights bill in 1957 did not have enough good in it to advance the cause of civil rights but would have the effect of throwing back civil rights for years; therefore, I said it is better to take our defeat today and wait for the dawn of a better day than to vote for a piece of legislation that in my judgment will so postpone an adequate program that it is better that we do nothing in 1957.

Unless it can be shown to me that the final bill that comes out of this committee is a definite step forward and will not have the effect of throwing a future program of juvenile delinquency back a good many years, I will not vote for it.

I have spoken long enough. It would not be fair to you and to Professor Ellingston if you did not know that there is this very honest difference of opinion on this committee. I am very much of the opinion that the great need in the field of juvenile delinquency is qualified trained help—qualified trained personnel.

It seems to me that another showcase in the form of some research home or research institute is not nearly as important as getting some people that can help. The judges, the probation officers, these public servants that are fulfilling a great public program with inadequate help in the field of juvenile delinquency.

Well, Judge, I wanted you to know what our problem is legislativewise and whatever you want to say now that will be of help to Senator CLARK and to me. I think on this one Senator CLARK and I are going to end up together in voting for something, but I hope it will be a stronger bill than the Hill-Clark bill is in its present form.

Judge LONG. I certainly enjoyed, Senator MORSE, your observations and comments because they are in agreement with my thinking.

I am not unmindful of the legislative problems on the Hill. I am in favor of attempting to develop techniques and having demonstration pilots but I have not been convinced as yet that there is going to be any result coming out of demonstration projects in less than 5 to 10 years that will be helpful to the judges throughout the United States.

Dr. Tyler has been working on a project at Stanford University for 5 years under foundation money and has been trying to come up with something as to why children behave the way they do, and he is going to go on for another 5 years and see what can come out of it.

And that is why, in all fairness to my own conscience and thinking, I must reiterate that as between the two approaches we had better spend our money on training. However, I would like to see several well-organized demonstration projects that should not be too costly, to see whether or not they are going to be able to come up with something which will be helpful to the courts and to the communities in dealing with the thinking and behavior of children.

I think I must say that and I will trust that something will come out of it. And in agreement, if they are unable to appropriate any money for training, then I am not so rigid as to believe, because I have not the whole loaf, that we should not then make some effort to develop techniques and have a few demonstration projects.

Thank you, Senator Morse. You have been very kind to me in allowing so much time this morning.

Senator MORSE. I appreciate very much what you said.

It has been said, Judge, that training grants should not be made because the people trained do not stay in the field. Is it true, first, generally; secondly is it true, particularly, with probation officers and police officers?

Judge LONG. There may be some merit—that people on a training program will leave the court and go to other related agencies. I can give you a concrete example: We had a very excellent person handling emotionally disturbed children in our court. She went to the School of Social Work at the University of Washington, got her master's, and now she is a school-social worker in the school district.

I am not concerned about that. She is still dealing with children and, probably, in that position will prevent some of the children from coming into the juvenile court later on.

I think some will have advancements, but I think most of the people who are trained will at least stay within the area of their training whether they come back to the court or not.

Senator MORSE. Would it be an accurate observation to say that any money spent in the training of these people would be repaid to society in that they would at least stay in the field long enough, or in allied fields long enough, so that the money will be well spent?

Judge LONG. I certainly believe so; yes. Most of the scholarships for training do have an agreement with them that they will at least come back to the agency that provides for the training for a period of a year, anyway.

Senator MORSE. I have in my hand the report of the Senate, No. 61, of the 84th Congress, and I turn to pages 102 and 103. I want to read statements contained on those two pages and then ask you if you agree in whole or in part with these statements.

Page 102 of the report says:

"To break through this kind of stalemate, the Federal Government must launch a three-pronged attack. It must provide increased consultation or technical aid, it must give assistance in attracting and training personnel, and finally, it must temporarily provide the risk capital needed for local organizations and agencies to launch and demonstrate the value of new services and programs."

On page 103:

"The training of greater numbers of qualified personnel to staff prevention and treatment agencies means both expanding certain training programs and the launching of new ones. Schools of social work, law schools, sociology and psychology departments, all provide training which partially prepares people for work in the delinquency field. Almost without exception, however, the training offered needs to be supplemented in terms of content and, in some instances, in methodology to qualify personnel for certain functions within the field.

"For still other positions such as that of institutional house parents or, in the vast majority of States, of juvenile police officers, there are no resources for training. Many institutions and police departments attempt to provide some on-the-job training and orientation, and although such training is valuable, it is no substitute for the intensive and comprehensive training needed for persons charged with the crucial task of protecting and rehabilitating children in trouble.

"To remove the bottleneck to improving the Nation's attack upon juvenile delinquency imposed by the lack of trained and qualified personnel to man its defenses, the subcommittee recommends the establishment of a program to be administered by the Children's Bureau under which grants would be made to States, selected educational institutions, and students to extend, establish, and further the training of personnel for work in the prevention and treatment of juvenile delinquency."

What I am reading from really is the report in support of the Lehman bill.

Judge LONG. I am in agreement with it.

Senator MORSE. I have gone over these hearings very carefully and I have found nothing in them yet to justify changing my position from when the Lehman bill was before us.

Now, the question has been raised about the matching funds for training funds. It is true, is it not, that a considerable percentage of trained personnel in this field does migrate from State to State, does not stay permanently in one State?

Judge LONG. Yes; I do not think in great numbers, but it is true that some do go where they have advancements, from one State to another.

Senator MORSE. If a State has funds and hears that there is a great juvenile delinquency worker in New York and that they might be able to persuade him or her to come to their State, they try to do it; do they not?

Judge LONG. That is right, that does happen, certainly.

Senator MORSE. Of course, the matter of juvenile delinquency does not recognize State boundaries.

Judge LONG. Should not.

Senator MORSE. It is a national problem.

Judge LONG. I have a feeling Congress could even appropriate a larger amount than these bills provide. I think most of them offer a 5- or 6- or 7-year period which would be $45 million in that period of time. As you compare that with our total budget in the United States, it is only a pittance and we will, in dollars, as the years go by, have qualified workers dealing with these problems and save the communities and the States and Federal Government many more times than what they spend.

Senator MORSE. I am sure that is true.

Is it true, Judge Long, that there are some States where there are no special facilities for social work training?

Judge LONG. The last legislature in our own State has at last created an act permitting the establishment of a school of social work to be located in Portland, Oreg. They made a survey and there are 240 social workers without graduate training who are willing to sign up immediately this school opens its doors.

Senator MORSE. I think that is wonderful. I want to congratulate you.

I just want to say that if that bill passed, Judge Long was part of the force behind it.

Judge LONG. I supported it but a very strong committee, with a lot of help from Mrs. Catlin, did the work before the legislature.

Senator MORSE. Generally speaking, what training facilities are available for house parents, that is, persons in charge of cottages in training schools?

Judge LONG. Of course, the record cannot see me smile.

One of our great weaknesses.

Senator MORSE. We do not have a training program for them generally speaking, do we?

Judge LONG. No. What little training there is, is in service. They are pretty difficult kids.

In our Oregon school, and I think most of them are comparable, they try to do a pretty good job, but they do not have the qualifications I would like to see them have. They need real training, a program of in-service training.

In the detention area where we have our own inservice training program with group workers who take care of the boys that are in detention, several of our very best juvenile court counselors have been elevated from the detention area where they were group workers, due to the fact that we had some well-trained people on our staff to give them the training.

I think throughout the United States in boys' schools and even girls' schools they need a lot more trained skilled workers.

Senator MORSE. I am glad you stressed that; these so-called house parents in training centers are, for the period of detention, the foster parents of these boys and girls, and these foster parents need specialized training.

Just recently here in the District of Columbia we have had what adds up to a scandal in regard to the lack of training that existed in regard to these people. We do not pay enough to get highly qualified persons and we do not have the training programs in order to qualify them.

Judge, if there is no trained probation officer available to a judge who performs the work that you perform, is it not true that the judge then has the choice of either permitting the child to remain at home, unsupervised, or sending him to a training school?

Judge LONG. That is true in many jurisdictions throughout the United States. There have been many boys who have been sent to even our own training school, I regret to say, from smaller communities because there is no program for them there and they should never have been there.

I do feel that in many counties such as we have in the Western States, that the welfare departments with trained child welfare workers can be of great assistance to the juvenile court judges in giving protective services for children.

I returned a week ago from San Francisco in participating in a discussion of protective services for children which points up that they could be of help while we are developing trained counselors as we prefer to call them, so we get away from the connotation of police officers, since we are dealing with children, to have the welfare workers who are trained to step in and help the courts where they possibly can. We are trying to develop that program now in many States.

Also, may I say for the record that I feel that what we need to do more, and that is under our welfare programs, but it does relate to the improvement of the family life, we need homemaker services. We need people who are qualified to go into the home to improve the standards of many people in the interest of the children.

You would be surprised how many people there are that are really inadequate in some respects, but they are people and my experience has been that they are sincere, and they will accept help, that they just do not know. For someone to go in who is qualified to tell them about certain habits and training will be helpful to their training so that when their boy goes to school the boy next to him will not move away because he has not had a bath for a couple of weeks.

I know Miss Jewett, administrator of public welfare in Oregon, is very much interested in it but the money has never been available, so I think we must be giving more thought to helping in family life.

Senator MORSE. I agree. For the last 2½ years as chairman of another subcommittee of the Senate I have been conducting hearings on the youth of the District of Columbia that have become known as hungry children hearings, but they go far beyond the question of just getting food for hungry children.

Our hearings showed a shocking number of little boys and girls in the District of Columbia that actually had no food source at all except garbage cans and what they picked up from food that was thrown away by others. Some had no known parents.

This, in the Capital, not only of the Nation, but in a real sense the capital of the world; it was a pretty shocking investigation. People would not believe it at first but we documented it and it resulted in making accessible additional quantities of surplus food.

But that led to the problem of who would prepare food, because just delivering the food even to the homes where there were parents did not mean that the children were going to get it, or it did not mean that it was going to be cooked so it would be nutritious.

One of the things we ran into is the great need of the social worker you have testified about to go into many of these homes and teach the mothers how to prepare the food.

Judge LONG. That is right.

Senator MORSE. How to make a home. It is not so easy for those of us who live at our level of society to appreciate fully the many children that have to live in homes where there is not even an understanding of how to prepare the food. That is another reason why I am so glad that you are stressing this matter of training of social workers to get into the homes and help these mothers.

I had asked you about the difficult problem that confronts many juvenile judges, they do not have the social work probation officer assistance they need and they have to make a choice of letting a child stay in a home that has proven inadequately supervised or going to a training school and it is pretty clear that many of our training schools do not graduate law-abiding future citizens. A good probation officer or social worker assisting a juvenile judge can help supervise a number of delinquent children, can he not?

Judge LONG. Oh, yes.

Senator MORSE. In terms of the cost of sending that same number of children to a training school or hiring a probation worker that we know could do at least as much good for the child as the training school can, is the cost ratio very much in favor of hiring the probation officer or social worker, as far as the taxpayer is concerned?

Judge LONG. Much lower, Senator MORSE. They are so much less costly to, say of 50 boys on probation, some of our staffs, however, and probation officers have a larger caseload. We try to hold it down to 50. Thirty, where they are severely emotionally disturbed children is a big caseload. And it saves us a great amount of money to be able to redirect the thinking of these children and make them law abiding than to have them go down to our schools where they stay for 6 months to a year and then they are released on parole and where there are not enough well-qualified parole officers that take care of these boys when they are released from the boys schools so they do not have the support that they need and too often they have committed another offense and are back in the training school again.

So that is an area I have not mentioned, but they just need a lot of qualified parole officers in dealing with these children after they are released from the boys school to see if we can prevent them from going on into the penitentiary.

Senator MORSE. One final question: Is it true that there are a great many counties throughout the United States that did not have a single child welfare worker of the type that you have just been testifying about?

Judge LONG. That is true. There are many, hundreds of counties that do not have any assistance whatsoever.

Senator MORSE. Well, on that one I will be willing to rest my case. I rest it with this observation. If it is true that there are hundreds and hundreds of counties throughout the United States that do not have a single worker to assist the courts in the field of juvenile delinquency, you cannot for this reason justify the resulting human waste of a single boy or girl who could be saved for the ranks of good citizenship. That is why I think the training program which you testified to is so much more important than to spend a lot of money adding to research, important as that is. I think your testimony that out of $5 million, you would spend about $4 million for training and $1 million for further research is the sentence in your testimony that I am willing to emphasize.

Judge, thank you very much. I will see to it that your testimony here this morning receives all of the attention that I can possibly give to it.

Judge LONG. Thank you, Senator Morse, and may I thank the committee for the privilege of making a few observations due to my experience in the field and I do trust that I have made at least a slight contribution.

Senator MORSE. You have been very helpful.

It is now my privilege to call Prof. John R. Ellingston to the witness chair.

Mr. Ellingston represents the Minnesota Legislative Interim Commission on Juvenile Delinquency, Adult Crime, and Corrections, and the Law School of the University of Minnesota, concerning proposals for Federal legislation on juvenile delinquency.

I want you to proceed in your own way. I will give you all the time you want, Professor Ellingston.

I have before me a prepared statement by you, setting forth your qualifications that I have already referred to.

I will put the full statement in the record at this point. It is your privilege either to read it or summarize it, to follow any course you wish to.

STATEMENT OF JOHN R. ELLINGSTON, REPRESENTING THE MINNESOTA LEGISLATIVE INTERIM COMMISSION ON JUVENILE DELINQUENCY, ADULT CRIME, AND CORRECTIONS, AND THE LAW SCHOOL OF THE UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA, CONCERNING PROPOSALS FOR FEDERAL LEGISLATION ON JUVENILE DELINQUENCY

Mr. ELLINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, you are extremely gracious. I welcome the chance to discuss this problem because in Minnesota in 1953 at the university we set up a training project in delinquency controls, and I have a personal interest in describing what we have done and in urging similar action in other States.

I would be very glad to have my prepared statement inserted in record.

(The full statement of Mr. Ellingston follows:)

"STATEMENT OF JOHN R. ELLINGSTON, REPRESENTING THE MINNESOTA LEGISLATIVE INTERIM COMMISSION ON JUVENILE DELINQUENCY, ADULT CRIME, AND CORRECTIONS, AND THE LAW SCHOOL OF THE UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA, CONCERNING PROPOSALS FOR FEDERAL LEGISLATION ON JUVENILE DELINQUENCY

"Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, I am professor of criminal law administration and director of the training project in delinquency control at the University of Minnesota, and also executive secretary of Minnesota's Legislative Interim Commission on Juvenile Delinquency, Adult Crime, and Corrections, and I represent here both the interim commission and the law school.

"The legislative interim commission, under the chairmanship first of Representative Joseph Prifel, Jr., and later of Senator Daniel S. Feidt, has been working for 4 years to increase understanding of the problem of delinquency in Minnesota, and to improve State and local services for its control. Illustrative of the commission's achievements is the passage of a bill in the recent legislative session providing sufficient qualified probation service to every juvenile court in the State. This is but one of many pieces of constructive legislation in delinquency control and corrections which led the Minneapolis Sunday Tribune on May 3 to make the following editorial comments: 'In fact, some professionals in these fields are now saying that this legislature may go down in history as the greatest of all—as far as these areas are concerned.' I submit copies of the commission's two major reports, 'Antisocial Behavior and Its Control in Minnesota,' and 'Safer Driving by Juveniles in Minnesota.'

"The law school is interested in the bills you are considering because it believes that more effective control of delinquency and crime depends at bottom on education and training. Accordingly, in 1953, under the leadership of the former dean, Maynard E. Pirsig, it launched a training program in delinquency control aimed to reach not only law students, but graduate students in social work, sociology and psychology, undergraduates aiming at subprofessional careers in delinquency control, and finally personnel actively working in the delinquency control field, particularly police officers and probation officers. This project, which is universitywide and has the support of the university administration, is sponsored by the following committee:

"Maynard E. Pirsig, professor, law school, chairman.

"Marcia Edwards, professor and associate dean, college of education.

"John R. Ellingston, professor of criminal law administration, law school, executive secretary.

"Dale Harris, professor and director, institute of child welfare.

"Donald W. Hastings, professor and head, psychiatry and neurology, medical school.

"John C. Kidneigh, professor and director, school of social work.

"Gisela Konopka, professor, social work (social group work).

"William B. Lockhart, dean, law school.

"Elio D. Monachesi, professor and chairman, sociology.

"Julius M. Nolte, dean, extension division.

"George B. Vold, professor, sociology (criminology).

"Robert D. Wirt, assistant professor, psychology, child welfare, and psychiatry and neurology.

"Gilbert Wrenn, professor, educational psychology.

"Since I shall urge passage of all three proposals before this committee, namely, to provide Federal aid for the training of personnel in the delinquency control field, Federal aid in support of demonstration projects, and Federal aid in support of ongoing programs, I should perhaps qualify myself by saying that in addition to participation in the activites descrbed above, I have been working full time in the delinquency control field since 1940. For 13 years before going to the University of Minnesota I was in charge of the American Law Institute's youth authority program, which has served as the basis for legislation in eight States and the Federal Government, and has influenced legislation and programs in many other States. I have written extensively in the field, including a book, 'Protecting Our Children From Criminal Careers,' and book length reports on prisons and parole in Maryland and on Maryland's services and facilities for delinquent children and youthful offenders.

"Significance of the delinquent problem

"Why should the Federal Government move massively into the field of delinquency control? How should it move? To answer these questions wisely it would seem to me that this committee and the Congress must see the enormous problem that lies behind and beyond the usually quoted statistics. It is not enough to know that the proportion of children aged 10 through 17 appearing before juvenile courts on charges of delinquency in the United States has jumped from 1.26 out of each 100 children in 1948 to 2.35 out of every 100 children in 1957. It is not enough to know that the increase in the number of children coming before the juvenile courts outran the increase in the population of juvenile court age almost five times during these 9 years.

"The California Youth Authority has recently given us a glimpse of how much more extensive may be the misbehavior and restlessness of youth than these juvenile court figures would indicate—a glimpse that challenges belief. The authority reports that during 1957 arrests of boys aged 17 totaled 35.7 percent of California's total population of boys of that age. Arrests of 16-year-olds and 15-year-olds were not much behind. Allowing for repeaters—that is, youth arrested more than once—the authority reported that about 26 percent of the State's 17-year-old boys were arrested in 1957. Approximately 5.6 percent of all arrests in the 15-, 16-, and 17-year-old groups were for major crimes; the remaining 25.8 percent were for minor offenses such as truancy and petty theft. Traffic law violations were not included in these figures. Perhaps we are just deceiving ourselves when we take comfort in the fact that only 2 or 3 percent of our children become recognized delinquents.

"Modern scientific insights, to say nothing of the figures quoted above, will no longer permit us to brush off delinquency as the inevitable behavior of an evil or moronic segment of the human species, an order of beings lower than the rest of us. Rather we are forced to see delinquency as a phenomenon to which every child is liable and for which society as a whole is primarily responsible. What raises today's extensive delinquency to the rating of a No. 1 social problem is that it reflects and reveals grave weaknesses in our society and its institutions. To these weaknesses all our children are exposed and vast numbers suffer from them, though to a less perceptible extent than do the identified delinquents. That is why, as I see it, today's juvenile delinquency demands the attention of and large-scale action by the Congress.

"A broad concept of the causes of today's delinquency

"To talk about the weaknesses of social institutions without being specific is mere rhetoric. To relate those weaknesses to delinquent behavior demands some discussion of the complicated problem of causation. Difficult as the subject is, it seems to me that those of us making recommendations to this committee and the committee itself in deciding on action must come to some agreement on the causes of delinquency. Until we do, we are flying blind.

"For centuries the Western World operated on the belief that everyone knew the difference between right and wrong and that if anyone did wrong and broke the law, it was because he willfully chose to do evil. That belief underlies our criminal law and its reliance on punishment. Related to this concept was the idea that delinquents and criminals differed from the rest of us in being "born bad." Over the last century people have fixed on one single factor or another to explain all the misbehavior of the age—feeblemindedness, poverty, unemployment, slums, gangs, drinking, broken homes, malfunctioning glands, lack of playgrounds, failure to punish children. Recently major blame has been thrown on crime and horror comics, movies, and television programs—many of which are, heaven knows, inexcusable.

"The danger of fixing upon any single cause as the explanation of all delinquency is that it encourages us to sidestep our responsibilities. If crime comics are the cause of current juvenile delinquency, then obviously all we have to do to stop delinquency is to get rid of crime comics; if the cause is alcohol, enforce prohibition; or lack of playgrounds, furnish them. Meanwhile we can shut our eyes to the really difficult and complicated task of delinquency control.

"I would not want to be understood as suggesting that none of the factors I have mentioned make any contribution to the causation of delinquency. Certainly the concept that certain children are born delinquent just will not stand up under scientific testing. But several other factors mentioned do play definite roles in the causation picture. However, these are secondary roles. They may act as triggers of particular delinquent acts, but the guns had to be loaded before the triggers could have any effect.

"Rarely is there a simple explanation of serious or chronic misbehavior by a particular child, except, perhaps, for the infrequent instances of brain lesion resulting from disease or accident. Rather the causes are multiple and interwoven over a long period of time. They combine differently for each child. Yet, despite their multiplicity and complexity, the psychological and environmental causes of delinquency can be reduced to ultimate factors that can be comprehended and used as guides to action.

"To understand today's peak load of juvenile delinquency, we have to grasp two broad but crucial facts. The first is that children have to grow up emotionally just as they have to grow up physically and mentally, and that failure to grow up emotionally predisposes them to antisocial behavior. The second fact is that industrialization and the machine have destroyed many of the automatic aids to emotional maturing of children with consequent increase in the proportion of children who become delinquent.

"Every Child Is Born a Little Savage

"Studies of chronically delinquent children reveal the same basic predisposing factors reappearing in case after case. The one almost universal predisposing factor may be defined as emotionally immaturity or warping, resulting from unsatisfactory human relations in the child's formative early years. It must be remembered that no infant is born a finished product. On the contrary, every baby starts life as a little savage. He is equipped among other things with organs and muscles over which he has no control, with an urge for self-preservation, with aggressive drives, and emotions like anger, fear, and love over which likewise he has practically no control. He is completely selfish and self-centered. He wants what he wants when he wants it—his bottle, his mother's attention, his playmate's toy, his uncle's watch. Deny those wants and he seethes with rage and aggression which could be murderous were he not so helpless. He is dirty, he has no manners, no shame, no respect for persons or property, no conscience, no morals, no knowledge, no skills.

"What I am saying, of course, is that all children, not just certain children, are born delinquent. If permitted to continue in the self-centered world of his infancy, giving free rein to his impulsive actions to satisfy his wants, every child would grow up a criminal—a thief, a killer, a rapist. And in the process of growing up, it is normal for every child to be dirty, to fight, to grab or steal, to tear things apart and smear the walls, to talk back, to disobey, to evade. Moreover, it may give us a truer perspective on delinquency if we remind ourselves that man never shakes off the primitive impulses so manifest in infancy. Hostility, stimulated by frustration, seems to lie very near the surface in us all, ready to erupt in the varieties of violence that make the daily headlines.

"How Society Teaches Self-Control

"In order to survive, every society, from the most primitive to the most complex, demands of its children some self-control of the emotions and actions. Each society seeks to shape the child's attitudes and behavior in its particular image. To this end, every society depends largely on authority expressed through various pressures. It depends on the presure of physical realities, such as the fire, the knife, the stairway which the child must learn to respect if he does not want to get hurt. It depends on the pressure of the competing needs of brothers and sisters, neighbors and schoolfellows. It depends upon the rules and sanctions imposed by parents, schools, custom, laws, police, and courts.

"Every child needs, from infancy on, wise and continuous discipline. He needs and wants to have limits set beyond which he cannot go. But too much authority, whether expressed in constant rebukes, regimentation of the child's life, or in harsh and frequent whippings, builds up hate, resentment, and a sense of guilt. To be effective, authority must be supplemented by the satisfaction of the child's basic emotional needs. First and most important is the need for emotional security, the assurance that he belongs, that he is loved and wanted. The infant gets this from being fondled and sheltered and warmed as he naturally is when fed at his mother's breast. As he grows older, this sense of security is nurtured by belonging—to the family, to the neighborhood, to the gang, to the church, the club, the union, and so on. Few of us can endure isolation or ostracism from our kind.

"A second basic emotional need is for adequacy, for being competent at least at some one activity, for which the child gets recognition and praise and gains the crucial sense of being useful. To appreciate what a sense of competence and the garland of approval mean to a child, adults need only look frankly at the striving for superiority and recognition that motivates their own daily lives and at the hunger with which they swallow appreciation and flattery. A third emotional need is for new experience, for adventure and excitement. And a fourth is the increasing need for independence as the child advances toward manhood.

"Mechanism of the Civilizing Process

"It is largely through satisfying these basic emotional needs that a society persuades its children to give up immediate satisfaction of their desires, to exercise some self-control, and to conform to its standards; in other words, to avoid delinquent behavior. We can see the mechanism at work in good parent-child relationships all around us. The child's need to belong, to be loved and approved, is just as insistent as his need for food. Children have died for lack of love. In effect, wise parents offer the child this love and approval in exchange for giving up his infantile habits and sources of pleasure. Gradually, in fits and starts, with many lapses, he accepts the frustrations of weaning, of toilet training, of respect for the property of others, of nonaggression, of the endless "don'ts" of these early years, first because he is afraid of losing his parents' love and later because he wants to be like them. Children become what they are largely through identification with someone they love and admire. Soon the child develops his own control mechanism, his conscience, to govern his behavior according to the beliefs, values, and attitudes he has adopted from those he admires.

"Such is the kind of background that leads most of our adolescents to reject delinquent behavior.

"On the other hand, we can also see the failure of the civilizing mechanism, where instead of love and approval and consistent discipline, and respect for his individuality, the child experiences from his parents only the slap and scream of silent hostility or constant criticism, or indifference, or unpredictable swings between harshness and laxness. Such a child has no incentive to want to control his primitive instincts or his aggressions. He is likely to be cruel, quarrelsome, destructive, defiant, selfish, jealous, showing little feeling of remorse or guilt. If brutality in his early years clamps down on his every effort to let out some of the hostility within him, the time may come when his bottled-up hostility will explode in torturing a dog or cat, in hurting other children, in setting fire to the school building, in theft, rape, or murder. Such is the background of some of the children whose atrocious behavior makes the headlines.

"Automatic Aids to Growth

"Our children grow up in family emotional climates that run the gamut of those described above. However, the home cannot do everything. Relationships and experiences outside it influence the child's development and may push him toward or protect him from antisocial behavior. This brings us to the second crucial fact—that industrialization has destroyed many of the automatic aids to the emotional maturing of our children, while increasing the pressures upon them.

"In preindustrial and especially in preautomobile America, as among most primitive peoples, children grew up in and had their basic emotional needs met by the tribe or the neighborhood rather than by the parents alone. To a large extent, life centered in the home, the church, and the school in relatively stable neighborhoods. A child might grow to manhood without getting 10 miles away from his birthplace. The family was likely to be a clan of many members. If the parents were missing, brutal, indifferent, or for some reason failed to meet a child's emotional needs, he might well get guidance and satisfaction from grandma or Aunt Mabel, or the neighbor lady next door, or the minister, priest, or teacher. The self-contained neighborhood, like the tribe, gave the child support and imposed powerful controls on his behavior.

"As for other basic needs, the typical youngster—boy or girl—was from early years a useful hand on the farm, or in the family shop, or in the home. He got a sense of competence, usefulness, and growing independence even as he learned a vocation. He was busy. His days were full. He fitted into life by living, and learned by the sweat of his body that things have value. To satisfy his need for excitement and new experience untamed country surrounded even the big cities. The rebels and the violent could always escape to the frontier.

"While such neighborhoods bred no little angels, they did tend to hold their children's behavior within whatever limits each neighborhood set. Often those limits in respect to fighting, Halloween pranks, raiding orchards, drinking, and sexual behavior were pretty flexible. But the children who grew up in them were not stamped as delinquents.

"Industrialization's Effects on Children

"Think for a moment how all this has changed. Industrialization, mechanization, mobility, urbanization, and teeming populations have transformed the conditions of life and multiplied the problems of adjustment for children. The clan family has disappeared. Grandma is retired in Florida and Aunt Mabel has a well-paid Government job in Washington—or Japan.

"Father Has Lost His Role in the Home

"More subtle and vastly more harmful in its effects on children is the gradual easing of father out of the home and out of close contact with his children. So serious is this effect of industrialization that I should like to quote the professional judgment of a psychiatrist, Dr. Doris Milman, of New York City, a judgment based upon years of experience with children from any economic levels:

" 'Probably the single most important influence on young people today is the fact that the home is almost exclusively dominated by the mother. Father is away from home all day—and frequently evenings, too—with the result that virtually the entire function of bringing up children is left to mother. The father has lost status in the home, and no matter how effective and successful he may be in business or socially, his children generally see him in a rather passive and not very sharply defined role. It is the mother who dominates in almost every case, and in some instances the father has abdicated almost completely.'

"According to Dr. Milman, the most severe result of this trend is in the extent to which it accentuates effeminate tendencies in boys. Even where there are no such drastic results, however, its effect is felt on most 'normal' children. Boys do not see a strong father after whom to pattern themselves. They cannot identify with their mothers. As a result they tend to be passive about almost everything. They do not want to work too hard, or to worry, particularly since they have no strong feeling about their future role in life. Insofar as girls are concerned, since they tend to pattern themselves after their mothers, they are likely to perpetuate the dominant role of the mother.

"Those who work with seriously delinquent boys know how frequently and in how many different ways lack of a satisfactory father image and relationship contributes to their antisocial behavior.

"The Breakdown of the Neighborhood

"Scarcely less than the family in its influence on children, the neighborhood has suffered from the effects of industrialization. In fact, the automobile has obliterated the self-contained neighborhood and, by enabling youth on the farm as well as in the cities to seek recreation in the anonymity of distance, has practically ended the neighborhood's control over children's behavior.

"This is a worldwide phenomenon. A United Nations report released in 1955 found a 'frightening' increase in juvenile delinquency throughout the world, and stated that there 'seems to be a definite relationship between industrialization and juvenile delinquency.' A Turkish official visiting the United States in 1954 to study our programs for the control of juvenile delinquency stated that until the recent widespread industrialization of the predominantly village life of his country, Turkey had so little juvenile delinquency that the language had no word for this phenomenon. He told the U.S. Senate Subcommittee To Investigate Juvenile Delinquency: 'In the past, the child was protected and guided by the pattern of village life, which was also a kind of family society * * *. Everybody knew everybody else and felt a responsibility for what any child did. With modernization that sense of responsibility broke down.'

"I do not think it is widely realized how grave is the loss of the neighborhood in its effect upon our children, our culture, and the socialization of all of us. The link that joins each of us to the world and to the rest of mankind has always been the tribe, the neighborhood. It has provided the arena in which we grow, learn, work, play, worship, fall in love and marry, in which, however, humble our job, we feel that we have meaning and influence, that we are wanted and respected.

"Children Are Isolated From Adults

"For many, the neighborhood link is now broken. The neighbor next door is a stranger. Though there are millions more of us than ever before, and we live more closely packed together, our children are orphaned from the adult world as never before. And they have lost thereby the models for imitation, the masters to teach them an infinite variety of skills, the deep satisfaction of their sense of belonging if their parents fail to satisfy this need—and the neighborhood control over their behavior.

"Depriving children of the security and control that throughout history they got automatically from growing up in the constant shadow of adults, we drive them increasingly to depend on their peers, in gangs and groups whose members are all equally immature and insecure. In his book, 'The Shook-Up Generation,' Harrison Salisbury analyzes the demoralization of youngsters left to themselves in our impersonal society.

"To turn for a moment from boys in trouble to girls in trouble, the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare reports a 30-percent increase since 1949 in illegitimate births among girls aged 15 or younger. It has been demonstrated over and over again that many teenage girls enter into sexual experience not from precocious appetite but from the need to feel wanted and loved and important. One of the pregnant girls quoted in a Minneapolis Sunday Tribune article said: 'I didn't like the heavy petting, but it was the thing to do.' Another said bitterly: 'I felt I wasn't important to mom because she didn't care when I got home.' Where parents and other adults satisfy the need for security and affection, children do not turn to tragic substitutes.

"No Chores, No Jobs

"I have time to list but one other effect of industrialization on the social structure which contributes to today's delinquency and works harm on perhaps most of our children. Along with the loss of contact with parents and adults, many of our children and youth have lost the opportunity to be useful and to learn automatically skills and vocations. Electric lights, stoves, and washers, oil and gas furnaces, vacuum cleaners, prepared food, and what not, have done away with the daily chores of carrying out the ashes, beating the rugs, stringing beans—even of sewing, cooking, and mowing the lawn. In too many homes today's youngster feels himself unneeded, superfluous, a kind of toy. Everything is given him, he earns or makes nothing, and as a result many appreciate nothing. Boys and girls no longer grow into a vocation in the family business or trade. Thanks to galloping mechanization of industry, commerce, and agriculture, it is getting harder to obtain the part-time and summer jobs that can give them pocket money, self-respect and contentment, good work habits, a sense of responsibility, respect for materials, and vocational skills.

"What Is Happening to Children

"In view of such deprivations and frustration of children and their basic needs (and I have cited but a few of many), it is perhaps no wonder that some of our adolescents drift into gangs, break school windows and street lights, race souped-up cars, experiment with liquor, drugs, and mass sex parties, steal, destroy, and even kill. 'The more the drive toward life is thwarted, the stronger is the drive toward destruction,' writes one psychologist.

"So much for the children driven into overt delinquency by the weaknesses in our social structure. As one last reminder of the toll paid to these social defects by many other children in weakened character and poorer citizenship, I refer you to a report with which the committee is undoubtedly familiar, the Kinkead report of the Army investigation into loss of morale among our servicemen in the Korean war. One speaker quoted in that report of Maj. Clarence L. Anderson, a doctor who was himself a prisoner from 1950 to the end of the war and who received the Distinguished Service Cross for rounding up the American wounded at Unsan Battle, for care of them, and for refusing to leave them, though it meant his own capture. I quote from Dr. Anderson: 'It is a sad fact, but it is a fact, that the men who were captured in large groups early in the war often became unmanageable. They refused to obey orders, and they cursed and sometimes struck officers who tried to enforce orders. Naturally, the chaos was encouraged by the Communists, who told the captives immediately after they were taken that rank no longer existed among them, that they were all equal as simple prisoners of war released from capitalist bondage. At first, the badly wounded suffered most. On the marches back from the line to the temporary holding camps, casualties on litters were often callously abandoned beside the road. Able-bodied prisoners refused to carry them, even when their officers commanded them to do so. If a Communist guard ordered a litter shouldered, our men obeyed; otherwise the wounded were left to die. On the march, in the temporary camps, and in the permanent ones, the strong regularly took food from the weak. There was no discipline to prevent it. Many men were sick, and these men, instead of being helped and nursed by the others, were ignored, or worse. Dysentery was common, and it made some men too weak to walk. On winter nights, helpless men with dysentery were rolled outside the huts by their comrades, and left to die in the cold.'

"Mr. Kinkead writes that what struck Major Anderson most forcibly was the almost universal inability of the prisoners to adjust to a primitive situation. 'They lacked the old Yankee resourcefulness,' he said. 'This was partly—but only partly, I believe—the result of the psychic shock of being captured. It was also, I think, the result of some new failure in the childhood and adolescent training of our young men—a new softness.'

"A program to reduce delinquent behavior

"Perhaps a summary of the points I have sought to make so far will suggest the kind of program which we must attempt if we are to bring delinquency under control.

"(1) Every infant is born at the social level of the savage, absorbed in self-preservation, with capacities for love but also for hate, fear, anger, cruelty, and violence over which he has no control.

"(2) The effective tool to aid the child to acquire some degree of control over his selfishness and his emotions and drives is person-to-person relationships with parents and other adults.

"(3) The extent of self-control learned, that is, the degree of civilized behavior attained, depends upon the degree to which the child's relationships with parents and other adults meet his needs for love and belonging, competence, recognition, independence, and so on.

"(4) In primitive and preindustrial societies children grew up in constant contact with all adults, including parents, relatives of the clan family, and members of the tribe or neighborhood. While there were plenty of emotionally warped individuals, children's behavior conformed pretty much to whatever standards the community set. Many basic needs of children, such as emotional security, were satisfied by the clan family or tribe or neighborhood. The sense of competence or usefulness was satisfied by the daily necessity to carry out household tasks. Today the traditional father-child and adult-child relationships have largely disappeared. So have such automatic aids to growth as universal chores. Industrialization, mechanization, mobility, and urbanization have undermined or destroyed these and many other indispensable aids to humanizing and civilizing of children.

"(5) Cast largely on their own inadequate resources in a crowded, impersonal, tense, demoralized and despiritualized world that doesn't need them, many children have failed to grow out of the delinquent behavior natural to infancy, or they have fallen back into such behavior; there is terrifying evidence that many other children appear to have suffered some character deterioration.

"Adult-Child Relationships Renewed

"To handle so vast a problem which to some degree affects every child, nothing less than a reestablishment of satisfactory father-child and adult-child relationships can hope to be effective. We have to bring our children back into the real life of the whole community and under the constant influence and guidance of adults. More services to children, particularly delinquent and disturbed children, which constitute the solution so far proposed, are not the whole answer. Of course we need more services, and particularly better services, as I shall urge later on, but neither parents nor the rest of us adults can buy nor delegate the main job of the physical, emotional, intellectual, vocational, moral, and spiritual education of the next generation. Basically and inescapably, such education is a job in person-to-person relationships between all adults and all children.

"Of course, society and its complicated industrial structure are not going to reverse themselves or go backward to the preindustrial age of self-contained neighborhoods. We have to find new ways and means of reestablishing father-child relationships and paternal authority over children and of renewing contact between the neighborhood adults and the neighborhood children. How this shall be done rests in large part on future discoveries, but, lest you think it a pipedream, I cite to you the Chicago area projects as one already demonstrated method of accomplishing this result. Furthermore, I suggest that industrialization, which has banished adult-child relationships, today offers to restore them, and even to enrich them, through the new leisure time which automation makes possible for fathers and mothers as well as their children.

"The First Necessity Is Education

"However, people have to find the answers largely for themselves. They will do so if they understand what is happening to their children and why. Therefore, the first responsibility of government at any level is education. We need to overcome our culture's almost universal psychological illiteracy. While we have recognized the need for physical and intellectual education, and to a lesser degree the need for moral and spiritual education, we have been unaware of the necessity for and the nature of emotional growth. Surely nothing less than ignorance of the fact that a boy needs close identification with a father figure to develop his masculinity could have permitted the father under the pressure of industrialization to drift out of the home and largely out of the life of his children.

"Task No. 1, then, for those interested in the better control of delinquency through prevention and rehabilitation is to extend education in the A B C's of human motivation and behavior. The primary job is to remedy man's almost universal psychological illiteracy. Once that is widely accepted, we can have faith that parents' and the adults' world generally will find ways of adjusting the system to meet the universal emotional needs of children.

"How do we go about this staggering task of universal education? Surely the first requisite is leadership, and I ask you gentlemen whether in any field leadership can produce greater benefits for our Nation. Next, the responsibility and opportunity of the schools to inject the A B C's of behavior into the stream of common thought is tremendous. But before they can do that, every teacher needs to be as well trained in the dynamics of human behavior and in the nature of emotional growth as he or she is in physical or academic education.

"Train First Personnel Working With Delinquents

"Fortunately and realistically, there is another large group of people whose need for education in human motivation and behavior is immediate and urgent, and who, once educated, can provide a leaven to spread understanding throughout our society. I mean all those whose jobs in one way or another give them control over delinquent children—policemen, probation officers, judges, county attorneys, visiting teachers, a variety of welfare workers, recreation leaders, training-school staffs, parole agents, visiting nurses. Since most chronic delinquency and other maladjustment stems from a failure in person-to-person relationships, treatment and rehabilitation has to be a function of person-to-person relationships. People are all-important in rehabilitation. Consequently, the selection and training of all personnel who deal with delinquent children becomes indispensable to rehabilitation and prevention. Only as each of them gets some understanding of themselves and of the forces that make them behave as they do are they likely to be effective in changing the attitudes and behavior of delinquent children. This is the group with which education in the dynamics of human behavior must begin. To stimulate and facilitate the teaching of this group seems to me to offer the greatest opportunity in this area to the Congress.

"Minnesota's Training Program

"Believing that such training is primarily a responsibility of universities, the University of Minnesota in 1953 launched a training project in delinquency control with four main purposes:

"(1) To introduce all law students to modern philosophy and procedures in the administration of the criminal law, especially as it affects juveniles, and to bring law students together with students of the behavioral sciences in joint exploration of common problems.

"(2) To attract and train college students for work, professional and nonprofessional, in delinquency control through development of an undergraduate interdepartmental major in delinquency control. I may say that this major is now beginning to provide probation and parole officers, detention-home workers, and even welfare workers to help meet the demand in Minnesota.

"(3) To provide in-service training to personnel now administering the criminal law and delinquency control services. Most important step in this area was the establishment in 1956 of an annual juvenile officers institute, a 10-week period of intensive training of police and probation officers for work with children.

"(4) Cooperation with State and local agencies in the delinquency control field.

"Let me give just one illustration of what this kind of training of people actually working in the field can do. One police officer who attended the juvenile officers institute was initially extremely skeptical of any concepts of treatment that might be inconsistent with 'cracking down' on children. After 5 weeks of the course he told me: 'I begin to get the point, Mr. Ellingston. Now my problem is to educate my department.' A year later he wrote the institute: 'There are so many ways that the juvenile institute has helped me in my work, community, and even in my home dealing with my own children that I couldn't even start to list all the help it has given me.' On graduation, this officer enlisted his neighbors in the organization of a varied leisure-time activities program for his and their children. This program has now become community wide, with a full-time paid staff in addition to the parent volunteers.

"Federal Aid Needed for Training

"Minnesota needs to expand its program to give intensive training to many other groups, such as juvenile court judges and training school personnel. Since every person working with children in trouble needs training in human behavior, it would seem that every State should have available training programs similar to that in Minnesota. Federal aid could vastly stimulate the establishment of such programs. In our own State it is highly doubtful whether we would carry on the juvenile officer institute without aid from the Ford Foundation, particularly as the institute trains officers from a dozen States other than Minnesota. In our delinquency control project we need stipends for students in the undergraduate major to maintain them while they get working experience in training schools during the summer vacations.

"I believe that the biggest returns from any investment by Congress in the delinquency control field will come from aid to training personnel.

"Aid for Demonstration and Ongoing Projects

"The need for and the opportunities in aid to demonstration projects and aid to ongoing projects is surely such as to justify Federal assistance. As for demonstration projects, I believe that every State would benefit from seeing an attack on the so-called hard core families, such as the family centered project carried on in St. Paul, or from seeing how a program like the Chicago area projects can stimulate the residents of rundown neighborhoods to revive their sense of neighborhood responsibility in action.

"As to ongoing projects, all American communities, urban or rural, lack some, and some lack all, of the essential treatment and prevention services, even the public ones, such as a probation officer or a visiting teacher. Few of them are adequately staffed in terms of number and qualification of personnel. As a result many juvenile courts and probation departments, for example, are treatment agencies in name only. Aid in carefully selected areas might serve as a demonstration to the rest of the State concerned.

"Need for Youth Conservation Camps

"In closing, I should like to suggest one additional area of major importance in which I believe the Federal Government can make a major contribution to the physical and spiritual health of many of our children, including the reduction of delinquency, as well as to the conservation of our natural resources. This is an area in which, if the Federal Government does not move, little or nothing will be accomplished.

"Unemployed youths under 20 years of age in Minnesota numbered 14,000 last February. There has been some improvement since, but less for this age group than for adult workers. The investigations of our interim commission indicated that this high volume of unemployment among Minnesota youth reflects a deeper and more lasting phenomenon than the recent economic recession. Police and settlement house workers in the big cities and juvenile judges throughout the State reported in 1956 that jobs for youth were increasingly scarce and that this scarcity contributed not only to delinquency but to the building up a body of embittered and frustrated young citizens, crippled vocationally, emotionally, and spiritually.

"This is another product of the accelerating industrial revolution which progressively reduces the workweek from 48 to 40 to 35 hours and cuts the number of traditional jobs available to those young people who, in our choreless economy, have no special talents or training.

"The Minnesota Legislature felt this problem to be so serious and lasting that each house created in February emergency committees to investigate the possibilities of a youth development camp program in Minnesota. I submit for the record copies of the reports of these emergency committees, which were the same for each house. These reports state in part: 'While many new programs to provide constructive work opportunities for youth will undoubtedly be developed, the protection of our natural resources in soil, water, forest, and wildlife combines endless work opportunities with immense social and economic benefits.'

"Citing the immense value of the Civilian Conservation Corps to Minnesota as well as to the rest of the Nation, the committees recommended and the legislature memorialized the Congress urging it to enact into law S. 812, the bill introduced by Senator HUBERT HUMPHREY and several of his colleagues, including members of this committee, to establish a Youth Conservation Corps comprising 150,000 young men. Such a step, I believe, would fit into the type of constructive long-range planning for youth which I have been urging in this statement.

"May I express to this committee the appreciation of the groups which I represent for the conscientious and responsible approach you have taken over a period of years in seeking ways to protect children and youth."

Mr. ELLINGSTON. I would like, because this is a subject about which it seems to me there is much talk and perhaps little understanding, to suggest that delinquency involves not just "those kids over there"; that the problem is not simply the number of children that appear in juvenile courts.

The percentages appearing in juvenile courts have risen from 1.26 out of every 100 children aged 10 through 17 in 1948 to 2.35 in 1957. This is bad enough, but this does not begin to suggest the magnitude nor the implications of the problem.

The California Youth Authority last year released figures which I think will astonish you. They are hard to believe. The authority pointed out that during 1957 arrests of boys aged 17 totaled 35.7 percent of the total California population of boys of this age. These arrests did not include traffic cases; these were excluded. Allowing for repeaters—that is the number of boys that were arrested twice or more in a year—26 percent were arrested.

And the 15- and 16-year olds were nearly as bad, the total of all three age groups being 25.8 percent.

In terms of the seriousness of the offenses for which they were arrested, 5.6 percent of the arrests were for the eight major crimes which the FBI lists in its annual reports, and 25 percent were for lesser crimes, such as truancy, incorrigibility, petty theft, and so on.

Now, are we to suppose that these vast numbers of youngsters suddenly made up their minds to break the law, to be "bad"? Well, of course, to ask the question is to answer it. These kinds do not simply choose to be bad. Their behavior reflects something new in our society. It seems to me that the behavioral problem that we face in the United States at this time reflects weaknesses in our social institutions, weaknesses in the social structure, to which every youngster is exposed. This is why the problem is of major concern to everyone and to the Congress. Perhaps I can demonstrate what I mean.

If we are to relate weaknesses of the social structure or of our institutions to delinquency, we have to discuss causation of delinquency. Everybody thinks he knows why delinquents are delinquent, that it is due to alcoholism, or to the fact that the old man has ceased to take his children out to the woodshed, or to lack of playgrounds or to poverty, or TV, or crime comics.

Many of these factors have some relationships but they certainly are not in any sense the cause of delinquency and it hurts our program, obstructs public action in the field, to say that any one thing is the cause, for example, failure of fathers to punish their children sufficiently. If this is the cause, then we need only get every father out whipping the tar out of junior and this ends the problem. Of course, this is not so. To say that it is permits us to evade the profoundly difficult social engineering which we have to undertake if we are going to effectively reduce delinquency.

What are the basic causative factors? No one who has worked in the field intensively for 20 years as I have, would be foolish enough to say that it is easy to explain the causation of delinquency. The combination of causes varies for every youngster, but I believe there are basic modern social conditions and basic universal psychological factors, which we can undertsand, and which underlie all of today's delinquency, except perhaps that of the youngster with the brain lesion because of disease or accident.

There are two basic facts: The first is that every youngster has to grow up emotionally as well as intellectually, physically, and socially and that failure to grow up emotionally predisposes him to delinquent behavior. The second fact is that industrialization and the machine have eliminated many of the automatic aids to emotional growth, which had been traditional throughout history.

These are the two factors: One, the necessity for emotional growth; two, the fact that the changes in our society have eliminated automatic aids to that emotional growth.

I would like to read a short paragraph from my statement:

"It must be remembered that no infant is born a finished product. On the contrary, every baby starts life as a little savage. He is equipped among other things with organs and muscles over which he has no control, with an urge for self-preservation, with aggressive drives, and emotions like anger, fear, and love, over which likewise he has practically no control. He is completely selfish and self-centered. He wants what we wants when he wants it—his bottle, his mother's attention, his playmate's toy, his uncle's watch. Deny those wants and he seethes with rage and aggression which would be murderous were he not so helpless. He is dirty, he has no manners, no shame, no respect for persons or property, no conscience, no morals, no knowledge, no skills."

I am describing all newborn infants here. I am sure the description is accurate because of my observations of my own children and grandchildren. All babies start out with infinite capacity for love, but also for hate, anger, envy, aggression, and so on. The instinctive, primitive behavior of all chidren when frustrated is delinquent behavior. Since frustration is continuous and inevitable from the moment of birth on, children have to be led out of this instinctive antisocial behavior.

The effective means of leading youngsters out of completely self-centered and delinquent behavior are intelligent use of authority coupled with satisfaction of their basic emotional needs. These are the need for love, for emotional security, for belonging; the need for feelings of competence, adequacy and for recognition; the need for new experience; and the need for increasing independence. These are perhaps the basic emotional needs which, if met, encourage a youngster to give up gradually and slowly—it is a difficult process for every child—to give up his selfish and aggressive behavior little by little, and to develop his conscience so that he eventually controls himself.

He will do this in response to effective meeting of these basic needs, particularly the need for love, the need to feel wanted. This is true of all youngsters and must have been true through most of human history. The youngster who makes the headlines, who kills old men wantonly whom he does not even know, the boys that lead the gangs in the big city slums, these boys are likely to be the sort of youngsters who have not had basic love in the home, do not belong, have been rejected, who have had no encouragement to overcome this instinctively selfish behavior, to gain self-control.

What I want to bring out is that these emotional needs are typical of all humanity, they are typical of humanity in the past, they are typical of humanity today, and in the future. The emotional needs have not changed, but the world in which those needs are met has been transformed. The change in the situation today as compared with 20 years ago, 50 years ago, with the preautomobile era, particularly, is the change in the environment in which youngsters grow up. This change I think explains today's increase in delinquent behavior.

The home cannot do everything. The family cannot do the whole job. These institutions do not exist in a vacuum. They are products of their society.

Prior to the automobile there were plenty of adults who had never been 10 miles away from the place in which they were born. The community, the neighborhood, was a self-contained unit in which the family and the school and the church really did provide the totality of life for the children. The clan-family—not only the parents, the mothers and fathers—but the grandparents and aunts and uncles and cousins—all exercised influence and control over the youngster and helped meet his emotional needs.

The same thing was true of the neighborhood. The neighborhood was a replica of the tribe. Youngsters grew up in the neighborhood. The lady next door might feel just as much responsibility for the behavior of the youngster as his own parents.

Vocational training was an automatic thing because every child had to chop wood, fill the lamps, beat rugs, cook, carry out the ashes, feed the chickens, and all the other chores that were essential to the daily survival of the family. These chores led to a lot of rebellion when a youngster wanted to play baseball, but they gave him tremendous psychological satisfaction because he meant something to his family and society. At the same time they taught him habits of work, skills, and respect for things.

Now all this has changed. Industrialization has eliminated the clan family and very largely broken down the neighborhood. The controls of the neighborhood over its children are gone because John can get in his car and drive to where he is unknown and do things that he would never do where he is known. In the preautomobile days, if the parents were missing or ineffectual, there might be an aunt or a neighbor to meet a youngster's needs. Now, these people are nonexistent. If there is a grandmother she lives in Florida and the aunt lives here in Washington, or in Japan with a Government job.

One even more serious loss in terms of helping a youngster to satisfy his emotional needs and of controlling his behavior is the father's gradual moving out of the home over the last half century. Because this is so serious I want to read what a psychiatrist in New York, Dr. Milman, who has worked with children of all economic levels for many years, has said about it.

"Probably the single most important influence on young people today is the fact that the home is almost exclusively dominated by the mother. Father is away from home all day—and frequently evenings too—with the result that virtually the entire function of bringing up children is left to mother. The father has lost status in the home, and no matter how effective and successful he may be in business or socially, his children generally see him in a rather passive and not very sharply defined role. It is the mother who dominates in almost every case, and in some instances the father has abdicated almost completely."

Then she goes on to say:

"The most severe result of this trend is in the extent to which it accentuates effeminate tendencies in boys. Even where there are no such drastic results, however, its effect is felt on most normal children. Boys do not see a strong father after whom to pattern themselves. They cannot identify with their mothers. As a result they tend to be passive about almost everything. They do not want to work too hard, or to worry, particularly since they have no strong feeling about their future role in life. Insofar as girls are concerned, since they tend to pattern themselves after their mothers, they are likely to perpetuate the dominant role of the mother."

This is a factor which anybody who works with boys in training schools recognizes to be a very real one. I once served as a house parent in a training school in Minnesota. Every boy in my cottage—and there were 53 of them whose records I knew intimately—had a basic problem of unsatisfactory relationships with one or both parents. Very often the father was the weak unsatisfactory character in one way or another and the behavior of the boys in various ways were reflections of that unsatisfactory relationship.

I said earlier that this problem extends far beyond the recognized delinquent. To support that statement, I want to read to you from a report I am sure, Senator, you are intimately familiar with. That is the Kinkead report on the breakdown of morale among our soldiers who were taken prisoners in Korea. This is the U.S. Army report which Kinkead has summarized.

One speaker quoted in that report is Maj. Clarence L. Anderson, a doctor who was himself a prisoner from 1950 to the end of the war and who received the Distinguished Service Cross for rounding up the American wounded at Unsan Battle, for care of them, and for refusing to leave them, though it meant his own capture. I quote from Dr. Anderson:

"It is a sad fact, but it is a fact, that the men who were captured in large groups early in the war often became unmanageable. They refused to obey orders, and they cursed and sometimes struck officers who tried to enforce orders. Naturally, the chaos was encouraged by the Communists, who told the captives immediately after they were taken that rank no longer existed among them—that they were all equal as simple prisoners of war released from capitalist bondage. At first, the badly wounded suffered most. On the marches back from the line to the temporary holding camps, casualties on litters were often callously abandoned beside the road. Able-bodied prisoners refused to carry them, even when their officers commanded them to do so. If a Communist guard ordered a litter shouldered, our men obeyed; otherwise the wounded were left to die. On the march, in the temporary camps, and in the permanent ones, the strong regularly took food from the weak."

These were American soldiers. These were not delinquents.

"There was no discipline to prevent it. Many men were sick, and these men, instead of being helped and nursed by the others, were ignored, or worse. Dysentery was common, and it made some men too weak to walk. On winter nights, helpless men with dysentery were rolled outside the huts by their comrades, and left to die in the cold."

Mr. Kinkead writes that what struck Major Anderson most forcibly was the almost universal inability of the prisoners to adjust to a primitive situation. "They lacked the old Yankee resourcefulness," he said. "This was partly—but only partly, I believe—the result of the psychic shock of being captured. It was also, I think, the result of some new failure in the childhood and adolescent training of our young men—a new softness."

I read this to emphasize what I am absolutely certain is true, that what we call delinquency is the overt reaction of a limited portion of our youngsters to weaknesses in our society which affect all youngsters, and I think this demonstrates it.

In addition to the loss of the father from the home we have broken down the neighborhood. Scarcely less than the family in its influence on children, the neighborhood has suffered from the effects of industrialization. In fact, the automobile has obliterated the self-contained neighborhood and, by enabling youth on the farm as well as in the cities to seek recreation in the anonymity of distance, has practically ended the neighborhood's control over children's behavior.

This is a worldwide phenomenon. A United Nations report released in 1955 found a frightening increase in juvenile delinquency throughout the world, and stated that there "seems to be a definite relationship between industrialization and juvenile delinquency." A Turkish official visiting the United States in 1954 to study our programs for the control of juvenile delinquency stated that until the recent widespread industrialization of the predominantly village life of his country, Turkey had so little juvenile delinquency that the language had no word for this phenomenon. He told the U.S. Senate Subcommittee To Investigate Juvenile Delinquency:

"In the past, the child was protected and guided by the pattern of village life, which was also a kind of family society * * *. Everybody knew everybody else and felt a responsibility for what any child did. With modernization that sense of responsibility broke down."

This is a perfect description of what has happened in American society. Every youngster to some degree is affected by this lack of interest and lack of supervision.

Senator MORSE. May I interrupt to supplement that by saying when I was in India in 1957, I talked to some of the Indian judges and many of the lawyers and observed some of the court proceedings. I was surprised at the number of judges that commented to me about their concern as to what was happening to the youth in India in the big cities.

Now, if there is any society that is based on the village pattern and the neighborhood pattern it is the Indian society and yet they were pointing out how this was breaking down in larger cities, Calcutta, Delhi, Bombay, Madras, and other cities, confronting them with an increase in juvenile delinquency that heretofore had not existed.

And I think you are quite right when you point out this is a worldwide pattern.

Mr. ELLINGSTON. Indeed it is, sir.

For many youngsters and for many adults, of course, the neighborhood link is now broken. The neighbor next door is a stranger. Though there are millions more of us than ever before and we live more closely packed together, our children are orphaned from the adult world as never before. They have lost thereby the models for imitation, the masters to teach them an infinite variety of skills, the deep satisfaction of their sense of belonging, and neighborhood control over their behavior.

This seems to me to be a problem of such seriousness, in the light of the whole history of humanity prior to the automobile, that I wonder that there has not been fuller recognition of what the loss of the neighborhood means. You remember the Greek polis, or city, state. That social and political organization explains why Athens was so magnificent a civilization. Every one participated in every aspect of city life through the polis. In this rich and full life children grew up. In our own preautomobile culture, children were constantly under the shadow of adults because of the neighborhood. Today, the neighborhood has largely disappeared. Youngsters are pushed off on their own age group, all immature and inadequate. They are not capable of making wise decisions. Not only do too many of them lack the guidance and control of the father and even of the mother, but they do not have the neighborhood adults—the grocer, the smith, the carpenter, the tavernkeeper, the minister or priest—under whose shadow they can grow up and from whom they can acquire the skills, the ideas, the values which together constitute the culture.

In the destruction of close adult-child relationships, we have broken the major link for the transmission of our culture.

I have time for just one more of the major effects of industrialization on the social structure which contributes to delinquency—there are many others of course—namely the loss of automatic vocational training through daily chores. Electric lights, stoves, and washers, oil and gas furnaces, vacuum cleaners, prepared food, and what not have done away with the daily chores of housekeeping. Nobody is born with skills, nobody is born with a sense of responsibility, these things are learned. But we have taken away the major tool to teach these things, the automatic tool, evolved inevitability, because in order to survive man had to use every tool that was available. Children could perform indispensable chores so they learned skills, habits of work, respect for materials, and self-respect automatically.

I would not agree there is as much delinquency in the rural areas as in the slums, but there is a great deal and it is partly a reflection of this same problem.

In view of such deprivations and frustration of children and their basic needs—and I have cited but a few of many—it is perhaps no wonder that some of our adolescents drift into gangs, break school windows and street lights, race souped-up cars, experiment with liquor, drugs, and mass sex parties, steal, destroy, and even kill. "The more the drive toward life is thwarted, the stronger is the drive toward destruction," writes one psychologist.

And if anybody questions that statement let him look inside himself. Again I say that the recognized delinquent is not someone different from us. He is ourselves subjected to pressures that were greater than those we were subjected to and with less supports than we enjoyed. Furthermore, none of us, no matter how long we live, get wholly rid of the hostility and violence that lie beneath the surface of each of us ready to break out in the violence that fills the headlines every day—violence in connection with strikes, schools, housing, elections, and what not.

Let us not deceive ourselves that the delinquent is someone apart and inferior.

I believe, then, that to understand today's delinquency, we need to understand these two fundamental facts: That every child needs to grow out of delinquent behavior by giving up emotionally; and that industrialization has, without our realizing it, deprived us of several automatic aids to emotional maturing. This permits us to see the problem in perspective, to see that vastly more is involved than getting rid of crime comics, for example, or even of restoring the woodshed.

In the light of this broader perspective, how are we going to reduce delinquency? The traditional approach has been to suggest more services. It has been said to this committee, "let us have demonstration projects."

I strongly believe in more and better services and in demonstration projects. But how can demonstration projects hope to change the attitudes and understandings of all adults and all parents with respect to the needs of the children which they are failing to meet? Demonstration projects, will not do this. It seems to me that at bottom the answer to the delinquency problem—and I wrote this 10 years ago—is education, education first of all of everybody, the elimination of our well-nigh universal psychological illiteracy.

We have understood that youngsters have to grow up physically and mentally, have to be aided to grow up in these ways, that they have to grow up socially and morally and spiritually, though we are forgetting these latter necessities.

But we have never realized that children have to grow up emotionally and that they need aid in this, in the development of self-control through the satisfaction of their basic emotional needs.

It seems to me, leaving aside the spiritual and moral problem which underlies all else and is related to the things I am talking about here, that if we are going to be concerned about doing something constructive and large scale, long range, in the reduction of delinquency, our first responsibility is education to reduce the psychological illiteracy of our people.

How do we go about this staggering task of universal education? The first need is leadership. People that have positions of influence and power have to stand up and tell our people what the score is, what our industrial society is unwittingly doing to harm our youngsters. This has not been said, though the most influential voices in the country should be saying it.

Secondly, of course, the role of the schools in the psychological education of our people is obvious. If we could get our teachers to understand why they themselves behave as they do we would be well on our way. Self-understanding is the only door to understanding of others or to teaching others to understand themselves.

This is why training teachers, particularly those in kindergarten and the early grades, in the ABC's of human motivation and behavior is so urgently needed. This will not be easy; it takes more than words and lectures. This learning is a matter of emotional growth. But words can help a great deal, and if people learn the words, after a while they may suddenly understand what drives them to behave as they do and so what are the needs and motivations of others.

If we can get our teachers to understand something about human behavior then these insights would be more surely transmitted to the new generation than in any other way.

Realistically and in terms of what this committee is interested in and what Congress might do at this time, it seems to me that the education of one particular group offers a tremendous opportunity. I refer, of course, to the many people who work with children in trouble. They are police officers, probation officers, juvenile court judges, county attorneys, institutional staff of all kinds, detention home staff, parole officers, they are welfare workers in many categories, they are visiting nurses. The value, the effectiveness of all these people depends largely upon how well they understand why a youngster gets out of line, why he behaves that way, and consequently what the constructive way of handling him is. Understanding does not mean they are going to change him in every instance, but their chances of contributing to a change in his attitude and behavior will be vastly greater if they have some understanding of his behavior.

These are the people that we can begin with, these are the people that need education most urgently, and for whom training will pay the biggest dividends in the reduction of delinquency.

In 1953, we set up our delinquency control project at the University of Minnesota. In 1956, we launched our training program for police and probation officers working with youngsters. The juvenile officers' institute runs for 10 weeks every summer. It involves 210 hours of classroom work and 10 days of field work. Officers come from all over the State, small departments and big departments; they have come from North Dakota, Wisconsin, Texas, Indiana, Ohio, Illinois, and North Carolina. We copied our institute from the delinquency control institute at the University of Southern California. I understand there is a third institute at the University of Arizona.

To give you an illustration of what this training can mean, one officer, the only one who wore a uniform, came in with a very belligerent expression. It seemed obvious that he was there to remind us that molly-coddling kids was no answer, telling us, "You have to be tough." After 3 weeks he stopped wearing his uniforms. After 5 weeks he said, "Mr. Ellingston, I begin to get the point and now my problem is to educate my department."

I am talking about the value of practical training in why kids behave as they do, how you control them constructively, how you treat them, how police officers should interview youngsters, how to work with other community agencies to control delinquency and to prevent it, what the legal aspects of the problem are. We also have a course on public speaking because these are the people that have to get up and tell the community, the church groups, the service clubs, the PTA's, how to do this job, what is involved in it.

A year after our officer graduated he wrote us to say:

"I can't begin to tell you how much good the juvenile officers institute did me, not only in my work and with my department, but in my own home, with my children."

He also informed us that when he graduated from the course he went home and called together his neighbors, the parents of the children his children played with, and persuaded them to share with him in supervising leisure time activities for their children.

The parents ran the program as volunteers for 2 years. By that time their project had extended to the whole town so they hired professional staff full time to run it with the continued volunteer help of fathers and mothers.

This illustrates what you can do by giving people of good will some understanding of human behavior, of the problems of children in our society, and of the responsibilities of every adult and every parent in meeting them.

This is where I think our education should begin. It should begin with police officers, with probation and parole agents, institutional personnel and the other frontline staff working with children in trouble.

With respect to probation and parole officers, as late as 10 years ago we had hardly any trained officers in the State. Now the probation departments in Minneapolis and St. Paul are professionally staffed and of high quality, and there are several probation and parole agents who are graduates of schools of social work in the State service. However, the need for probation officers far outruns the supply of social work M.A.'s so we have had to develop other types of training.

In 1955, the Minnesota Legislature set up an interim commission on juvenile delinquency, adult crime, and corrections, of which I happen to be the executive secretary. The commission was continued in 1957 and seems likely to be continued again this year.

As a result of its investigation of the total problem, the commission concluded that sufficient trained probation officers to serve every juvenile court in Minnesota are indispensable to help reduce delinquency. On its recommendation, the legislature despite its economy-mindedness appropriated $671,000 for a statewide probation program. This may be "peanuts" in Washington, but is tremendous to us. The act requires that every new officer hired must have passed the State civil service examination.

This is a tie-in between training and practical application. The State is authorized to hire 15 new probation-parole agents I and 7 agents II or supervisors. It seems likely that 10 of the new parole agents I will attend the juvenile officers institute for training this summer. If they do, they will go out on the job with a good deal more skill and understanding than they would otherwise have.

Senator MORSE. I am familiar with those two pamphlets to which you have referred and without objection I would like to have them filed with the committee, not part of the record, but as exhibits for our file so they will be available for us in executive committee discussions.

Mr. ELLINGSTON. What we would like to do at the university in connection with this Juvenile Officers Institute—and we could run this without Ford Foundation aid; the Ford people came out in 1957, paid half the costs, now they pay the total cost of that program because they think it valuable—is to include not only probation and parole agents with the police officers, but also juvenile court judges and county attorneys. No judge would need a 10-week course, but we believe they could use 2 weeks very intensive training at the university on behavior, on court operations, on relations with other agencies, etc.

We should like also to train welfare workers who around the State have inevitably to do with delinquent children. Very few of them have social work M.A.'s. We can give them training in several weeks which would make them a lot more efficient and more valuable than they are.

This seems to be the fruitful approach to help to meet this immense social problem that affects all children. Incidentally, I would like to make one point: Service by itself is not worth a hoot. You cannot do anything for anybody. The only thing of value is to help others to do something for themselves, to help them solve their own problems.

We have to get away from this concept of just pouring out services as such. We have to find ways of revitalizing neighborhoods, the plain citizens are helped and guided into serving their own kids and the neighborhood kids and in so doing suddenly discover that theirs is a neighborhood and they have revitalized the values that have been lost through industrialization.

So this type of training that I am talking of in relation to the Juvenile Officers Institute seems to me to be the crucial type of training. Sure, we have to have professionals and qualified people to do demonstration projects, but it is vastly more important to have every police department have somebody with training to handle little Johnny around the corner. So with the probation officer and the institutional people who have practically no training, these are the people we have to start with. Then demonstration projects are perfectly sound.

For 13 years I was in charge of the youth authority program for the American Law Institute. We set it up in California and many other States and here in the Federal Government, and I think it is a very good thing. But the longer I worked on that project, the more doubtful I became of the wisdom of setting up youth authorities without personnel. They were not available.

What is the good of a project, sound as it may be, unless you have people that can administer it?

We are not going to get M.A.'s, we do not want M.A.'s for many of these positions. An M.A. as a cottage parent in a training school is a waste of time and would probably have the wrong approach. The cottage parent should have understanding of himself and therefore of the children, of how to handle the kids. Some people cannot learn that if they live to be a hundred, but the great majority can. This we have discovered in practical work. This is where training should begin, and I do not think that anything else that the Government could do would be worth 10 cents if it fails to help provide the people who can do these jobs. May I say that Federal aid for demonstration projects alone will make so little impact on the immense problem that it may foreclose future Federal action to aid training of personnel. The tendency may be to say that Federal funds are wasted in the effort to control delinquency.

A demonstration, presumably, is of a program that you want adopted all through your State. If it is going to be so adopted there have to be people locally who understand the problem and who can be taught to administer the demonstrated project.

There is no slick answer, there is no short cut, there is no demonstration that is going to find the total answer to this universal social problem. Therefore, the thing to do is to get across to the greatest possible number of people working daily with children, the basic understandings of antisocial behavior and how to change it.

I am all for demonstration projects, provided I know what the demonstration projects are. It is very easy to say, "Here is some Federal money and would it not be nice if we had this little project." And a lot of professional people get together and cook up something of interest to them but which doesn't contribute much of anything to help a community reduce delinquency.

To select projects wisely, I believe we have to understand the nature of this problem and its cause, then we can decide how well the project hits at the core of the problem. We have to have perspective.

Thirdly, as Judge Long quite rightly pointed out, no State has enough essential services—police, probation, and the rest, to work with children who are already delinquent, to say nothing of effective preventive services. Ongoing projects everywhere need aid. Also they need trained staff. A new probation service is set up. Someone says, "Well, now, we have a probation department and the situation is just as bad as it was before we had that probation office." Why? The probation officer is an ex-deputy sheriff and does not know the first thing about the problem. This sets back the whole concept of treatment. There has to be education.

Senator MORSE. I have these two questions I would like to ask, based upon our earlier conversation this morning.

Earlier this morning Senator CLARK raised the point in regard to how much, after all, should the States do about these matters, and I think we shared the point of view that the States should do all they possibly can.

Mr. ELLINGSTON. Pushed to the very limit; yes, sir.

Senator MORSE. Is it your opinion that the Federal Government also has a share of responsibility in regard to facing this problem?

Mr. ELLINGSTON. Sir, it seems to me as I have tried to analyze it, that this is really the No. 1 national problem, more so than the atomic bomb. Despite all the platitudinous repetition, our youngsters are our future, and the only way we can be destroyed is from inside. This Korean story indicates there are grave weaknesses in our social structure. The Federal Government has got to move into this field. Weaknesses in the social structure affect every youngster, so you move on delinquency in a broad attack because it helps control and improve institutions and situations from which all youngsters suffer.

Senator MORSE. Just roughly, what would be your division of funds in the hypothetical situation that Senator CLARK put this morning? Out of $5 million of Federal money, we will say that might be made available, how much of it would you spend for training and how much would you spend for research?

Mr. ELLINGSTON. Sir, I would answer that very much as Judge Long did, that at the very minimum there should be 4 to 1; there should be a minimum of $4 million for the type of training I am talking about, not demonstration projects, but pushing universities to do those things. I would personally see the whole $5 million there, but there is real value to demonstration projects properly done and related to training, so 4 to 1 at the very minimum. There should be at least $4 million for training out of $5 million.

Senator MORSE. Having heard your entire testimony, I want to thank you very much for what I think will prove to be, along with Judge Long's testimony this morning, a very, very valuable contribution to our executive discussions.

Senator CLARK. First, let me address my expression of thanks to you, Senator MORSE, for being chairman while I was called to two other committee meetings.

I have leafed through your testimony and heard the last part of it, Mr. Ellingston. I would like to share the commendation which Senator MORSE has given you for being an extremely helpful and useful witness.

I have a few specific questions I would like to ask you which I do not think will detain you long.

I note with interest the statistics which you cite in the first part of your prepared statement and they tend to agree with some testimony which I thought was shocking, and perhaps inaccurate, when given from the representative of Big Brothers Association at a hearing last week.

It was then testified that approximately 20 percent of the male population of this country would have been arrested by the time they are 18. That seemed to me to be a highly extravagant statement, but as I look at the figures in your statement, it seems to me maybe they are right.

Mr. ELLINGSTON. Would have been arrested?

Senator CLARK. Would have been arrested by the time they reach their 18th birthday.

Mr. ELLINGSTON. Of course, if you include traffic, surely. And I would guess that—California, of course, has a very difficult problem, as you know.

This is the production of our industrialization and mobility. It is all focused in California, so their situation is without question more difficult than that of any other State.

Senator CLARK. I am happy to hear it intimated that young Californians are worse than young Pennsylvanians.

Mr. ELLINGSTON. I do not think they are. I think the situation there may be one which would push the young Californian into an obvious position which the young Pennsylvanian might be in without being recognized.

Senator CLARK. In a lighter vein, you do not have any figures on Texas?

Mr. ELLINGSTON. The famous Porterfield study on Texas college students—you are familiar with that?

Senator CLARK. No; I am not.

Mr. ELLINGSTON. While I do not have the figures at hand, the study was made of some 300 college students in Texas. Taking the offenses for which youngsters in juvenile court in this particular city had been arraigned that year, everything up to homicide, the study found that every college student had been guilty of some of the offenses for which kids were in juvenile court at some time in their career, including homicide. Every college student that was included in this category had been involved in 1, and some even as many as 10, of these offenses for which kids were in juvenile court.

Senator CLARK. I would like your comment on the statistic which encourages so many people, and had encouraged me until we had these hearings—that the overwhelming proportion of our youth are fine and upstanding boys and girls and that no more than 2 or 3 percent of the total of our youth are problems in the delinquency area. This, I suppose, is a little deceptive, is it not?

Mr. ELLINGSTON. Yes, indeed. Figures for juvenile court appear——

Senator CLARK. Let me rephrase that. Referring to your prepared statement, I wonder if you could reconcile the figures to the effect that 2.35 out of every 100 children in 1957 appeared before juvenile courts with the statements which I referred to earlier that the percentage of delinquency among our youth is far higher than that statistic standing by itself would indicate.

Mr. ELLINGSTON. Sir, it is understood, of course, that the youngster gets to juvenile court usually only after he has been in very serious behavior or repeated behavior in most instances. There are exceptions.

So that 2.35 of all our youngsters in this age group in juvenile court reflects a vastly larger number of youngsters who have been arrested or not arrested. For example, a youngster in school steals money. A good visiting teacher will try to work this out, not with the police but with the family and the child, so you get a vastly greater proportion of youngsters involved in the behavior for which only some youngsters are arrested.

Senator CLARK. Not only that but these figures are not cumulative, just year by year, and any one individual might not have come before the court in one year and might the next.

Mr. ELLINGSTON. A study was made by Peter Lejins, at the University of Maryland, and his findings were that instead of 2 or 3 percent having juvenile court appearances, it ran up to 8 or 9 percent of a particular age group, considering the total period for which they were eligible for juvenile court hearings.

Senator CLARK. Let me shift to another subject—that is, to get your opinion unless you have already expressed it. If you have, say so, and I will read it in the record, as to whether any Federal legislation should require matching funds from (a) the State, or (b) the local unit of government, or (c) the private institution, as a condition for grant.

Mr. ELLINGSTON. Sir, I have not been asked that question. Initially I would say "No," provided the aids are carefully granted with this perspective of the problem in mind. I think that there are several universities which could develop a program such as Minnesota's, but which could not get a penny from their State legislatures until they had demonstrated the soundness and value of the project. If the Federal Government would make it possible for 3 or 4 years to operate a police officers' training school, for example, then the local people might take over. I think this has happened in our State. I think this year we could have gotten money for the J.O.I. because of its success over the last few years. We could not have in 1955.

Senator CLARK. How about the suggestion that your university, for example, could obtain the matching funds from a foundation grant. You said you had Ford Foundation money. If we could make the Federal Government money go twice as far, this would be desirable.

The argument has been made that you cannot expect the legislatures to put up the money. On the other hand, in an allied field of urban renewal, we have been able to find localities to put up some of the money. Perhaps this would be true for some of the larger cities if you acquired a grant—money from them as well as from the Federal Government. What is your opinion on that?

Mr. ELLINGSTON. I am convinced there should be a minimum amount of handout—localities should do the job as much as possible. I believe, in some areas Federal aid might be based on matching funds, but I believe in other areas and other projects you would not get the project launched unless you prove its soundness.

Let me give you an illustration of what I mean: In Wisconsin in the 1930's there were no such personnel as county social workers, so the Federal Government provided funds which made it possible to send a trained social worker to one of the rural counties in Wisconsin. The county supervisors said, "Nuts, this is free; we will let her stay as long as the Federal money lasts." Then the social worker turned up a family of 12 living in a one-room hut in a dirt cellar, both sexes sleeping in rags on the floor. People had known this family was in trouble, but a little publicity like this and the county commissioners said, "We need this sort of help." So they hired the worker permanently. But had you said to the county, "We will pay half of the social worker's salary if you pay half," you would not have gotten to first base.

Senator CLARK. I am pursuing the subject because Senator MORSE and I, and our colleagues on this committee, are going to be met on the floor of the Senate, if not in committee itself, witn the claim that localities and States are loafing on the job, that localities and States will say the thing is to lie down too, and get the Federal Government to pick up the tab; that we, in Congress, should not encourage this trend, but force the States and localities to pay their share.

Then at that point you get into the old argument as to whether the Federal system of taxation is progressing or regressing. You find there are a number of local areas that are not progressing as they should, but you find a number that cannot do what they should. And this is true in areas of my Commonwealth.

We have so much chronic unemployment in some local districts, that they are pretty much exhausted and in other ends of the State we have richer areas that are doing well, but could do better.

We have some kind of State equalization program but it is not as effective as it should be.

I do not know that what I said calls for any comment from you, but maybe you want to say a word.

Mr. ELLINGSTON. With respect, for example, to the training program in which I am particularly interested, would it be feasible for the Federal Government to launch a university project such as ours if it thought this makes sense, and guarantee it for 3 to 5 years with a definite understanding at the end of that time Federal aid is going to stop? If you had a really successful program, public support would insure that the local legislature would step in. This may not be realistic, but it is a way of getting more programs than you are going to get if you depend on matching funds.

Then, is it possible for the Federal Government to make grants varied by States and projects—by State and community with respect to local or State participation? Could the Federal Government give a hundred percent to one area which might be a distress area and 50 percent to another for a comparable project?

Senator CLARK. These are interesting suggestions which I think we would want to consider, and I would not want to make a categorical answer at this time. But thank you very much for the thought.

Now, to move to another area, I gather that you agree with Judge Long that training should have the first priority; and perhaps you spelled out to the extent you think desirable the kind of training you have in mind.

Mr. ELLINGSTON. I hope I did, sir.

Senator CLARK. I would not go further on that.

Now, you have mentioned the Youth Conservation Corps and that legislation is not before this subcommittee. It is, however, pending and I am on that subcommittee, although not the chairman of it.

We are looking forward to marking up the bill tomorrow, and then it will come before the full committee where Senator MORSE and I both serve.

I am wondering how you would react to this dilemma which confronts us over there: There is an apparent conflict between the thought of conservation and bringing youth into a conservation corps which will improve our national forests and forests, our State lands and the like, give an opportunity to young people who have perhaps been unable to seek employment; to get a job during the summer, perhaps, or, if they are out of school and have no job, to get a job the year round. That is one objection.

The other is to have a definite emphasis on taking young people with records of delinquency into the corps and to make it primarily a welfare project as distinguished from a conservation project.

Then the question arises, Can you do both within the same system? I would like your thinking on that.

Mr. ELLINGSTON. Sir, I would be heartily and flatfootedly against a separate facility for so-called delinquent kids. I keep trying to get across that delinquent kids are no different from your kids and mine; that the CCC had plenty of youngsters who had gotten into trouble because they did not have a penny in their pockets, and they did splendidly. They were not sent there as delinquents; they were kids who needed jobs. These are the kids who are hurt worst, the fringe kids, the 16- or 17-year-old who does not have any special skill—the school dropout.

We had, as I pointed out in this statement, 14,000 Minnesota youngsters under 20 looking for jobs and without work last March. A lot of those kids are in trouble, or will be in trouble, because they do not have jobs. I would not send them up there as delinquents. I would give these kids the thing they most need—a job of work.

Senator CLARK. If you were in charge of re-creating policies for a youth conservation corps, what would be the basic principles on which you would re-create membership in the corps?

Mr. ELLINGSTON. First, need for work—the fact that he cannot get jobs elsewhere. Two, his physical condition; he has to be able to do this kind of work. And, three, in terms of his behavior, if he had been a homosexual or a murderer, or something of that sort—sure I would say he is not for a conservation camp. But if he had been a burglar or thief or gotten into trouble related to the fact that he was on the loose and had no job, I would make no bones about taking him. I would not want it to be an institution for delinquents, but I would not keep the youngster out just because he had been in trouble; and I would want other kids that did not have any record.

Senator CLARK. On this I would agree and I think everybody else would, too. You come down to this problem of legislation. Is it desirable to try to spell out in the act, principles, standards, percentages, or should it be just left to the recruiting agent for each particular camp or each particular project to try to strike an appropriate and happy medium in terms of the local need, or is there a point at which you get so high a percentage of delinquents in the group that you prejudice the success and future of the other members of the group, so that in a sense Gresham's law takes over?

This is something I have had considerable experience with, myself in connection with integrated housing and this is perhaps a sad comment to make, but you can successfully integrate housing projects in my experience if the percentage of minority groups in any particular project is held somewhere between the 35- to 50-percent level. If you get above that, it would not work because nobody else will go into the project.

Now, this is perhaps un-American, it is perhaps unjust, but it is there and you have to deal with it. How would you comment on that?

Mr. ELLINGSTON. I would—speaking off the cuff, sir, without having given it due thought, of course—I would hesitate to have a bill spell out that no more than x percent shall have delinquency records. I would want to have it set up for the double purpose for providing indispensable employment of the most valuable kind to youngsters who do not have it, and to do the conservation work that goes with it. I would hope that any intelligent administrative agency would have discussion with Members of the Congress who are most interested, would work out an intelligent set of recruiting principles and procedures. Anybody administering one of these programs does not want it to fail, and some people would say we do not want anybody with a record. This is precisely what I hope would not be permitted.

Senator CLARK. It might in your judgment be desirable to write such a prohibition into the act, or not?

Mr. ELLINGSTON. I would think not. I am sure that the CCC legislation did not spell out standards with respect to the delinquents.

Senator CLARK. No; it did not but in those days we were not as aware of delinquency problems as we are today.

Mr. ELLINGSTON. Senator CLARK, this winter the Minnesota Legislature set up two emergency committees because the problem of employment in our States for the youngster is so serious, a House and a Senate committee, and I would like to turn over a report on them to you.

Senator CLARK. They may be filed with the record, for the information of the committee but not incorporated in the record.

(The report was retained in the subcommittee files.)

Mr. ELLINGSTON. These committees dealt with this very problem. We had a meeting of the committee members and public officials and others concerned about unemployment for youth. The question of admitting boys with a record to CCC camps came up. One participant asked, "Would you want your children to be in the camp with delinquent kids?" I suppose the answer would be to cite the Porterfield Study referred to above.

What is delinquency and who are delinquents? You do not want a homosexual or a murderer in a camp with your boy, but he is very likely not to be very different from the boy who has been caught for car theft or burglary or malicious mischief.

Senator CLARK. Thank you very much, Professor.

Senator MORSE, do you have any further questions?

Senator MORSE. No.

Senator CLARK. Thank you very much.

Judge Long, thank you very much.

Your testimony has been most interesting and helpful.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, at the full committee I was unable to prevail and became thereby a dissenting member when the vote came to report the bill. My views are set forth as minority views in the committee report which accompanies the bill.

Mr. President, because so many of the arguments I would otherwise make this afternoon I have already made in my dissenting views, I ask unanimous consent that my minority views may be printed at this point in the RECORD as a part of my speech.

There being no objection, the minority views were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MINORITY VIEWS

In consideration of S. 694, both at the hearings, and during executive session, I had been most hopeful that the bill would provide a well-rounded program which would like up to the promise of the bill's purpose, to provide the beginnings of a solution to the Nation's juvenile delinquency control problems.

The bill as reported, however, authorizes the expenditure of $5 million, not for the important purpose of training personnel so urgently needed, but for demonstration and study projects, together with the publication of materials for those interested in this field. I will, of course, concede that the bill as reported represents a step in the direction of Federal leadership that must be taken in coping with a national problem of ever-growing dimensions. I think, however, that the testimony of the witnesses, the experience of the Congress itself, and the realities of what is happening in many localities in the country, strongly demonstrate that the bill does something for what is less urgent, and does nothing for the exceedingly important problem of training.

In the 84th Congress, the Senate passed the Lehman bill, which would have provided the kind of program which I advocate. In Senate Report No. 61 of the 84th Congress at page 103 is the following quotation:

"The training of greater numbers of qualified personnel to staff prevention and treatment agencies means both expanding certain training programs and the launching of new ones. Schools of social work, law schools, sociology, and psychology departments, all provide training which partially prepares people for work in the delinquency field. Almost without exception, however, the training offered needs to be supplemented in terms of content and, in some instances, in methodology to qualify personnel for certain functions within the field.

"For still other positions such as that of institutional house parents or, in the vast majority of States, of juvenile police officers, there are no resources for training. Many institutions and police departments attempt to provide some on-the-job training and orientation, and although such training is valuable, it is no substitute for the intensive and comprehensive training needed for persons charged with the crucial task of protecting and rehabilitating children in trouble.

"To remove the bottleneck to improving the Nation's attack upon juvenile delinquency imposed by the lack of trained and qualified personnel to man its defenses, the subcommittee recommends the establishment of a program to be administered by the Children's Bureau under which grants would be made to States, selected educational institutions, and students to extend, establish, and further the training of personnel for work in the prevention and treatment of juvenile delinquency."

I think this excerpt speaks for itself, and is as true today as it was then.

At the hearings, nearly all of the witnesses made reference to the fact that there was a serious need for trained personnel. While projects will be helpful, it will require trained people to man such projects. On the last day of the hearings the committee was honored by two witnesses who had special qualifications in the field of juvenile delinquency. The first was the Honorable Donald E. Long, presiding judge of the court of domestic relations and juvenile court in Portland, Oreg., and a man whose public service demonstrates his authority to speak on this problem. Judge Long made the following statements:

"In my opinion the training provision in the Green bill and in the other Senate bills is much more important than the provisions of providing for development of techniques and demonstrations. We have a severe lack of qualified personnel in the United States dealing with these problems. We need to do something about the need. If I had my way and had $5 million a year, to be realistic I would spend $4 million in training and I would spend $1 million in developing of techniques and demonstration."

The second of these eminent experts was John R. Ellingston, professor of criminal law administration at the University of Minnesota and director of the training program in delinquency control at that university. Professor Ellingston has been most active throughout the country in his field. He made the point that after teaching parents and teachers about the whys of children's behavior "there is another large group of people whose need for education in human motivation and behavior is immediate and urgent and who, once educated, can provide a leaven to spread understanding throughout our society. I mean all those jobs in one way or another give them control over delinquent children—policemen, probation officers, judges, county training school staffs, parole agents, visiting nurses. Since most chronic delinquency and other maladjustment stems from a failure in person-to-person relationships, treatment and rehabilitation has to be a function of person-to-person relationships. People are all important in rehabilitation. Consequently, the selection and training of all personnel who deal with delinquent children becomes indispensable to rehabilitation and prevention. Only as each of them gets understanding of themselves and of the forces that make them behave as they do are they likely to be effective in changing the attitudes and behavior of delinquent children. This is the group with which education in the dynamics of human behavior must begin. To stimulate and facilitate the teaching of this group seems to me to offer the greatest opportunity in this area to the Congress."

I asked Professor Ellingston if he had the $5 million contemplated by this bill how he would spend it. His answer was as follows:

"Sir, I would answer that very much as Judge Long did, that at the very minimum there should be 4 to 1; there should be a minimum of $4 million for the type of training I am talking about, not demonstration projects, but pushing universities to do those things. I would personally see the whole $5 million there, but there is real value to demonstration projects properly done and related to training, so 4 to 1 at the very minimum. There should be at least $4 million for training out of $5 million."

On April 18, 1959, the advisory council of judges to the National Probation and Parole Association held its meeting in New Orleans. The several bills before the Congress were on the agenda for study and discussion by the council. This discussion brought out the unanimous opinions that the two greatest needs for Federal assistance are for training of personnel and for research. It was, however, the unanimous vote of those in attendance that the training of personnel was the most preferable and, therefore, should have priority. The 16 judges who participated in this discussion included the following top authorities in the juvenile field:

Paul W. Alexander (chairman), division of domestic relations and juvenile court, court of common pleas, Toledo, Ohio.

Walter H. Beckhan, juvenile and domestic relations court, Miami, Fla.

Charles O. Betts, district court, county courthouse, Austin, Tex.

Leo B. Blessing, juvenile court, parish of Orleans, New Orleans, La.

John J. Connelly, Boston juvenile court, Boston, Mass.

Harold N. Fields, Marion County juvenile court, Indianapolis, Ind.

Thomas D. Gill, juvenile court for the State of Connecticut, Hartford, Conn.

Theodore B. Knudson, district court of Minnesota, family court division, Minneapolis, Minn.

Donald E. Long, circuit court of Oregon, courthouse, Portland, Oreg.

William B. McKesson, district attorney, Los Angeles County, Los Angeles, Calif.

Frank W. Nicholas, division of domestic relations and juvenile court, court of common pleas, Dayton, Ohio.

Donald A. Odell, juvenile court, Los Angeles County, Los Angeles, Calif.

Monroe J. Paxman, juvenile court, Provo, Utah.

Joe W. Sanders, family court for the parish of East Baton Rouge, Baton Rouge, La.

W. W. Woolfolk, Fulton County juvenile court, Atlanta, Ga.

Victor B. Wylegala, Erie County children's court, Buffalo, N.Y.

Dorothy Young, juvenile court of Tulsa County, Tulsa, Okla.

I have examined the hearings conducted by the Subcommittee on Education and Labor in the House of Representatives held during March of 1959. These hearings also effectively demonstrate the need of training. I consider that the points made by the questioning of Congresswoman EDITH GREEN during those hearings are irrefutable. In many counties in the United States with serious juvenile delinquency problems, there is not a single parole officer, policeman, or social worker with knowledge or training in the juvenile delinquency field, and most States have no training facilities whatsoever in this field.

I think one point needs to be made so that the reason for my dissent is clear; if it were true, as my colleagues in favor of the bill believe, that this bill was a beginning of Federal leadership, I would vote in favor of the bill even though it was not everything I believed necessary. But I do not think this is a beginning; I think instead that passing this bill will lull the public into a false sense of believing that the Federal Government will have accomplished something, when in fact the need for training will be left to an uncertain future.

For these reasons, briefly set forth, I, therefore, find myself unable in good conscience to support a program for which the necessary foundation is being neglected.

WAYNE MORSE.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, these views support my amendment, which is drawn in substantially the same language as that found in the bill reported by the subcommittee. I am pleased to support the amendment.

Mr. President, I again congratulate the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLARK] and the Senator from Alabama [Mr. HILL] for their decision to recommend to the Senate at this time the amendment which is now pending before the Senate.

I listened with great interest this afternoon to the Senator from Ohio [Mr. LAUSCHE] when he discussed the matter of Federal participation in the program.

I desire to make two points, Mr. President.

First, this is an aid program. It is really a pilot project program. This is a program of assistance to the States and to the municipalities. This is not a program which by the broadest stretch of the imagination entails any plans by the Federal Government to take over the juvenile delinquency problems of the country. However, it is a program whereby the Federal Government will step in, project by project as approved by the council which is to be set up under the jurisdiction of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, to consider specific training project proposals which will come to the council from the various States or municipalities. It is a program designed to assist in demonstrating to the rest of the country the kind of training program which ought to be developed at the local level so as to provide the trained personnel necessary to prevent juvenile crime, in the first place, and to rehabilitate the wayward, in the second place. We need to keep that in mind. It is consistent with a good many of our Federal assistance or aid programs.

Second, I wish to point out, as the Senator from New York [Mr. JAVITS] indicated, that there is a Federal responsibility in this field. However, until we pursue a study of the types of crimes which are committed by juvenile delinquents we cannot fully understand the extent to which there is a Federal interest, because much of their malbehavior takes the form of violations of Federal law. Some of these are the most heinous of crimes committed by youngsters, and the Federal Government does have a jurisdiction or responsibility in connection with them.

Therefore, I think a responsibility to assist the States and the municipalities with the kind of a pilot project program to which I referred does exist.

Mr. President, I was very much interested in what the Senator from Ohio [Mr. LAUSCHE] said in respect to his views as to Ohio's interests, for example. I should like to invite attention to the fact that on April 18, 1959, the advisory council of judges to the National Probation and Parole Association held its meeting in New Orleans. The several bills before the Congress were on the agenda for study and discussion by the council. This discussion brought out the unanimous opinions that the two greatest needs for Federal assistance are for training of personnel and for research. It was, however, the unanimous vote of those in attendance that the training of personnel was the most preferable and, therefore, should have priority.

The 16 judges who participated in this discussion included the top authorities in the juvenile field in America I shall mention. I should like to have the Senator from Ohio take note of the fact that Paul W. Alexander was the chairman of this group. He is the judge of the Division of Domestic Relations and Juvenile Court, Court of Common Pleas, Toledo, Ohio. The chairman of this group of distinguished judges of America, which held this conference and submitted a unanimous recommendation that the training program should be given priority, was a distinguished judge from the State of Ohio. Among those who participated was Walter H. Beckham, juvenile and domestic relations court, Miami, Fla.

I shall read the names of others, because Senators will find among them a good many southern judges, who recognize the national responsibility, the Federal responsibility, in this field. These judges made a unanimous recommendation that a training program should be given priority.

Charles O. Betts, district court, county courthouse, Austin, Tex.

Leo B. Blessing, juvenile court, parish of Orleans, New Orleans, La.

John J. Connelly, Boston juvenile court, Boston, Mass.

Harold N. Fields, Marion County juvenile court, Indianapolis, Ind.

Thomas D. Gill, Juvenile Court for the State of Connecticut, Hartford, Conn.

Theodore B. Knudson, District Court of Minnesota, family court division, Minneapolis, Minn.

Donald E. Long, Circuit Court of Oregon, Courthouse, Portland, Oreg.

William B. McKesson, district attorney, Los Angeles County, Los Angeles, Calif.

Frank W. Nicholas, division of domestic relations and juvenile court, court of common pleas, Dayton, Ohio.

That is a second Ohio judge who concurred in the recommendation in support of giving priority consideration to a training program.

Donald A. Odell, juvenile court, Los Angeles County, Los Angeles, Calif.

Monroe J. Paxman, juvenile court, Provo, Utah.

Joe W. Sanders, family court for the parish of East Baton Rouge, Baton Rouge, La.

W. W. Woolfolk, Fulton County juvenile court, Atlanta, Ga.

Victor B. Wylegala, Erie County children's court, Buffalo, N.Y.

Dorothy Young, juvenile court of Tulsa County, Tulsa, Okla.

Mr. YARBOROUGH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MORSE. I yield to the Senator from Texas.

Mr. YARBOROUGH. Mr. President, I note that the distinguished Senator from Oregon, in reading the list of judges, read the name of Judge Charles O. Betts, district court county courthouse, Austin, Tex.

Under the laws of our State and of that county the district judges are automatically members of the juvenile court of that county. I was once associated very closely with Judge Betts in a governmental activity there. I was once a district judge of that county and a member of the juvenile court.

Since Judge Betts' name was read, I wish to pay tribute to his fine judicial ability and to his great interest in the problem of juvenile delinquency. Judge Betts spent over 12 years of work and effort on that problem. He has put forth great energy and research in regard to it. He is one of the dedicated and devoted men of our area. I thank the distinguished Senator from Oregon for mentioning Judge Betts' name in this connection.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Texas very much for the contribution he has made to my discussion. The Senator has pointed up a fact which I wish to reemphasize; namely, I have presented to the Senate, in this list of juvenile judges, a group from the South, from the North, from the East, and from the West—from all sections of our country—who are recognized as experts in this field, as persons who are highly qualified by professional training, experience, and knowledge to make a recommendation to the people of the country as to the steps which should be taken at least to try to alleviate the very serious juvenile crime problem which confronts us.

As a lawyer by training, I know the importance of following where the experts lead. When the experts can substantiate their findings and their recommendations by a reference to the evidence and to the facts, they should be followed. One only has to take a look at the records of our hearings, one only has to look at the voluminous writings in the field of juvenile delinquency, to know that the experts are correct. Therefore, it seems to me that the Senate of the United States should let the facts prevail when it acts on the amendment. The facts are on the side of the amendment.

I make one last point, Mr. President. We have an obligation to the children and to the parents of the children and to the rest of our citizenry who are affected by their misbehavior, to do what we can cooperatively with the States and the municipalities to try to find ways of solving the serious problem of juvenile delinquency which confronts us.

Mr. President, the argument I now make has some weakness, and I offer it only because I think it also has some application.

I wish to point out, Mr. President, that there is a relatively small amount of money proposed in the bill by way of Federal assistance to the States and to the municipalities in a program of juvenile delinquency control. A total of $5 million is provided, and only a part of it is to be spent for a training program under the amendment. But let the record be clear, that under the foreign aid program we are appropriating for several countries much more than this sum, by way of assistance to those countries in solving their social problems and their problems of crime control.

I think the American people have a right to ask the Congress of the United States the question, "Do we not also have an obligation to come to the assistance of our own people with at least this relatively small amount of money?"

This money will be used to set up what I call the pilot plant training programs in the field of juvenile delinquency, which will be of great assistance to the States and to the municipalities in subsequently developing their own programs for the training of personnel necessary to handle their juvenile delinquency problems. It is a sound amendment, and I urge its adoption.

Mr. YARBOROUGH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CLARK. I yield to my friend from Texas.

Mr. YARBOROUGH. Mr. President, I rise to ask the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania a question. First, I desire to express my appreciation to the distinguished Senator from Oregon for his able presentation of the pending amendment, and to concur in the recommendation which he makes, that training be included in the bill. Let me inquire whether or not it is too late for my name to be added as a cosponsor of the amendment.

Mr. MORSE. The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLARK] is the author of the amendment. I suppose it is too late to have the Senator's name printed on the amendment, but it is not too late for the record to be perfectly clear that this very worthwhile assistance from Texas is coming to the cosponsors of the amendment.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the name of the distinguished Senator from Texas may be added as a cosponsor of the pending amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. YARBOROUGH. Mr. President, I am grateful to the Senator from Pennsylvania for permitting me to join in sponsoring his amendment. I think it is one of the most important and worthwhile amendments I have heard at this session of Congress.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLARK] to the committee amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, what the pending bill does is first to establish a Federal policy. When we establish a Federal policy, it means "from here on out." I once saw a fellow in the calaboose in my town. It was a warm day, and the doors were open, with the exception of the bars. He saw me striding by, and he said, "Hi." I said, "Hi; how are you? What are you in here for?" He said, "I don't know."

I said, "How long are you in there for?" He said, "From now on."

If we venture into this field, we shall be there from now on, because very definitely the language of the bill would establish a Federal policy.

There is a finding stated in the bill:

The Congress hereby finds and declares that juvenile delinquency diminishes the strength and vitality of the people of our Nation.

Then we find the following:

The policy of the Federal Government shall be to assist in the prevention, control, and treatment of juvenile delinquency.

It does not say the policy for today or tomorrow. It does not say the policy for a year or 5 years. It says:

The policy of the Federal Government shall be to assist in the prevention, control, and treatment of juvenile delinquency.

Anyone who has had experience in this field knows that when this venture is made, it will snowball, as all such programs do, and it will be here from now on.

Secondly, this is a 5-year program. It would call for not to exceed $5 million a year, or a total of $25 million; and there is no question in my mind that the $25 million would be expended, even though the language is "not to exceed $5 million, as Congress shall determine."

Then the purposes of the program are stated—first, to develop improved methods; second, training techniques; third, prevention, control, and treatment; fourth, grants or contracts.

Such grants or contracts may be made to States or cities, public and private nonprofit agencies, schools, and so forth. The only matching provision is to the extent the Secretary deems appropriate. The Secretary may not require any matching at all in connection with a program of this kind, or he may require matching in part. So this could be a completely Federal program if the States were rather reluctant and refused to advance any money for this purpose.

Finally, the bill would establish a council of 12 to pass on projects, and also initiate projects. So the advisory council of 12 would not only approve projects, but it could come forward with projects of its own.

I am free to admit that juvenile delinquency is a problem. There has been testimony on that point before the subcommittee of the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, and we have had testimony before a Judiciary Subcommittee for the past 6 years. That committee is still being continued. At present there is pending before the Committee on Rules and Administration a request for $150,000 for a continuation of the work of the Subcommittee on Juvenile Delinquency of the Committee on the Judiciary.

It seems to me that this whole business is frightfully vague, and certainly amorphous. If I must adduce any testimony, I take it from the committee report. One of the witnesses was Clifford J. Campbell, representing the American Municipal Association. The majority report quotes him, and I read the quotation into the RECORD, as follows:

We believe there are untapped resources of ingenuity deserving encouragement, as do many already pioneered innovations.

That is very fine language, but frightfully vague.

Mr. Campbell continues:

We believe they merit not only encouragement but close examination, careful testing, and evaluation, from which process we may confidently expect emergence of fruitful results deserving of dissemination and emulation.

That sounds very beautiful, but it is still in the domain of vagueness.

Mr. Campbell continues:

Thus we believe the Federal Government can, by such a step as Senate bill 694 contemplates, help add to the arsenal of all cities and local communities tried and tested weapons for the war against juvenile crime, which is, even more importantly, a battle for salvation of souls and minds and bodies of our young people, our most priceless national resource.

No one can quarrel with that. They are the priceless resources of our country, and they should be conserved. But our problem is how effectively to conserve them, without establishing another policy or another program of such far-reaching dimensions that, in due course, from it will spring another flowering bureaucracy, which must extend its functions, its duties, and its authority from the Nation's Capital into the 50 States and their respective communities.

If I need cite further testimony on this subject, I refer to the majority report again. Among the witnesses was Mr. Ralph Whelan, commissioner of youth services, New York City, and a board member of the National Conference of Catholic Charities. This is what Mr. Whelan said:

We have come a long way in developing skills for working with children, families, and communities who recognize their problems, who seek help and are willing to participate in planning for themselves. I must reiterate the fact, however, that we know too little at this point in relation to what kind of skills and training are necessary to meet the needs of those who present the most serious problems in the community in relation to delinquency and crime among youth, and yet do not seek help on a voluntary basis.

I think that is very fine. I can subscribe to that rather wonderful philosophic sentiment, but here, of course, we are dealing with methods. The question is, Should we go back to the communities where this problem really exists, rather than establish another institution of Government that will snowball and grow?

The majority report is candid enough to put its finger upon the real case for juvenile delinquency, as to methods and locale, and where the effective job must be done. On page 4 of the report there is this very succinct summation of what I think is the approach:

The front line of defense in meeting the problem of juvenile delinquency is the local community, for troubled youth must be reached in person—in their homes, their churches, their schools.

That is the heart of the problem. This is a personal problem. We are dealing with flesh and blood, and we must deal with it at the grassroots level, in the homes, in the churches, and in the schools.

Now comes a proposal that the long arm of the Federal Government reach in, ostensibly with money, for a 5-year period, but with studies, and the annexation of experts in order to develop a program, if they can. That looks pretty much like a fishing expedition.

However, I make the point that a 5-year fishing expedition for techniques, at a cost of not to exceed $25 million, which will snowball and become a part of Federal policy, and from here on will become at once a very expensive venture and a very expensive expedition for what it is likely to accomplish.

I make the further point that of the witnesses who appeared before the subcommittee—some 20 in number—15 were from 9 States. What about the other States? Were they not interested? Were they not sufficiently interested to send representatives here to testify on juvenile delinquency problems? Have they solved them at their own level? Have they done the job in that field? Where were they? Five of the witnesses came from the State of New York?

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. MORSE. I believe the Senator should bear in mind, however, that some of the witnesses, represented large groups of experts in this field, from various juvenile delinquency associations and crime commissions and State organizations which have worked for years and years in this case. So, Mr. President, while I agree with the Senator on his statistics, I should say that the statistics are subject to the interpretation that I now state and to the application which I suggest; namely, that those witnesses represented a large body of opinion in this country.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Oh, I am quite sensible of that fact. However, I say that the States themselves, through their own spokesmen, if they had that kind of interest, would have had someone appear before the subcommittee. The fact is that 15 of the 20 witnesses came from 9 States. I am content to let the figures stand and speak for themselves, because in my judgment they are quite eloquent.

I make another point. The bill contains no allocation of funds. To be sure, the amendment which was approved a short time ago divides the fund in half, as between projects and training. However, what I say about the allocation of funds is that all the funds are to be expended within the discretion of the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare. He can put as much in one State as he likes, and as much or as little in another State as he likes. Normally and in nearly every case where projects of this kind are authorized, there is always some kind of formula for allocation, some kind of guarantee that there will be a fair and equitable distribution of funds. Such a provision does not appear in this bill.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. MORSE. I do not believe the Senator from Illinois means to imply that the decision will be made entirely by the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare, acting without reference to anyone else. The procedure will provide for the establishment of a council.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I understand that.

Mr. MORSE. The council will be very representative of the workers in this field. Projects will be presented to the council, and the council will make recommendations. I believe we can take judicial notice of the fact that no Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare will act in a vacuum. He will clearly follow the recommendations of the council.

Mr. DIRKSEN. There is no inhibition on the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare contained in the bill as to whether he has the authority to make an allocation, because the language in the very first title of the bill states:

> The Secretary may make such grants to States and municipalities and to other public and private nonprofit agencies, including institutions of higher learning and research.

It requires no matching. It merely refers to "grant recipient" and provides:

> The Secretary shall require each grant recipient to contribute money, facilities, or services to the extent the Secretary deems appropriate.

The Secretary may deem that no grant of money is appropriate, that no matching and no supplying of facilities are appropriate.

If that is the case, then we have no matching at all in the bill. Previously, most of these programs have always provided for a matching basis.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. MORSE. I think the very fact that the bill does not so provide is a strong point in its favor, and is to be commended, because there could be such a serious juvenile delinquency problem in a certain area where there is a lack of funds, that this discretionary power ought to exist, so that the Secretary can step into the picture and provide some assistance.

I wish to stress the point that the bill does provide that the Secretary shall have the advantage of the suggestions and recommendations of experts in this field.

Mr. DIRKSEN. We might just as well nail that down now as later. The bill provides:

> Before any grant or contract is made under title I, the council shall review the project involved and shall submit its recommendation thereon to the Secretary.

It does not inhibit the Secretary from making the decision. In fact, the decision is reposed in the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare. The council can make its recommendation, and at that point the recommendation ends.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. MORSE. That is exactly what I have tried to point out, that the council will pass on the individual projects. The council will make its recommendations to the Secretary. I have said before, as I believe the RECORD will show, in effect, that I am perfectly well satisfied that no Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare will fly in the face of recommendations which have been supported by the council. The council will be of great assistance. We know when this kind of procedure is adopted, the Secretary's opinion will have to be fully justified before he will veto the recommendation of the council.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I only know from experience that when in the past we have set up programs of this kind it has always been the policy of Congress to nail them down and to provide for an equitable distribution of the funds. Under this bill, however, it is discretionary. The power of the council is only recommendatory. As a result, here is what could be a $25 million fund over a 5-year period, very vague as to projects, with nothing definite, and in the nature of a fishing expedition for what it is thought might come from an approach of this kind.

The fact of the matter is there have been programs in this field for quite a long time.

First of all, there is the Russell Sage Foundation. It issued a report the other day. It entered the entire delinquency field, including the training of personnel.

Then there is the Ford Foundation. In 1958 the foundation made awards totaling $1,700,000. In 1959 it made awards totaling $1,800,000. There is a variety of schools and institutions which have worked in this field.

Then I point out, of course, that the American Academy of Political and Social Science has done some work in this area and has called attention to various projects which have been in being. There is one in Illinois, known as the Illinois Institute for Juvenile Research. There is also the Chicago area project. There was the behavior research fund. Then there was the south central youth program, which was initiated in Minneapolis, Minn. The interesting thing about the latter program is that the financing of the project was in itself an unusual example of joint community effort. The money came from local foundations: the community chest, women's clubs, the junior chamber of commerce, and a group of women employees in one of the largest industries of the city.

That city, of course, was Minneapolis, Minn.

Other programs were covered and evaluated by the academy, including a work camp program for potential delinquents, in Newark, N.J.; delinquency prevention through improved parent-child relations; a project for all-day neighborhood schools in New York City; the effectiveness of a boys' club in reducing delinquency in Louisville, Ky.; and projects relating to preventive work with street-corner groups in Boston and Chicago.

All these projects were financed without Federal assistance. So let it not be said that a great deal of work has not been done in this field.

Finally, Mr. President, I should like to point out that the Committee on the Judiciary, in its first regular meeting has approved $150,000 for the Subcommittee on Juvenile Delinquency, to continue its study. The chairman of the Committee on Rules and Administration is also the chairman of the subcommittee which investigates juvenile delinquency problems. All he has to do is to consult with himself in order to approve the expenditure of $150,000, and then this work will go on.

The interesting thing about that is that the program has been in being for nearly 7 years. I remember when it was created by the Committee on the Judiciary in 1953. The very distinguished former Senator from New Jersey, Mr. Hendrickson, was the ranking minority member on that committee. When it was created, we said it was to "conduct a full and complete study of juvenile delinquency in the United States." The subcommittee was named, and for 6 years hearings have been held on such subjects as institutions for rehabilitation and treatment, interstate adoption practices, forestry camps, runaway children, and narcotic addicts.

Reports have been prepared on various special problems affecting juvenile delinquency, including youth employment, comic books, television, motion pictures, and pornography. Thus far, the subcommittee has spent $730,000 on these investigations, together with the pending request for $150,000 for the 2d session of the 86th Congress.

How far are we to go in this matter? I am not insensible of the problem, but I say that the committee was right when it said that the front line of defense against juvenile delinquency is back at the grassroots, in the homes, in the churches, and in the schools.

I propose to keep this thing within due bounds, so that it does not get out of hand. To that effect, I submit amendments. I shall ask unanimous consent to submit the amendments en bloc; and if the Senator from Pennsylvania has a copy of the bill before him and will follow me for a moment, I will tell him what the amendments are.

On page 7, line 10, I propose to strike out "a year" and insert in lieu thereof "years"—in the plural—so that the phrase will read "fiscal years."

I propose to change the date to "June 30, 1961, and June 30, 1962." That, Mr. President, would make this a 2-year program instead of a 5-year program. I propose to strike out in line 11 "$5,000,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$1,000,000," and strike out the rest of line 12.

The net result of my amendment would be to make the program a 2-year program at a cost of $1 million a year.

I think that is enough for an exploratory effort such as this. Then, if we are on the wrong track, and if it appears that this is going to be a snowballing program, on which large sums of money will have to be expended in the future, we will have the time in which to draw back before we get into difficulties.

I have seen programs of this kind grow, and I would not be surprised, if the bill is enacted into law or in the form in which it appears today, that in the years to come we could count on this developing into a vast program which, in my considered judgment, knowing how expenditures grow under the gentle nurturings of Congress, may well reach $100 million in due course.

I therefore submit the amendments and ask that they be stated. I ask unanimous consent that the amendments be considered en bloc. I think it is clear now to all that my proposal would make this a 2-year program and would reduce the amount from $5 million to $1 million.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendments will be stated for the information of the Senate.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. In the committee amendment on page 7, line 10, it is proposed to strike out "year" and insert in lieu thereof "years" and to strike out "1960" and insert "1961, and June 30, 1962."

To strike out all of line 11; on line 12 to strike out "$5,000,000, as the Congress may determine" and insert in lieu thereof "$1,000,000."

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I hope the amendments will be rejected. To cut down the program to 2 years, and to reduce the amount involved to $1 million, would curtail the program and would to a great extent emasculate the bill.

The interesting thing for Senators to note, I believe, is that the amount of $5 million was fixed by the committee when the bill was reported, with the thought that this sum would be satisfactory to both the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, and the Bureau of the Budget. It is a fact that the Bureau of the Budget raises no objection to an appropriation in this amount and the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare has favored this sum. Therefore, the influential agencies of the Eisenhower administration support the amount of money in the bill. I hope the amendments will be rejected.

Mr. President, I wonder if I may have the attention of the distinguished Senator from New York [Mr. JAVITS] for a moment, to ask him whether he would withhold his request for recognition until we can have a vote on the amendment.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, in view of the fact that I shall speak to the amendment, I should like to be recognized.

I understood the Senator from Michigan [Mr. HART] would seek recognition. At this time I do not see him in the Chamber. If he comes in, I will, of course, yield to him. But I do not wish to forgo an opportunity in which to speak to another matter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York has the floor.

(Mr. JAVITS addressed the Senate on the subject of United States-Cuban relations. On his request and by unanimous consent, his remarks were ordered to be printed in the RECORD following the debate on the juvenile delinquency bill.)

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I address myself now to the amendment offered by the leader on the minority side [Mr. DIRKSEN], with which amendment I am not in agreement. I feel, with deep sincerity, we should let the bill pass as it has been amended. I think it is the minimal approach we can take to this national problem.

Mr. President, I shall not detain the Senate more than 6 or 7 minutes to explain why. I have actually acted as the law enforcement officer of the largest State of the Union and have personally dealt with this problem. It is not a local problem; it is a national problem.

Some people always have an idea that juvenile delinquency is a problem which is confined only to the large cities, and it is especially to those that I would like to point out that the increase in juvenile delinquency has not been confined to New York City or to any other urban area. Nationally, for example, juvenile delinquency has risen 8 percent faster in nonurban than in urban areas since 1948.

Secondly, what we are proposing today is minuscule. Five million dollars a year is a fraction of what New York alone spends in dealing with the problem. When we take into consideration the amounts spent by all the States, that amount is meaningless in terms of actual money.

What the bill does represent—and this is important—is an effort on the part of the U.S. Government, with an expenditure of a minimal amount of money, to lend its leadership in dealing with the juvenile delinquency problem.

Let it be understood that this amount represents only an acknowledgment by the United States that it is a national problem, involving participation by the United States, on a minimal basis, in order to lend the whole issue the dignity, the prestige, and the facilities which represent the Federal Government. I believe very deeply the bill is absolutely essential if the States or the Nation are in any way to get on top of the problem.

I understand very clearly that the first line of defense is in the homes, the schools, and the churches; but again this is a matter of tens of thousands, and perhaps even millions, of people, and not only $5 million, but hundreds of millions of dollars for this frontline of defense, and by this bill we are seeking a method of operating.

Secondly, to say there have been reports by the Subcommittee on Juvenile Delinquency is not an answer. Those reports are not actual working in the field in connection with laboratory experiments which can be made available to everybody in the United States; and what is proposed by this bill is actual field experiments.

I will give to you, Mr. President, and to the Senate a specific instance to indicate why there is no other way unless the U.S. Government does it. The first is the element of Federal crime and interstate activity, which is one of the typical examples of what goes on in this whole field. In other words, it is not merely the money the Federal Government will spend; it is the fact that the facilities of the Federal Government in the field of narcotics, the FBI, the Department of Justice, the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, the Interior Department, the State Department—every Department of Government—will be made available to the States. What this bill does is to take the Federal Government into the field.

Secondly, and very importantly, a great many of these crimes are tried in the Federal courts, because many crimes against Federal law are involved. I point out that one of the main problems of juvenile delinquency—and again I refer to my own experience in law enforcement—is that of recidivism, which is the constant repetition of offenses.

When we speak in terms of a million arrests, we are not speaking in terms of 1 million young people. We are speaking in terms of a million times offenders are arrested. That is the geometric progression in crime which is causing a problem which is inundating us. It is a national disgrace which, as we all know, is availed of in Moscow, Peiping, and a dozen other countries, to show that this is a lawless country where parents cannot control their children.

What can the Federal Government do with the $5 million but lend its prestige, dignity, and facilities to the solving of this problem? First and foremost, the Federal Government can deal with preventing the occurrence in an unparalleled way of recidivism—which is the repetition of crimes—because the Federal Government has many agencies on which it can call, and also because of its experience in the Federal courts.

I have previously suggested the idea of defenders for youth in the Federal courts. Many of these young people lose their respect for the law, and, indeed, for organized society, because they are not properly represented in court when they are charged with crime. Also, there is a lack of adequately trained probation officers, caseworkers, and other persons to look after the cases which already exist; and that fact contributes to the problem of recidivism. And so in this one field a tremendous contribution can be made by the Federal Government.

Then there is the problem of narcotics addiction, which is a serious problem for young people. There are practically no facilities for treating young addicts. We tried one in the State of New York. It is very meager in terms of its effect and in terms of coverage which we can give. Narcotics is peculiarly a problem within the jurisdiction of the Federal Government.

Then there is the problem of the hard-core families, that is, families in which there are difficulties in parental responsibility, and which are the seedbed for a tremendous amount of juvenile delinquency. It is estimated that in New York City as few as 20,000 families are responsible for more than 50 percent of the juvenile delinquency which occurs in New York City. Here is an acute problem to the solution of which the Federal Government can enormously contribute, because the Federal Government is heavily in the welfare field and in the field of taking care of dependent children and the fields which impinge upon the technique of care and the amount of care which is utilized for hard-core families.

Finally, Mr. President, there is the matter of advance detection. Here again there is the tremendous machinery of which the Federal Government can avail itself in experiments, such as the National Institutes of Health, which can be markedly beneficial and can make a major contribution to the science in the field of anticipating crime in those of tender years.

Mr. President, why is $1 million for 2 years inadequate? Even for a token program, when one considers the overhead and the time lag in getting such a program into operation, the $1 million will have been spent and the 2 years will have gone.

I know the amendment has behind it the laudable intentions of my leader, and I regret to oppose my colleague, who I know has sincere intentions. But I respectfully submit that the result of adoption of his amendment would be to eliminate the program entirely, because any minimal program, no matter how small or inadequate, will take $1 million in overhead cost and will take a minimum of 1 or 2 years to get off the ground. The $5 million provided in the bill and the 5-year period provided already cut the program to a minimum, and a further reduction will either make it a laughing stock or kill it altogether.

If the Senator sincerely believes that the Federal Government can exercise some beneficial influence in lending its prestige, dignity, and facilities to this field, then I think at the minimum the Senate should pass this bill.

Mr. President, I do not think we have adequately emphasized the coordinating activity of the Federal Government and the experience it has had in many States. By getting the Federal Government into the field with its established machinery, we get the benefit of coordinated activities which have been and are taking place in many States.

I hope the Senate in its wisdom will pass the bill as we have amended it and will reject—and I say this regretfully—the amendment which has been proposed by the minority leader to cut the period of time to 2 years and the amount of money to $1 million.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing en bloc to the amendments of the Senator from Illinois.

The amendments were rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment, as amended.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

Mr. CARROLL. Mr. President, I rise in support of this important piece of proposed legislation which would provide assistance in training of personnel and development of projects to combat juvenile delinquency.

When I was home in Colorado a few months ago literally hundreds of people talked to me about the problems which are being raised by juvenile delinquency. The interest of the public has been stimulated among church groups, educational groups, and PTA groups.

Mr. President, I have in my hand a letter from the department of welfare, city and county of Denver, written by the director, Miss Charline J. Berkins, which I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DENVER DEPARTMENT OF WELFARE,
CITY AND COUNTY OF DENVER,
Denver, Colo., March 19, 1959.

Hon. JOHN A. CARROLL,
U.S. Senate, Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs, Washington, D.C.

MY DEAR SENATOR CARROLL: We were very pleased to receive your letter of February 7 enclosing a statement regarding the bills introduced into our Congress which will help combat juvenile delinquency. We are also very proud to have someone from Colorado on the Subcommittee on Juvenile Delinquency which we, of course, consider a very important one.

We certainly give you full support regarding the bills you have mentioned in your statement. As a matter of fact, we have just received a brochure regarding the "juvenile delinquency control projects" bill (Hill-Clark bill, S. 694, and Elliott bill, H.R. 3464). We wish to suggest your support of this bill, also. We, too, are convinced that more must be done at the local level to deal in an increasingly effective way with young people who are in conflict with the law and in the prevention of delinquency through service to families while children are young. Perhaps one of the greatest benefits of the program suggested by this bill would be the help to get localities started in coping with the problem of delinquency, stepping up the program in localities where a beginning has taken place, and then disseminating the information about the results of these projects.

However, SENATOR CARROLL, in order to accomplish what we all desire—the control of and the prevention of juvenile delinquency—we must have trained personnel in much greater numbers. A revision was made in the Social Security Act allowing for training and research, but it is my understanding that at no time has an appropriation been made for this. You will find this revision in the Social Security Act in section 705 of the compilation of social security laws through December 31, 1956, which is Senate Document 156; or, you can find the same reference under the title of "Training Grants for Public Welfare Personnel," H.R. 7225, 2d session in Public Law 880, chapter 836, 84th Congress.

Any assistance that you can give us in obtaining stipend funds for the graduate training of child welfare and public assistance workers and others who will be dealing directly with these young people and their families will be greatly appreciated. This would be a great step toward the control of and prevention of delinquency.

As you may know, the county departments of welfare in Colorado are charged with the responsibility of providing care and service to neglected and dependent children and to those in danger of becoming delinquent. In carrying out this charge, our work is with parents who have neglected their children, with parents who wish to place their children for adoption, with adoptive parents who are childless and who want families, with foster parents who give temporary care to these children, and with young children and with teenagers who are on the verge of trouble with the law and who frequently have a distorted view of life because of their own deprivation. These are the children who will become delinquents in the legal sense of the word if they do not receive experiences that are constructive and have loving family relationships. Working with families and children such as these is the opportunity for preventing delinquency.

It is a sad commentary, however, that there are fewer trained child welfare workers in the departments of public welfare in Colorado today than there were some years ago. Through funds from the Children's Bureau, the State Department of Public Welfare in Colorado has only four stipends annually for graduate training for social workers. The Denver Department of Welfare receives one of these annually to grant to one of our employees interested in child welfare, but we could use more. Many more trained personnel are needed to do this kind of preventive work, and we believe that this is what is truly meant by juvenile delinquency control. We hope that you will find a way to provide increased funds for the training of these essential personnel.

Sincerely yours,
Miss CHARLINE J. BIRKINS,
Director.

Mr. CARROLL. Mr. President, one of the sentences in this letter reads:

However, Senator CARROLL, in order to accomplish what we all desire—the control of and the prevention of juvenile delinquency—we must have trained personnel in much greater numbers.

Mr. President, I share the viewpoint of those who submitted minority views on a bill that we ought to emphasize to a greater degree the necessity for trained personnel. We understand we cannot achieve these things all at once, so I am going to support the bill, because it has now been modified by the Clark amendment, which I cosponsored. This amendment provides $2.5 million for the type of training called for by the city and county of Denver.

In our State we find growing interest in the question of what to do about juvenile delinquents. How are we going to treat them?

Mr. President, I am a member of the Subcommittee To Investigate Juvenile Delinquency of the Committee on the Judiciary. We held hearings in Los Angeles. We heard from the chief of police of Los Angeles and from the sheriff of Los Angeles County; from narcotics agents, from youth workers, from various interested persons.

Everywhere I went I found a great interest in the problem. People are saying, "What are we going to do about this?"

In Colorado I met with Catholic home and family leaders and other church groups, educational organizations, and law enforcement agencies.

Throughout the country there is fear expressed that we will not do anything at the Federal level, and that we must do something about getting trained personnel.

I am realistic enough to know that with the amount of money which is to be provided we are not going to be able to accomplish much at the outset, but I think it will be a beginning. I think we will have to move ahead faster in the future. We will recognize this is only a beginning.

I repeat, everywhere I have gone, every person with whom I have talked has expressed a gnawing fear about the problems of juvenile delinquency. In Colorado my staff held extended meetings with authorities on juvenile delinquency, including Judge Philip Gilliam and Mr. Melvin Hull who conduct the Denver Juvenile Hall, which has an international reputation as an outstanding juvenile institution. All of these people want our help.

In order to demonstrate that this is no small problem, I should like to quote at this point, Mr. President, a portion of a recent editorial from the Rocky Mountain News, a Scripps-Howard newspaper, which discusses the institutional needs of Colorado in dealing with juvenile offenders. The editorial leads off with this pertinent remark: "Colorado faces a major crisis in its war against juvenile delinquency."

Mr. President, there is another letter I should like to have printed in the RECORD. It is addressed to me, written by Doris K. Nelson, Chairman, Juvenile Protection, Colorado Congress of Parents and Teachers. In her letter she says:

I urge you to support in any way you can, the juvenile delinquency bills providing grants to the States for strengthening and improving programs related to Juvenile delinquency.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the letter be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

COLORADO SPRINGS, COLO.

Senator JOHN A. CARROLL,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SIR: I urge you to support in any way you can, the juvenile delinquency bills providing grants to the States for strengthening and improving programs related to juvenile delinquency.

Such legislation would be of inestimable value in our State, as Colorado, at this time, has no single agency responsible for planning and coordinating services for children; therefore, we have no constructive planning for the prevention of delinquency or the disposition of delinquents.

Study and effort has been made to establish separate juvenile courts and to improve Colorado children's laws. I believe this would be intensified under a program set up with the aid of these grants.

Colorado communities should be shown the need for special juvenile police and probation officers but training courses must be available for them as well as all other personnel dealing with children and youth. This would be possible under the provisions of the bills.

Thanking you for any effort you may make in behalf of Colorado and the Nation's young people, I am,

Yours truly,

DORIS K. NELSON,
Chairman, Juvenile Protection, Colorado Congress of Parents and Teachers.

Mr. CARROLL. Mr. President, at this time I wish to commend the distinguished senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. HILL] and my colleague the distinguished senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLARK] not only for their great interest but for their great leadership in presenting the bill.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CARROLL. I am happy to yield.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I should like to express my own deep appreciation for the very valuable assistance which the Senator from Colorado has given us in connection with the progress of this bill to date, which I hope is progress to passage. I should like to pay my testimony to the valuable work the Senator from Colorado has done in the field of juvenile delinquency in connection with his membership on the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CARROLL. I thank the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. President, I commend the chairman of the important Juvenile Delinquency Subcommittee of the Senate Committee on the Judiciary, the able and distinguished Senator from Missouri [Mr. HENNINGS], for the fine work he has done. He has held hearings not only in New York but also in Philadelphia, San Francisco, Los Angeles, San Diego, and other places. He has demonstrated great interest in this subject. The Senator from Missouri made an excellent statement on the floor today.

I see the distinguished Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE] is present in the Chamber. I read the Senator's minority views. I agree with him 100 percent that we are merely scratching the surface and the emphasis should be more and more upon training, although I am in favor of the so-called demonstrative techniques also. We need them in Colorado. We need them in the Nation.

All sections of my State and all sections of the West are interested in this problem. It is a problem which does not affect solely the populous areas of Philadelphia and New York. It has been shown, as a result of a research program conducted by the Library of Congress, that juvenile delinquency is spilling over from the metropolitan areas to the so-called suburban areas.

Mr. President, I sincerely hope there will be no real opposition to the bill. This proposed legislation is long overdue. It is time for us to do something about the problem.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill having been read the third time, the question is, Shall it pass?

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, all of us are aware of the rising tide of crimes and misdemeanors committed by youthful offenders throughout our Nation. All of us are concerned—and properly so—about the causes, motivations, and cures for the blight of juvenile delinquency.

It is a problem of no small dimensions. Gang warfare has turned sections of some of our cities into bloody battlegrounds. Mischief has turned to murder. Petty thievery and worse crimes have become commonplace among teenagers.

The Federal Bureau of Investigation has reported that some 130 of our young people under the age of 18 were arrested during 1958 for murder and nonaccidental killing. For the past 5 years, arrests of young people in the same age group have increased about 10 percent each year, while arrests of those over 18 have increased 1 percent each year.

All of us must remember, of course, that the great majority of our teenagers are upright, honest, and useful citizens. They are the kind of young people of whom we can be proud. But they are being given a black eye by their contemporaries who stray from the straight and narrow. Although juvenile delinquency is the exception rather than the rule, its shocking percentage of incidence must command the energies and attention of all the American people.

This phenomenon is not limited to any one group of States nor to any one political or geographical division. Like an epidemic, juvenile delinquency has spread in city and town, slum and suburb. It is at its worst, of course, in the larger urban centers. The courts in our communities reported over half a million cases involving youthful delinquents during 1957. If the rate continues to increase as it has since 1948, we can expect something over a million such appearances before our courts during 1965 and by 1970—a scant 10 years—we can expect nearly a million and a half such cases in our courts.

Mr. President, these are statistics which must shock and dismay all Americans.

Of course, the alarming increase in youthful crime and delinquency has not gone unheeded nor unattended. A variety of experts and laymen have delved into the causes of this continued upsurge of teenage lawlessness and they have pursued means for its control and cure. The concern and interest of churchmen and sociologists, scientists and social workers, police and government officials, as well as many private organizations, has created a growing public awareness of the mortal and moral dangers inherent in the present trend.

These same interested citizens have devised and developed vigorous and often successful community programs for guiding their children to maturity as responsible citizens rather than lawless ruffians or hardened criminals.

There has been a healthy and realistic understanding on the part of all concerned that crime and delinquency are primarily local problems to be solved at the local level. In the extensive hearings held by the Senate Juvenile Delinquency Subcommittee, most witnesses in localities across the country testified that much of the progress toward curbing delinquency can and will be made at the local level by citizens in their own communities.

Mr. President, any legislation dealing with juvenile delinquency is of particular importance to a Senator from New York. My State contains the Nation's largest city, a city which in recent months has made headlines with outbreaks of teenage terrorism which have shocked the Nation and, indeed, the world. Although juvenile crime is in no sense unique to the city of New York, the type of youthful lawlessness found there is representative of the worst in sporadic violence to be found in our communities. We are all appalled by the organized murder and terrorism of gang members whose motive for murder is that "we like to see them drop." Faced with such senseless and sadistic acts, we need not only immediate action but plans for long-term methods and projects for the effective control and eventual cure of youthful delinquency.

The city of New York, like other cities faced with this problem, has launched programs to control juvenile crime.

Extra police forces have been concentrated in danger areas, headway has been made to relieve the jam of juvenile cases in the courts, the city's work-camp program has been under review, certain weapons have been outlawed, and both private and governmental groups have organized to work with multiproblem families. There has been a concerted effort to assess and strengthen all community resources in the great battle.

Some of these measures will be effective as long-term methods to stem the tide of youthful crime. Others, however, are immediate firefighting methods improvised along the frontlines. In this respect, it is gratifying to note the speed with which Gov. Nelson A. Rockefeller has come to the aid of embattled New York City officials in their endeavors to formulate not only immediate controls, but also long-term answers which are essential for any effective program in this field.

Through conferences implemented by the State's interdepartmental task force on youth and juvenile delinquency, a concrete program of city-State cooperation and action has been formulated in my State. The Governor's program involves specific means by which the State can complement the efforts of New York City and other communities without impinging upon the more immediate responsibilities of local officials. Thus, he has left to the cities the task of apprehending and punishing delinquents while the State concentrates on longer range matters.

Governor Rockefeller has offered a broad program including the expansion of work camps which can help both in terms of prevention of juvenile delinquency and rehabilitation of offenders. As a result of extensive research, the Governor's task force has recently recommended other measures which are calculated to prevent youthful lawlessness and curb it at its source. Among the suggestions are the expansion of youth institutions, the establishment of new services, such as Youth Opportunity Centers for youngsters in danger of becoming delinquent, and a general broadening and improvement of probation and parole services. Such State leadership and action will be of great assistance to the city fathers of Manhattan and yet will not trespass on their areas of special responsibility. Indeed, Governor Rockefeller's program to combat juvenile delinquency is typical of the thoughtful, forward-looking administration he is giving the Empire State.

Another example of effective cooperation between State and local governments in meeting the challenge of youth in trouble is the program now in practice in the State of California. An integral part of this program is the California Youth Authority. Established in 1941, with a board composed of six members appointed by the Governor, the California Youth Authority assists local government units in dealing with youthful offenders. This authority has pioneered in a new approach to the correction of juvenile delinquency and it has now broadened its efforts into the preventive field, hoping to devise methods of reaching young people before they run afoul of the law. The California Youth Authority has also recently initiated a new division of research. Some of the areas planned for research are measuring the parole performance of wards, studying the efficacy of psychiatric treatment, and investigating whether a closer ratio of staff to wards will increase chances of rehabilitation. Thus California is another example of a specific line of attack based on State and local cooperation.

Mr. President, New York and California, among other States, are demonstrating how State and local officials can work together toward the solution of juvenile delinquency problems. Together they have planned and initiated programs which promise effective and enlightened action to curb and cure youngsters gone wrong. I believe particularly that the example in New York of State and local cooperation can serve as an excellent model for other State leaders as they seek solutions for their own juvenile problems.

I agree entirely with what has been said here to the effect that the best place, and the primary place, to fight juvenile delinquency is in the home, in the church, and in the school. After all, family guidance, religious teaching, and general education are the ultimate weapons which must be used in the effort to curb such lawlessness.

Mr. President, it is now time for the resources and powers of the Federal Government to be brought reasonably and effectively into this fight. While it is true there are presently some programs by means of which the Federal Government assists the States in this field, we need to coordinate and broaden these activities so that the talents of the National Government can be most soundly utilized.

I support the measure before us because it provides a first step toward such a plan of reasonable cooperation. The provisions in S. 694 for carrying out various projects that are substantial enough to help solve juvenile delinquency in many areas and in the country as a whole seem certain to reward us with the techniques and practices leading to the solution of our juvenile delinquency problems.

In supporting this measure, I should like to emphasize my opinion that the activities it promotes should deal directly and actively with these problems rather than indulging in mere theory. It has been my observation that sometimes the professionals who become involved in the study of these problems seem to become so enmeshed and entangled in theory that they come up with few practical results. We must never confuse coddling with realistic efforts to rehabilitate. And we must not be overly soft when dealing with hardened teenage criminals.

Mr. President, I am convinced that the Federal Government can be of tremendous assistance in the development of comprehensive programs for the prevention, control, and treatment of juvenile delinquency. By means of the grants provided for in title I of this bill, much progress can be made toward this goal. It is important to note that the grants to be provided in this bill will be supplemented by contributions by the recipients to the extent determined fair by the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare.

The technical-assistance provisions of title II should be most helpful in providing a clearinghouse for the latest information on research findings, techniques, programs, and other data which can be shared by the wide variety of groups, individuals, and levels of government working to prevent, control, and cure the problem of juvenile delinquency. This section takes cognizance of the fact that all concerned should have the benefit of the experience of others in the field if we are to find the most effective and meaningful means of attack and solution.

Finally, the National Advisory Council on Juvenile Delinquency, to be established under title III of this bill, can serve as a spearhead, brain trust, and coordinating body of experts to help the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare carry out the provisions of this bill. This group can imaginatively and vigorously explore the many exciting possibilities of S. 694 in terms of finding solutions to the challenge of young people gone wrong.

In general, Mr. President, I believe that S. 694 can be an effective measure because throughout it recognizes that the principal point of successful attack on this problem must be in our States and localities. But it is also based on the fact that States and communities need to be encouraged and helped with new ideas and information as they pursue various projects in the field.

In summary, Mr. President, I believe that S. 694 represents a sound investment in this country and in our most vital resource. It is true, of course, that we must punish—and punish severely—young and hardened criminals. It is true that we must apply immediate measures of control to meet present emergencies. But if we are to find any permanent solutions to the problem of juvenile delinquency, I believe it is imperative that we get at the root causes of youthful crime and delinquency.

Our approach must be realistic and farsighted. It must be sustained and nationwide. This is a task which should command the energies, talents, and ingenuity of our finest minds, and a task in which the Federal Government can and must play an important part.

I am confident that we have made a good start and are on the right track with S. 694. It is a step in the right direction and assures a vigorous but proper role by the Federal Government in assisting localities to wipe out this blight. I therefore urge its passage.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The bill (S. 694) was passed.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I move that the Senate reconsider the vote by which S. 694 was passed.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

UNITED STATES-CUBAN RELATIONS—STATEMENT BY PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES AND SECRETARY OF STATE

During the debate on the so-called juvenile delinquency bill,

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, before I speak to the matter of the bill and the amendment, I call the attention of the Senate to another matter which has just appeared on the news ticker, and which is of such importance that I think we should all know about it.

The President of the United States and the Secretary of State have just issued a statement on the subject of United States-Cuban relations. It is, in my view, a statement of such wisdom and of such understanding of the international position of the United States as to be well worth the attention of every Senator.

The President and the Secretary of State, while maintaining fully the dignity and strength of our great country, have at the same time not allowed themselves to be rushed into precipitate threats or injunctions for strong action, which the United States can always take very effectively—and which, indeed, we may with far more sadness than anger have to take, but which, nevertheless, we will do most reluctantly—have made a statement which demonstrates the calm and noble spirit which is our country, and in a manner of which I think we must all be proud.

The President has made five points with respect to United States-Cuban relations. He said:

The U.S. Government adheres strictly to the policy of nonintervention in the domestic affairs of other countries, including Cuba.

This is in accordance with the good neighbor policy of the United States with respect to Latin American countries.

In this connection, I am delighted to see in the Chamber the chairman of the Subcommittee on Latin American Affairs of the Committee on Foreign Relations, the distinguished senior Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE].

The President of the United States then said:

Second, the U.S. Government has consistently endeavored to prevent illegal acts in territory under its jurisdiction directed against other governments.

Again, that is a noble expression of the good neighbor policy.

In effect, he has said to Cuba, "Tell us who is invading your territory or launching against you illegal acts from the United States, and we will take the necessary action, while we ourselves try to find out at one and the same time."

Third, the President protested against the tendency of the spokesman of the Cuban Government, including Dr. Castro, the Prime Minister, "to create the illusion of aggressive acts and conspiratorial activities aimed at the Cuban Government and attributed to U.S. officials or agencies."

This, Mr. President, is the dignity of our country, speaking through the President. The President continued:

Fourth, the U.S. Government, of course, recognizes the right of the Cuban Government and people in the exercise of their national sovereignty to undertake those social, economic, and political reforms which, with due regard to their obligations under international law, they may think desirable.

In other words, the President is saying that we will not interfere, and we do not make it a policy to interfere.

In his fifth point, the President points out that under Cuban law as well as under international law we simply cannot proceed without any consideration for those principles which we are all sworn to uphold in the interest of the people, especially the principles of liberty and the right to hold property, particularly as they affect citizens of our own country; and he states our determination that these principles shall be observed.

The President closes on this note:

I should like only to add that the United States Government has confidence in the ability of the Cuban people to recognize and defeat the intrigues of international communism which are aimed at destroying democratic institutions in Cuba and the traditional and mutually beneficial friendship between the Cuban and American peoples.

I shall, of course, yield in a moment to the distinguished Senator from Oregon, who is a leader in this field. First, however, I ask unanimous consent, Mr. President, that the entire text of the statement by the President on United States-Cuban relations be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Text of statement on United States-Cuban relations:

Secretary of State Christian A. Herter and I have been giving careful consideration to the problem of relations between the Governments of the United States and Cuba. Ambassador Philip W. Bonsal, who is currently in Washington, shared in our discussions.

We have been, for many months, deeply concerned and perplexed at the steady deterioration of those relations reflected especially by recent public statements by Prime Minister Castro, of Cuba, as well as by statements in official publicity organs of the Cuban Government. These statements contain unwarranted attacks on our Government and on our leading officials. These attacks involve serious charges none of which, however, has been the subject of formal representations by the Government of Cuba to our Government. We believe these charges to be totally unfounded.

We have prepared a restatement of our policy toward Cuba, a country with whose people the people of the United States have enjoyed and expect to continue to enjoy a firm and mutually beneficial friendship.

The U.S. Government adheres strictly to the policy of nonintervention in the domestic affairs of other countries, including Cuba. This policy is incorporated in our treaty commitments as a member of the Organization of American States.

Second, the U.S. Government has consistently endeavored to prevent illegal acts in the territory under its jurisdiction directed against other governments. The U.S. law enforcement agencies have been increasingly successful in the prevention of such acts. The U.S. record in this respect compares very favorably with that of Cuba from whose territory a number of invasions directed against other countries have departed during the past year, in several cases attended with serious loss of life and property damage in the territory of those other countries. The U.S. authorities will continue to enforce U.S. laws, including those which reflect commitments under inter-American treaties, and hope that other governments will act similarly. Our Government has repeatedly indicated that it will welcome any information from the Cuban Government, or from other governments, regarding incidents occurring within their jurisdiction or notice which would be of assistance to our law enforcement agencies in this respect.

Third, the U.S. Government views with increasing concern the tendency of spokesmen of the Cuban Government, including Prime Minister Castro, to create the illusion of aggressive acts and conspiratorial activities aimed at the Cuban Government and attributed to U.S. officials or agencies. The promotion of unfounded illusions of this kind can hardly facilitate the development, in the real interests of the two peoples, of relations of understanding and confidence between their governments. The U.S. Government regrets that its earnest efforts over the past year to establish the basis for such understanding and confidence have not been reciprocated.

Fourth, the U.S. Government, of course, recognizes the right of the Cuban Government and people in the exercise of their national sovereignty to undertake those social, economic, and political reforms which, with due regard to their obligations under international law, they may think desirable. This position has frequently been stated and it reflects a real understanding of and sympathy with the ideals and aspirations of the Cuban people. Similarly, the U.S. Government and people will continue to assert and to defend, in the exercise of their own sovereignty, their legitimate interests.

Fifth, the U.S. Government believes that its citizens have made constructive contributions to the economies of other countries by means of their investments and their work in those countries, and that such contributions, taking into account changing conditions, can remain on a mutually satisfactory basis. The U.S. Government will continue to bring to the attention of the Cuban Government any instances in which the rights of its citizens under Cuban law and under international law have been disregarded, and in which redress under Cuban law is apparently unavailable or denied. In this connection it is the hope of the U.S. Government that differences of opinion between the two governments in matters recognized under international law as subject to diplomatic negotiations will be resolved through such negotiations. In the event that disagreements between the two governments concerning this matter should persist, it would be the intention of the U.S. Government to seek solutions through other appropriate international procedures.

The above points seem to me to furnish reasonable basis for a workable and satisfactory relationship between our two sovereign countries. I should like only to add that the U. S. Government has confidence in the ability of the Cuban people to recognize and defeat the intrigues of international communism which are aimed at destroying democratic institutions in Cuba and the traditional and mutually beneficial friendship between the Cuban and American peoples.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I point out that this is a noble statement, issued in the finest spirit of bipartisanship. We can all be proud of it. The President bespeaks the dignity of our great country with respect to a small country. He bespeaks our respect for the people of that small country and their government, so long as it is their government, and points out that we will adhere strictly to what is correct for us; that strength is to be utilized only where nothing else will suffice; but that we certainly intend to exhaust every avenue of the cooperation—indeed, the affection—which the American people have for the Cuban people, to bring about the justice which should dominate the relations between our two countries and our two peoples.

I now yield to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I associate myself with the Senator from New York in commending the President and the Secretary of State for the very fine statement which has been released by the White House today on the United States-Cuban relations. I was advised of it earlier by a representative of the State Department.

I think the President and the Secretary of State deserve the high praise of Congress and the American people for the statesmanship portrayed by the paper.

What it says in essence, really, is that, consistent with our historic policy, we do not believe in following a course of action which will work hardship upon a people because problems have arisen between their leaders of government and the United States. There is no question that there is a great reservoir of good will on the part of the people of the United States toward the people of Cuba.

So far as I am concerned, as chairman of the Subcommittee on Latin American Affairs, this is a problem of diplomacy. It is a problem of diplomatic negotiation. It is a problem of official conversations between the representatives of our Government, who under the Constitution of the United States have the responsibility for the administration of foreign affairs, and the leaders of the Cuban Government.

I say most respectfully that I hope future statements will be made by the President and the Secretary of State, and not by members of the American military. I think it was most unfortunate that the other day Admiral Burke made the statement he did concerning what American policy would be in connection with the American naval base in Cuba.

I say, most respectfully, it does not happen to fall within his province. That happens to be a matter of foreign policy, upon the basis of which the President and the Vice President should be the ones on which to make a statement, and not the top brass in the military. All too often, Mr. President, the top brass of the military issue statements from to time, which amount to military statements, that ought not to come from them, but, when they are in the field of foreign policy, from the President or the Secretary of State.

I am very happy the Senator from New York, able student that he is of American-Latin American relations, made the statement he has made on the floor of the Senate, and I wish to associate myself with it.

Mr. JAVITS. I am very grateful to my colleague.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the remarks on Cuban-American relations may follow the debate on the so-called juvenile delinquency bill, so that there may be some continuity in the debate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

THE MACK CHARLES PARKER LYNCHING CASE

Mr. HART. Mr. President, earlier this month a Federal grand jury failed to return an indictment in the Mack Charles Parker case. As I see it, this underlines in no uncertain terms the inadequacy of Federal law and Federal law enforcement to deal with lynchings.

The Nation, indeed the world, was shocked and saddened when a new chapter of lynch law was written in Poplarville, Miss., last April, the Parker case. Immediately following that violence, I checked and found no proposal for Federal antilynching law had been introduced in the Senate in this Congress. I then introduced S. 1848. At the time of introducing S. 1848, I acknowledged that we all hoped those responsible for this crime would be quickly brought to justice.

The press reported, and I was given assurances, that the Governor of Mississippi was proceeding with full power of his office to undertake a vigorous State investigation; that at the request of the Governor the Department of Justice, through the FBI and others of its branches, was giving full cooperation in the case.

From the first days of that intense public and official concern, the story led sadly through a chain of events which week by week lessens the chances that the individuals responsible for lynching Mack Charles Parker will be apprehended and brought to account for their crime.

A recounting of these events seems to me important at this time, and not for the purpose of pointing a finger at any one region of the Nation, because the problems of which I speak are basically not those of any single State or region. A review is important because a chronology of the events may illustrate where justice failed in this case, and illustrate remedial steps that need to be taken, both by Congress and by the executive branch of the Federal Government.

Some of the documents, newspaper reports, statements and comments on this case I shall ask to have printed in the RECORD at the end of my remarks. Briefly, I refer to a few of them.

Following the investigation by the FBI, a full report of its findings was turned over to the Governor of Mississippi, and the New York Herald Tribune headlined the story: "FBI Names Lynchers in Mississippi; Case Solved; Left Up to Governor Coleman."

Only a few days before this headline, the Department of Justice issued a press statement which resulted in headlines such as those in the St. Louis Post Dispatch of May 25, "Rogers Reports Lynchers Broke No Federal Law."

The Justice Department's release stated in part:

> Attorney General William P. Rogers has announced that the FBI was directed today to turn over to Gov. J. P. Coleman, at Jackson, Miss., a summary of information relative to facts and evidence obtained during the FBI's investigation of the abduction and murder of Mack Charles Parker. This action on the part of the Justice Department was based upon a ruling that FBI investigation had clearly established that the persons responsible for the death of Parker had not violated the Federal kidnaping statute, and no other successful Federal prosecution could be maintained.

No special grand jury was called to consider the FBI evidence. Months elapsed—April to October 1959—before the regularly scheduled grand jury of the county of Pearl River convened. No indictments were returned by this grand jury, and responsible news sources reported the case had not even been presented to the grand jury.

This failure to return an indictment under State law brought the charge of "travesty of justice" from the Attorney General, and a sudden discussion of the possible needs for new Federal laws in the area. The Attorney General, at his news conference in November 1959, was quoted as saying that the Department of Justice initially did not prosecute the case because the crime of murder was "more appropriate for a State to handle under our Federal system."

Notwithstanding these public announcements which gave the clear impression there had been no Federal crime, the U.S. attorney in Jackson, Miss., was instructed to present the case to a Federal grand jury after the State failed to return an indictment. This the U.S. attorney did, and on January 14, 1960, the Federal grand jury announced that it had found no basis for a Federal prosecution in the lynching of Mack Charles Parker.

The New York Times reported:

> The decision appeared to come as a surprise to defense lawyers retained by the men under investigation in the slaying. One attorney, who asked that he not be identified, said "we had five names" of persons against whom action had been expected. Bonding arrangements already had been made for them, according to the attorney.

Here, Mr. President, we have a chain of events that leads us nowhere. And, unless the Congress sees in the Mack Charles Parker case a lesson, and builds into our laws and their administration explicit ways effectively to undertake prosecution for the crime of lynching, the next sad instance may result in equally regrettable consequences.

It was for this reason that I introduced S. 1848 some 10 months ago. To date, despite requests to the Department of Justice, no report on this bill, or others dealing with this problem introduced subsequently, has been forthcoming from the Department of Justice.

I ask that the exchange of correspondence I have had with the Attorney General and the Department of Justice on this case be included in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks; also, I should like to include excerpts from remarks I made on April 30, 1959, in connection with the introduction of S. 1848.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(See exhibits 1 and 2.)

Mr. HART. Mr. President, it is vitally important, it would seem to me, that we study the point-by-point developments and decisions in the handling of the Parker case by the Federal Government. The sequence of events, as I understand it, raises many questions. For example, by whom and upon what evidence was the "ruling" announced May 25 by the Department of Justice that "no other successful Federal prosecution could be maintained."

It is for this reason that I wrote the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. HENNINGS] chairman of the Senate Subcommittee on Constitutional Rights, on January 15, 1960, suggesting a thorough study of this case by his subcommittee. Such a study, I believe, would permit us to develop far better perspective as to the real failings of the law and administration of justice reflected by the events of the Parker case. Such a study would better prepare the Congress for the consideration of additional Federal legislation such as that proposed in S. 1848. With this study and, hopefully, the long-promised Department of Justice reports on these antilynching bills, we should take action to improve our Federal laws to prosecute effectively those who, with no understanding of the law, take it into their own hands. Surely the dead-end in the Parker case is the best evidence of need of Federal law to insure against repetition, if not of the crime, of the escape of the criminals. The Parker case is not a murder mystery to be solved—apparently the FBI has the names, place, and time—it is a national problem to be met.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that at the conclusion of my remarks there be printed in the RECORD the letter I addressed to the chairman of the Subcommittee on Constitutional Rights; a Department of Justice release dated May 25, 1959; editorials dealing with the Mack Charles Parker case; and newspaper articles dealing with the same case.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(See exhibits 3, 4, 5, and 6.)

EXHIBIT 1

JUNE 10, 1959.

The Honorable WILLIAM P. ROGERS,
Attorney General of the United States, Department of Justice, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. ATTORNEY GENERAL: We now find ourselves, as I read the press reports of your Department's conclusions, in the position which we discussed and realized might be reached when I phoned you a short time after the Poplarville incident. Incidentally, I meant to send you the remarks I made shortly thereafter upon introducing an antilynching bill, and enclose a copy herewith.

I wonder if I might now inquire as to your thoughts with regard to the need for additional Federal law to permit Federal prosecution of crimes such as that committed in Poplarville? Is it your feeling that the exploration of ways to provide additional Federal legislation would now be profitable? However, perhaps I misread the press release from the Department of Justice issued on May 25, 1959, setting forth the reasons for Federal withdrawal, and in effect should read from its contents that the Department is taking the position that there may well have been a violation of sections 241 and 242 of the Federal code, but that Federal prosecution was rejected because of the probability that no conviction could be obtained.

Whatever comments you might like to share with me on these observations would be welcome. Frankly, I am disturbed by the general turn which this case has taken: the "end of the road" so far as Federal law is concerned; almost a half year wait for State action. While I am willing to assume the good faith of all parties involved in pursuing the prosecution of those responsible for this crime, I cannot help but feel that before this case is closed, it may well present a particularly clear example of the need for clarification and strengthening of present Federal law.

With every best wish.

Sincerely,

PHILIP A. HART.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, D.C., July 28, 1959.

Hon. PHILIP A. HART,
U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR HART: This will refer to your letter of June 10, 1959, addressed to the Attorney General, enclosing a copy of your remarks in introducing S. 1848, an antilynching bill, and commenting about the application of the Federal criminal laws to the Mack Charles Parker case in Mississippi.

Apropos of the Department's press release of May 25, 1959, to which you referred, it was concluded, based on the results of the extensive and thorough FBI investigation of the Parker matter, there were no felony offenses involved, including violation of 18 United States Code, 241, upon which to predicate prosecution in a Federal court.

We appreciated receiving a copy of your remarks made in introducing S. 1848. The Department plans to submit its views on this proposed legislation in the near future.

Sincerely,

MALCOLM R. WILKEY,
Assistant Attorney General.

NOVEMBER 24, 1959.

The Honorable WILLIAM P. ROGERS,
Attorney General,
Department of Justice,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. ATTORNEY GENERAL: Your recent remarks, as reported in the press, would indicate that the Department of Justice is giving some consideration to recommending additional Federal legislation to strengthen the Government's hand in dealing with lynching cases.

As one member of the Senate Committee on the Judiciary, it would be most helpful to me, and I am sure to a number of my colleagues, if such proposals as the Department of Justice may recommend were available to the committee when Congress reconvenes in January. A recent check indicates that the Department of Justice has given the committee no report on S. 1848, which I introduced on this subject last April.

Your assistance in expediting a report on this bill would also be appreciated.

Sincerely,

PHILIP A. HART.

U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
OFFICE OF THE
DEPUTY ATTORNEY GENERAL,
Washington, D.C., December 1, 1959.

Hon. PHILIP A. HART,
U.S. Senate,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR: The Attorney General has asked me to acknowledge and thank you for your letter of November 24, in which you request that the Department of Justice expedite its report on your bill, S. 1848, "To declare certain rights of all persons within the jurisdiction of the United States, and for the protection of such persons from lynching, and for other purposes."

In his news conference of November 17, to which you refer, the Attorney General stated that the failure of State law enforcement officers in Mississippi even to present the facts of the Mack Charles Parker murder case to the State grand jury has prompted renewed study by the Department of Justice of the need for additional criminal legislation in the civil rights field. The form the solution should take is now under intensive study in the Department. Necessarily, until completion of that study the Department is not in a position to issue a report on S. 1848 or related legislation.

As the most recent public statements of the Attorney General make clear, the Department of Justice has a continuing and keen interest in all legislative proposals in this area. We will, of course, keep you informed of any proposals of the Department which relate to the subject matter of S. 1848.

Sincerely,

JOHN D. CALHOUN,
Special Assistant to the Attorney General.

EXCERPTS OF REMARKS BY SENATOR HART ON S. 1848

Mr. President, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill on a subject that is not new to the Congress. According to the Library of Congress, more than 200 bills dealing with the same subject have been introduced since 1900. In checking the status of bills before this Congress, however, I was surprised to find that no proposed legislation on this subject has as yet been introduced in the Senate during this session, although four bills on the subject are now before the House of Representatives. The House, in fact, has passed proposed legislation on this subject five times since 1937.

I refer, Mr. President, to proposed legislation dealing with the question of Federal responsibility in cases in which physical violence resulting in great bodily injury or death has been committed against any person because of his race, religion, color, or national origin, or against any person who is either suspected of, or is in custody for committing, a criminal offense.

Admittedly, Mr. President, I made this check because of the incident in Poplarville, Miss., last week. I should like to comment briefly on that incident, so that no one will misunderstand my intentions in placing this bill before the Senate.

Mob violence is a horrible thing. Dragging a man from a jail; inflicting brutal injury, possibly death; denying anyone a fair trial; taking the law into private hands—these are unconscionable things. Few Americans anywhere condone them. I am informed that Governor Coleman of Mississippi, responded immediately, when informed of the incident, ordered a vigorous State investigation, and, within 18 minutes, had asked for assistance from the FBI. Not all local officials in some of the sections given to "finger pointing" have acted as promptly or as strongly in the face of mob violence. I know that every Member of the Senate joins me in the hope that those responsible will quickly be brought to justice. Thus, while this recent incident has reopened the question of how we are best to prevent mobs from running over local officers of the law, I want to make it clear that it is not greatly different from some of the incidents involving mob action when Negro families have moved into new neighborhoods in Michigan. The same violation of constitutional guarantees providing for the equal protection of the laws may be involved. Basic motivations, I am sure, are the same.

I am, therefore, Mr. President, introducing this bill in the hope that it may provide an additional way to strengthen cooperation between the Federal law enforcement agencies and those of our individual State. Governor Coleman and the local law enforcement officials of Mississippi have taken an important step toward building that cooperation. Attorney General Rogers has assured me that his department is receiving and giving every assistance. At the very least, I believe that we here in the Senate should seek constructive ways to broaden the legal tools available to both State and Federal officials. We have come a long way in the right direction from the outbreaks in the 1930's and that worst hour, on the 19th day of June 1943, in Detroit, Mich., without the help of the bill I am now introducing.

It may be that this bill is not the best answer. If some better suggestions are forthcoming, I shall welcome the chance to support them. But I cannot, in good conscience, agree with those who may now suggest that the case has been made for no congressional action. We need every means of prevention that we can find.

JANUARY 15, 1960.

The Honorable THOMAS C. HENNINGS, Jr.,
Chairman, Subcommittee on Constitutional Rights, Committee on the Judiciary, U.S. Senate

MY DEAR SENATOR: The report that no indictment was returned by the Federal grand jury in the Mack Charles Parker case has caused me to review the activities of the Department of Justice in the investigation and attempted prosecution of this case.

There are several statements and documents which I believe justify a thorough study by the Constitutional Rights Subcommittee to ascertain the background and sequence of these events. A study might well look into question such as: (1) On what grounds did the Department of Justice first enter the case? (2) What was the background of the Department of Justice's press release of May 25, 1959? (3) Why was the impression given that there were no Federal offenses involved when the investigative material was turned over to the State officials? (4) When the State grand jury was not presented with the case, why at this late date did the Attorney General call this a "travesty of justice" and then order it to be presented to a Federal grand jury?

In considering this proposal you may find the enclosed material, including a letter I received from the Department of Justice on July 28, 1959, quite useful.

Sincerely,

PHILIP A. HART.

EXHIBIT 4

U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
FEDERAL BUREAU OF INVESTIGATION,
Washington, D.C., May 25, 1959.

Attorney General William P. Rogers has announced that the FBI was directed today to turn over to Gov. J. P. Coleman, at Jackson, Miss., a summary of information relative to facts and evidence obtained during the FBI's investigation of the abduction and murder of Mack Charles Parker. This action on the part of the Justice Department was based upon a ruling that FBI investigations had clearly established that the persons responsible for the death of Parker had not violated the Federal kidnaping statute, and no other successful Federal prosecution could be maintained.

According to Director J. Edgar Hoover, the FBI was ordered into this case on the morning of April 25, 1959, shortly after the abduction of Parker from the Pearl River County Courthouse jail in Poplarville, Miss. On May 4, 1959, Parker's body was recovered on the Mississippi side of the Pearl River near Bogalusa, La., by FBI agents and Mississippi highway patrolmen.

Mr. Hoover stated that during its intensive investigation which has just been completed the FBI interviewed scores of persons and examined numerous items of physical evidence. The report by the FBI has been given the Governor of Mississippi in order that a determination can be made as to violations of State laws, he said.

Mr. Hoover expressed appreciation for the cooperation give the FBI by Governor Coleman, the Mississippi highway patrol, and other responsible citizens. He said that the services of the FBI Laboratory, as well as its Fingerprint Identification Division and all other FBI facilities, are fully available to Mississippi authorities in the event additional assistance is needed for prosecution of State violations in the Parker case.

The FBI Director also stated that FBI personnel, including scientific experts of the FBI Laboratory, would be available to testify should the case be tried in State court.

EXHIBIT 5

[From the Washington Post, Dec. 6, 1959]

LYNCHING AND THE LAW

What, if anything, can Uncle Sam do about lynchings—and about the failure of State governments to prevent or punish them? Fortunately this ugly form of mob violence has been extremely rare in recent years. When it occurs, however, and when, as in Poplarville, Miss., a grand jury refuses even to consider the available evidence against those who were responsible for it, the conscience of the country is outraged. The FBI conducted an exhaustive investigation of the case and made a complete report on it; the U.S. attorney in the area told local authorities the FBI agents were ready and willing to testify before the grand jury. But the report was not considered, and no FBI men were called. Attorney General Rogers characterized it as "a flagrant and calculated miscarriage of justice."

As a result of the Poplarville lynching, the Attorney General said that the Department of Justice is "studying the need for some new criminal statute in the civil rights field." It seems unlikely that this will take the form of a Federal antilynching law. Such legislation was proposed in a variety of forms during the 1930's when lynching was much more common. But lynching cannot constitutionally be made a Federal crime unless officers of a State, acting under color of law, are participants in it. Civil rights statutes banning such State violation of the 14th amendment have been on the books since the 1870's. They will no doubt be invoked before the Federal grand jury which is to look into the Poplarville case in January. But they were never intended to deal with so atrocious a crime as lynching, and the penalties they provide are altogether inadequate.

The key to the punishment of lynching must be found in the development of local sentiment that wants lynching punished. Without such sentiment, Federal juries are as likely as county juries to condone it. And the key to development of such sentiment, we are convinced, lies in enabling Negroes to vote. Wherever Negroes vote in appreciable numbers, their civil rights are respected. Wherever, in other words, their support must be solicited by candidates for local election, they will be able to command—and they will receive—the respect which is the due of American citizens.

Now, the right to vote is a right of American citizenship guaranteed by the 15th amendment and indubitably subject to the protection of the Federal Government. There is no doubt that the Department of Justice has authority to act in this field—authority to turn the key and open the door to Negro voting. If additional legislation is needed to make the right to vote meaningful, there is no doubt that Congress can constitutionally enact it. We surmise and hope that the Department's "study" is in this direction and that it will act with the utmost vigor.

While supremacists can hardly have it both ways if they invoke the Constitution to forbid Federal action against lynching, they cannot disregard the constitutional responsibility to protect voting rights. Full realization of these rights will mean at least the emancipation not of the Negro alone, but of the South itself.

[From the New York Times of Jan. 7, 1960]

BAD NEWS FROM MISSISSIPPI

The refusal of a grand jury to return an indictment would normally end the matter. Under our system of law, one does not lightly criticize a grand jury's decision to indict, or not to indict; for it is to the grand jury, and not to the public, that the evidence based on investigation by the law-enforcement authorities is duly presented.

However, enough is publicly known about the Mack Charles Parker lynching in Poplarville, Miss., last April to warrant a sense of shock and outrage that the Federal grand jury in Biloxi has failed to bring in an indictment against the kidnapers and murderers of the young Negro truckdriver who had been charged with the rape of a white woman. After the lynching, the Federal Bureau of Investigation conducted what the Attorney General of the United States described as "one of the most complete investigations I've ever seen." The FBI produced a long and detailed report, which—though it has not been and cannot be made public—is understood to have included names of participants in the lynching. Our own correspondent reports that "details of the lynching and the names of those involved were common knowledge" in the area.

In what Attorney General Rogers rightly called "a travesty on justice" a county grand jury last November failed to take action in the case; and now a Federal grand jury of 20 whites and 1 Negro—also local residents, of course—has done the same. * * * deeply affects our international position. The repercussions will be felt in Europe, in Asia, in Africa, for months and years.

What to do about it? Unfortunately, there isn't much that can be done. The Parker case emphasizes the need for Federal antilynching legislation. It also suggests that the Civil Rights Commission undertake its contemplated inquiry into the administration of justice in respect to civil rights, something that the Parker case shows to be in serious jeopardy in Mississippi.

[From Commonweal, Jan. 15, 1960]

CIVIL RIGHTS IN 1960

The problem of achieving an effective civil rights program will be one of the great domestic issues of 1960. Even if this were not an election year, the President and Congress would feel the growing pressure to increase present efforts and to strengthen present laws. But it is an election year, and the question of civil rights will inevitably become an intensely charged political issue. Each potential candidate for the Presidency will be called upon to answer various questions: Are present laws and programs sufficient? Should they be revised or reconstructed? What positive recommendations can be made?

In the face of this inescapable challenge, the disposition of the case of Mack Charles Parker will have telling effect. While awaiting trial for rape last April, Mack Parker was placed in a small jail in Poplarville, Miss. But in the night a group of white men broke into the jail, dragged him resisting to their cars, shot him twice through the chest and fed his body to the river. Although the FBI launched a large-scale investigation and was prepared to submit abundant evidence, the county grand jury called no FBI witness, asked to see no reports, and returned no indictment. The case, apparently, was closed on this cynical note. This lynching would join other lynchings which were briefly noted and soon forgotten.

Attorney General William P. Rogers, however, calling such a procedure a travesty, asked for a particular study of the situation, and the Justice Department requested a Federal grand jury investigation. If a majority of the 23 Mississippians on the Federal grand jury panel decide that civil rights were violated, the Justice Department will be able to enter the case and to offer as evidence what is, apparently, acknowledged fact in the Mississippi community. For there seems to be little mystery about how and when Mack Parker was lynched or even about the identity of many people who were involved.

In the case of Mack Parker, it is not then a mystery but a problem that faces the southern community, the Federal Government and the Nation. It is the key problem to any meaningful civil rights program: How is justice to be administered under law in communities where prejudice allows the citizens to be indifferent to or contemptuous of civilized standards of justice? The difficulties under which the Justice Department is operating are clear from the fact that it felt called upon to reenter a case from which it had previously withdrawn and that the Attorney General justified this action by referring to laws of the Reconstruction Era whose constitutionality has been questioned.

Even if the Justice Department is effective in this case, the travesty of justice offered by the county grand jury cannot be forgotten. And if the Justice Department proves ineffective, even those most blinded by prejudice must acknowledge, even if they protest, the need for a more effective civil rights program.

FBI Names Lynchers to Mississippi—Case Solved, Left Up to Governor Coleman

Washington, May 27. — Government sources said today the FBI has solved the Mack Charles Parker lynching and named the participants in evidence turned over to Mississippi Gov. J. P. Coleman.

According to this report, the list was accompanied by proof of the identities of the masked men who went into the Pearl River County jail at Poplarville, Miss., in the early morning of April 25 and dragged the 23-year-old Negro feet first to their waiting cars.

Parker, who was on the eve of trial on a charge of raping a pregnant white woman, was found dead on the Mississippi side of the Pearl River May 4. He had been shot twice.

Today's Chicago Tribune reported an FBI solution of the case, quoting "informed sources on Capitol Hill." The newspaper said 10 men were named in the list turned over to Governor Coleman. New Orleans television station WDSU–TV said earlier that the FBI report implicated at least 18 persons.

The FBI which sent 40 agents into the area immediately after Parker's abduction, announced 2 days ago its investigation showed no Federal law violation. A major factor was the lack of any evidence a State line had been crossed. The body was in the swamps opposite Bogalusa, La., but there was nothing to indicate the abductors had crossed into that State.

In announcing its withdrawal, the FBI said its extensive evidence was being turned over to Governor Coleman for any action the State might desire to take. Governor Coleman has stated the evidence will be submitted to the next regular grand jury convening in Pearl River County in November.

According to Government sources, the FBI investigation developed this evidence:

Parker was due to face trial on April 27. A week before that date, there was talk around Poplarville about the possibility of trouble developing around the jail, where he was locked up, without guards, with other prisoners. Local authorities decided, however, that there was no good reason to take him elsewhere because it appeared unlikely any violence would develop.

On the night of April 24 there was an outdoor meeting in the yard of a farmhouse outside Poplarville which attracted a large attendance, and in which local indignation over the raping of the white woman was aired.

The meeting convened after 9 o'clock. When it broke up shortly after midnight, many of those in attendance got in their cars and drove back to their homes. Another group, reported to have numbered less than 10, put on masks and headed for Poplarville.

They arrived in the early morning hours of April 25 and got into the sheriff's office, where they obtained the keys to the jail cells from a cabinet. Parker was seized after his cell had been unlocked with one of these keys.

It was reported that most of the indignation voiced at the farmhouse conspiracy meeting was based on the prospect that Parker's Negro attorney would cross-examine the pregnant white woman when the Parker trial was convened on Monday. The most outspoken participants were represented as having said they would not stand for this.

In Jackson, Governor Coleman, preparing to leave for Washington to testify against civil rights legislation, declined to comment on request by the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People for a special grand jury to act on the FBI lynching report.

From New York, the NAACP had telegraphed: "The possibility is that information which would justify the issuance of true bills is ready for presentation."

Rogers Reports Lynchers Broke No Federal Law

Washington, May 2.—The Federal Bureau of Investigation has clearly established that there was no violation of Federal law by the persons responsible for the lynching of Mack Charles Parker at Poplarville, Miss., Attorney General William P. Rogers announced today.

Rogers said the FBI had been directed to turn over to Gov. J. P. Coleman a summary of all facts and evidence obtained by Federal agents in their investigation of the kidnaping and murder of the 23-year-old Negro accused of raping a pregnant white woman.

Rogers said in a statement that the FBI report would be given to Governor Coleman so that he may determine any violation of State laws.

Gov. J. P. Coleman said he would present evidence gathered by the agents to the next session of the Pearl River County grand jury which meets in November at Poplarville.

The Justice Department announcement did not give details of information gathered in the case, but indicated it would include the names of those the FBI considers prime suspects.

Parker was dragged screaming from the Pearl River County jail by a mob of masked men on April 25. He was scheduled to go on trial the following day on charges of raping the woman while her 4-year-old daughter looked on.

FINDING OF BODY

Parker's body, shot twice, was found on the Mississippi side of the Pear River near Bogalusa, La., last May 4 by FBI agents and Mississippi highway patrolmen.

The Department of Justice was in effect withdrawing from the case today. Rogers said the Department had "clearly established that the persons responsible for the death of Parker had not violated the Federal kidnaping statutes, and no other Federal prosecution could be maintained."

In order to establish violation of the Lindbergh kidnaping act, the Department would have had to prove that Parker's body had been carried across a State line.

The only other law under which the Federal Government could have acted in this case would have been a violation of Parker's civil rights by persons acting "under color of law." This means someone in an official capacity such as local authorities, acting in collusion with the lynching mob.

FORTY AGENTS SENT IN

FBI Director J. Edgar Hoover sent about 40 agents to Poplarville April 25, shortly after Parker's abduction.

Hoover said that during the FBI intensive investigation agents interviewed scores of persons and examined numerous items of physical evidence.

FBI agents, it was learned, ended their investigation in gathering evidence early last week. The evidence was turned over to the Department's lawyers to determine whether a Federal crime had been committed. After sifting through the facts, Rogers ruled that there had been no Federal crime.

Grand Jury Quits Seemingly Without Considering Parker Lynching Case

Poplarville, Miss., Nov. 3 (UPI)—An all-white Pearl River County grand jury finished its investigations today and apparently declined to indict anyone for the lynching of Mack Charles Parker.

A usually reliable source said the 18-member grand jury had finished its consideration of criminal bills of indictment and would submit a report Thursday.

The grand jury did not call any of the more than 60 Federal Bureau of Investigation agents who took part in a month-long investigation of the Parker lynching last spring.

Because the grand jury acts in secret, officials would not tell newsmen even when it would reconvene.

The FBI withdrew from the case after the Justice Department reported it failed to find that any Federal laws had been violated. But the FBI submitted to Gov. J. P. Coleman a detailed 378-page report which named nearly a score of men as suspects.

Parker, a 23-year-old Negro accused of raping a pregnant white woman on a country road last February, was dragged from a jail cell here April 25 by a mob of masked, gloved white men who beat him, shot him and threw his body in the Pearl River.

It was understood that the grand jury did not receive the FBI report which Coleman turned over to the district attorney and Pearl River County prosecutor.

U.S. Jury To Sift Parker Lynching—Justice Department To Act as Panel in Mississippi, Ignores Case at Session

(By Anthony Lewis)

Washington, November 5.—The Justice Department said tonight that it would convene a Federal grand jury in Mississippi to consider the lynching of Mack Charles Parker.

The action came quickly after a Mississippi State grand jury had ignored the case in its deliberations. The jury adjourned today, according to reports, without considering a 378-page report on the lynching by the Federal Bureau of Investigation.

The Acting Attorney General, Lawrence E. Walsh, made the announcement tonight. He made clear that the Justice Department was back in the case because there was now no reason to defer to State rights.

Parker, a 23-year-old Negro charged with the rape of a white woman, was dragged from a jail in Poplarville, Miss., on the night of last April 24. Witnesses said he had been abducted by 15 to 20 masked men.

FOUND IN RIVER

FBI agents found his body 9 days later in the Pearl River. He had been shot twice.

The FBI carried out an intensive inquiry, sending as many as 60 men at a time to the Poplarville area. Though its findings have never been published, there were credible reports in Mississippi that the Bureau had identified the masked lynchers.

Last May 25, the Justice Department said that it was withdrawing from the case. It gave two main reasons for the withdrawal:

1. The FBI had clearly established that the persons responsible for the death of Parker had not violated the Federal kidnaping statute.

2. No other successful Federal prosecution could be maintained.

The second reason evidently referred to the two criminal civil rights statutes remaining from the post-Civil War period.

One of these provides a maximum 10-year jail sentence and $5,000 fine for persons conspiring to deprive someone of his civil rights. Lawyers regard its constitutionality as questionable if it is applied to actions by private persons rather than State officials.

The other statute is directed at persons acting under color of law—officials—who deprive another of his constitutional rights. The maximum penalty is a year in prison and a $1,000 fine.

One of the unknown factors in the Parker case is whether any official joined or helped the lynch mob. If so, it is believed that either of these two Federal statutes could be used constitutionally.

Mr. Walsh did not comment tonight on whether either of the two reasons given for withdrawing from the case last May had changed.

He said that the Justice Department had dropped out last May "so there would be no possible interference with a prosecution for State crimes, which then seemed simpler and more effective as vehicles of successful law enforcement."

"There is now no reason why Federal proceedings may not resume," Mr. Walsh said.

He said the Federal investigation of the lynching would be resumed. And he directed the U.S. attorney for the southern district of Mississippi, Robert E. Hauberg, to take the necessary steps toward presenting evidence before a grand jury.

Under the Constitution and Federal law, the grand jury will be composed of Mississippi citizens. Any persons it indicts will be tried by a locally drawn Federal petit jury.

UNITED STATES DENOUNCES LYNCHING INACTION

WASHINGTON.—Attorney General William P. Rogers, Tuesday, denounced Mississippi's handling of the Mack Parker lynching as a travesty on justice. He said the case may lead to proposals for new civil-rights legislation.

He told a press conference that he was considering a new criminal statute that would let the Federal Government move in more strongly when States refuse to act in racial crimes.

Such a proposal, if made by President Eisenhower, would mark a distinctly new approach for his administration. He and his attorneys have consistently played down criminal remedies in the civil-rights field.

Parker, a 23-year-old Negro charged with the rape of a white woman, was dragged from a jail in Poplarville, Miss., last April by a band of masked men.

Nine days later, agents of the Federal Bureau of Investigation found his body in the Pearl River. He had beeen shot twice.

The FBI spent $80,000 investigating the case, Rogers said, and carried out "one of the most complete investigations I've ever seen conducted."

The Justice Department turned the report over to Mississippi officials and, last May, said it would not itself prosecute. Rogers said that was because the Department thought murder was a crime more appropriate for a State to handle under our Federal system.

Early this month, a Mississippi grand jury considered the case. Rogers said the Justice Department had written the grand jury and local officials offering to produce FBI agents to testify and to bring evidence, including fingerprints.

Not one FBI witness was called, and the grand jury adjourned without taking any action on the Parker case.

"You talk about States rights," Rogers said. "I believe in States rights too. But there are also State responsibilities.

"It seems clear to me that if a State doesn't believe in the administration of justice, to the extent of not even calling witnesses in a case like the Poplarville case, then the Federal Government must consider something else."

Rogers said the Mississippi officials' failure to act was as "flagrant and calculated a miscarriage of justice as I know of."

FEDERAL ACTION SET IN LYNCHING

The Justice Department today was preparing to seek Federal court action against the lynchers of Mack Charles Parker.

Acting Atty. Gen. Lawrence E. Walsh announced that the U.S. attorney in Jackson, Miss., has been told to take steps toward presenting the case to a Federal grand jury.

Parker, a 23-year-old Lumberton (Miss.) Negro indicted for raping a white expectant mother in a stalled car, was dragged from his cell last April. His body was found later in a river 20 miles away.

Initial Mississippi reaction to the newest Federal move was hostile. Judge Sebe Dale, in whose court the Pearl River County grand jury made its report, said he didn't think the Justice Department had a chance to get an indictment.

"They seem hellbent to punish us about everything that comes up," Judge Dale said. "They want to carry it to the last degree."

The decision to enter the case marked a sharp reversal for the Department. Apparently it would attempt to proceed under the civil rights laws. After a month-long investigation by the FBI last May, Justice Department officials admitted there had been no evidence of violation of the Federal kidnaping law because the lynchers apparently had not crossed a State line.

The FBI report was turned over to Mississippi. The 378-page report, which reportedly identified the men involved, was not considered by the local grand jury.

District Attorney Vernon Broom labeled the report hearsay. The grand jury could have it if it desired, he said. The 18-man jury, reporting yesterday, did not hand down any indictment in the case.

"From the standpoint of citizenship and law enforcement," the grand jury said, "our county compares favorably with any in the entire world."

In Jackson, Gov. J. P. Coleman and Attorney General Joe Patterson had no comment on the Justice Department's announcement.

District Attorney Broom said he also had no comment, but he added:

"It seems like a strange paradox to me that when a respectable woman of Mississippi is attacked on a lonely highway, the press showed little interest in it.

"Then when something happens to the rapist, the press raises an endless clamor."

LYNCHING OF MISSISSIPPI NEGRO GOES TO U.S. GRAND JURY TODAY

(By Claude Sitton)

BILOXI, MISS., January 3.—Federal grand jury investigation into the lynching of Mack Charles Parker, a Negro, will open here tomorrow amid growing national pressure for new civil rights legislation.

A panel of 23 Mississippians will be chosen to decide whether the evidence in the case warrants indictment for civil rights violations. If 12 or more find that it does the resulting trial will enable the Justice Department to bring out the full details of the crime.

The Federal Bureau of Investigation prepared a 318-page report on the case after a month's inquiry. This document has been kept secret, but details of the lynching are common knowledge in the area.

Acording to the story accepted here, 11 white men dragged Parker from the jail in Poplarville, Miss., last April and killed him with two shots through the chest.

The Federal grand jury investigation was requested by the Justice Department after a grand jury in Pearl River County did not return an indictment last November in Parker's murder.

Attorney General William P. Rogers said at the time that the county grand jury had called no FBI witnesses. And county officials said that jurors had not asked to see the Federal agents' report.

Mr. Rogers termed the handling of the lynching a "travesty on justice." He said he thought that disclosure of the evidence would shock the Nation.

If a trial should result from the new investigation, it would immediately precede or coincide with congressional consideration of new civil rights legislation, which will almost certainly include an antilynching bill. Debate is scheduled to start in the Senate about February 15.

Poplarville residents told a visitor last week that the names of the chief suspects and the details of the lynching had been common gossip in that county seat for some time. Inquiries there and among officials and others elsewhere in the State with a knowledge of the case produced a detailed account of events surrounding Parker's death.

The lynching, according to these sources, was carried out by seven white men from Pearl River County, about 1 a.m., on Saturday, April 25. It took place only 2 days before the victim was to have stood trial for the alleged rape of a young white mother who was pregnant.

Parker, a slight youth of 23, was a pulpwood truckdriver and cutter. He lived at Lumberton, 13 miles north of Poplarville.

Officials said he had no police record but had received a dishonorable discharge from the Army following two convictions for misappropriation of Government property.

Parker's two attorneys were Negroes. The prospect that they would cross-examine the white mother in open court on her accusations against Parker was said to have aroused intense bitterness.

VOIDING OF VERDICT FEARED

Some persons in the county realized that Parker might be freed by a Federal court even if convicted in the local court. State law requires that the jurors be drawn from voting rolls. And there were no Negro voters in the county.

A short time earlier, the United States Supreme Court had voided the conviction of a Negro in Carroll County, Miss., on the ground that members of his race had been systematically excluded from jury service.

Two days before the lynching, the editor of the Picayune Item, a weekly newspaper in the southern tip of Pearl River County, attacked the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People. The editor, Chance H. Cole, criticized the association for having obtained Negro attorneys to defend Parker. He then said:

"The vicious, violent treatment meted out to this white, Forrest County housewife, helpless as she was to defend herself, is enough to make any American's blood boil. We have never believed in mob violence, but if M. C. Parker is found guilty of this crime no treatment is too bad for him or those who would attempt to get him out of it.

But Parker, as it turned out, would never have a chance to be found guilty or innocent.

As the full moon rose over the pine fields and pastures of the Pearl River Valley the night of April 24, cars began to arrive at an unpainted farmhouse 6 miles from Poplarville. Soon there were 35 men or more, it was said.

HUSBAND REFUSES TO JOIN

Two of the men drove 36 miles to Hattiesburg to invite the husband of the alleged rape victim to join them. He refused.

His wife, who had moved south from upstate New York while a child, told newsmen after the lynching that Parker should have received a trial. She said she had no objection to being questioned by the Negro attorneys.

But this was the point most discussed by the men as they milled around in the hard-packed clay yard of the house. Many said they feared that someone would attack the lawyers in the courtroom. The decision was made to "take the nigger out of jail."

Paper slips, some blank and some marked, were placed in a container and shaken around.

Those who drew the marked slips went to the jail, the others went home, not knowing who the lynchers would be.

As was the usual practice, no guard was stationed at the combination courthouse and jail. Entry was simple, once three of the men had obtained the keys through a contact.

The filing cabinet in Sheriff W. O. Moody's office, where the keys were kept, showed the marks of repeated hammering the next day. But the lock had apparently not been broken.

Informants said that the number of men who entered the jail that night had never been established. Some grew afraid at the last minute and fled.

REPORTED MASKED

Parker's fellow prisoners said that nine men disguised in masks and gloves had clattered up the stairway at the rear of the second floor courtroom and into the cell block. One held a pistol. Others brandished clubs.

After a brief scuffle, Parker was dragged struggling and screaming down the stairway. His captors clubbed him on the head repeatedly. His head bounced off the steel treads like "a ping pong ball," it was said. A trail of bloody handprints was left behind as he clawed frantically at the steps.

Four men tossed Parker into the back seat of a four-door sedan, jumped into the car and drove off. Three others followed in another automobile.

The cars raced southward through the tung tree orchards toward the Pearl River, the boundary between Mississippi and Louisiana. They stopped just short of the bridge over the muddy river which was swollen by spring rains.

Parker was pulled from the car and dumped on the ground. Two shots through the chest ended his life.

FRIGHTENED BY HEADLIGHTS

The men picked up Parker's body to throw it over the railing. But the headlights of a car approaching from the Louisiana side of the bridge frightened them.

They threw the body into the automobile and drove away. It is thought that they crossed the bridge into Louisiana and turned around at a livestock inspection station. Driving back into Mississippi, they dropped the body into the river on the downstream side of the bridge.

By Saturday afternoon, R. W. Bachman, special agent in charge of the New Orleans office of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, and a number of agents had arrived in Poplarville. Gov. J. P. Coleman dispatched Bill Hood, Mississippi highway patrol chief, and one-quarter of the patrol's force to the scene.

Justice Department officials said the investigation that followed was one of the most intensive in the FBI's history and cost about $80,000.

One of those questioned by the FBI was J. P. Walker, a former deputy sheriff who operates an automobile body shop in Picayune. He was quoted as criticizing such an expenditure and the investigation into the death of "that Negro, who wasn't worth two bits."

Among others questioned were J. Florin Lee, a missionary Baptist preacher from the Poplarville area, and his son, J. F. Lee, Jr., a Poplarville automobile mechanic.

FBI AGENTS CRITICIZED

The family of Arthur Smith, a resident of nearby McNeill, complained that he had been harassed by the Federal Bureau of Investigation. A physician accused the agents of having interrogated another McNeill man, Christopher C. Reyer, so intensely that it had caused him to have a nervous breakdown.

Jewel H. Alford, of Poplarville, deputy and jailer and brother-in-law of Sheriff Moody, was also questioned repeatedly in the investigation.

Residents of the town seemed less critical last week of the FBI's activities in the case. One local official, who declined use of his name, said there had been no basis for the criticism in the first place.

Nine days after Parker was dragged from the jail, his body was found lodged in a brushfall on the river's edge. Identification was made through fingerprint records.

On May 25, the Federal Government withdrew from the case, saying that no Federal law had been violated. The punishment of crimes such as murder is left to the States by the Constitution.

U.S. PROSECUTION BARRED

Attorney General Rogers said it had been "clearly established" that the mob had not violated the Federal kidnaping act, apparently because it had not crossed the State line before killing Parker. He also said that "no other successful Federal prosecution could be maintained."

The report of the Federal Bureau of Investigation report was turned over to Governor Coleman, who subsequently gave it to Vernon Broome, circuit prosecutor. J. Edgar Hoover, the FBI Director, announced that agents would be available to testify "should the case be tried in a State court."

An 18-member grand jury was impaneled on November 2 by Circuit Judge Sebe Dale in Poplarville. In his charge, to the jury, the judge said that recent Supreme Court decisions might have been responsible for the lynching.

He referred to the Court as "that board of sociology, sitting in Washington, garbed in judicial robes."

Three days later the grand jurors went home without action in the Parker case. They had declined to hear FBI agents, who had offered to appear without being subpenaed.

Prosecutor Broome and County Attorney William H. Stewart indicated that the panel had made no request for the FBI report.

"I have an idea the Nation may look down on Mississippi justice now," said Judge Dale. "But I'm not apologizing."

JURY'S ACTION SUPPORTED

Those questioned in Poplarville last week said that residents generally agreed with the grand jury's course. They pointed out that there would have been practically no chance of convicting Parker's murderers had they been indicted. A trial, they contended, would only have embarrassed the community.

"You couldn't convict the guilty parties if you had a sound film of the lynching," said one official. He also asserted that not 1 person out of 100 in the town had realized the national implications of the case and not 1 out of 1,000 would care anyway.

There is regret over the lynching because of its effect on the town's reputation, according to Murphy Weir, editor of the Weekly Democrat. He said that most residents had believed Parker deserved a trial, although there was no sympathy for him.

More typical of the area's race relations, according to Mr. Weir, was the recent celebration of a Negro couple's 50th wedding anniversary. He said that more than 100 whites had attended an open house for them.

U.S. POSITION REVERSED

On the day that the local grand jury adjourned, the Justice Department announced that it would reenter the case. Attorney General Rogers made it clear later that this reversal of the Department's previous position had resulted from Mississippi's handling of the case.

"It was as flagrant and calculated a miscarriage of justice as I know of," he asserted.

Mr. Rogers also said that any prosecutions would be brought under one of two criminal statutes in the civil rights field, which were written into law during the Reconstruction era.

The first provides a maximum prison term of 10 years and a $5,000 fine for those involved in a conspiracy to deprive someone of his civil rights. The second imposes a year's imprisonment and a $1,000 fine on State officials found guilty of such a violation.

Lawyers question the constitutionality of the first statute when applied to private persons rather than officials.

INVESTIGATION PLANNED

An investigation of at least 2 weeks is expected to begin tomorrow after District Judge Sidney C. Mize empanels the grand jury. Some of the witnesses, who include the prime suspects in the lynching, have not been ordered to appear until January 15.

The Justice Department's determination to press the case is underscored by the sending of two of its lawyers from Washington, Ben Brooks and William A. Kehoe, to assist U.S. Attorney Robert E. Hauberg.

A refusal by the Federal grand jury to indict, observers contend, would provide striking support for those in the Justice Department who argue that new civil rights laws are needed.

U.S. JURY REFUSES LYNCH INDICTMENT

(By Claude Sitton)

BILOXI, MISS., January 14.—A grand jury announced today that it had found no basis for a Federal prosecution in the lynching of Mack Charles Parker, a Negro.

The panel of 1 Negro and 20 white residents of south Mississippi said they could not return indictments on the evidence presented by the Government.

The decision appeared to come as a surprise to defense lawyers retained by the men under investigation in the slaying.

One attorney, who asked that he not be identified, said "we had five names" of persons against whom action had been expected. Bonding arrangements already had been made for them, according to the attorney.

It marked a second failure to indict in the kidnaping and slaying of the 23-year-old truckdriver. He was taken from the jail at Poplarville, Miss., last April 25. Parker had been scheduled for trial 2 days later on a charge of raping a pregnant, white housewife.

A Pearl River County grand jury adjourned last November without taking action in the case, although details of the lynching and the names of those involved were common knowledge in that area.

This demonstration of the Federal Government's inability to bring Parker's murderers to justice was regarded as giving support to advocates of stronger civil rights legislation. An antilynching measure already has been introduced at this session of Congress.

The Federal grand jury was empaneled here January 4 as a result of action by Attorney General William P. Rogers. He termed Mississippi's handling of the case "a travesty on justice."

Officials of the Justice Department sought indictments on the ground that two civil rights statutes passed during the Reconstruction period had been violated. Prosecution for murder is left to the States under the Constitution.

Thirty-two witnesses, including some of the prime suspects, appeared before the jury. Most of the Pearl River County residents refused to answer questions on grounds of possible self-incrimination, it was said.

Testimony also was given by Federal Bureau of Investigation agents. The agency prepared a voluminous report on its month-long inquiry into the lynching. This was understood to include the names of the participants.

Government attorneys completed their case Tuesday and the grand jury began voting yesterday. Twelve affirmative votes would have been necessary for indictment.

Members of the panel filed into the second floor courtroom of the new Federal building here shortly after 10 a.m. to make their presentment to District Judge Sidney C. Mize.

The foreman, Charles P. Long, of Gulfport, said the jurors had heard all evidence the Government wished to offer and had made a careful study of the case.

"We are unable to arrive at any true bill," he told Judge Mize.

Mr. Long then said that the jurors felt that they could have never arrived at a true bill on the evidence that was presented.

The panel was thanked by the judge for "the very thorough way in which you have investigated this matter." In charging the jury, he had said that the question of a Federal violation appeared to hinge on whether a sheriff or deputy had knowingly permitted the mob to take Parker from the jail.

A defense attorney, Stanford E. Morse, Sr., of Gulfport, praised the grand jury after court was adjourned.

"Good work, Charlie," he said to Mr. Long.

The two Justice Department attorneys sent from Washington to assist U.S. Attorney Robert E. Hauberg in presenting the case declined to comment. They are Ben Brooks and William A. Kehoe.

Mr. CARROLL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HART. I yield to the distinguished Senator from Colorado.

Mr. CARROLL. I wish to commend the very able Senator from Michigan for a very fine and clear statement. At the time the hearings were held by the Subcommittee on Constitutional Rights of the Committee on the Judiciary I was present and interrogated Governor Coleman of Mississippi, when he testified on the so-called civil rights legislation. During that hearing I quoted the statutes involved for the benefit of both the record and the Governor of Mississippi. At that time I wondered why the FBI had turned the reports over to the Governor. I pointed out that the law in Mississippi was similar to the law in Colorado. There were judicial districts in the States and elected district attorneys. I pointed out that normally it is the district attorney who enforces the law, not the Governor of the State. That is true in Mississippi. Nonetheless, the FBI had turned the reports over to the Governor, with action not being taken until November—until after the election, I suspect.

The point was made by me at the time of the hearing—and immediately after the hearing I issued a statement about it—that I disagreed with the Attorney General, and said that there were statutes under which the suspects could be investigated and prosecuted and convicted if the evidence warranted such action. I cited the two statutes in question. Months later the Federal grand jury investigated under the two statutes I had mentioned. I suspect that there was a reason for not moving ahead.

Of course, those statutes are not so severe, from the standpoint of penalty, as a statute relating to murder. I must confess, also, that I would rather see, where there is a clear case of murder—and there was no question about that in this case—that the perpetrators of the murder be prosecuted under the murder statute rather than under some other statute which provides a lesser penalty. However, the Senator from Michigan has put his finger on a vital point, the question of national morality.

A very serious, tragic crime might be committed. It might be known who the defendants are; yet nothing can be done about it. This raises the question, What can be done under an antilynching statute?

Almost 25 years ago, when I was a young man, I was seated in the gallery of this Chamber and heard a great debate on the necessity, at that time, for an antilynching statute. The people had been led to believe down through the years—and I suspect there was some measure of truth in the statement—that lynchings had abated.

But in Mississippi there is a peculiar situation. I have not had the opportunity to read all the remarks of the distinguished Senator from Michigan, but this whole matter relates to the question of the right to vote in Mississippi. I think the record will bear me out that Governor Coleman testified that one could be seated on a jury only if he was a qualified male elector. One could be a qualified male elector in that county only if he was privileged to register to vote. In that county there was not one Negro on the rolls.

Mr. HART. That is the impression I have developed from a reading of the reports of the case.

Mr. CARROLL. This has been some months ago, but, if my memory is accurate, when I addressed to Governor Coleman the question whether the name of any Negro appeared on the rolls, his answer was, "No." In fairness to him, he did say, however, that Negroes were not deliberately excluded; he said they simply did not register. I have forgotten the exact figures, but I believe the population of that particular county was more than 50 percent Negro.

The fact remains, under the decisions of the Supreme Court, there cannot be a systematic exclusion of American citizens from a jury by reason of race, religion, or, I may add, color.

How could a jury have been selected to try this man? I think the charge against that particular defendant was one of forcible rape. How could he have been tried? He did not have a jury, under our American system of criminal jurisprudence, which could properly hear his case, because in that county Negroes were not permitted to become qualified electors; and not having become electors, they could not become jurors. Therefore, the case fell under the constitutional rule of systematic exclusion, and he could not have been properly tried under the American system of criminal law.

Mr. HART. Mr. President, there is an interesting development in the use of the Constitution of this country when the subject of an antilynching bill is proposed in Congress. Throughout the years, this kind of bill has been before Congress many times. Always the argument is made that the Constitution prevents the Federal Government from enacting this kind of legislation. Those who oppose such legislation invoke the Constitution of the United States as their reason for opposition.

Yet the Senator from Colorado has just cited an instance which is not an isolated one. Regrettably, in that one county, the people persistently ignore the constitutional obligation to afford every adult the opportunity to vote. They would have it both ways, in a sense.

Mr. CARROLL. I agree with the Senator's remarks. Let us assume that years ago Congress had passed an antilynching statute similar to the one now proposed by the Senator from Michigan. Would not the defendants in this case now be subject to indictment?

Mr. HART. My answer, of course, would be "Yes."

Mr. CARROLL. Would not the Federal Government be confronted with the situation which confronts it in the case of other statutes? I do not say this to harass the Senator from Michigan, but would such persons not have to be indicted by a Federal grand jury?

Mr. HART. Indeed, they would. As the Senator from Colorado has suggested, I believe we have an obligation which, in the eyes of the world, we will fail to meet unless we put on the books a statute which declares that this kind of crime is more than murder. This is a crime which involves individuals who go, in the dead of night, to a man's home and yank him out of it by violence.

Second, in putting on the Federal books a prohibition against such conduct and applying sanctions to those who would do it, I can only hope that by establishing it as a Federal crime, the Federal officials will aggressively prosecute and that, hopefully, a jury will return a verdict which the facts warrant.

Mr. CARROLL. The second proposition which the Senator from Michigan outlines is to me a very compelling and logical one. When the terrible crime of which we have spoken occurred, there was great indecision, I assume, on the part of the Attorney General of the United States and the Department of Justice as to whether they could prosecute under existing law.

Mr. HART. That is very clear from some exhibits I have introduced.

Mr. CARROLL. If at that time we had a clear statute covering the Mississippi situation, one that all State officers and all citizens could understand, that if a citizen were lynched, either by citizens alone or with the complicity of law enforcement authorities, then those responsible would be subject to a conspiracy statute and to a substantive statute for the lynching itself, if they were parties to it. There could be no question then. The authorities would be able to act without hesitation. Everybody would understand what the law was. Is that the understanding of the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. HART. That is the second reason which I think should compel us seriously to consider and, I hope, pass such a bill.

Mr. CARROLL. Even if there were such a statute, under the situation which developed in Mississippi, as I read the newspaper reports of the case as they emanated from that area, I doubt whether a Federal grand jury would have indicted under the statute.

What might have happened, had there been such a statute, was that perhaps the State enforcement officials themselves would have been a little more apprehensive as to what was taking place.

This brings us back to the fundamental question which we shall have to meet here in a week or two, the basic question which has been coming up every year, and which has come up with even more significance this year: that American citizens must be guaranteed the right to vote and to participate in our political system; the right to choose representatives; the right to participate in the jury system and all the other political rights to which American citizens are entitled, including, I may say, the right to trial by a jury of their peers. They cannot be afforded such trials unless they are given the full-fledged privilege and right to vote.

I thank the Senator from Michigan for his excellent comments. Under the circumstances I desire to study further his antilynching bill. I should be very happy and privileged to associate myself with him in the sponsorship of the bill which he is now discussing. I believe I was a cosponsor of a similar bill with the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. HART. In any event, I recall the great encouragement which the junior Senator from Colorado gave to me at the time I was considering the introduction of the bill. One is not happy in introducing such a bill; and my remarks, as they appeared when I introduced it, acknowledged that this might be regarded as singling out and pointing a finger at one region because of a recent highly emotional incident. At that time I made the point that such an incident could happen anywhere in the country, because similar incidents have happened in many places.

While the constitutional violation may not be the same, the basic motivation is. It happens when a Negro family seeks to move into a white neighborhood in Michigan, and there is violence. This is not peculiar or unique to any section. Regrettably, it is an aspect of human nature which the world which we seek to influence, and to whom we assert a claim to moral leadership, must view very dimly. For these and many other reasons, I hope that this last example, this last chapter, in the lynch book will trigger the enactment of Federal legislation against lynching. I do not know whether it will. I suppose that what will happen is that every time there is one of these incidents, it will be hoped by some that it will be the last; and by others that it will be the last and that it will not trigger action.

Mr. CARROLL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HART. I yield.

Mr. CARROLL. The Senator has raised a good point. This is not a question of pointing a finger at a particular State simply because we happened to mention Mississippi. I think Governor Coleman, who testified before our committee, is a very able lawyer. We commended him for his forthright expression of what the law of Mississippi is and how the judicial system there works.

I may say to the Senator from Michigan that in the past few months, since the Mississippi case, right in my own State of Colorado, the Colorado Supreme Court threw out a criminal case in northern Colorado, in a rich agricultural area, because it held that there was a systematic exclusion of Spanish-American citizens in the selection of a jury. So it is not a question of only one area. The principle of constitutional law applies to every area. The question is, Do we need further legislation, whether it is an antilynching statute or otherwise? Do we need stronger statutes so we can let citizens in each State and the law enforcement officers of the United States know that persons cannot break into jails and take the law into their own hands by disposing of a person who is charged with a crime? Is this a matter for Federal legislation under the Constitution? I think it is.

Mr. HART. I thank the junior Senator from Colorado. As he spoke, whether consciously or not, he must have had in mind a very persuasive memorandum of the law which was filed with the Judiciary Committee in the 2d session of the 84th Congress, subscribed to by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. HENNINGS], and the late great Senator from North Dakota, Senator Langer, making this very point in terms of constitutional justification for such action.

Again I thank the junior Senator from Colorado. He has pointed to that which underlies protection in this field against physical violence by self-appointed executors of the law. We in Congress should do everything we can, within our constitutional right, to protect the privileges and immunities of citizens including the opportunity to vote, in every section of the country. I think the Senator from Colorado has put his finger on the key that unlocks the door. If I read the wire service statements correctly, it is not that which the Attorney General would have us believe. It is not to ignore the bill introduced by the senior Senator from New York [Mr. JAVITS] and by the senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY], which undertake to do precisely what the President's Civil Rights Commission proposed, namely, authorize temporary Federal registrars, and thus assure the opportunity of citizens to vote.

Mr. CARROLL. Mr. President, I had no knowledge that the able junior Senator from Michigan was going to speak on this subject this afternoon. I am sort of speaking off the cuff. I think I can say, without any equivocation, that if there had been American Negroes registered in the county in Mississippi to which reference has been made, if the qualified male electors could have voted and if they had been on the jury list in that county in Mississippi, whose name I have forgotten——

Mr. HART. Pearl River.

Mr. CARROLL. Pearl River County. Had there been qualified male electors on the jury list, I have a strong conviction that the lynching would not have taken place.

Mr. HART. So do I.

Mr. CARROLL. If my recollection serves me correctly, when the defendant was arraigned, his counsel raised the constitutional question of systematic exclusion from the jury list. Not having permitted these persons to register to vote and be on the jury list, and fearing the case would be nullified by the systematic exclusion rule, I think the community, in its anger, not knowing what to do, decided to take the law in its own hands. This is a breakdown of the democratic process. Some people got together and took the law into their own hands because there was no law which could touch them, because of the weakness and defect in the democratic process.

I thank the Senator from Michigan. I shall not interfere with his presentation further. I think it is fine. It has stimulated my thinking on this subject.

I close with this one observation. If the Attorney General of the United States, the head of the Department of Justice, is very confused as to what the law is, one can realize the confusion which may exist in the various States as to whether action by Federal officials constitutes a violation of a statute. Whether we do it with an anti-lynching statute or not, we have got to strengthen the Federal laws to see to it that there is a protection of a person's right to a fair and speedy trial.

Mr. HART. I thank the Senator from Colorado and welcome the opportunity to benefit from the leadership he has given in this whole field in his role as a member of the Constitutional Rights Subcommittee of the Judiciary Committee.

His comment that he did not have word that I intended to make this speech is correct. Last night, however, I did send copies of these remarks to the distinguished Senators from Mississippi, in view of the comments which of necessity would be made with respect to that great State.

Mr. CARROLL. The reason why I made that observation is that I wanted the RECORD to show that this discussion is entirely impromptu and extemporaneous. I appreciate the Senator's discussing this matter. I know of his great interest in such legislation. In other words, there was nothing calculated about our discussion.

Mr. HART. Very likely the grammar and continuity will reflect that it is unrehearsed.

Mr. CARROLL. I hope the reporters will make some corrections.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, I have listened with great interest to the colloquy between my distinguished friends from Michigan and Colorado. I want to express my gratification that the Attorney General today, after conference with the President, has taken the initiative in urging action to further protect the voting rights of our citizens. This leadership on the part of the President and the Attorney General should prove to be an important stimulant to effective action in this field.

The administration's proposal for U.S. referees is in many respects not so far reaching as the recommendations for the appointment of temporary Federal registrars. Certainly it is a step in the right direction. I will urge that the Senate Committee on Rules and Administration, which is now considering a number of Federal registrar bills and is calling witnesses before it, immediately add the proposal for U.S. referees to its agenda.

The proposal as drafted by the Attorney General and presented this afternoon is worded in such a manner that it would normally, if introduced in the Senate, be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, since it amends the Civil Rights Act of 1957. However, that is a matter of phraseology, and it does deal with voting rights and does seek to strengthen the assurance of voting rights to all citizens, and could appropriately be incorporated in a bill to be reported by the Committee on Rules and Administration, if it should determine, in its wisdom, that that is the proper course.

Personally, I shall favor whichever procedure appears to me, after hearings, to promise the most effective relief to Americans who are being denied their right to vote by reason of their race, color, religion, or national origin.

The advantage of an administrative remedy through the appointment of Federal registrars is that it is generally more expeditious since judicial relief in voting cases, while vital, and now provided for in the Civil Rights Act of 1957, is often slow, cumbersome, and costly.

On the other hand, the administration's proposal has the advantage—a very distinct advantage—of being applicable to voting as well as registration, and is more closely related, it must be admitted, to the existing framework for prosecuting such matters.

The Federal registrar plan, which I favor—and I am not seriously concerned about the unconstitutionality question which has been claimed with regard to it—is applicable only to registration.

In other words, it could be asked, after we got them registered, where do we go from there? In any event, I hope it will be the subject of full hearings.

I trust the Attorney General or his representative will appear before our committee to express his views on it. I commend the President and the Attorney General for the action they have taken today. I know that their support of legislation to deal with this problem will greatly strengthen the hand of those of us in Congress who are determined to press for meaningful civil rights legislation during this session.

Mr. MCNAMARA. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

NATIONAL JUNIOR ACHIEVEMENT WEEK

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Calendar No. 1072, Senate Concurrent Resolution 81.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be stated by title for the information of the Senate.

The CHIEF CLERK. A concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 81) proposing observance of week beginning January 31, 1960, as National Junior Achievement Week.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Florida?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the concurrent resolution.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, I understand this is one of the customary resolutions in encouragement of a very worthy objective. I understand it is sponsored by the leadership on both sides of the aisle and that there is no objection to its being agreed to immediately. I believe the acting minority leader will agree with me.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that an analysis of the resolution, included in the committee report, be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the analysis was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PURPOSE

The purpose of the proposed resolution is to authorize and request the President of the United States to issue a proclamation designating the week of January 31 through February 6, 1960, as National Junior Achievement Week, and urging all citizens of our country to salute the activities of Junior Achievers and their volunteer adult advisers through appropriate ceremonies.

STATEMENT

A similar resolution, Senate Concurrent Resolution 3, was agreed to by the Senate of the United States on January 20, 1959, and agreed to in the House of Representatives on January 21, 1959.

Junior Achievement, Inc., is a nationwide, nonprofit organization which was organized in 1942 to provide high school students with the opportunity to learn American business methods by actually organizing and operating their own businesses under the sponsorship of local business corporations.

Students who are members of the Junior Achievement learn-by-doing business enterprise are advised by employees of the sponsoring firms. Junior Achievers are recruited in public and parochial high schools throughout the country with the cooperation of school authorities. The Junior Achievers meet and work in business centers maintained and supervised by Junior Achievement in communities from coast to coast. The members of Junior Achievement companies decide on the products they will produce and sell. They elect their own teenage officers and capitalize their own ventures through the sale of stock at 50 cents a share to parents, relatives, friends, neighbors, and themselves. The average capitalization is $100 per Junior Achievement company.

These teenage members buy raw materials, set up production lines, and manufacture products. From Boston to San Diego, from September to May, they are busy casting, molding, joining, polishing, binding, everything from lamps to oven mitts to bookends to hand soap. When they are not working on production lines, they are pounding pavements selling. When these Junior Achievers sell their products, they also sell the entire junior achievement program, for only in selling the program can they succeed in selling their stock and products. It is in this dual process of selling the idea to make the sale that the teenagers become ambassadors extraordinary of their private enterprise economy.

At the end of the junior achievement program year in May, each company publishes complete financial reports. At this time also dividends are paid to stockholders and many a company manages to pay 10 percent on the share, an impressive yield in any market.

Since its beginning in 1942, this program of junior achievement has spread from a few small areas in the northeast region of the country into a national organization in 95 communities from coast to coast.

This organization numbers more than 30,500 teenagers and operates more than 2,000 miniature corporations operating in over 95 communities throughout the United States.

The committee deems it appropriate that the week of January 31 through February 6, 1960, be designated as National Junior Achievement Week, thus calling to the attention of the citizens of this country the worthwhile program undertaken by thousands of high school pupils who are gaining a growing understanding of the privileges and duties of citizenship and are being better prepared to assume the responsibilities of community leadership through this program.

Accordingly, the committee recommends favorable consideration of Senate Concurrent Resolution 81, without amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no amendment to be proposed, the question is on agreeing to the concurrent resolution.

The concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 81) was agreed to, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the President of the United States is authorized and requested to issue a proclamation designating the week of January 31, 1960, through February 6, 1960, as National Junior Achievement Week and urging all citizens of our country to salute the activities of Junior Achievers and their volunteer adult advisers through appropriate ceremonies.

The preamble was agreed to.

FILLING OF TEMPORARY VACANCIES IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Calendar No. 559, Senate Joint Resolution 39.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint resolution will be stated by title for the information of the Senate.

The CHIEF CLERK. A joint resolution (S.J. Res. 39) to amend the Constitution to authorize Governors to fill temporary vacancies in the House of Representatives.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Florida.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, I call up the amendments I have at the desk, which I ask to have stated and made the pending question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendments will be stated for the information of the Senate.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 1, line 11, after the quotation marks, it is proposed to insert "SECTION 1.".

On page 2, line 8, to strike out the quotation marks.

At the end of the resolution, to add the following new section:

SEC. 2. The right of citizens of the United States to vote in any primary or other election for electors for President or Vice President, or for Senator or Representative in Congress, shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or any State by reason of failure to pay any poll tax or other tax or to meet any property qualification.

Nothing in this section shall be construed to invalidate any provision of law denying the right to vote to paupers or persons supported at public expense or by charitable institutions.

The Congress shall have power to enforce this section by appropriate legislation.

Amend the title so as to read: "Joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States to authorize Governors to fill temporary vacancies in the House of Representatives and relating to qualifications for voting in Federal elections.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, I have received word from the leadership that the action just taken is agreeable to both sides; namely, that the pending joint resolution be made the unfinished business, and that my amendment be the pending question.

I do not intend to discuss my amendment tonight, or at any time until after the author of the joint resolution itself [Mr. KEFAUVER] and Senators who may care to support the joint resolution or to oppose it have had full and reasonable opportunity to be heard.

Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Florida.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, I understand that there is no further business to come before the Senate today. I now move that the Senate stand in adjournment until 12 o'clock noon tomorrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 26 minutes p.m.) the Senate adjourned until tomorrow, Wednesday, January 27, 1960, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

TUESDAY, JANUARY 26, 1960

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Rev. O. Garfield Beckstrand II, associate pastor, Trinity Lutheran Church, Rockford, Ill., offered the following prayer:

Let us pray:

Almighty, everlasting God, Creator of all mankind, bestower of all good gifts unto Thy children, and protector of all who labor and seek Thy righteousness, still the problems, burdens, and anxieties of this day as we pause quietly and reverently before Thee.

Deepen within us that sense of Thy presence. Let Thy holy spirit breathe into our hearts pure and holy desires. Let Thy truth inform our minds. Help us to be reverent in the use of freedom, just in the exercise of power, and generous in the protection of weakness. Give us courage to put right before interest, others before self, principles above reputation, and Thy way before our desires.

Bless these distinguished leaders of Government who guide the destiny of our Nation. Give them strength and wisdom to carry out the mandates of their office to Thy glory, in Jesus' name. Amen.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate by Mr. McGown, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed a bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House is requested:

S. 2436. An act to revise the Federal election laws, to prevent corrupt practices in Federal elections, and for other purposes.

DISPENSING WITH CALENDAR WEDNESDAY

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the business

[1] Ad interim appointment issued.

[1] Ad interim appointment issued.

[1] Ad interim appointment issued.

in order on Calendar Wednesday of this week be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, may I ask the majority leader if it is true that the Committee on the Judiciary has a bill that they are anxious to bring before the House.

Mr. McCORMACK. Does the gentleman from Missouri desire to object to the request? If so, I will withdraw it.

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri. I have only reserved the right to object, and I will not object, because I think that is the prerogative of the majority leadership to schedule legislation; but I am simply calling attention to the fact that I understood that that is so.

Mr. McCORMACK. What is it that the gentleman understands?

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri. That the Committee on the Judiciary had a bill they were anxious to get before the House.

Mr. McCORMACK. Does the gentleman take the position that we should bring up the civil-rights bill under the Calendar Wednesday procedure?

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri. My personal position on that is "Yes."

Mr. McCORMACK. The gentleman amazes me.

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri. I would appreciate it if the gentleman from Massachusetts would explain to the House why that would not be a proper procedure.

Mr. McCORMACK. All that is necessary to bring the bill before the House under a procedure whereby the House can work its full will on this important legislation is to get 219 signatures on the discharge petition and bring the bill up under that procedure, or for the Committee on Rules to report out a rule and bring it up under a rule.

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri. All I can say is that the proceeding under the Calendar Wednesday rule would permit this bill to be brought out tomorrow.

Mr. McCORMACK. I do not believe that the gentleman is creating any misconceptions about this matter, certainly, in the minds of the Members of the House or in the minds of people throughout the country who are interested. The proposal also has been made that the bill can be brought up by the leadership under suspension of the rules. Of course, that would require a two-thirds vote and, of course, it would be a calculated risk that a responsible leadership would be aware of and realize the danger in such a procedure. Secondly, no amendments under such a procedure could be offered to the bill. Certainly, a bill of this kind ought to be brought up under a procedure whereby Members may offer amendments. As the gentleman well knows, many Members are interested and many people are interested in the offering of an amendment in connection with the voters registrar's provision. Many Members feel that such a provision should be a part of the bill, so that those who advance suspension of the rules to bring this up know that is not the proper way to bring this bill up in the House. And the same thing applies to Calendar Wednesday.

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri. If the gentleman will explain to the House why Calendar Wednesday is not a proper device within the rules of the House to bring this up——

Mr. McCORMACK. Calendar Wednesday, on occasion, is a very important device to have, but on a bill of this kind the gentleman knows you have got to dispose of the bill in a day, and if you do not dispose of the bill on Calendar Wednesday it does not go over until next Calendar Wednesday. The gentleman understands that. The last controversial bill on Calendar Wednesday we had ran until about 5 o'clock the following morning.

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri. If it is important enough there is nothing wrong with that.

Mr. McCORMACK. If we can get the bill out under a rule or a discharge petition, that provides for orderly debate and orderly conduct in the House, the gentleman knows that under Calendar Wednesday in connection with any bill of a controversial nature the House becomes chaotic.

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri. I do not know that. I do not think the gentleman does either.

Mr. McCORMACK. The gentleman says he does not know that? The gentleman amazes me. I have profound respect for my friend.

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri. I have respect for the gentleman and I know he has respect for me.

Mr. McCORMACK. But on this matter I say to the gentleman that I know he is doing a little probing but he is not fooling anybody.

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri. I took the floor last week to discuss the issue with particular reference to Calendar Wednesday. I think we should have a debate on the subject of whether Calendar Wednesday is not a proper device, because I do not like this position that we seem to be placed in on our side of the aisle that we are the ones that are dragging our feet in connection with this legislation.

Mr. McCORMACK. There are 11 or 12 committees ahead of the Judiciary Committee. When the gentleman says it can get on the floor tomorrow, I am sorry for the uncomfortable political position he is in.

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri. Oh, no.

Will the gentleman answer this question? Have any of the other committees bills that are ready? The gentleman says there is no other business for the rest of this week.

Mr. McCORMACK. I do not know of anyone who supports civil rights legislation outside of Congress that at this time of year wants to take the calculated risk of bringing up the civil rights bill on Calendar Wednesday.

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri. I do.

Mr. McCORMACK. I said anyone of responsibility outside of Congress. Certainly the officials of all the fine organizations of America, the colored race, and others who are interested do not want it brought up.

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri. Now, wait a moment. We are not told by other people how we do things. I think we in Congress figure that out for ourselves if we are responsible.

Mr. McCORMACK. But the gentleman is suggesting in January a course of action that would result in legislative chaos.

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri. I do not agree with the gentleman.

Mr. McCORMACK. All you have to do is to have the Rules Committee report out a rule and we can bring it up. The gentleman knows that rule will either be reported out in reasonable time or a discharge petition will be signed. I know how many signatures have been signed, but I cannot announce it, under the rules.

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri. Somebody announced it for the press.

Mr. McCORMACK. I know. But before the Judiciary Committee would have the right, 11 or 12 other committees could be called. If the gentleman is going to object, I will withdraw my request. I would not put the gentleman to the burden of objecting. If the gentleman is going to object, I will withdraw my request.

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri. No. If the gentleman pleases——

Mr. McCORMACK. The gentleman, feeling the way he does, ought to object. Certainly the gentleman is a Member of Congress; he cannot get around the smoke screen that he is a Republican Member. You will not offend me as majority leader if you object. If you do I will sit down with a smile on my face.

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri. No. The only point I am making, and I hope it is quite clear, is that the gentleman takes the floor as the majority leader and asks that the Calendar Wednesday rule be dispensed with. That is an indication to the membership of the House that we are not to take this matter up under the Calendar Wednesday procedure.

Mr. McCORMACK. The gentleman is not saying that at all.

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri. If that is the position of the leadership I want to make it very plain.

Mr. McCORMACK. The gentleman has his responsibility if he argues that we should bring up a bill of this kind under the Calendar Wednesday procedure.

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri. I do argue that this bill can and should be brought up under Calendar Wednesday, but I withdraw my reservation of objection inasmuch as the leadership of the House must be ready to use Calendar Wednesday. There would be no point to having Calendar Wednesday if the majority leader and I presume the chairman of the Judiciary Committee are not prepared to make use of it. Obviously they are not prepared to use it, otherwise we could have Calendar Wednesday tomorrow and take up the civil rights bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

COMPENSATION FOR ASSISTANT SUPERINTENDENT OF PRESS GALLERY

Mr. McCORMACK Mr. Speaker, I offer a privileged resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

HOUSE RESOLUTION 429

Resolved by the House of Representatives, That, effective February 1, 1960, there shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House, until otherwise provided by law, compensation for the employment of an Assistant Superintendent in the House Periodical Press Gallery, at the basic salary of $2,580 per annum.

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

U.S. LAMB INDUSTRY FACES CRITICAL TIMES

Mr. ANDERSON of Montana. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Montana?

There was no objection.

Mr. ANDERSON of Montana. Mr. Speaker, today, in San Antonio, Tex., the Nation's woolgrowers are meeting in national convention. One of the major topics before that meeting will be lamb prices, and the four points which affect those prices. The National Woolgrowers Association has prepared a report, entitled "What Makes Lamb Price," which I believe is worthy of the attention of every Member of Congress.

As this study so dramatically illustrates, there are four phases of the lamb-price situation in the United States which are creating major problems in the American lamb industry.

First is the growing price spread of the retailers. This is graphically shown by the charts of gross income and marginal trends in the lamb business. In studying the chart on annual averages, I found that in 1956 the producer received $22.05 for his product, while in 1959 he received $21.95. Thus, between 1956 and 1959 the grower's prices actually declined, but in that period of time the retail price of a lamb carcass went from $27.25 to $31.63, or a gain of more than 16 percent. Obviously, the grower is getting none of these price increases—the middleman is getting it all.

Second, the lamb supply trends chart reveals how the middlemen are increasingly bringing in outside lamb, or manipulating by bulk pressure in a market like New York City, to further break the price to the producer.

The third point is that buying power is so concentrated that the producer is at the mercy of the middleman. When three packers handle more than one-half of the slaughter, and when 15 packers do almost 75 percent of the slaughter, then this concentration of buying power obviously works against the interest of the producer. Such concentration of buying power, in this and other industries, is a matter I believe should be thoroughly looked into by Congress, in the interests of both producers and consumers.

Fourth is the import situation—certainly, Congress should take a look into this. In 1956, 1.3 million pounds of lamb and mutton were imported into the United States, and during the first 9 months of 1959, imports had jumped to 48.8 million pounds. The impact of this increase in imports on the domestic industry is obvious.

It is very apparent that the answer to the problem of the everwidening spread between retail prices and the prices paid to growers will only be found in appropriate congressional action.

GEN. DOUGLAS MacARTHUR'S BIRTHDAY

Mr. DORN of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina?

There was no objection.

Mr. DORN of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, Gen. Douglas MacArthur is one of the greatest military commanders in world history. With only a fraction of American manpower, money, and equipment, he and his gallant men crushed the Empire of Japan. MacArthur was supposed to fight only a holding action in the South Pacific until reinforcements from Europe, after the defeat of Germany and Italy, arrived. The vast proportion of U.S. manpower and industrial output was hurled at Germany and impotent Italy. A Germany greatly weakened by the attrition of her armies and air force in Communist Russia.

Final victory in Europe was won in May 1945. In the Pacific, General MacArthur faced a Japan potentially more powerful than all of Europe combined. Japan in 1942 was flushed with overwhelming victory on land, sea, and in the air. She had access to oil, rubber, aluminum, and controlled almost a billion people. Her army, navy, and air force were at peak strength. General MacArthur, rather than wait for Germany's defeat, embarked upon a brilliant strategy. By skillful application of land, sea, and air power, MacArthur bypassed vast enemy-controlled areas and destroyed the military power of Japan even before the surrender of Germany. General MacArthur by his genius saved the American people thousands of lives and billions of dollars.

Mr. Speaker, last week I referred to General MacArthur's contribution to freedom as occupation commander in Japan and commander of our Armed Forces during the Korean war. Mr. Speaker, on this, General MacArthur's 80th birthday, I join with his family and friends in wishing for him the happiest birthday of all.

THE HENNINGS CLEAN ELECTIONS BILL

Mr. UDALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arizona?

There was no objection.

Mr. UDALL. Mr. Speaker, the other body struck a note of high statesmanship yesterday when, by an overwhelming vote, it passed the Hennings clean elections bill. In my opinion, nothing has done more to put a cloud of distrust over politics and politicians than our antiquated and unrealistic election laws. It should surprise no one that Members of Congress have forfeited public esteem by their failure to modernize the model T Corrupt Practices Act of 1925.

In the interim our entire way of life and methods of campaigning for public office have been drastically altered, and surely the time has come when Congress must provide new legislation which will insure open elections and the fullest possible disclosure of the funds used by candidates in their campaigns.

The senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. HENNINGS] and I have collaborated during the last three Congresses in an attempt to secure a realistic rewrite of our Corrupt Practices Act. Later today I expect to introduce—with one major modification—the bill passed by the other body.

This change would eliminate the provision which provides for Federal regulation of primary elections and State conventions. Although it is my personal conviction that primaries and State conventions should be regulated, I recognize there is strong opposition in this body to such controls, and I have deleted this controversial section in order to facilitate favorable action on this measure.

Mr. Speaker, it is my hope that the House will rise to the challenge presented to us yesterday by our sister institution and pass a clean elections bill before we adjourn.

STEEL SETTLEMENT

Mr. ASHLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. ASHLEY. Mr. Speaker, I am sure Members of Congress were interested in the letter from Vice President NIXON to Alexander F. Jones, executive editor of the Syracuse Herald-Journal, relative to the role that NIXON and Secretary Mitchell played in the recent steel setlement.

For my part, I find it fascinating that Mr. NIXON should justify his role on the basis that Congress, in dealing with labor-management relations, would be politically irresponsible in an election year.

Mr. NIXON writes:

I can only say that any objective observer would have to agree that there could be nothing more irresponsible than to place before the Congress in an election year the complicated and potentially explosive issue of labor-management relations.

By implication, Mr. Speaker, we are asked to believe that there was absolutely nothing political about the Vice President interjecting himself into the steel dispute, absolutely nothing political about the settlement terms which he proposed, absolutely nothing political about the fact that the steel companies have indicated quite clearly that they will postpone steel price increases until after the presidential election this November.

With Mr. NIXON an avowed candidate for the presidency of the United States, I can hardly believe that the Vice President is as objective and politically responsible as he would have the Nation believe. On the contrary, on the basis of past performance, I think that it is much more plausible that Mr. NIXON's role in the steel settlement was calculated quite shrewdly and deliberately to win the gratitude of steelworkers, and at the same stroke to forestall any congressional consideration which might focus public attention on Senators KENNEDY, JOHNSON of Texas, SYMINGTON, and HUMPHREY—four leading Democratic candidates for the Presidency.

On the basis of steel profits in recent years, together with increased labor productivity, there is no question but that the steelworkers were entitled to a substantial increase. But neither is there any question as to the tremendous inflationary pressure which will be generated by the settlement coerced from the steel companies and so gleefully accepted by the union.

In his letter, NIXON himself says that the companies agreed to an amount which was "greater than they thought could be absorbed by increased worker productivity." This sentiment has since been repeated by officials of most of the major steel companies. Quite clearly, Mr. Speaker, the plot is to ambush the American public with higher steel prices sometime after the November election. This, in turn, is certain to set off a wage-price spiral throughout every sector of our industrial economy.

And yet we are asked to swallow Mr. NIXON's brazen assertion that Congress cannot be trusted to act in a responsible manner in an election year.

EXPLANATORY STATEMENT OF H.R. 9870

Mr. FLYNT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

Mr. FLYNT. Mr. Speaker, I have introduced H.R. 9870, "A bill to encourage the creation of original ornamental designs of useful articles by protecting the authors of such designs for a limited time against unauthorized copying and to preserve copyright protection for creators of artistic works in which copyright subsists." This bill has been referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

This legislation would safeguard designs which are originated by the person creating such designs much in the same manner as is now provided by existing law and would provide for continued protection of copyright in the event proposed legislation to limit and restrict copyright and registered design should be enacted.

The existing law of the United States provides that copyright in newspaper features, pictures, strip cartoons, drawings, television and motion picture films and other works is fully protected for a period of 28 years, with a renewable period of 28 years, or 56 years total.

Under the present law, a copyright is not lost, diminished or adversely affected—Mazer v. Stein (1954), 347 U.S. 201, 98 L. Ed. 630, 74 S. Ct. 460—provided a copyright owner uses his protected work industrially, commercially, or on useful articles—whether two or three dimensional. Full and complete copyright protection is given to the copyright owner, irrespective of the use to which he puts his copyright work.

Certain other legislation pending before the House Judiciary Committee—H.R. 9525—provides that a copyright owner, using his work industrially, commercially, or on useful articles, would lose his protection in that field unless he obtained design registration under the proposed act. If he obtained design registration under that act, a copyright owner would be afforded only a 5-year protection period on the registered design, and the totality of basic copyright protection would be seriously impaired.

If legislation is enacted which would provide for the protection of ornamental and commercial designs, legitimate copyright interests should not be unfairly penalized. The protection now afforded under present copyright law ought not to be lost, impaired, restricted, or diminished.

The measure which I have introduced in the House of Representatives primarily provides continued protection of copyright to the full extent now provided under the law of the United States in the event registered commercial design legislation should be enacted.

H.R. 9870 provides a 5-year term of protection plus the right to two renewable terms of 5 years each for registered designs. It further provides that a copyright owner has the right to choose to come under the proposed Registered Designs Act if he chooses; but unless he should elect to diminish the protection and term afforded by it by voluntarily registering under the provisions of the Registered Designs Act, his full copyright protection remains intact and inviolate.

Some other countries provide protection under design registration laws for a 5-year period plus two renewable terms of 5 years each. If Congress enacts registered design legislation, American nationals should not be placed in a less advantageous position than foreign nationals.

H.R. 9870 provides protection for commercial interests concerned only in short-term and limited protection for ornamental designs without unfairly or unjustly injuring or adversely affecting copyright interests which are satisfied with the full protection and term now afforded copyrights under the existing law of the United States.

The present protection afforded by our copyright laws to legitimate copyright interests should not be upset or diminished. H.R. 9870 justly and fairly provides for registered commercial designs without prejudice, injury, or hurt to copyright owners.

FOREIGN SERVICE REPORTS IMPROVEMENT IN LANGUAGE TRAINING AND SKILLS

Mrs. BOLTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks and include extraneous matter.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mrs. BOLTON. Mr. Speaker, in this day of rapidly expanding diplomatic relationships appropriate foreign language training becomes increasingly important for the men and women who represent us abroad. As more and more nations gain their independence, the need for linguistically competent Foreign Service personnel becomes ever greater.

Last year, the Congress demonstrated its concern in this matter by making available more funds for language training alone than were devoted to all types of training 5 years earlier. As a result of this new emphasis, remarkable improvement has been made by the Foreign Service in foreign language competence during the last year.

According to the results of proficiency tests given to more than 1,450 Foreign Service Officers, some 83.5 percent were found to have a working knowledge of at least 1 of more than 50 different languages. Of these, 24.7 percent rate a specialist or bilingual knowledge, 35.4 percent have achieved the professional level of proficiency, while 25 percent demonstrated a working knowledge of a second language. Less than 17 percent were found to be without a speaking knowledge of any foreign language.

During the next 5 years it is planned to provide 500 officers with full-time intensive language training for a period of from 8 to 24 months, with particular emphasis on the critical languages of Africa, Asia, the Middle East, and Eastern Europe. Together with those already trained and now in training, this number should provide the Foreign Service with a corps of competent officers prepared to meet the needs of U.S. diplomacy.

Mr. Speaker, I should like to commend the Department of State and the Foreign Service for their energetic language training programs. As their progress is well summarized in an article entitled "Language Training and Skills" in the Foreign Service News Letter of January 15, I include it at this point in the RECORD:

LANGUAGE TRAINING AND SKILLS

The results of the first 15 months' operation of the mandatory language testing program indicate that 83.5 percent of the officers tested have at least a working knowledge of at least one of the more than 50 different foreign languages spoken by officers in the Foreign Service. Since the inception of the program in August 1958, a little over 40 percent of the Foreign Service Officer Corps have been tested for language proficiency by the Testing Branch of the Foreign Service Institute or at one of the institute's oversea schools. As may be seen from the chart on the following page, 24.7 percent of those tested have a specialist or bilingual knowledge; an additional 35.4 percent have achieved the professional level of proficiency (S–3); and only 16.5 percent have less than a working knowledge of any foreign language.

Also, recently completed surveys of officers stationed in German-speaking countries and in Spanish-speaking countries of Latin America show that all but 15.5 percent have been trained or have the professional use level (S–3) of the language of their posts of assignment. As a result of this accomplishment, the schools in Mexico City and in Frankfurt am Main, which were organized several years ago to correct the language deficiencies then existing, have fulfilled their function. In the future, intensive language training for these areas will be offered in Washington prior to the departure of personnel to posts abroad if they do not already have a command of the language of the country to which they are assigned. The fact that over 40 percent of all Foreign Service officer positions are in Washington provides the opportunity for training at minimum cost to the taxpayer since no travel or per diem expense is entailed.

Over the past 4 years, increased emphasis on foreign language training and on the expanded training programs has enabled the Department of State to make marked progress toward meeting its foreign language requirements. For example, in fiscal year 1960, as in fiscal year 1959, more funds are being devoted to language training alone than were spent on all types of training in fiscal year 1955. Progress made to date indicates that by fiscal year 1963 the Department will attain the practical goal of having 85 percent to 90 percent of its officers reach at least the professional use level (S–3) in one or more foreign languages.

At the same time, further effort is being made to develop specialists in the critical though less widely used languages of Asia, the Middle East, Eastern Europe, and Africa. During the next 5 years, with a continuing budgetary support of these programs at not less than the current fiscal level, the Department plans to assign approximately 500 officers to full-time intensive training for a period of from 8 to 24 months in the languages of these areas. This number, together with those already trained and now in training, will provide the Service with a corps of officers having a knowledge of less widely known languages sufficient to meet the Department's currently anticipated requirements.

HOUSING SUBCOMMITTEE OF THE COMMITTEE ON BANKING AND CURRENCY

Mr. ALBERT. Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. RAINS] I ask unanimous consent that the Housing Subcommittee of the Committee on Banking and Currency may be permitted to sit during the session of the House today.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

There was no objection.

ORGANIZATION OF THE STUDY OF EMPLOYMENT, GROWTH, AND PRICE LEVELS

The SPEAKER. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BOLLING] is recognized for 60 minutes.

Mr. BOLLING. Mr. Speaker, the Joint Economic Committee today completed its special "Study of Employment, Growth, and Price Levels" by filing the final committee report. The committee had been concerned with the performance of the American economy. The recessions, unemployment, and the relatively slow growth, occurring together with continued inflation, raised serious questions about the adequacy of public policy.

Senate Resolution 13 established the study and provided for an appropriation of $200,000 and for a report to be filed by January 31, 1960. The study began with a first set of hearings on the problems and prospects of the American economy, at which four distinguished Americans, holding a wide range of views, testified. The late Professor Slichter was the initial witness, followed by Dean Neil Jacoby, formerly of President Eisenhower's Council of Economic Advisers, by Mr. Leon Keyserling, Chairman of the President's Council of Economic Advisers under President Truman, and by Mr. Marriner Eccles, former Chairman of the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System.

Early in April the committee selected Dr. Otto Eckstein of Harvard University as technical director of the study. Dr. Eckstein proceeded to recruit a basic professional staff consisting of three senior and four junior economists; several members of the permanent staff were assigned to the study, Mr. John Lehman as administrative officer, Mr. James Knowles as special economic counsel, and Mr. Norman Ture in a research capacity. Temporary research assistants and secretarial personnel were also added. The technical director was given a free hand in selecting his staff with the exception of one senior economist who was chosen by the minority and served as minority adviser. Dr. Padraic P. Frucht, formerly of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, served in that role.

The temporary research staff was recruited from various universities, including Harvard University, the University of Michigan, the University of Minnesota, Northwestern University, and Georgetown University. Early in June, at the end of the academic year, the temporary staff assumed its duties, collected various factual materials, and began a series of research projects designed to permit an analysis of the historical record and to discover policies that would promote the objectives of the study.

In addition to the internal staff work, 19 outside studies, dealing with particular aspects of the problems were commissioned. In commissioning these papers, the technical director sought out the best qualified people who were available for the work. The committee was very fortunate in getting the cooperation of outstanding scholars. Several of the papers, including "Study Paper No. 1," by Charles L. Schultze, were immediately recognized by professional economists everywhere as among the most important contributions to our understanding of inflation and growth made since World War II.

The committee also held nine sets of hearings at which almost 100 witnesses were heard. On every topic, the committee heard a wide and balanced range of views. In each instance, the committee endeavored to obtain the testimony of the best qualified experts in the field. It submitted a series of questions on monetary policy and debt management to the Secretary of the Treasury, the Chairman of the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System, and to dealers in Treasury securities, and published their comprehensive answers. The committee also invited the constructive suggestions of 12 organizations for reconciling the three objectives of employment, growth, and price level stability. Finally, as part of the hearings record, suggestions and comments sent in by individuals were published.

On July 30, 1959, the full committee met to consider the plan of research for the study. This outline, which is appended at the end of my remarks, called for detailed analysis of the economic effects of various economic policies, particularly in recent history. Monetary policy, fiscal policy, debt management and U.S. foreign economic policy were to be given particular attention. After thorough discussion, the committee voted unanimously to approve the plan of research. The committee was kept informed at every stage of the project.

Beginning in September, the committee published the first of the study papers prepared by outside consultants and by the staff. Thirteen of these papers have been published and the remaining ten will be made public within a week.

Besides providing general staff assistance for the hearings, the study staff engaged in a detailed analysis of the historical record. The findings of the staff appeared in the form of a 500-page staff report, a document which is the responsibility of the technical director. This report was prepared without intervention by the committee in any form. No member of the committee saw the report prior to its publication. The committee felt that its own deliberations would be best assisted by freely permiting the staff to reach its own conclusions and to have the staff prepare a set of recommendations. The Joint Economic Committee has steadily pursued the policy of seeking out the best available expert evidence, and to come to its own conclusions after having been exposed to the views of the experts.

The testimony of the witnesses, contained in the 3,500 pages of hearing record, the 23 special study papers, the answers to the committee questionnaire provided by the Treasury, the Federal Reserve System and Government bond dealers, and the comprehensive staff report together constitute the most thorough examination of the problems of employment, economic growth, and the behavior of the price level that has been undertaken in the United States since World War II. On the basis of all these materials, the committee then prepared its own report.

The full list of studies, hearings, and the resolution which authorized the study and the plan of research are appended at the end of these remarks.

Mr. Speaker, I would like briefly to read into the RECORD the conclusions of the majority of the study. It seems to me it is very important that we have in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a coordinated approach to the background of this study and to the major recommendations; and then at the conclusion of that reading into the RECORD I propose to read some testimony which occurred before a subcommittee of the Joint Economic Committee, the Subcommittee on Economic Statistics of which I am the chairman, by Mr. Allen Dulles, the head of the Central Intelligence Agency, dealing with the comparative growth rates of the United States and the Soviet Union.

But here are the conclusions, very briefly, of the majority in this year-long study, with all the exhaustive effort that went into it, on the basis of staff work and preparation. I commend this to the attention of all Members as I commend all of the document which is the committee report.

The majority has a set of views. There are supplemental views by one Member of the majority. The minority has a set of views. There are two supplemental views by Members of the minority. And I particularly commend to the attention of the Members the supplemental views of a distinguished gentleman of the other body, a Member of the minority, the Senator from New York [Mr. JAVITS], who has approached this matter, I believe, in an objective and at the same time discreet fashion, and who comes up with what is to me the fundamental problem that faces this country with regard to the performance of its economy. That is the very clear threat that is at hand from the Soviet Union in terms of economic competition. But the conclusions of the majority, in my judgment, represent the first real, fresh approach which has been made to the problem of the American economy, an approach which is realistic, an approach which involves the accomplishment of several objectives which will be very difficult of accomplishment but which are fundamental—and I say this in all seriousness—to the long-range survival of the United States and the free world.

The conclusions, in brief, are as follows:

In general, the fundamental conclusions about our economy to which we come on the basis of the study are:

1. It is possible with proper policies to achieve a high and sustained rate of economic growth, relatively full employment, without creeping or galloping inflation.

2. Under the present policies followed by the administration, the Treasury, the Federal Reserve, and the Congress, we would have to choose between growth equal to our potential, on the one hand, or price level stability, on the other.

3. Our future growth will depend on what we do now. If we pursue policies which will foster growth, the economy could grow at a rate of approximately 4.5 percent a year over the next 15 years. This is in sharp contrast to the rate of 2.3 percent of the last 6 years. These are amounts large enough to spell the differences between a rapid or slow increase in our standards of living and between meeting our public responsibilities at home and abroad fully or stintingly. We do not desire growth merely for its own sake. We need it to raise our standards of living, to meet our growing public responsibilities, and to improve our military position.

In fact, if we grow at 4.5 percent per year between now and 1975 instead of at a rate of 2.5 percent, the gross national product in 1975 would be $971 billion or $258 billion greater than it would be at a 2.5 percent growth rate.

If we grow at 4.5 percent, the gross national product in 1975 would be $139 billion greater in that year alone than if we grow at only 3.5 percent.

The cumulative amounts which we would gain from a growth rate of 4.5 percent per year in this period, instead of 2.5 percent or 3.5 percent, are staggering.

4. In order to get a rate of growth close to our potential, we must reduce the inflationary bias of the economy so that we will not have to choose between growth, on the one hand, or stable prices on the other. We must then pursue programs of growth. To grow at a high rate without inflation we must do the following:

(a) Make sure that final money demand for goods and services grows at a rate equal to the increase in the potential supply of them.

(b) Reduce the instability which still troubles the economy. There is nothing inevitable about the periodic recessions with which we have been plagued. While perfect stability will never be achieved in a dynamic economy, the frequency of recessions and their severity can be reduced.

(c) Improve the structure of the economy by reducing concentrations of market power and by increasing the mobility of resources.

(d) Increase the growth of the productive capability of the economy by investment in public and private capital, by raising the productivity of the labor force, and by improving the mobility of resources.

5. Our inadequate economic policies have contributed a good deal to the difficulties of recent years. Since the end of the 1954 recession, public policy has been concentrated primarily on curbing inflation. This has been done on the mistaken assumption that such policy will automatically promote economic growth. The policies used assume that the inflation of recent years was caused by generally excessive money demand. Our studies find that the real sources of inflation primarily lie elsewhere. In fact, money demand fell short of the potential output of the economy during most of the period, and the general restraints on demand imposed by public policies unduly retarded the growth in output and in employment without preventing price increases.

6. However, we also find that policies designed to promote growth will not automatically prevent inflation. While high output serves to raise productivity, a high rate of growth requires high levels of monetary demand. It is impossible to manage the increase in money demand, particularly with present policy tools, without having some of that demand hit industries in which output is pressing upon capacity. This would result in inflationary strains. The sheer promotion of total output without regard to composition may therefore very well result in strong inflationary pressures.

7. Concentrations of market power partially contributed to the inflation of recent years. Antitrust and similar policies designed to improve the competitiveness of the economy are important in reducing this source of inflationary strain but cannot be relied on exclusively for preventing increases in the general level of prices. Improved monetary and fiscal policies must also share in restraining inflation.

POLICIES

In general, the policies that would reduce instability, make our labor force more productive at full employment levels, increase our capital and use it more fully, and maintain our scientific advance, include:

1. Monetary and fiscal policies that permit money demand to grow in line with supply.

2. Measures to reduce the instability of output, especially the management of our defense orders in such a manner that they do not cause serious instability in the economy.

3. Greater reliance on fiscal policy so that monetary policy will not have to carry so much of the burden to achieve any desired restraint on total money demand. This means that we should aim for higher budget surpluses during periods of prosperity and a lower level of interest rates than have been achieved in recent years.

4. A comprehensive program for promoting the productivity of the labor force, for technical progress, and for facilitating the introduction of new technology. This program should:

(a) Provide Federal aid to education, without Federal control, particularly for those States with a large school-age population and poor financial resources.

(b) Provide a national scholarship program.

(c) Strengthen Federal programs of medical research and of vocational rehabilitation.

(d) Strengthen the private and public apprenticeship programs.

(e) Continue and increase support of scientific research, especially basic research, even in the event that the strictly military needs for advancement in science diminish.

(f) Set up national productivity centers for raising productivity in the low-wage, low-productivity industries and services in the economy.

(g) Encourage those institutions of collective bargaining that allow for the introduction of new technology and which promote an equitable sharing of the inevitable social costs of technological change.

(h) Provide unemployment benefits and retraining for workers laid off because of technological change, with benefits related to seniority.

(i) Establish special programs for the rehabilitation of depressed areas.

In addition, we should:

5. Reorder the priorities in Federal Government expenditures to place greater emphasis on those activities which contribute to growth, such as education, research and health programs, and reduce subsidies for agriculture and business, and prune wasteful Government activities.

6. Reform the Federal tax system to make it fairer, less obstructive to economic growth, and more productive of revenue.

7. Revise monetary policy so that we may have a growth in the money supply in line with the growth in total output and increase the effectiveness of monetary action.

8. Put greater reliance, to the extent possible, on selective policies which will curb excess demands in certain industries without causing general unemployment.

9. Carry out a more vigorous and more effective antitrust policy and, first, attempt to restrain groups that possess market power by voluntary methods and, second, take whatever steps in the way of hearings and factfinding that may prove necessary.

10. Reduce tariffs gradually.

11. Revise our farm policy, including more research to find new uses for farm products.

12. Improve our foreign trade position.

Briefly and in conclusion, it is perfectly possible to concentrate one's major effort on the problem of full employment both from the point of view of its economic impact and also from a social, humanitarian view of what excessive unemployment does to millions of individuals. It is equally possible to make an excellent argument that stability is the most important economic problem that confronts us.

I happen to have been preoccupied for 6 years with the significance in international competition of the problem of growth. A number of years ago my subcommittee, then called the Subcommittee on Foreign Economic Policy, began to explore through the Legislative Reference Service the facts as to the comparative rates of growth of the Soviet Union and the United States. This last fall we had full dress hearings, in which our first witness was the Director of the Central Intelligence Agency, Mr. Allen Dulles. In his testimony, which I should like to read in part, Mr. Dulles made the following statement:

Furthermore, in reviewing the various studies of Western scholars, I have been struck by the substantial agreement on the rate of industrial growth achieved by the Soviet Union over the period since 1950. The range of estimates is from 9 to 10.5 percent a year.

* * * * *

Virtually all Western measurements point to this conclusion—that Soviet industrial production has been growing at a rate at least twice as rapidly as that of the United States since 1950.

We estimate the growth of the Soviet GNP during the present decade, or a little short of a decade, 1950–58, to have been at an annual average rate of about 7 percent measured in constant prices. Estimates by others for similar time periods range from a low of 6 percent to a high of 9 percent. The degree of agreement is perhaps even closer than this range would indicate since these other estimates I have mentioned have varying initial and terminal dates within the decade. The conclusion, then, is that Soviet GNP has also been growing twice as rapidly as that of the United States over the past 8 years.

Mr. Dulles concluded his statement before the subcommittee of the Joint Economic Committee as follows, and I suspect this is one of the most important statements made by anybody in the Congress or from the executive branch in a very long time because in it there is very clearly presented to all of us and to the American people the kind of hard choices we are going to have to make in the use to which we put the product of our economy.

Mr. Dulles concluded:

And now, Mr. Chairman, to summarize and conclude this rather long statement:

1. The Communists are not about to inherit the world economically. But while we debunk the distortions of their propaganda, we should frankly face up to the very sobering implications of the Soviet economic program and the striking progress they have made over the last decade.

2. The fulfillment of the present Soviet 7-year plan is a major goal of Soviet policy. Khrushchev and the Kremlin leaders are committed to it and will allocate every available resource to fulfill it. The present indications are—that Khrushchev desires a period of coexistence in which to reach the objectives of this plan.

3. Future economic gains will also provide the goods and the services needed to further expand Soviet military power, if they choose so to use it, and to carry forward the penetration of the uncommitted and the underdeveloped nations of the free world. These gains will also permit the Soviet to further assist in the rapid economic growth of the Kremlin's eastern ally, Communist China, if Soviet policy considerations dictate such a course.

4. If the Soviet industrial growth rate persists at 8 or 9 percent per annum over the next decade, as is forecast, the gap between our two economies by 1970 will be dangerously narrowed unless our own industrial growth rate is substantially increased from the present pace.

5. The major thrust—

And this is the most important conclusion—of Soviet economic development and its high technological skills and resources are directed toward specialized industrial, military, and national power goals. A major thrust of our economy is directed into the production of the consumer-type goods and services which add little to the sinews of our national strength. Hence, neither the size of our respective gross national products nor of our respective industrial productions is a true yardstick of our relative national power positions.

The uses to which economic resources are directed largely determine the measure of national power.

Mr. Speaker, I would hope that every Member of the Congress and every member of the executive branch of our Government and every citizen of the United States would read and think and ponder on those words of the Director of the Central Intelligence Agency.

GENERAL OUTLINE OF STUDY, JOINT ECONOMIC COMMITTEE, EMPLOYMENT, GROWTH, AND PRICE LEVELS, JULY 30, 1959

The following outline indicates the major problems to which the study addresses itself and the work being done on them.

I. EMPLOYMENT

Three facets of the employment problem are being analyzed:

A. the determinants of the total size of the labor force;

B. the variations in employment caused by recessions, and the sources of instability which remain in the economic system;

C. structural unemployment—a major study, in terms of particular frictions, industries, areas, age brackets, and other characteristics, by the Bureau of Labor Statistics.

II. ECONOMIC GROWTH

A. The significance of economic growth for the attainment of national objectives will be shown.

B. There will be a detailed analysis of the historical record, particularly since World War II, looking at different sectors of the economy and seeking the determinants of this historical growth.

C. The determinants of growth will be studied, including: the rate of investment, the size, training, skill, and productivity of the labor force, the resource base, the role of research and development, adequate provision of the requisite public services, and the effect of recessions on growth.

III. PRICES

A. Several empirical studies of the inflation of the last decade are underway. These studies seek to penetrate below the levels of broad economic aggregates, to examine the inflation in terms of the problem areas. Analyses include price and wage movements by industry, price changes of services, rising costs of Federal, State, and local governments and the identification of particular bottlenecks that have occurred. The role of prices in our changing international trade position is also being explored.

B. Studies of price and wage policies are being prepared, exploring the economic and administrative experience in foreign countries and in the United States.

IV. POLICIES TO ACHIEVE THE OBJECTIVES

Several studies are being made to see how different policies serve to promote the objectives of the Employment Act. These studies contain the historical background and the available evidence on the general economic effects of the policies; the implications of alternative combinations of policies will also be explored. Monetary policies, fiscal policies, debt management, and U.S. foreign economic policies will be given particular attention.

SENATE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION 13

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Joint Economic Committee, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, as authorized by the Employment Act of 1946, as amended, is authorized and directed to conduct a full and complete study of and investigation into the problems of providing maximum employment and an adequate rate of economic growth, as well as maintaining price stability and preventing inflation, including, among others, the following subjects:

(1) Historical and comparative rates of unemployment, production, and prices;

(2) Inflation and deflation caused by increases and decreases in the effective supply of money and credit and the effects of these and of interest rates on growth, employment, and economic stability;

(3) The effect of monopolistic and quasi-monopolistic practices upon prices, profits, production, and employment;

(4) The effect of increases in wages, salaries, and the prices of personal services, together with union and professional practices, upon prices, profits, production, and employment;

(5) The effect of governmental expenditures, taxation, and budgetary surpluses and deficits and of monetary and debt management policies upon price levels, production, and employment;

(6) International influences affecting prices, production, trade, and employment; and

(7) Constructive suggestions for reconciling and simultaneously obtaining the three objectives of maximum employment, an adequate rate of growth, and substantial stability of the price level.

SEC. 2. For the purposes of this resolution, the joint committee, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized through January 31, 1960 (1) to appoint and fix the compensation of such experts, consultants, or organizations thereof, and clerical and stenographic assistants as it deems necessary and advisable; and (2) to hold such hearing to sit and act at such times and places, to require by subpena or otherwise the attendance of such witnesses and the production of such books, papers, and documents, to administer such oaths, to take such testimony, and to make such expenditures, as it deems advisable. Subpenas shall be issued under the signature of the chairman or vice chairman of the joint committee and shall be served by any person designated by them.

SEC. 3. The joint committee shall from time to time report its findings and recommendations to the Senate and the House of Representatives and shall make its final report at the earliest practicable date but not later than January 31, 1960.

SEC. 4. The expenses of the joint committee under this resolution, which shall not exceed $200,000, through January 31, 1960, shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers approved by the chairman of the joint committee.

Mr. COFFIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOLLING. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. COFFIN. I commend the gentleman for initiating a discussion of this most important report. I think a discussion could be started in no better way than by pinpointing for us the crucial problems of our time. I would like to ask whether or not my understanding is correct, that in arriving at the conclusion that the growth of which we are capable in the period ahead, stated in the report as being in the order of 4½ percent a year, the assumptions did not involve any spectacular conditions? That is, this is a prediction of the capability of our economy, given certain policies, but not assuming any massive intervention by the Government as far as either industry or labor is concerned?

Mr. BOLLING. The gentleman is correct. That is the conclusion of a majority of the report. It is also the conclusion of a number of witnesses who appeared before the committee. I might mention only one distinguished economist, who made available to us the results of the study made independently by the National Planning Association. They arrived at the conclusion that without any massive changes, but with somewhat different policy approaches, that it is the capability of the American economy to grow at a rate of more than 4 percent. Our majority report is a packaging of many policies that are more realistic in our view than any heretofore proposed and which rely on all the weapons available to us instead of perhaps just one or two. The core of the recommendation of the majority is what is said about fiscal policy and taxes. I particularly have in mind that tax reform is perhaps the main issue by which we will find the solution.

Mr. COFFIN. I thank the gentleman. I think he has made a real contribution.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOLLING. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. If I am correct in the assumption that one of the struggles of our day is the struggle of the backward nations of the world, does the gentleman now express his concern that the rate of growth which the Soviet group shows is so far above our national rate of growth that we may fail to excite favorable interest among the poorer nations?

Mr. BOLLING. There is no question about it. This is one of the most important problems involved in this question. We are living in a world in which there are hundreds of millions of people who have aspirations to have nothing more complicated than enough to eat and to wear and to have some medical attention, a relief program from a disaster. Those are people in the underdeveloped, poverty-stricken areas of the world. They are looking for methods to achieve a solution to give them some kind of decency in living. Inevitably, they are going to compare the two economic systems. If the Soviet and Chinese Communists are able to say, "We are the system you need to follow, because we accomplish your objective much faster than do the capitalist nations," then it is possible that this will be a great propaganda weapon for the Communists. It seems to me that this in itself justifies a great deal of attention to the problem of growth in this country, aside from the very clear social benefits that would accrue to the people of the United States in the process.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. I want to pursue that a bit further. One of the questions often put to us is, Can we afford to be concerned about the rate of growth in other countries? If I read the evidence of the committee and understand the issue correctly, am I right in believing that our most satisfactory economic relations are with the nations which have the highest income?

Mr. BOLLING. There is no question about that.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Therefore, as we make whatever contribution we can to the improvement of the welfare of what are now undeveloped nations, are we not improving their capacity and improving our own markets in those countries?

Mr. BOLLING. There is no legitimate argument against that point of view.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Then, even if we are doing them a favor by making whatever investment or any assistance that we may be able to make in raising their growth rate we are at the same time really making a long-term investment in the wealth of America economically.

Mr. BOLLING. I think there is no question about that. Personally, I prefer to emphasize the fact that we are doing it because we should be doing it; but there is no question that the end result is advantageous to ourselves as well.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. I share the gentleman's thinking completely. I think we should discuss these things, but these goals should be pursued in terms of their own intrinsic merit and not merely because there is some selfish gain to be had in the bargain. When I raised the argument I recognized the gentleman himself had this deep concern for his fellow humans.

My own feeling is that the peace of the world is best assured by reducing the tensions, the hunger and poverty in the rest of the world, and economic developments will, of itself, add to our own economic well-being even as it will reduce tensions that make for wars and unrest in the world.

Mr. BOLLING. I thank the gentleman for his comments.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks and include extraneous matter.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

BREAKING NEW GROUND IN POLITICAL ECONOMY

The SPEAKER. Under the previous order of the House, the gentleman from Maine [Mr. COFFIN] is recognized for 60 minutes.

Mr. COFFIN. Mr. Speaker, before continuing to discuss the Joint Economic Committee Study on Employment, Growth, and Price Levels, I would like to insert in the RECORD at this point an editorial from the January 9, 1960, issue of Business Week relating to the work of our highly competent staff:

TO STOP INFLATION

The settlement in steel—and the inflationary worries it raises—give fresh point to the staff report on employment, growth, and price levels, prepared by the Joint Economic Committee of Congress under the direction of Otto Eckstein (Business Week, January 2, 1960, p. 61).

The Eckstein study (and the steel settlement) should bury once and for all the notion that inflation is basically a simple phenomenon that can be explained by the old saw about too much money chasing too few goods. Excess demand may cause some inflations, but the Eckstein report offers evidence that recent U.S. inflation has been caused, not by excess demand, but by a combination of unstable output, the power of big business and big labor, and continuous upcreep in the prices of services.

Attacking this kind of inflation, as the administration has done, with the present set of policy tools—with heaviest emphasis on general monetary policy—has been, according to the Eckstein report, the major cause for the slowdown in growth—a slowdown that, even so, did not produce price stability. At the same time, the Eckstein report slashes at those Democrats whose favorite theorist is Leon Keyserling, who believe that promoting faster growth will suffice to halt inflation.

The Eckstein report, instead, recommends using an arsenal of weapons designed to hit the specific causes of the type of inflation we have been suffering. To deal with instability of production—caused by huge shifts in demand upon particular sectors—the report recommends selective controls, especially consumer credit controls, that hit the area of disturbance, rather than a different sector, as general controls are likely to do. To attack power over prices, the report favors a vigorous antitrust program and a steady reduction in tariffs. For long-run growth, the report makes as its single most important recommendation heavier Federal investment in education.

On all these measures, the Eckstein report is clearly not going to be the last word. The merits of some of its specific proposals are highly debatable. But Eckstein and his staff deserve a vote of thanks for providing a work of analysis which should raise the level of debate on this most crucial economic problem of our time.

It is to try to live up to the Business Week expectation of a high "level of debate on this most crucial economic problem of our time" that I make these remarks.

There is nothing wrong with a debate on subjects so vital as those encompassed by the study of price stability, full employment, and growth just completed by the Joint Economic Committee. Indeed, the study would have been futile if it did not stimulate controversy and the vigorous contention of ideas. But it would be equally futile if the battle were waged under ancient banners, with the same old war cries, weapons, tactics, and objectives. It would be as ludicrous an exhibition as diagnosing symptoms by references to ancient texts on humors, when the electron microscope is available.

It is the purpose of my remarks to indicate where, in the study, new ground was broken and some overworked sacred cows were ploughed under. Some of the cows used to graze in Democratic pastures; others, in Republican ranges.

To gain the full benefit of the hearings, separate studies, and staff report, it is vital for the Congress—on both sides of the aisle—to realize that knowledge must constantly expand to catch up with truth. This means that many of us, to make constructive contributions in this area, must part company with some old ideas which have served us well, and perhaps too long.

In charting the new depths reached by the economic bathysphere, I shall try to substantiate my remarks with references to the hearings, study papers, or the staff report.

The study of employment, growth, and price levels plowed new ground in three general areas: First, the analysis of inflation; second, the analysis of economic growth, particularly in the short-run; and third, the effectiveness of various policies in promoting stable prices in economic growth.

The study found that the simple views which had been used to characterize the relationships between growth and prices were quite inadequate, and did not provide a reasonable scientific basis for the design of possible policies—"Staff Report on Employment, Growth, and Price Levels," page XXI and following. In particular, the study rejected three views:

The first is the simple notion that a vigorous anti-inflation campaign, in the form of very tight money and stringent budgets would automatically promote economic growth. This theory assumes that all inflation is due to a general excess of demand over supply; that is, too much money chasing too few goods, that prices and wages are very flexible, so that any restriction of demand anywhere will affect prices generally, and that resources move freely and quickly from industries and regions where they are in excess to industries where they are in shortage. In fact, the economy has many rigidities, and unless fiscal and monetary policies designed to keep demand in check have a direct impact on the prices which are rising, only a high level of unemployment and of idle capacity will lead to stable prices. Thus, present policies have in fact left us with the dilemma of either having high employment and growth, at the cost of inflation, or having stable prices with unemployment and slow growth.

Second. The study rejected the theory that the promotion of economic growth would halt inflation. This theory argues that rising output leads to increasing productivity, and that the rate of increase of wages is constant. Therefore, it is argued that the increase in output drives down unit labor costs. The study rejected this theory because it was found that the rate of wage increase would also be greater if output rose more and that policies designed to stimulate output would have some of their effect on industries in which demand was outrunning supply. Thus, the study rejected this easy route, just as it did the first.

Third. The study rejected the view that inflation is wholly caused by monopoly power, and that all that was required to get stable prices was to attack concentrations of monopoly power. It was found that monopoly did play a role in inflation, but that it was far from the whole story.

These three theories, which had dominated the stage of the discussions prior to the study, all have in common a simplicity, and very simple policy implications. None of them suggests that the choices ahead of us are difficult and that only the highest degree of wisdom and ingenuity will give us economic policies that will reconcile adequate growth and stable prices. The study, with the limitations of time, of resources, and of the inevitable imperfections of our knowledge about the economic system, offers no simple guaranteed recipes. But through its analyses of the workings of the economy, particularly the processes of inflation and growth, and through the many policies which are either recommended or suggested for further study, it has moved the level of debate on to more realistic ground and improved our chances for achieving a satisfactory level of performance for the American economy.

ANALYSIS OF INFLATION

The inflations of 1945–48 and 1950–51 have been generally understood and were clearly due to war and its aftermath. The large stocks of liquid assets at the end of World War II and the backlogs of demands of consumer durables and housing led to general excess demands which drove up prices. From 1951 to 1955, prices were quite relatively stable but in the subsequent years the economy experienced creeping inflation. Since economic growth was relatively slow, unemployment, even in good times, was in excess of 4 percent. These price increases were both puzzling and alarming, and led some observers to the belief that some creeping inflation was inevitable. The study analyzed this inflation in detail and reached the following major conclusions:

First. The inflation was very concentrated in relatively few sectors—see study papers No. 1, "Recent Inflation in the United States," by Charles L. Schultze; No. 2, "Steel and the Postwar Inflation," by Otto Eckstein and Gary Fromm; No. 3, "An Analysis of the Inflation in Machinery Prices," by Thomas A. Wilson; No. 5, "Trends in the Supply and Demand of Medical Care," by Markley Roberts; No. 17, "Prices and Costs in Manufacturing Industries," by Charles L. Shultze and Joseph L. Tryon; and No. 21, "Postwar Inflation," by Harold M. Levinson; and "Staff Report on Employment, Growth, and Price Levels," chapter 5.

In many industries, prices were stable. The exceptions, which accounted for most of the increases in the price indexes, were steel, machinery, commercial construction and services, including the cost of government.

Second. To a large extent, these price increases were a byproduct of the instability of output in this period—see study paper No. 3, "Analysis of the Inflation in Machinery Prices," by Thomas A. Wilson. The climb in machinery prices occurred when orders for the industries' product ran far in excess of production during the capital goods boom of 1955–57. Similarly, the increase in costs of commercial construction took place as a result of the capital goods boom.

The pattern of wage increases, which helped to drive up unit labor costs over several years, was determined by the key wage bargains in autos and steel in 1955 and early 1956. These long-term contracts were signed on the basis of the very rapid and large rise of corporation profits in 1955, which were caused by the rapid recovery from the recession, facilitated by a rapid expansion of consumer credit.

Third. The exercise of market power also contributed to the inflation of recent years—for a discussion of the effect of market power on the rate of growth and the need for competition, see hearings, part 7, "The Effect of Monopolistic and Quasi-Monopolistic Practices Upon Prices, Profits, Production, and Employment," testimony of Hines, Martin, page 2001; Bicks, page 2100; Markham, page 2120; and Duesenberry, pages 2324–2328. A detailed analysis of price and behavior in the steel industry revealed that prices and wages in this industry rose far more than in other industries, despite the fact that the demand for steel products was not particularly favorable. Steel is a particularly important commodity because it enters as a cost into many other products. Had steel prices behaved like other industrial prices, the finished goods prices of wholesalers would have risen by one-third less for 1953 to 1958. This extraordinary behavior must in part be attributed to the market power possessed jointly by management and labor in the steel industry.

Fourth. Among consumer prices, services played much the largest role—see study paper No. 2, "Steel and the Postwar Inflation," by Otto Eckstein and Gary Fromm. The cost of medical care—particularly the hospital care component—has risen enormously because of shortages of personnel and of hospital facilities in the face of a rapidly rising demand associated with higher incomes and with increased coverage of medical insurance. The prices of services using unskilled labor have risen even though the wages of unskilled workers have generally risen less than the average. This is because productivity has risen so much less than elsewhere.

These last three factors account for most of the inflation since 1955.

ANALYSIS OF ECONOMIC GROWTH IN THE SHORT RUN

The study investigated in some detail the causes for the low growth rate of output of the last 6 years. Growth has been at a rate of 2½ percent or less, a rate well below our long-run average, and far below the potential growth of which the economy is capable. These were the reasons that were found for this slowdown—see study paper No. 15, "Profits, Profit Markups, and Productivity; An Examination of Corporate Behavior Since 1947," by Edwin Kuh, and "Staff Report on Employment, Growth, and Price Levels," chapter 3:

First. At the end of the Korean war, the demand for goods and services of Government fell and provided the happy opportunity for the expansion of output for public and private civil purposes. However, the total demand for goods and services was not allowed to grow at a rate equal to the growth of supply of the economy. The blame for this inadequate growth of demand cannot be placed solely on monetary policy or on fiscal policy. It is the total result of economic policies which must be judged, and the evidence clearly points to the fact that capacity increased substantially more than output.

Second. Growth was also retarded by the two recessions, which accounted for more than one-third of the period of slow growth. A dynamic economy cannot be expected to grow without fluctuation, but the instability of recent years was in part unnecessary and the fault of economic policy. In each instance, as in the recession of 1949, sudden changes in the orders of the Federal Government, particularly for defense, played an important contributory role to the downturns. Further, in the case of the recession of 1958, the failure of demand to grow in line with capacity hastened the end of the capital goods boom and intensified the decline of fixed investment.

Third. The output of goods-producing industries of the economy increased at a very low rate. At the same time, the output of services rose more. The entire increase of the labor force since 1953 was absorbed by the service industries and by Government, most of it in the low-wage, low-productivity portions of the service industries.

To some extent, this shift to services was inevitable. The decline in Government defense purchases was particularly concentrated in goods-producing industries. Also, with the backlogs of demand for consumer durables disappearing, households inevitably shifted some of their expenditures to services. The rising fraction of the population which is either of school age or over 65 also reinforces this trend.

However, the failure of purchasing power to grow played a crucial role in this development. The demand for durable goods is heavily dependent on the increase in per capita purchasing power. In recent years, real purchasing power has risen very slowly, cutting into potential consumer purchases of goods. Government demands for goods were kept in check by tight budgeting policies. Investment demands for goods were kept down by monetary policies that limited residential construction and by the total economic policy which made the capital goods boom of 1956–57 come to a premature end. If the economy is to grow at a rate equal to its potential, we must manage our economic affairs better.

Fourth. The productivity of some industries, particularly manufacturing, increased very little, especially from 1955 to 1957, because of the failure of output to grow.

ANALYSIS OF ECONOMIC GROWTH IN THE LONG RUN

In the second and third set of hearings, the committee had the benefit of surveys of the factual knowledge on this subject from several of the most outstanding authorities in this field. Further hearings, particularly about policies for long-run growth, were held as part of the parts 7, 8, and 9 of the hearings. Several study papers were also devoted to this subject—see study papers Nos. 13 and 20. The staff report integrated and summarized these findings, and drew up a set of recommendations designed to promote a long-run rate of growth. These findings can be summarized as follows—see "Staff Report on Employment, Growth, and Price Levels," XXIII.

First. No economy can match the record of growth of the American economy over the past 120 years.

Second. More than half of the historical growth is accounted for by improvements in the quality of our labor force and by technological progress, with only the remainder due to the increase in sheer quantity of labor and capital.

Third. The abundance of our natural resources which has been a great stimulant to our past growth, promises to remain adequate in the foreseeable future. There will be some special resource problems, but the general outlook is favorable.

Fourth. Throughout our history, economic growth has been interrupted by recessions. In these periods, it was demand rather than supply of goods and services which determined output.

The following policies are recommended to raise our long-term rate of growth—see staff report, page 55. For testimony on the contribution of education to long-term growth, see "Hearings on Employment, Growth, and Price Levels," part 9A, testimony of Witnesses Musgrave, Baumol, Gordon, and Heller; and part 7, testimony of Witness Power.

First. To assure continued improvement in the quality of our labor force, a program of Federal aid to education is proposed.

Second. The Federal Government should do whatever it can to encourage the acquisition of skills through various apprenticeship programs.

Third. The process of technological change, an important factor in rising productivity, must be facilitated—"Hearings on Employment, Growth, and Price Levels," part 8, see Witnesses Dunlop, pages 2471–2; Anderson, part 6, page 2163; Stieber, part 8, pages 2606–7. Those institutions of collective bargaining which facilitate the introduction of new techniques must be strengthened. National productivity centers, designed to raise productivity in the low-wage, low-productivity industries should be set up. The unemployment insurance system should make particular provision for workers laid off by technological change—see staff report, pages 57–59; "Hearings on Employment, Growth, and Price Levels," especially testimony of Witnesses Taylor, Stieber, Dunlop, Chamberlain, part 8.

Fourth. Special programs to rehabilitate depressed areas must be instituted both as a matter of justice and to assure the utilization of the labor and resources of these areas—see "Hearings on Employment, Growth, and Price Levels," testimony of Witnesses Eccles, page 201; Gordon, page 2963; Stieber, page 2611; Chamberlain, pages 2704–7; Taft and Schultz, page 2711.

Fifth. Federal support of scientific research, which amounts to more than half of all the funds now being used, must be continued, even in the unlikely event that military needs for research diminish—see staff report, pages 60–62, testimony of Hamberg, part 7.

Sixth. The competitive structure of the economy must continue to be strengthened—see hearings, part 7, "The Effect of Monopolistic and Quasi-Monopolistic Practices Upon Prices, Profits, Production, and Employment," and staff report, chapter 9. A strengthened national program for the United States Employment Service and other measures will improve the functioning of our product and our labor markets.

Seventh. Monetary and fiscal policies which help to determine the level of demand in the economy must be managed in such a way that purchasing power grows in line with the economy's capability to supply increasing quantities of output—Smithies, part 7, "Hearings on Employment, Growth, and Price Levels," and study paper No. 1, "Recent Inflation in the United States," by Charles L. Schultze.

FISCAL POLICY

Besides hearing the views of at least a dozen witnesses on problems of fiscal policy, the staff made a detailed analysis of the historical performance of fiscal policy since World War II. The staff study concluded that while some of the hopes held out for fiscal policy at the end of World War II were realized, others were not. The automatic stabilizers which dampened the effects of recession were effective. They reduced the decline in consumer purchasing power to less than one-half the declines in output, but they provided no impetus to recovery by themselves. Discretionary fiscal policy, on the other hand, has in fact been very little used. Discretionary changes in taxes, which are the most powerful single antirecession and anti-inflation policy, have been used only once in the entire postwar period, the increase in tax rates during the Korean war. At other times, tax changes enacted for other reasons have proved helpful, but it was luck rather than policy design to which the credit must be given. Variations in public expenditures, which have been used in recession have generally had a rather slow impact, too slow to make them a reliable stabilizer—see "Staff Report, Minority and Other Views," page 20.

The single most important new finding of the study in the area of fiscal policy is the destabilizing effect of sudden changes in defense orders—see staff report, chapter 8, page 2123. In each of the three postwar recessions, a sudden decline in defense orders helped to trigger recession. In the recession of 1954, it was the primary cause. These changes in defense orders have partly been carried out for economic reasons and to that extent were clearly a case of perverse policy. The study does not suggest that defense orders should be managed in a countercyclical way. We should procure what is necessary for our national security but when defense orders are either suddenly cut or increased, other offsetting actions must be taken. The Defense Department is too important a customer of the economy for the Government to ignore its effect on the level of activity. The committee recommends that extensive statistical work be undertaken to put ourselves in a position to evaluate economic effects of defense spending and to take appropriate policy actions. These findings and recommendations are particularly of significance now that at least some slight possibility of disarmament has appeared. The economy does not need the stimulus of military spending for prosperity, but the transition must be managed skillfully. If we do not do better than we have done in the last 12 years, we shall needlessly stumble into recession should disarmament come.

The use of fiscal policy to contain demand in periods of prosperity has declined over the postwar period—see hearings, part 9A, testimony of Heller, pages 2994–2996. The surpluses have become smaller, forcing greater reliance on monetary policy. The failure of fiscal policy to play a larger role in good times has been a contributing factor to the weakness in the performance of the economy, the relatively slow growth coinciding with rising prices. The decline in budget surpluses was partly caused by the deterioration of our budgeting standards. While budget balancing was made the central tenet of fiscal policy in good times, the budget itself contained less and less of the total Government expenditures, as the use of trust funds, sales of assets and other devices were used to achieve the semblance of budget balances.

The following policies are recommended with reference to fiscal policy:

First. The study recommends that greater reliance be placed on fiscal policy in the future—see "Hearings on Employment, Growth, and Price Levels," testimony of Heller, 9A, pages 2995 and following pages; Martin, 60, pages 1763–1764; Anderson, 60, pages 1719–1770—that is, that bigger surpluses be run in good times, and that prompt but clearly temporary tax changes be enacted when the signs of recession become clear.

Second. Greater reliance on fiscal policy will require that our Federal tax structure be improved. The study relied on the comprehensive investigation of the Ways and Means Committee for policy recommendations to reform the Federal tax structure. I cannot stress too much the importance of painstaking and objective analysis of the valuable data accumulated by this committee.

MONETARY POLICY AND DEBT MANAGEMENT

The committee held extensive hearings on the problems of monetary policy and debt management. Witnesses included the Secretary of the Treasury, the Chairman of the Federal Reserve Board, as well as leading executives of the insurance and banking industries, and dealers in Government securities. In addition, a number of academic experts dealt with these problems. The staff report contains an analysis both of the historical record of monetary policy as well as of its impact on various parts of the economy.

The major conclusions of the study are these:

A. MONETARY POLICY

First. Increasing reliance has been placed on monetary policy, especially since 1953. The progressively tighter money has raised interest rates to the highest level in 25 years—see staff report, chapter 9, page 341; "Minority and Other Views," page 30.

Second. The Federal Reserve System has relied almost exclusively on general credit controls, primarily on changes in commercial bank reserves by means of open market operations in short-term Treasury securities, and by means of changes in reserve requirements.

Third. The effect of monetary policy on total demand occurs only after considerable passage of time. In the boom of 1955–57, monetary policy was tightened too late but even in the present boom when money was tightened very early in the recovery, the effects on spending were delayed. Therefore, these delays which are inevitable under present techniques severely limit the effectiveness of monetary policy.

Fourth. The impact of general credit controls on the economy is in fact highly selective—see testimony of Witnesses Smithies and Schultze, part 7, "Hearings on Employment, Growth, and Price Levels." Much the greatest impact falls in residential construction. In addition, small business and State and local governments are influenced. Investment in plant equipment and in inventories by large firms and consumer credit appear to be relatively immune.

Fifth. Monetary policy had only a limited effect in containing the inflation of recent years—see "Hearings on Employment, Growth, and Price Levels," pages 2163, 2166, 2193, 2219, 2439–2240, part 7. The effect of monetary policy in the capital-goods boom was small. It has little or no influence on the rise in service prices, nor does it operate directly on the concentrations of market power which added to the inflation. Had monetary policy been much looser, no doubt the inflation would have been worse. A higher level of total money income would have meant a slightly greater rise in service prices and perhaps even in the price and wage rises of concentrated industries. But the very heavy reliance on monetary policy meant that the anti-inflation campaign could not hope to succeed in stabilizing prices. At the same time, the attempt to reduce demand and fight inflation by monetary policy alone did have serious adverse effects on the economic growth of the country.

To make monetary policy more effective, the study concluded that standby consumer credit regulation be added to the arsenal of the consumer credit of the monetary authorities and that serious investigation be made to see what can be done to smooth the violent fluctuations in plant and equipment expenditures. In addition, the study recommended that the Federal Reserve System assume responsibility for all sectors of the credit market, both short and long term, and that it abandon its doctrinaire policy of confining its operations generally to open market purchases and sales of short-term Treasury securities—see staff report, chapter 9, pages 394–408; also hearings, part 7, pages 2220–2221, and 2439; part 9A, pages 2766, 2962, and 2998; and part 9B, pages 3070 and 3109–3110.

B. DEBT MANAGEMENT

First. The potential contribution of debt management to stabilization policy is relatively small—staff report, chapter 9, especially pages 424–428. See also forthcoming study paper No. 19, "Debt Management in the United States," by Warren L. Smith. Since debt management only affects the maturity structure of the public held debt, the total size of the debt being determined by fiscal policy, its economic effects depend wholly upon the change of the liquidity position of the economy. There is no scientific evidence that these effects are substantial. Nevertheless, it is important that the debt be managed consistent with economic objectives and in a way which does not interfere with other policies. In practical terms, this means today that the Treasury should seek to lengthen the debt, primarily to increase the effectiveness of monetary policy. It should lengthen the debt at minimum interest costs in order to keep the budget cost to the taxpayer as low as possible. The study concluded that it was not feasible to run a countercyclical debt management policy, but rather that under present circumstances the Treasury should seek to sell long-term securities whenever the opportunity presents itself, consistent with stabilization objectives, and at reasonable interest costs.

AMERICA'S FOREIGN ECONOMIC POSITION

The committee held extensive hearings on our foreign economic position last June—"Hearings on Employment, Growth, and Price Levels," part 5, "International Influences on the American Economy." These hearings were the occasion for leading experts in international economics to marshal their views on the changed position of the United States in the world economy. In addition, an extensive study paper—see forthcoming study paper No. 16, "International Effects of U.S. Economic Policy," by Edward M. Bernstein—and internal staff work—see staff report, especially chapter 11, "U.S. Position in the World Economy"—was devoted to this problem. The study concluded:

First. The United States does have to consider its balance of payments more seriously than it has in the past, but no emergency measures are required which would go counter to our long-run foreign policy.

Second. The deterioration in our balance payments position is not due to the general increases in our price levels, which rose less than those of most other countries. The exports of some specific commodities, however, such as steel and autos, did suffer from higher prices.

Third. The steps which should be taken now include:

(a) Encouragement of greater participation by Western Europe in programs of mutual security and development aid, in line with their much improved economic welfare.

(b) Strengthening of the international institutions to improve the world system of liquidity.

(c) Discriminations against other imports, particularly in the form of quotas should be removed at a rapid rate.

To conclude, Mr. Speaker, let me emphasize that if we but take off the blinders of long-held pet theories and prejudices, and make full and intelligent use of the data and findings of this study, we shall find new and useful tools to help us achieve the threefold objective of reasonable growth, full employment, and price stability. The answer lies not in simplicity but in complexity, not in rigidity but in a variety of flexible policies; not in dogma but in workable solutions for specific problems.

Mr. AVERY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COFFIN. I yield.

Mr. AVERY. The gentleman from Maine has made a most eloquent recital, may I say, of the recommendations and the conclusions of the Joint Economic Committee and, of course, those recommendations were so voluminous it would be virtually impossible for anyone just exposed to them for the first time on the floor this afternoon to completely digest them. I wonder if the gentleman could turn it around and tell us just what would remain of our free economy if the Congress were to adopt all of those recommendations. It seems to me that if we were to accept all of the recommendations presented by the committee we would have no flexibility left in our economy at all. Our free economy as we have known it for a hundred years would completely disappear. It would be managed from the initial concept down to the very end.

Mr. COFFIN. If that were the fact I would share the gentleman's concern, but my whole theme has been to show how this report discarded many of the theories that have shackled both parties in the past. I think when the gentleman has a chance to study the staff report and the committee report he will find that in many areas there are recommendations for fewer controls than hitherto have been recommended. For example, in the field of taxation and fiscal policy we recommend things I am sure the gentleman would agree with. We recommended that in the field of antimonopoly a great deal more needs to be done.

Let me test the gentleman. We say that we should revise the U.S. Unemployment Service. This involves, we will say, more money for a Federal agency, but the effect of this is not to impose rigidity or indirection on the economy; the effect is to make available to the taxpayer, the laborer in New Jersey or New England, information that there is an opportunity for employment in Arizona or California; and thus, in effect, make possible the basic posture of a more flexible economy than we have ever had.

Mr. AVERY. The gentleman has picked out probably the one aspect of his whole presentation as far as unemployment is concerned, that I might agree with. If I understood the gentleman correctly he selected a number of separate categories and he made an observation to this effect, that in order to have a lesser impact on our total employment if the budgetary item for the Defense Establishment were suddenly cut off that they should have another Federal program instantly available so it could absorb those items. So that the impact would be less on our economy. If that is not more of a managed economy I would not know how to describe it.

Mr. COFFIN. The gentleman should have in mind the type of thing I mean. This is one of the big findings of the study; that is, the tremendous impact of a sudden cutting off of defense orders, the economic problems we face when defense orders are terminated very quickly. We say that when the need passes, they should be terminated. We do not make the proposal that we should continue to buy because it will keep up employment. We say we are left with excess productive capacity, with a lot of supply potential, and in order to prevent the cutting off of defense orders from having an adverse effect on our economy, we should take other measures. What other measures? I am not referring to make-work proposals, I am not referring to leaf-raking or unnecessary projects. But at that juncture in our economy it might be well for the Congress and the administration to go along with tax cuts. Why? To stimulate the demand for the capacity that is released. A tax cut is intervention, yes, but it is not the intervention of the kind the gentleman mentions.

In other words, I may say to the gentleman that I do not expect him to concur with everything in here, but I do think there are many things we can agree on. We have to examine the facts and the specific proposals. I think we can agree on the fact that the principle of having a wide arsenal of weapons that are surgeon's scalpels rather than sledgehammers should appeal to the gentleman.

Mr. AVERY. When the gentleman refers to arsenal of weapons, I presume he is referring to the economic impetus. Is that correct?

Mr. COFFIN. Yes.

Mr. AVERY. I can agree with that. The gentleman is saying, in effect, we should increase our gross national product. On that item the gentleman and I have no controversy.

Mr. COFFIN. I think the gentleman would agree with us on some others of these proposals.

Mr. AVERY. I will be very interested in making a personal study of the gentleman's report.

Mr. REUSS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COFFIN. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. REUSS. Would the gentleman agree that if the recommendations of the majority in the report of the Joint Economic Committee were adopted by this country, there would not only be greater economic freedom, as, for example, by the jettisoning of the restrictive "bills only" policy of the Federal Reserve System, but we would have a far greater approach to maximum employment, maximum growth, maximum production, and maximum purchasing power?

Mr. COFFIN. This certainly is my deep hope, that this does lead us to greater freedom in achieving it. I think that is the philosophy of us on the majority side at least. I believe all of us are more sophisticated, and we should be more sophisticated, this study having been made, than we have ever before been. We know you cannot legislate increased productivity and business stability and full employment. You have to utilize to the utmost the free forces of the markets. Sometimes you have to create conditions within which the market can operate as it should operate. Our ultimate objective is not too far removed from that of the gentleman from Kansas who just posed his questions of me. It is my feeling that the genius of the staff study and of the committee report is that it looks toward the future to these three goals, realizing you cannot arrive at them in any simple way, realizing you have to have an atmosphere of freedom, and that sometimes you have to counteract certain antifreedom influences in order to create conditions under which these institutions will operate effectively.

This is a long way of saying "Yes" to the gentleman.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COFFIN. I yield to the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. OLIVER. I should like to take this opportunity to commend my colleague for the very exhaustive report which he has made which reflects a great deal of attention and consideration on his part, as he always displays when subjects of major interest and importance are at stake. I wonder if, generally speaking, it could not be said that what this report does is to outline a program of action when, as, and if it is indicated that there may be some deterioration in our economic picture, rather than waiting until this sag has occurred and then proceeding on the theory that nature should take its course. In other words, you and your associates on the committee are advocating, as I see it, that the Congress should make plans now to meet any emergency that may arise either suddenly or over a long period of time, to take up the sag in our economy by positive action through programs, that will be in the best interest of the welfare of this Nation?

Mr. COFFIN. I would agree with the gentleman and thank him for his summarizing part of our objective. I would go further, however, and say that I would strike from the gentleman's question "when, as, and if a sag has occurred." I think we are deeply concerned, as the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BOLLING] outlined in his remarks earlier, that our present rate of growth in the world in which we live is a dangerous condition and an unnecessary condition, so we say that action is required. We know that action is required now and we also say in the event of sharp booms or sharp recessions we should have available other instruments to use at those times. But, even now we need action.

Mr. OLIVER. I thank the gentleman for that amendment to my remarks, and I take the opportunity again to commend him for the very scholarly study which he and his associates have made of this problem. I certainly want to identify myself with what he has said.

Mr. COFFIN. I thank the gentleman.

CLEAN ELECTIONS

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentlewoman from Oregon [Mrs. GREEN] may extend her remarks in the RECORD at this point.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Colorado?

There was no objection.

Mrs. GREEN of Oregon. Mr. Speaker, earlier today my distinguished colleague, the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. UDALL], introduced a clean elections bill, basically similar to that just passed in the other body, with one major modification. Mr. UDALL's bill does not contain the provisions which the other body has accepted in regard to primary elections. My colleague has indicated that his belief, that primary elections should be covered, has not wavered, but that he hopes his bill will expedite consideration of this issue by the House.

As a member of the Committee on House Administration, which has jurisdiction over election law, I feel that it is time—and past time—the House came to grips with the issues posed by the clean election bills. The question of covering primaries is, of course, a controversial one. Like my friend from Arizona [Mr. UDALL], I feel that primaries ought to be covered. Like him, I recognize that this question may well impede passage of this legislation in the House. However, I have decided to introduce a bill identical to that passed yesterday by the other body. With the introduction of Mr. UDALL's bill, and my own, the House Administration Committee will have before it the question of "clean elections" in all its phases. I hope that the committee will now turn to this issue, and that the 86th Congress will not adjourn without having given to the people of the United States some assurance that the election of Federal officials will be conducted under 1960 ground rules, in place of the 1925 rules now in force.

FULL EMPLOYMENT, A 4.5 PERCENT GROWTH RATE, AND NO INFLATION: HOW TO ACHIEVE IT

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. REUSS] is recognized for 1 hour.

Mr. REUSS. Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to follow after the far-ranging panorama of the Joint Economic Committee report given by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BOLLING], and the delightful mercy killing of some sacred cows given by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. COFFIN].

I should like to address myself more briefly, perhaps, to some of the highlights of the Joint Economic Committee report. I think the totality of recommendations has been well set forth in the RECORD. I would like to take up some of the recommendations that are likely to produce a clash of debate in the months to come.

This can be called a partisan report, and a partisan minority view, in the sense that all of the majority Members in both bodies concurred in the majority opinion, with the exception of the Senator from Arkansas [Senator FULBRIGHT], who inserted a footnote on page 61 disclosing that he had not been able to take part in the report. Similarly, all of the minority Members in both bodies concurred in the minority report, so members of the press and the public who want to get at the kernel of the economic disagreement between the two great parties of this country can get at it by reading the report.

I am going to suggest that there are some seven major recommendations in the majority portion of the report where there is a clearcut difference between the majority and the minority.

No. 1: The whole notion of growth, the idea that our economy can and must grow at a rate of around 4.5 percent a year, and that the goals of maximum employment, maximum production, maximum growth, and maximum dollar stability can and must be attained at the same time. On page 16 of the report it is set forth:

> Our economy can grow at a rate as high as 4.5 percent per year without changing our economic system in any fundamental way.

The minority report does not really come to grips with this. I read it in vain to gather any notion whether the minority believes that such a rate of growth as 4.5 percent is possible or desirable, and I searched in vain for any hint on how to attain it.

No. 2 concerns the great priorities of our national needs. These are set forth very well on page 24 of the report, and range through a better defense program, an improved foreign-aid program, Federal aid to education, medical care, hospitals and medical schools, natural resource conservation, and area redevelopment.

No. 3 is that fiscal policy should be upgraded and monetary policy deemphasized in our national economic policy. This should be done, says the majority, very largely by the plugging of some of the more outrageous loopholes in the Federal tax structure. On pages 22 to 24 of the report are set forth the specifics of some of these loopholes.

It is recommended that there be provision for withholding on interest and dividend payments; that employee expense accounts be rigorously limited; that capital gains exemptions be restricted to true capital gains; that the percentage depletion allowance in the extractive industries be reduced; that numerous preferential provisions in the estate and gift tax be eliminated; and so on, and so on.

The minority report, by its silence on these, seems to give its consent to the present policy of the administration that these loopholes are not loopholes at all, but instead are worthy parts of the tax structure.

No. 4 concerns monetary policy. Here the Democrats, surveying the record of the Federal Reserve System and the administration in the last year, in which the money supply of this Nation has been increased hardly at all, not even one percentage point—here the majority says that a reasonable rate of increase over the years ought to be on the order of 3 percent a year.

And indeed, if we are going to have an increase in gross national product of 4.5 percent a year, it should at least take an increase of 3 percent in the money supply to keep the wheels lubricated.

Here, again, the minority takes issue with the majority position.

No. 5. The fifth great proposition forwarded by the majority report has to do with administered prices. The House Committee on Government Operations last June reported out favorably the Clark-Reuss bill, H.R. 6263, under which in pace setting, concentrated industries such as steel the President is authorized and directed, whenever there is in the offing a price or associated wage increase which would seriously threaten economic stability, to convene a fact-finding board to study the matter, and make public recommendations regarding the justification and desirability of such proposed increases. H.R. 6263 is now pending before the House Committee on Rules.

It is a pleasure to read, on page 53 and page 54 of the Joint Economic Committee report, that this voluntary method of addressing the public interest to the administered-price problem has been adopted by the Joint Economic Committee's majority. At the bottom of page 53 it is stated:

> There is a need, at least on a standby basis, for a fact-finding procedure in key price, and associated wage, increases which seriously threaten economic stablity, to be invoked at the discretion of the President, and to result in the issuance of a report and recommendations regarding the justification and desirablity of such proposed increases.

The minority report takes issue with this. Happily, one member of the minority, Senator JAVITS, apparently disagrees with his minority colleagues, because in his separate opinion, particularly at pages 141 and 142, he says very clearly:

> While the devices employed to restrain inflation may vary from time to time, the least the Government can do is to lend its fact-finding facilities and its good offices, to bring about a feeling of restraint in price rises by presentation of the facts themselves.

A Daniel come to judgment. I am delighted Senator JAVITS has expressed himself as opposed to the policy of the administration and in favor of the principle, at least, of the Clark-Reuss bill.

No. 6 of the major majority recommendations has to do with debt management. There the majority report very clearly calls for the immediate abandonment of the bills-only policy of the Federal Reserve. It calls for the abandonment of the present method of the Federal Reserve, when it wishes to expand the money supply, of using mainly the method of reductions in reserve requirements. Instead, it directs the Federal Reserve to rely on open-market operations for expanding the money supply. As has been said many times before, the abandonment of these bankrupt Federal Reserve policies would mean millions and ultimately billions of dollars of savings for the taxpayers.

It must be a peculiar source of satisfaction to the gentleman from Montana [Mr. METCALF], who introduced just these two propositions in the so-called Metcalf amendment last summer to the administration's request for lifting the 4¼ percent interest ceiling on U.S. bonds, that he now has the uniform backing of the entire majority membership of the Joint Economic Committee.

I well remember the barrage of villification that the gentleman from Montana was subjected to by the administration last summer—how he was accused of being an engineer of inflation—a lover of funny money—a holder of a union card in the monetary printing press establishment. It will be a little more difficult, I suggest, for Secretary Anderson or Federal Reserve Board Chairman Martin or President Eisenhower and the others who have been pushing this line to say that the entire membership on the majority side of the Joint Economic Committee deserves that kind of epithet. I think the wisdom and the foresight of the gentleman from Montana has been very convincingly demonstrated.

No. 7. The last recommendation which seems to me especially significant is that recommendation, again on page 34 of the majority report, calling for standby power to regulate consumer credit.

The administration's main monetary position is that there is a great excess of demand today, and hence the tight money policy is necessary to flight inflation. If this were true, certainly the first thing the administration should do is to ask for standby controls over consumer credit, so that that aspect of the demand for credit which has least to do with growth, which has least to do with building new plants and equipment, with building new schools and highways, should be the first to be curtailed.

Curtailment of credit would harm the economy the least in the field of consumer credit expenditures. Yet the administration refuses to take a position on consumer credit regulation. And when the Federal Reserve was asked by the Joint Economic Committee to say "Aye, yes or no—should this country have standby consumer credit controls?" The Federal Reserve once again pussyfooted and said, "Well, we cannot say. Let us just leave it to the Congress."

So here again you have another real area of disagreement between the majority and the minority.

It may be interesting to refer to the reason given at the end of the minority report, on page 90, for the disheartening and negative nature of the minority's conclusions. You can search the minority report in vain for any constructive suggestions as to how to have full employment and maximum growth without inflation. Here is what the minority has to say, on page 90 of the report, to explain this dreary negativism:

> We regret that these minority views have necessarily been confined to comments, many of a negative nature, on the majority report. We should have preferred to provide some useful guidelines to economic policy. Indeed, as we stated earlier, we would have preferred to join in a unanimous report of that character. In the light of the shortcomings of both the staff report and the majority report, as well as the limitations of time, however, our statement had to take the form that it has.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the minority as well as the majority had a year or more to ponder the state of the Nation's economy, and to come up with some constructive suggestions. The Nation will read this report with interest, and with full awareness that both the majority and the minority had the same time to compose their reports.

Then the people will ask: Which is the side which is constructively trying to grapple with the great questions of our national economic policy?

It is not surprising, Mr. Speaker, that the minority dissents from the main, proposals that the majority makes in this report. It is not surprising because the minority's own administration in the White House is taking a line at the present moment diametrically opposed to what the majority is advocating.

In the President's annual economic message there is no setting up of economic goals, no statement of a growth rate of 4½ percent, 3 percent, or 2 percent, or any other kind of growth rate that this country ought to have.

In the state of the Union message and the budget message we get a complete disregard of the great priorities of national need. Defense is shortchanged on the ground that while Russia seems to have a great deal, it may be they will not use it, so perhaps it will not be necessary for us to match them.

Our great international responsibilities are given the back of the budget hand, with the comment that those foreigners should help each other.

Our cities, that have asked for bread, have received a stone; a stone composed in equal parts of high interest rates, which makes it impossible for cities to borrow to build schools and streets and sewers, and of a retrenchment in vitally needed aids to local communities. No effort is made to plug tax loopholes.

Objection to the Clark-Reuss bill continues. They are against it.

The "bills only" policy is pursued with vigor by the Federal Reserve. We can contemplate the shambles they have made of debt management by this policy. U.S. obligations today are selling at 80 cents on the dollar now.

In direct violation of the will of Congress, the Federal Reserve is currently engaged in doing just what Congress told them not to do; namely, it is up to its old tricks of reducing reserve requirements, then selling many of its portfolio U.S. securities, to the great hurt and detriment of the long-suffering U.S. taxpayer.

And when it comes to taking a good hard look at the need for standby credit controls, the administration is AWOL on that national issue, too.

So here is a document which, by reason of the minority's failure to go along with the recommendations of the majority, has become a partisan document. Frankly, I do not see anything particularly wrong or un-American about having a good debate about the economic issues of our time.

Let the American people and the American press all study the majority and minority reports on employment, stability, and growth. Let them compare the constructive suggestions of the majority for breaking out into new ground. Let them compare these constructive suggestions with the negative and crabbed attitude of the minority report.

I believe the debate will be a good thing for the American people.

Mr. METCALF. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REUSS. I yield to the gentleman from Montana.

Mr. METCALF. I want to commend the last three speakers for the very statesmanlike programs for economic growth they have proposed, and for their analysis of this report.

I want especially to commend the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. REUSS]. He is the real author of the so-called Metcalf amendment.

I think it should be noted that while the gentleman from Maine and the gentleman from Missouri who were the previous speakers had a footnote on page 36 of the report, there is no real conflict between the position that was taken by me and some of my colleagues in the committee, and the position they took there, or the position taken by the majority of the committee. When the matter of increasing interest rates above the 4¼-percent statutory level came to the committee we said that if we had proper debt management we felt that the "bills only" policy, a better program for purchase of long-term bonds in periods of low interest and all these other questions that are brought out so well in this report, that if we had such a policy, the question of the debt ceiling would be merely an academic question. So there is no real conflict.

In the matter of the ceiling and interest rates and other basic reforms the resolution pending in the Banking and Currency Committee says exactly the same thing, that if we have proper fiscal debt management we can have a low interest rate on long-term maturities to the betterment of the economic system and structure of our country.

I commend these gentlemen for bringing this out and I call special attention to it, and I want to say that my amendment is merely a modification of the bill introduced by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. REUSS] that is pending at this time in the Banking and Currency Committee.

Mr. REUSS. I thank the gentleman from Montana; and I would point out that my reading of the Coffin-Bolling footnote which appears, by the way, on page 36 rather than page 34 of the report, is precisely that of the gentleman from Montana. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. COFFIN] and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BOLLING] say in that footnote that they "take the position of not objecting to removal of the 4½-percent ceiling if accompanied by the initiation of other basic reforms."

That is my position completely, and always has been; indeed I would not only merely not object to the removal of the 4¼-percent ceiling if it is accompanied by these basic reforms that are set forth in the report, but I heartily applaud its removal.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REUSS. I yield to the gentleman from Colorado.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. I wish to congratulate all three of the speakers who reported on the work of the Joint Economic Committee this afternoon.

Mr. Speaker, in 1946 when the act was passed it was assumed that the Council of Economic Advisers of the President would submit to the Congress the economic message, and that then the Joint Economic Committee on the Economic Report would reply. This year the timing was such that it might seem that this is what happened. The Economic Report of the President was transmitted to the Congress on January 20, but those who know are driven to the conclusion that the function of the Council of Economic Advisers is being better performed by the staff and the Committee on the Joint Economic Report than by the executive agency which we have created. I merely state this as a development, but I am at least grateful that my colleagues in the Congress and the staff which they employ have seen fit to give to the Congress and to the American people a very sober, a very thoughtful, a very conscientious, and a very constructive program.

In opening the debate on this question a week ago, I said that the issues presented in this document must be fairly discussed, including wage and price pressures. I welcome the inclusion in this document of the recommendation to the Treasury regarding callable features of long-term bonds.

I also commend the committee's decision to recommend against a raise in the 4¼-percent ceiling until other constructive steps are taken to change our policies. It seems to me that the 4¼ percent may indeed be unnecessary in a well-ordered monetary, credit, and fiscal policy.

It seems to me that the Joint Economic Committee has pointed out in what ways that policy is not now well ordered. It, therefore, seems that the Congress was correct last summer, and would be correct today, in endorsing the committee's position in saying that until the administration has changed its economic policies, we would be wise to refuse a request for a raise in the interest rate ceiling.

I would appreciate the comments of the gentleman from Wisconsin on that point.

Mr. REUSS. I am glad that the gentleman from Colorado raised the question of the staff report, the larger volume which was such a great help in preparing the majority report. It gives me an opportunity to pay my tribute to the committee staff, which, in my opinion, performed a most objective, workmanlike, and thoroughly professional study which will be read for years to come by serious students of economic affairs.

I wish that the minority in their report, on page 91, had not said as they did:

> The minority feels that this study will not be complete unless a good staff report is first put together.

That seems to me a rather churlish reward to these men for the time they put in on this report. I hope that the six members of the minority who signed that will see fit to edit out that statement, because I do not think they meant to suggest that the staff report is not a good report or is not helpful.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REUSS. I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. May I say to the distinguished gentleman that there are some areas of disagreement in this report, and I want to announce that these areas of disagreement will certainly be brought into sharp focus in the near future by those who believe differently than the gentleman.

Mr. REUSS. I am glad to hear that.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. Not being an expert in this field but simply having in mind some basic facts and truths, I do wish to ask a question or two.

The gentleman decries the fact that we have these tax loopholes. He mentioned quite a few, and he was quite critical of the administration because these tax holes were not plugged. Unless I am wrong, I believe that these will take legislation to correct. I am wondering if the Committee on Ways and Means, which will probably have jurisdiction over most of these that he mentioned, if not all of them, will bring legislation to the floor, and that with the 2-to-1 majority of members of the gentleman's party you should be able to make a correction, rather than slough off the blame to ones who cannot do anything about it.

Mr. REUSS. The gentleman has not correctly appraised the position of the Congress. If he would spend a little time studying it, he would find that when you put together the members of the gentleman's party and certain members of my own party there is a coalition which is effectively able to stymie the progress of legislation through this body. The point, it seems to me, is that you do not get legislation to plug loopholes through Congress unless the administration is willing to take the lead in asking for it.

Just to take one example, the oil depletion allowance loophole. It is perfectly true that a minority of Members on the Democratic side support the oil depletion allowance. It is equally true that a majority of Members on the Republican side support that particular tax loophole. Until and unless the administration is willing to come forward and propose a program to partially plug that loophole, you are not going to have any progress. I would like to point out that the two preceding administrations, that of the late Mr. Roosevelt and that of Mr. Truman, did time after time propose the plugging of the oil depletion loophole. This Republican administration, which has been in power for the last 8 years, has never proposed such a plugging. I suggest that that is the reason why most of these loopholes are still making of our tax structure a sieve instead of a system.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. On the point mentioned, that Mr. Roosevelt and Mr. Truman had recommended this matter relative to the depletion allowance, was any legislative action taken on their recommendations?

Mr. REUSS. No. The same political configuration which prevents that today existed then. But, this much is clear. You are never going to get the plugging of these loopholes unless you have in the White House an administration with the courage of its convictions, which is willing to go down the line and use such powers as it has over its members to get these loopholes plugged.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. I admire the position taken by some in connection with their recommendations for plugging these loopholes, but even those liberals in your own party—regardless of the position taken by the administration—ought to have the courage to do those things that you believe to be right and just, and let the chips fall where they may. In other words, it would be logical to assume then that your leadership shies away from the possibility of any executive action, therefore not assuming the responsibility which evidently the people of this country have placed in them. Would the gentleman care to comment on that?

Mr. REUSS. I would be very glad to comment. The people on this side of the aisle have repeatedly, in committee, on the floor, and in whatever forum was available to them, attempted to plug the loopholes mentioned in the Joint Economic Committee majority report. They have been voted down.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. May I interrupt? Have these matters of loopholes which you have enumerated come out of the Committee on Ways and Means?

Mr. REUSS. Typically not. Typically not.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. And your feeling is that this Republican-southern Democratic—I suppose you are referring to them—coalition is responsible for this?

Mr. REUSS. I did not use the geographical term which the gentleman used. I simply said a minority of Members on this side frequently make common cause with the majority of Members on the Republican side. It is not entirely a geographical marriage, but it is a marriage which has worked very well over the years. The gentleman, I suspect, is thoroughly familiar with it. One of the ways in which the effect of the marriage in preventing tax reform is going to be stopped is by an administration which will come forward and tell the Congress and the American people what a good tax system would be like. Until that happens I do not anticipate that any reform is going to be possible.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. Would you go so far as to say this: Regardless of the administration, you will always have a division on your side of the aisle between the so-called southerners and the northerners; so that regardless of who is in the White House, if the southerners would pick up a few Members over here, you would never get these things done that you advocate, because you did not get them done under those circumstances when your party had control of the White House. So it would indicate to me that it is impossible for you on your side of the aisle to assert legislative responsibility.

Mr. REUSS. No; I do not say that for a moment. I hold in my hand a document which is the great turning point of the new economics, because in this Joint Economic Committee report, which we have been discussing, there is unanimity among the Democrats on all of these points which you have mentioned. And we have Democrats on this committee from Illinois and Alabama, Wyoming and Massachusetts, Missouri and Maine, Louisiana, Wisconsin, and Texas.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. If the gentleman will permit, if you have that unanimity, that is grand from the gentleman's position, and I should expect then that he would be able to get all of these legislative recommendations through the Congress.

Mr. REUSS. Yes. I think the probable timeable will be, first, a full debate on the issues presented by this Joint Economic Committee report for the next few months, making clear the issues on which all the Democrats were on one side and all the Republicans were opposed; then the submission of this issue to the arbitrament of the voters in the election next November; and then, there is likely to be in power in the White House an administration which will supply the missing element of leadership. Then we can go forward toward full employment and necessary national growth and do it all without the destructive inflation which the administration has visited upon us.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. May I remind the gentleman that his party under President Roosevelt and President Truman were in power and I presume that they gave vigorous leadership and still they could not get these things through that the gentleman has been talking about in his presentation here today.

Mr. REUSS. As the very able address of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. COFFIN] made clear, what is set forth in the Joint Economic Committee majority report is for the 1960's. These are new approaches. The lumber and the cobwebs of the other years have been thrust aside. We are not going to be led into false analogies and bootless arguments about F.D.R. and Mr. Truman. What we are concerned with is how we can produce the full employment and national growth without inflation necessary to carry out our responsibilities in the last 40 years of the 20th century.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. The gentleman has been here longer than I. He says in this report they are throwing out the cobwebs, et cetera. I would presume that during the leadership of Mr. Roosevelt and Mr. Truman similiar economic situations were brought forth with similar impact that would compare to the one you have today.

Mr. REUSS. If I may answer that, you did not have the problem then. Then you had an administration which was dedicated to reasonable interest rates, so the economy could grow; to a sensible management of the national debt so that it would not become the shambles that it is today; to a concerted policy of full employment. Most of these problems were academic then, although the one mentioned, the oil depletion allowance I grant you, was a problem then as it is now.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. I wanted to go on to another thing that has some bearing on the question of interest rates. The gentleman mentioned in his address a week ago and again today the "bankrupt" Federal Reserve policies. As the gentleman knows the Federal Reserve System is a creature of the Congress, and as I reminded him last week, and I should like to say again, if there is something about the Federal Reserve System that it would take legislation to correct, instead of being continually critical, I would presume that he and the proper committee of the Congress would bring before the Congress the necessary legislation and with their 2-to-1 majority, one could expect that it would pass.

Mr. REUSS. There the gentleman goes again with his textbook view of the political realities. We should get together sometime and talk this over.

Mr. BOW. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REUSS. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BOW. May I inquire whether the report, which I have not had the privilege as yet of reading, deals at all with the question of reciprocal trade, tariffs, or embargoes?

Mr. REUSS. Yes, it does. On pages 59 to 61 there are some things said about America's changing position in the world economy. I will read for the gentleman what happens to be the last paragraph of the report, which has something to do with this. It is on page 61. Very briefly, it states:

> The United States should maintain its policy of striving for a system of multilateral world trade, without restrictions and discriminations. We should reduce our own tariffs in exchange for tariff concessions from other countries. We should also use our influence and leadership to encourage the newly emerging regional economic blocks to become means of trade liberalization rather than discrimination.

I know the gentleman will not like that very much, but he asked me, and it is my painful duty to inform him.

Mr. BOW. I am delighted the gentleman has given us that information. The gentleman is correct, I do not agree with it. However, I am glad he has given it to us because it gives us more subjects for debate on this very important question as time goes on.

THE STABILITY OF OUR ECONOMY

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. METCALF). Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. BAILEY] is recognized for 90 minutes.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, I come to the well of the House today to plead the cause of a stable economy. There is a growing number of my colleagues on both sides of the center aisle who are convinced that we can have no stability in our economy so long as we have an imbalance of trade in excess of $4 billion a year.

Today during my presentation I intend to offer a concurrent resolution which will be joined in by some 25 or 30 Members, equally divided as to political affiliation. The concurrent resolution, which I shall read into the RECORD at this time, would declare it to be the sense of Congress that with respect to the 20-percent reduction in import duties authorized in the Trade Agreements Extension Act of 1958, which has not been applied, there be no further cuts in our import duties for the next few years, that is, the life of the trade agreements, and that our delegates to the international agreement on trade and tariffs be instructed to see to it that other nations signatory to the trade agreement clear their obstructions and restrictions on the importation of American exports.

At this time I should like to read the resolution and offer it for inclusion in the RECORD:

Whereas the 85th Congress passed the trade agreements extension bill in August 1958, authorizing the President within a four-year period to reduce existing customs duties up to 20 per centum; and

Whereas an international conference held under the auspices of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade will be convened in the autumn of 1960 and continue into 1961; and

Whereas the executive branch of the Government, pursuant to the provisions of the Trade Agreements Extension Act of 1958 (Public Law 85-686), is engaged in the preparation of a list of products upon which the United States will be prepared to offer further duty reductions, up to 20 per centum, at such international conference; and

Whereas profound changes in the international competitive standing of United States producers have occurred since the passage of the Trade Agreements Extension Act of 1958; and

Whereas imports have increased sharply since the passage of said Act while exports have declined, thus contributing to the mounting deficits incurred by the United States in the total foreign account, which in 1958 attained the magnitude of $3,400,000,000 and an estimated $4,000,000,000 or more in 1959; and

Whereas the gold outflow in partial satisfaction of these deficits since January 1958 has exceeded $3,500,000,000, while the stock of gold at Fort Knox has fallen to a level of $19,500,000,000 against which foreign claims of more than $18,000,000,000 are outstanding, approximately $16,000,000,000 of which could be withdrawn on demand; and

Whereas prevention of a disastrous outflow of gold to foreign countries adds to the pressure on the Treasury Department to offer higher interest rates on its current and future borrowings, thus adding to the outlay for interest on the national debt, the interest service on which has already reached the level of $9,600,000,000 annually and bids fair to rise appreciably, thus adding to the national budget additional billions of dollars of fixed charges; and

Whereas imports as a whole in 1959 rose approximately 22 per centum compared with 1958, while those from the industrial countries rose more sharply, notably 54 per centum from Japan in the first nine months of 1959 compared with the same period in 1958 and 43 per centum from Europe during the same period, thus reflecting the sharpened competitive advantage that has been gained by other industrial countries over the United States; and

Whereas the United States has moved from the position of a leading export nation in a number of items that are products of mass production and therefore the output of our most advanced industries technologically, among them being automobiles, steel, sewing machines, and typewriters, thus reflecting the startling loss of technological leadership by the United States to other countries that enjoy a wage differential in comparison with this country; and

Whereas numerous domestic manufacturers have in the past 2 years made arrangements to manufacture abroad as a means of gaining lower production costs and enabling them to supply foreign markets from abroad rather than from the United States and in some instances to ship into the United States from branches established abroad, thus reducing opportunities for employment of American workers, and foreclosing American suppliers of materials and parts to domestic industry, and small American companies that lack the capital resources to invest in foreign facilities from participating in the economic growth represented by such use of United States capital, thereby producing the total effect of shrinking American industrial power and diminishing tax revenues at a time when the cold-war costs of the Federal Government are mounting; and

Whereas the shrinkage of United States exports would be much more severe than has in fact been registered but for the extensive subsidization of certain crop exports, notably raw cotton and wheat; and

Whereas such subsidization as a means of stimulating exports adds to the burden on the Treasury and thus cannot be looked to for correction of the deficit position of our total foreign account; and

Whereas the productivity of labor in other industrial countries has taken a notable leap, stimulated in great degree by some $25 billion in modern machinery and equipment shipped abroad by the United States during the past seven years, thus increasing the competitive advantage of foreign producers, particularly in the absence of any significant increase in foreign wage rates compared with those prevailing in this country; and

Whereas American industry may expect increasingly sharp and distressing competition from abroad because of the generally weaker bargaining powers of foreign labor unions compared with those of this country, thus offering no hope of any closing of the cost differential between foreign and domestic producers in the foreseeable future; and

Whereas this competition, already severe and capturing progressively larger shares of our home market for numerous products, will create grave problems of survival for some of our industries and of maintaining in such industries an American scale of wages and the enjoyment of an American standard of living for their workers, even without further tariff reductions by the United States: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That it is the sense of Congress:

(1) That the United States should grant no further tariff reductions in the forthcoming tariff negotiations under the auspices of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade in 1960 and 1961, notwithstanding the authorization contained in Public Law 85-686, known as the Trade Agreements Extension Act of 1958; and

(2) That the Executive Branch of the Government should conduct an investigation either through the State Department or as the President may otherwise direct to determine and report to the Congress the significance, extent and effect of the limitations other than tariffs imposed by foreign countries on exports from the United States and the extent to which such limitations are removed during the course of the next two years either as a result of the activities presently being pursued by the State Department or otherwise.

Mr. Speaker, this resolution has been introduced not only by myself but by a number of colleagues on both sides of the aisle. The feeling among us is unanimous that nothing could be less timely and ill advised than further tariff reductions by this country under present circumstances.

I understand that the executive branch is now preparing a long list of products on which the United States will be prepared to reduce the tariff up to 20 percent. It is anticipated that this list will be published possibly within the next 2 months.

Coming on top of the import onslaught that has already made a growing number of our industries groggy, this further inducement to imports will draw over them a pall of gloom and despair.

We should not forget that we not only have reduced our tariffs by some 80 percent in the last quarter century but have become exposed to rougher competition than ever before in the past few years. As the resolution says, we have shipped tens of billions of dollars of modern machinery overseas under foreign aid and as commercial exports. Not only that, we have financed the building of modern plants abroad. Beyond that we have shown our production methods and techniques to thousands of productivity teams from foreign countries. As a result of these actions and operations many foreign plants today have machinery as modern as the machinery in many plants here and more modern than some.

The sharp increase in imports from Japan and Europe in the past 2 years has reflected the wide competitive advantage that they have gained over us. Their productivity is up sharply in many lines but their wages still lag very far behind ours; and there is no reason for believing that this gap will be narrowed appreciably. Foreign labor is not as effective as labor in this country in gaining wage increases. Our own wages are not standing still and it would require a faster and higher climb by foreign wages than here, to put the other countries on a more nearly equal competitive footing than is now the case; and such a trend is not a very likely possibility.

The resolution itself details the principal reasons why further tariff cutting would be an act bordering on hostility to American industry and labor. I wish to turn at this point to some particular aspects of the American competitive and financial position in our total foreign account.

Mr. Speaker, it has only recently come to be known how serious this situation is. The press of this country has failed badly in enlightening the public on this very serious matter. Only in the past 6 months or so has it become known that while in 1959 we were running a deficit in the magnitude of $4 billion in our total foreign account we had in 1958 incurred one of $3.4 billion, and that with the exception of 1957, which was greatly influenced by the Suez crisis of 1956, we have had a deficit each year since 1950.

This means that we have been giving out more internationally than we have been taking in. This growing deficit has shown up in two respects:

First. Our gold has been flowing out in satisfaction of a part of the deficits. The Fort Knox gold stock is down to about $19.5 billion from approximately $25 billion. We have lost $3.5 billion in gold in the past 2 years.

Second. Foreign claims of $18 billion have accumulated in the form of short- and long-term paper. Of this $18 billion, $16 billion represent callable claims against the $19.5 billion of gold still remaining in Fort Knox. This would leave some $3.5 billion in gold as reserves against our currency, or much less than the legal requirement.

Now, it is not expected that a run on our gold will start although the basic conditions for a run are there. When foreign countries and foreign interests have a claim of $16 billion against our reserves of $19.5 billion in gold the potential of a run exists even if the run does not materialize.

Recently gold withdrawals by other countries have slowed to a lower rate of outflow. Why? Is it because the balance has changed? The answer is "No"; the balance has not been reversed. Our imports are still high and our exports are still down. Our foreign and military aid are still flowing at a high rate. American tourist expenditures of dollars abroad are at record levels. Our foreign investments are also still moving in high volume. Obviously no reversal in the balance has taken place. The adverse factors are still on the scene.

If the balance has not been reversed why have gold withdrawals slowed down?

It is for one reason, and that is the higher interest rate being paid by our Treasury Department. While this slowdown in outflow represents a salutary effect there is also an adverse one. The higher interest rate is adding daily to the total interest the taxpayer of this country has to shoulder on the national debt. In other words, as a while back the interest on our national debt was in the magnitude of $7 billion, it is now $9.6 billion, and will soon rise to $10, $11, $12 billion and on up as our Federal bonds mature and have to be refinanced.

Not long ago Secretary Anderson found it necessary to offer 5 percent for short-term money. If the whole national debt of $290 billion were financed at that rate the annual interest would be $14.5 billion.

We see then that the only way we can keep our gold from draining away is through high interest rates. The foreign holders of claims are then willing to leave the bonds here for the interest they draw. Unfortunately, as already said, these higher rates increase the burden of the Treasury; and we are getting nowhere in solving the problem. The higher interest in fact aggravates rather than solves the problem, since it increases the burden.

Much the same situation faces us in our efforts to increase exports. The high costs prevailing in this country have made it more difficult for us to sell to other countries. Wages, I understand, have risen faster in some countries than in the United States since 1954 but they have not kept up with the increase in productivity in many of the industries in foreign countries that have installed modern machinery.

Our efforts to stimulate exports consist largely in further subsidization. Our cotton exports are supposed to spurt during the 1959–60 crop year because we have increased the export subsidy from 6 cents to 8 cents per pound. This 8-cent subsidy will cost us $240 million this year if we export 6 million bales of cotton, and the Treasury will pick up the check. Wheat exports are also heavily subsidized. The subsidy is about 65 cents per bushel or 30 to 35 percent of the value. Beyond that we subsidize other farm products exports by selling under Public Law 480 and taking foreign currencies in payment.

But for these subsidies and foreign-aid shipments our exports of merchandise would be well below our imports. This fact reflects the real position in which the United States stands competitively.

These subsidies, of course, all devolve on the Treasury.

The upshot is that we are on the run. We can keep our gold only by buying our way through in the form of higher interest rates on U.S. obligations, thus increasing the burden of the Treasury. We can increase our agricultural exports principally by further subsidization, thus once more loading further burdens on the Treasury.

How much longer can we continue in this direction without facing the facts of life?

Instead of facing the facts we are even now drawing up a long bargaining list for the next tariff-cutting conference in Geneva. We will be offering further tariff cuts up to 20 percent on numerous items on which the tariff has already been cut, in some cases as much as 75 percent.

The whole proposal of going into another tariff-reduction program is preposterous at this time. We would be walking in exactly the opposite direction from what is called for by the facts.

When will we grow up to the point where we determine our own policies in accordance with the needs of the country rather than taking our cue from weak-kneed diplomats who seem to be eternally unable to bring other countries to see our needs? It seems that the spokesmen of other countries had no difficulty in the postwar years in laying the needs of their countries before us in such a way that we recognized and approved their protective measures when they imposed them. Today we, in turn, need to adopt some protective measures. Where are our diplomats who can explain our needs to other countries in language as clear and compelling as their spokesmen used in convincing us?

On the contrary, we hear more and more that since other countries are eliminating some of their import restrictions we should rush in and take down more of what we have left of barriers against low-cost imports from abroad, to show our heartfelt appreciation, if nothing else.

Such an attitude overlooks completely the fact that the other countries maintained their barriers as long as they needed them, and that they will reimpose them when, as and if they find them again desirable. It was by dint of such protection that these countries were able to regain their feet. Why should they then despise the restrictions that served them so well?

Of course, all these countries denounce protectionism, for our consumption. This denunciation is one of their best exports. It has certainly succeeded in bringing us to dance to their music. Let us not forget that while they reviled protectionism as a principle or a philosophy, they nevertheless made full use of it while it suited them. While malign-ing protectionism for foreign consumption they silently honored it at home.

Mr. Speaker, it seems clear to me that this country is in no position to offer to open yet wider our doors to imports. In the three quarters ended September 1959 our imports from Japan climbed by 54 percent compared with the same period in 1958, while those from Europe rose 43 percent.

Does this record, in all seriousness and in all good sense, look as if we should make further tariff reductions? It seems to me that we are being hopelessly blind to propose such a step. We should keep in mind that it was 2 years ago that the 1958 Trade bill was first sent to Congress. Much water has passed under the bridge since that time. What is very clear now was then no more than something on the far horizon. Why should we not take our bearings from today's reality rather than yesterday's appearance?

I strongly urge adoption of the resolution. I think it is imperative that we be guided by the overwhelming evidence of this country's weak international competitive position and that we avoid action that would only make it worse rather than improving it. I now turn to those of my colleagues who are joining me in support of the resolution.

I yield at this time to my colleague from West Virginia [Mr. MOORE].

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Speaker, I appreciate very much my colleague's yielding to me.

Mr. Speaker, I have not always agreed with my colleague from West Virginia [Mr. BAILEY] as we have stood across the aisle from each other in this body. Today, however, I find myself in complete agreement with him. I have introduced House Concurrent Resolution 462 the same concurrent resolution that he has introduced.

It seems to me that we in the Congress should recognize changes in underlying conditions such as those that have become obvious since mid-1958 when the last Trade Agreements Extension Act was passed; and rather than going through with something that does not fit the present situation we should recognize the changes that have occurred and act accordingly.

In 1958 we authorized, we did not issue a mandate—we authorized the President to cut existing tariff rates another 20 percent in new trade agreements. That authorization has now outlived its day.

As has already been so ably pointed out by others, the present situation of the United States in our foreign dealings was not clear 18 months ago. To be sure, many of us issued warnings at that time; but the facts as they have since been given grudgingly to the public, were still debatable at that time. Those who thought that American industrial know-how and technological leadership held us proof against any really damaging foreign competition could still hold their ground.

Since that time incontrovertible evidence of a very basic shift has come to light. The concurrent resolution that I have introduced in its preamble itself mentions these changes. One of the surest proofs of the changed conditions, however, is found in the turnabout of some of our leading mass production industries.

In the past it was always said that domestic industries that cannot compete with imports must be inefficient. That this was not true and was a libel on some of our finest industries is beside the point. The economists with almost one voice shouted that industries that could not meet foreign competition by that very fact convicted themselves of incompetence, uneconomic operation, and inefficiency in general. If such industries fell by the board it would be a good thing for the economy, they implied or stated explicitly.

The real backbone of the American economy lay in the mass production industries—those giants that were in the forefront of technology and had the moving production line, interchangeable parts, and so forth. Automation was the great god of industrial efficiency. That was the economists' gospel.

Throughout this bootless debate it was claimed, with seemingly blind insistence, that low foreign wages meant nothing so far as harmful competition was concerned. We were so much more productive than our backward friends abroad that we had nothing to worry about so long as we were efficient. The steel industry, the automobile industry, the packinghouses, the business machine manufacturers, the electrical appliance and the rubber industries, and other similar leaders of American industry were constantly cited as proof that low foreign wages meant little or nothing competitively.

Mr. WHITENER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BAILEY. I yield.

Mr. WHITENER. I want to commend the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. BAILEY] and my colleague on the Judiciary Committee, the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. MOORE], for the introduction of this concurrent resolution. I noted, however, in the reference to our major industries that no reference is made to the great textile industry in which I am so vitally interested. I am sure it is an oversight and that somewhere along the line it will be mentioned by name, because it is a greatly burdened industry.

I want to concur in what has just been said with reference to these new industrial competitors who are moving on the scene. Just this week in talking to one of the textile people in my district I was told that on his desk he had a sample of 20 singles carded and 40 two-ply combed yarn which came from Portugal or Spain, I am not sure which, which had been offered to him at 80 cents a pound, which was substantially less than the cost of production of that yarn in our area.

I was further told by this gentleman that a big textile manufacturing company in my neighboring State of South Carolina had recently purchased a quarter of a million pounds of this yarn at a price substantially below the domestic production cost.

It seems to me that the textile industry and the jobs of approximately 230,000 people in the State of North Carolina, and I may say the greater number of those are in my congressional district, are being placed upon the chopping block, so to speak. Unless through this resolution and other efforts which have been continuing on the part of so many, including the two gentlemen from West Virginia and others in this Chamber, at the present time, we face a return to the levels that we had many years ago when this country became dependent upon imports from other countries in some basic commodities. This cuts across the board not only in industry but in agriculture. I think it is encouraging to see that some leaders in agriculture and some leaders in the steel and automobile industries are now coming around to the view which we consider to be essential in the preservation of our domestic industry and our domestic agriculture.

I commend the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. BAILEY], and my equally capable friend from West Virginia [Mr. MOORE], for the contribution they have made to this fight which I consider to be a battle for the jobs of our working people of the country and the fight for the preservation of the economy of this country upon which the entire world is resting at this time.

Mr. MOORE. I thank the gentleman from North Carolina, and I assure him that if he had stayed with me a few minutes longer I would have certainly indicated that great industry he is so much interested in as a part of my remarks.

Well, a new day has dawned. After 25 years the facts of foreign competition have broken through the barrier of economic theory and propaganda.

Now that other countries have gained a great technological advance as a result of installations of a vast amount of modern machinery, our mass production industries have become as vulnerable to imports as were the so-called backward industries in this country in the past. The latter were those, such as glassware and pottery, in which a large element of hand operations were and are still present in the manufacturing process.

Now the relatively low wages abroad have been given greater competitive effect through the greater productivity achieved through extensive mechanization. Steel, which has been on an export basis for many years, has reversed its trend and we have been on a net import basis for more than a year. The tide began turning nearly 2 years ago. With automobiles the story has been much the same, not distorted by a strike. We were the great automobile exporters of the world. Now we are the great importers. Our imports in point of units now exceed our exports 5 or 6 to 1. We have lost our leadership to our backward brethren who so long lacked the great know-how, of which we thought we had a monopoly.

In the case of typewriters we have again reversed direction. We were the world's leading exporters. Today we are net importers of typewriters. Sewing machines reversed themselves 10 years ago. We have only one producing company left. The other remaining one of consequence went out of business over a year ago as a domestic manufacturer and became an importer. Singer Sewing Machine Co., the only one left as a producer of any significance, is abandoning more of its home production and will rely more on its foreign plants, particularly in the cheaper lines.

In the electronic field, in cameras, and other lines in which mass production has long been characteristic, imports are driving domestic producers before them. More and more of the domestic manufacturers of these products are either licensing foreign producers or undertaking manufacturing abroad.

If lower wages in other countries did not confer a distinct competitive advantage we may be sure that our mass producers would not go abroad as a means of competing with foreign manufacturers.

Yet even today we find eminent economists minimizing the effect of foreign competition. They say we should sell more energetically. This may be good advice; but harder selling will not sell raw cotton abroad when our price is 8 cents higher per pound than the world market, as has been pointed out here today. Nor will harder selling dispose of more wheat abroad when our price is 60 cents per bushel above the world price.

Why does anyone think that our higher prices are confined to cotton and wheat? Obviously they extend also to prices of manufactured products. When our manufacturers of generators, turbines, and other equipment bid against foreign manufacturers it is a common experience to find themselves underbid from 30 to 40 percent by their foreign rivals. This margin is about the same as the differential in cotton and wheat prices compared with the world price on these crops.

When the Secretary of the Treasury announced that the proceeds of the Development Loan Fund must be spent in the United States so far as possible the Washington Post deplored this step editorially. It stated that if India, for example, one of the beneficiaries of the Loan Fund, were forced to spend the proceeds of loans under the Fund in the United States the money would have 40 percent less purchasing power than it would were India free to purchase on the world market. This was a measure of the degree to which the Washington Post found us to be overpriced, not in farm products, but in other materials, machinery, and equipment.

Regardless then of economic theory, all the facts, buttressed by everyday experience, point to the untenable competitive situation in which American producers and manufacturers find themselves. Not to recognize this condition would be ostrichlike behavior unworthy of our intelligence. Not only would we gain nothing by it, we would invite ultimate economic disaster. There are those who seem to think that because all our economic indexes are high and pointing upward, we have nothing at all to worry about, least of all, foreign import competition. This is a most shortsighted if not a tragic mistake. The most powerful giant can bleed to death if he bleeds long enough or fast enough. We have been bleeding for years. Since 1950 we have been running a deficit in our overall foreign account, with the exception of 1957. This was slow bleeding until 2 years ago when the stream became broader and deeper. We fell behind 7.5 billion in the 2-year period 1958 and 1959. Our imports rose while our exports either fell or stood still.

Others have pointed out how sharply imports from Japan and Europe have risen. Most of these increases consisted of sharply competitive imports, that is, finished or semifinished manufactures. But for the broad competitive advantage enjoyed by these foreign manufacturers, a condition that is powerful enough to attract a rising flood of American investments outgoing from this country, no such sharp rises in sales to the United States could have occurred.

Let us keep in mind that we have already reduced our tariffs very drastically since 1934, about 80 percent on the average. Now for the first time have foreign countries come into a position to test these tariff reductions; and the results are anything but reassuring to American industry. The outlook for any industry that sees imports capturing, first 5 percent of the domestic market, then 10, 15, and 20 percent; and yet not deterred, but going up to 25, 30, 40 percent or higher, is gloomy to say the least.

Where will the expansion in our domestic economy come from if more and more industries come to face such an outlook; and that is precisely what is happening. Yet we need the expansion; and not merely in service and distribution trades, but in production, if we are to absorb the estimated million new workers that will soon be looking for new jobs each year. We need expansion in production also to remain strong as an industrial nation. This alone will assure our bearing up against the Communist economic onslaught.

Aside from the changes already mentioned or which have been detailed elsewhere, we should not overlook the significance of the rise of the Common Market and the European Free Trade Association in Europe. These are the harbingers of greater mass production and therefore yet cheaper production in Europe in the years to come.

Already our market is wide open to European and Asiatic production. Those countries need no lowering of barriers by us to penetrate our market at will. We will be more realistic if we do as those countries did when they were in trouble. They regulated imports with the most effective instrumentalities known to man. When they thought that imports would harm them or drain their reserves, they cut them back at will and asked no questions.

This observation has already been made on the floor, but it cannot be repeated too often. Europe and Japan saved themselves by resort to very stiff protective measures. Oh, sure, they said the worst things about protectionism for our benefit. Are we to be so stupid as to do what they say we should rather than doing what they did while preaching the opposite? Protectionism cannot be so bad if it brought the countries that resorted to it back to life and prosperity.

Mr. Speaker, I am thoroughly convinced that this is no time for the United States to venture into any further tariff reductions, and I believe that we should so advise the President. He was merely authorized to do something 18 months ago. He was not ordered by law to do so. The conditions having changed so radically since the authorization as to throw the suggested action into question, we would be ill advised indeed to proceed in that manner. I urge all my colleagues to back the concurrent resolution.

Mr. Speaker, I take this opportunity to commend my colleague, the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. BAILEY], for taking this time today in order that we might present here the feelings of so many areas of the country in support of this concurrent resolution.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, at this time I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DENT].

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, first I want to thank the gentleman from West Virginia for his courtesy in allowing me to enter this discussion for a few minutes.

CRUCIAL PERIOD

Mr. Speaker, during these important and all too limited days, it becomes increasingly more important for all of us to take a good long look at what is going on in the world around us. It has been said by one of Khrushchev's predecessors that "England will expand itself out of existance, and the United States will spend itself into oblivion." Every day those of us on the scene here in Washington see the gathering clouds hovering over our American way of life.

While not discounting the importance of labor-management relations, and the increasing tempo of our economic system, one must acknowledge our weakness in a field of much greater importance at this time in our history. We are committed by our leaders to a program of world assistance. This program was started on the high plane of compassionate consideration for human beings living in a troubled world. America was to be the good samaritan to all of the oppressed, the ill-kept, ill-clothed, and ill-housed peoples of the earth. This we do not oppose from a humanitarian viewpoint.

For many years our aid and succor was taken in kind. We were the saviors of the poorer peoples, wherever they happened to live. In the beginning, the wealth, the corporations, the bankers and sophisticates all opposed this program. Now, these groups have all embraced not only the humble beginning, but are clamoring for more, more aid, more help, more guidance and more intervention into every country on the face of the earth. Meanwhile, here at home, we find ourselves being fed the propaganda of cheaper labor, more production, and less privileges for the working class.

Ever since man discovered the wheel and found out he could pay someone to push it for him, there has been a consuming ambition to own the wheels and to pay as little as possible to have someone push it. This is true all over the world. Every country is seeking production and the cheaper, the better. Any 8-year-old kid can tell you that production is worthless unless the products are consumed.

What happens when we have helped every country produce more than they can consume after they have sold all they can to our American consumer? Remember one thing and do not forget it—every time a Japanese radio is sold in America, an American radio is left in the stockroom. Our stockrooms are pretty full right now. Inventories of American business are estimated to be about $87 billion compared to $25 billion in the thirties. That is not half the story, the inventories of the American consumer are so fantastically high that to even venture a guess at the figure would be idiotic. A wise man once said, "About 25 percent of the United States is covered by forest and the rest by mortgages."

We have within our congressional prerogatives the tools to work out a solution. We will not do it because, in the main, we have perverted our principles. We have set aside peoples and peace and are pushing for profits and property.

The whole foreign aid, reciprocal trade, and defense spending program is based upon profits, propaganda and political expediency. It is interesting to note some figures that prove this statement: Foreign aid during the trying and critical war years amounted to $59.8 billion. Foreign aid from 1946 to 1959—up to March—amounted to $140 billion. This does not count the $20 billion of interest or the $80 billion we have spent in military establishments, maintaining our troops and purchases by our Government in foreign countries. Added up—this amounts to over $240 billion since the war against our total national debt of $290 billion. In the face of these figures, not discounting the need for some of the expenditures, but just trying to make two and two equal four—how can any person in their right mind blame American labor, the American farmer, or the small businessman for the ridiculous plight we find ourselves in today.

Here we are—with the greatest production facilities in the world urging every country in the world to get into production against us. No one minds other countries producing for themselves and gearing their way of life to their own ability to sustain it. It does, however, become an impossible situation with the theorists, the political fakers and profiteers when they urge taking money from the pockets of American workers to build factories to produce goods to sell to American workers which we produce in surplus and which they produce at wage levels which do not allow these foreign workers to buy the products of American workers.

One of the reasons for our present economic dilemma comes from overexpansion of production facilities in our own country. You can imagine what happens to the same dilemma when we help other countries build facilities to produce what we already overproduce. Let us look at steel production. We have built up our production facilities to produce over 150 million tons a year. We can produce all the steel the whole world can consume. In the face of this established fact, we have built or helped to build plants all over the world.

In doing this, we were motivated—we hope—by the high ideals of helping our neighbors. We seemed to forget, however, that no steel can be sold unless people have the money to buy it. If we produce more than we can buy and we help our friendly competitors to produce without demanding that they pay their workers enough to buy what they produce, the only place they can sell is in our market, to our workers, who then reduce their purchases of our own products thereby creating unemployment, while industry demands cheaper and greater production in the hope of recapturing the markets we have given away. In this way, we have become the suckers for giving the succor. It has often been said that the fault lies in underconsumption, not in overproduction. However, unless the producers get enough income to buy up production and services that will in turn make income to buy up production, how in heaven's name can consumption keep up with production.

Without the benefit of being an expert, let us take a simple little everyday example. If a plant produces 100 cars a day, selling for $2,000 each, with 2,000 workers at $20 a day, that plant is putting $40,000 a day into the buying market and puts $200,000 worth of product into the selling market. If this same plant produces the same number of cars by automation—sells them for $1,500 while only employing 1,000 workers at $20 a day, we find that there is only $20,000 going into the buying market, while putting $150,000 worth of product into the selling market. In other words, the purchase ability of production labor has been cut 50 percent while the products they produce has only been cut 25 percent. This case is not nearly as bad as the many like situations that have come up in recent years and are now starting to come to the front in most of our automated plants. Actually, the argument that by producing for less—more goods will be sold and more jobs created is true only if buying power at the basic production plant is maintained. Of course, this can be argued out by the long-hair experts, who will come up with a conclusion that this example is all wrong. But, the facts remain, if you do not have the money, you cannot buy unless you buy without intending to pay for it.

This holds true in the relationship between trade and economic prosperity. If a nation trades on a dollar balance without considering the production payroll balance, it will go broke. The argument has been advanced by the international profiteers that if we sell a dollar's worth and buy a dollar's worth, everybody will be making money. That is as silly as trading a horse for a rabbit and then selling the meat retail. When we sell raw goods, machinery, powerplants, and buy back the finished consumer goods made from these items we are trading a horse for a rabbit in the marketplace and on the production line. How silly can we get when we consider a sale of $100,000 worth of raw cotton to Japan as an even trade for $100,000 worth of shirts, socks, and skivvies?

Frankly, it is not a question of high or low tariffs; it is a question of high or low standards. If Japanese workers received the same pay as Americans and paid the same taxes; if Japanese industry had the same laws to abide by, paid the same taxes, the same cost of living with social and welfare costs being equal, and profits subject to the same restrictions and charges as our American standard, they would not be able to undersell us and would have to depend upon their own consumption for basic prosperity. The great thinkers say that is what the future holds for all of us—equal pay, equal opportunities, and, above all, equal standards of living. OK; we will buy that. However, where do we finally rest our laurels—at the low standard of Japan and other competing countries or at the level Americans believe their right? Now, when we all reach the same standard, whom do we sell to and whom do we buy from? If a Ford made here sells for as much in every other country and every other country makes Fords, why do we have to ship or trade with other countries? The same holds true for shirts, socks, and skivvies.

In plain words, we are making deals, buying facilities, leasing and licensing manufacturing rights to produce everything, everywhere. When we have reached the saturation point in our market by buying up goods from other countries we can produce here, and the other markets do not buy any of our production, what happens to their own production as well as our own? Basically, we have to control, whether we like it or not, the production of production facilities.

If we can produce 10 million autos and can consume only 8 million, why should the facilities be expanded to produce 15 million while at the same time we reduce the number of potential buyers by automated production facilities to where we can produce 1½ times as much goods with one-half as many workers?

The best example of this kind of poor management can be seen in our agricultural surplus. We started out trying to help the farmer by buying up his surplus. In less than 8 years we have come from zero to about $10 billion worth of surplus farm goods which cost over $1 billion a year just to store. Facts show that only a small percentage of farmers are doing this overproduction. You may think this ought to awaken the long-hairs, but it has not. They are now promoting the plan to buy up surplus production of manufacturing plants. This, then, is the plan. Buy up surplus farm foods, give it away to Europe and Asia. Buy up surplus production of steel, cars, and so forth, and give the surplus away to underprivileged countries.

Of course, they argue that we only have to give it away until the underprivileged countries get enough money, material, and know-how from our country to produce enough goods so that they can sell it to the American people so they can get enough dollar credits to buy additional machinery, from the other countries we put on their feet before, and whose competition put us into the surplus commodities business in the first place.

As one of the outstanding examples of the stupidity of our own position in the matter of export-import trade balances and their relationship to international good will, the experience of the coal producers of this country ought to be a lesson for even the most rampant internationalist.

It has been argued by those who have favored the elimination of all tariff barriers that by so doing we influence other countries into the same and that in the end, the exchange of free entry goods will benefit the producing nations such as the United States. To bring this about, it has been argued too that we have to reduce, or curtail wages, put in automation, and thereby reduce the cost of American-made goods and that if we did sell it, we would be able to sell in world markets strictly on the basis of price consideration.

The one industry in the United States that, through cooperation and understanding between the producers and the union, have been able to produce at a cost that has made it the cheapest selling product of its kind in the entire world—I am speaking of coal, both bituminous and anthracite. In regard to bituminous, there are many countries in the world that produce bituminous coal; however, none of them are able to produce it at a price anywhere near that which American producers can put it on the market. In regards to anthracite coal, there are only two known major deposits of this mineral—one in the United States and the other in Russia. Since we are talking about our NATO friends and allies, we can assume that the Russian supply would not be a deterrent to the purchase of American anthracite because the whole scheme of things behind the foreign and economic aid programs is that we are in a combine with friends who are not purchasing from Russia.

Let us get back then to the real issue—the exportation of soft coal, or bituminous coal as it is known in the market. In the President's Economic Report, presented to Congress January 20, this year, on page 34, the President had this to say about coal:

> Coal exports, despite the price advantage favoring the United States, met increasing obstacles because of the oversupply of coal in Europe.

This simple statement only tells part of the story. The real reason that coal exports dropped to the low point that it is now is because the main importing country, West Germany, imposed a tariff upon coal of 4.78 a ton which is even greater than the price of coal in the American market. Why was this done? It was done to protect the West German coal producers against the importation of coal from outside the country that could be sold in the country at a rate less than the production cost in West Germany. Now, if our friendly ally, which incidentally was a defeated nation in World War II, and is now enjoying the greatest prosperity in its entire history, can put up barriers against the importation of the one American product that can undersell their local domestic producers, then how can any American stand up in defense of a program that allows the importation of goods from every country in the world that we produce in surplus in this country on the grounds that they can be sold cheaper to the American people. The reason in coal is proof positive—that every nation except the United States protects its own home economy first—takes care of its friends second.

It is my firm conviction that unless we take another look and reevaluate our position in world trade from the standpoint of what is good for America, we will be headed into that oblivion promised us by the Russian Communist leader.

No man should be elected President who will continue this idiotic program that will not only bankrupt us financially, but will defeat us militarily.

If this kind of logic and thinking is reactionary then the Lord help us liberals. We will soon get to the point where we will not have anything to give but our words and by this time we have given enough to choke an elephant, let alone a donkey.

Further, Mr. Speaker, last September 9 I listed for the information of Congress a report on ships and cargoes entering U.S. ports with the products of foreign industry. Many of my colleagues registered amazement at the vast tonnages that were being unloaded in a single day at American seaports.

At this time I should like to remind you that there has been no ebbing whatsoever of the tides that move foreign-produced commodities into the markets of this country. Hour after hour, day after day, week after week, month after month, the big freighters and tankers are rolling into ports on the Atlantic, the Pacific, the Gulf, and the St. Lawrence with a miscellany of goods that cast ever-extending shadows over the employment opportunities of our miners, railroad workers, and factory personnel.

The threat to American industry and labor started off with an invasion of fuel markets and such manufacturing areas as handmade glass, pottery, ceramics, clothes pins, and other products whose individual personnel rolls may be small but which represent traditional American enterprise. As tariffs dropped, the toll of business victims took in a much wider range, with mass-production industries eventually succumbing and being forced to locate their own plants in lands of cheap labor.

The effects of import competition are now so widespread that no section of the country has assurance that its economy will be able to stand up against the idiotic policies granting preference to foreign producers over domestic industry and labor. The extent of the damage is typified by the evidence presented here today by my colleagues from all areas of the Nation.

Today I shall confine my remarks to what has taken place in the congressional district I represent as a consequence of the legislative surrender to the executive department the authority to regulate international commerce.

First came foreign residual oil. With the mounting seas of this fuel, mine after mine in western Pennsylvania had to close, with workers automatically relegated to relief rolls. Railroad freight traffic was simultaneously cut back as foreign oil knocked coal out of east coast utilities and industrial plants. When I visit mining camps, our discouraged citizenry invariably ask me about the chances of getting back to work. I cannot tell them that the situation is hopeless and that they should clear out and move into areas of more vigorous economic activity. To advise these Americans to resign themselves to a fate brought about by the stupidity of dreamy diplomats would be a reflection upon the integrity of the U.S. Government. Furthermore, any great exodus of trained mineworkers could lead to national catastrophe, in that the services of these experienced men will be needed desperately if and when an emergency develops.

Railroaders are in a parallel category. With coal traffic off, rail employment drops proportionately. But if the enemy should strike suddenly and coal is required to replace the foreign oil upon which we have come to rely but which would not be available in a period of hostility, the railroad trainman and maintenance man would be as important to survival as any other individual in the military effort. Two world wars have proved beyond contradiction that coal and railroads are ingredients of survival in universal conflicts.

So our idle workers must stand by, waiting patiently for a reversal of the foreign trade policies that have deprived them of their jobs.

We also have large manufacturers of electrical generating equipment in our district. Their employees have for a long time wondered about the logic of a program that admits foreign products to displace identical made-in-America equipment. Our glassworkers cannot understand why they are without full-time employment while European products flood domestic markets. And a score of other industries strive desperately to hold on in the face of mounting imports of competitive products.

I will say to the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. BAILEY], who has carried on a relentless battle to save American industry and labor from unfair foreign competition, that the proposed resolution is not going to answer our problem. It is not going to put our people back to work. But I am supporting this resolution because I feel that it will also serve as a message to the State Department that Congress will no longer tolerate the devious practices which put our home industries in a hopeless position in international competition. Through this resolution we are notifying the responsible officeholders that we want to stop the practice of placing diplomatic expediency above the welfare of our country. We are going on record as opposing further tariff reductions, and inherent in this resolution is a determination to remedy the policies that give foreign-made products precedence in our home markets.

We are proud of our high wage scales, our standards of living. We refuse to permit them to be depressed in order to attempt to meet production costs of countries where income of labor groups is bare subsistence. The resolution which we offer today is advance notice that Congress has reaffirmed its determination to act in the interest of the American people.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, I want to submit a few recent figures on foreign trade trends and their cumulative effect upon our U.S. economy:

FOREIGN TRADE BRIEFS

Thirty thousand steel jobs: Drastic changes in import/export trade in iron and steel mill products have cost Americans the equivalent of 30,000 jobs in the steel industry, wrote A. H. Fetherolf, senior editor of Steelways.

"And the economic loss to domestic wage earners does not stop here. The sale of more than 430,000 foreign cars in the United States last year, for instance, meant fewer jobs not only in steel but in our automotive and fabricating industries.

"How many other jobs were lost due to iron and steel imported—and the decline of the industry's exports—in the form of machine tools, farm machinery, sewing machines and a host of other products is a moot question. But clearly the answer evokes few cheers over here."

Electronic products: U.S. imports of Jap electronic products in first half of 1959 ($22 million), surpassed entire total for 1958 and tripled 1957 ($7.5 million). United States appears prime foreign target for Jap's booming industry, absorbing 34 percent of her electronic exports in 1956, 39 percent in 1957, 46 percent in 1958, and over 50 percent first-half 1959.

Import-impact on domestic manufacturers of transistor (a U.S. invention) radios was immediate: in 1957, United States made 20 such radios to every Jap import; but in 1958, United States made only three to their one, a rapid, 2-year Jap advance from 5 to 25 percent into American market where imports underprice U.S. unit by two-thirds. (Electronic Industries Association.)

Pottery: President Wheatley, International Brotherhood of Operative Potters, attacked AFL–CIO resolution on foreign trade on grounds it does not go far enough to protect pottery industry; 7,500 workers dropped by dissolved firms in last 10 years, he said. (Since 1954, one-third of pottery companies displaced by imports—NWC.)

Umbrellas: Umbrella frame manufactures, reduced by imports from six to three companies since 1954, renew plea for industry-saving tariffs in open letter to President. Similar appeal rejected in 1958 when Japs had 60 percent of U.S. market. Higher 1959 import trend indicates U.S. manufacturers may salvage only 25 percent of own market this year.

Coal: In 1947, U.S. miners delivered record 631 million tons of bituminous coal from earth to customer. In 1949, low-priced residual fuel oil imports, a residue byproduct of oil refinement, shouldered into American market with 75 million barrels. Bituminous coal production dropped off next 2 years by 193 million tons; since 1950, 1.3 billion barrels poured through ports here displacing the energy equivalent of 310 million tons of U.S. coal as well as idling numerous miners.

Cotton: Exports of U.S. cotton manufactures dropped from 954,000 bales equivalent to 539,000 while imports increased from 38,000 to 273,000 over last 10 years. Differential of net exports over imports cut from 917,000 to 266,000 resulting in net loss to domestic mills of 651,000 bales equivalent. Foreign competition maneuvered United States from net exporter to net importer of cotton end products.

Hosiery: U.S. hosiery exports dropped 38.6 percent first 7 months of 1959 over same period 1958 or from 1,788,639 dozen pairs at $7.4 million to 1,098,551 dozen pairs at $4.6 million.

"Our export market suffers a slow and painful death," W. F. Williamson, president of National Association of Hosiery Manufacturers, told the nationwide committee.

Foreign productivity teams (continued from issue No. 4): A U.S. tool steel company, urged by ICA, conducted an Asiatic productivity team through its plants, understanding that the team was subsequently to develop a foreign subsidiary operation for the parent firm. However, negotiations were soon dropped at the other end. They now produce similar tool steel, utilizing their newly acquired know-how to underbid and undersell the host company over here.

But another steel official, faced by a camera-laden team at his plant, told the ICA representative. It took us 35 years to develop our special processes and we do not intend to blow the whole operation in 35 minutes.

Do U.S. productivity costs offset low foreign wages? A U.S. firm which makes pumps both here and abroad says "No." It cost them but one-third the U.S. costs to produce the same machine there. In addition, costs in their foreign facilities dropped 5 percent while parent plant's increased 50 percent during same 5-year period.

Committee activities: September 25, Miami: O. R. Strackbein attacks demolition squad of State Department for undoing work of Congress' Tariff Commission (Florida Fruit & Vegetable Association); September 28, Hot Springs, W. Va.: Strackbein calls for restoration of congressional authority in foreign trade and cautioned delegates that injurious economic fallout from trade agreements will be as lethal to many of our domestic industries as strontium 90 if a brake is not applied (Machine Knife Association); October 7, Washington: Strackbein testifies before U.S. Tariff Commission in opposition to compensatory tariff cuts on glass mirrors and books on grounds "legal authority is lacking for this process of double economic jeopardy proposed to be perpetrated against innocent industrial and labor bystanders."

Leather gloves: "Sharing a market is one consideration; but to dominate it completely * * * is not justified." Of the two U.S. leather glove producing areas, New York City has discontinued domestic production while Fulton County, N.Y., producers have been whittled from 184 firms to 56.

"The growth of imports is almost in direct proportion to our losses * * * and every 30 or 40 thousand dozen increase means the loss of several small plants or one large one." (Petition of Leather Glove Manufacturers Association.) Clothing union, supporting petition, said cutters' membership dropped from 701 to 289 due chiefly to imports.

Free-trade shoes: Says chairman of a New England shoe company: "Sure, all this free trade may be great for international relations. * * * But how do I explain that to several hundred of my employees who were waiting for a midyear bonus and got termination notices instead?" (Think, November 1959.)

Hides: While imports of cattlehides were 377 percent higher first half 1959 over same for 1958, U.S. net hide exports steadily dropped from 6.3 million pieces in 1957; to 5 million in 1958; to 1959 estimate of 2.7 million—lowest since 1953. (Schnitzer, Department of Commerce.)

Woolen and worsted fabric: Imports up 850 percent since 1947, helping liquidate over 100,000 U.S. jobs; closing hundreds of mills; reducing domestic output almost 50 percent.

Terry woven towel: Imports from Hong Kong increased from 160,000 pieces first half 1958 to 2 million, same period 1959. British colony of commerce also doing land office business here in other categories: wearing apparel (except shirts) up 167 percent—from $6 million to $16 for same periods.

Silk fabric: Imports from Japan jumped from 13 million square yards to 51 between 1954–58, while U.S. silk woven fabric production dropped from 50 to 32 million square yards during same period.

U.S. imports: First 10 months 1959 now 12.4 billion, a 19 percent jump over same in 1958.

Meat import record: Total U.S. meat imports of 1 billion pounds in 1959 will break record. Six Australian ships alone brought 40 million pounds beef here—more than one-half of all slaughter here under Federal inspection in June. (G. Reid, Oklahoma Cattlemen's Association.)

United States-New Zealand price gap: So great that current study underway by New Zealand Meat Board to air-ship meat to United States at three times sea cost.

Bikes: "The Kress stores sell a German-made bicycle for $39.95 that gives the appearance of an American * * * which sells for $78.95. It is difficult to convince customers that this wide difference in price can possibly be justified by a difference in quality or for any other reason. Consequently, the imports have caused us to lose many sales." (Tulsa bicycle shop owner.)

Chemicals: One and one-tenth million pounds of phathalic anhydride imports first-half 1959 were triple 1958 total. "An unusual situation for United States, traditionally a large exporter of this chemical," says Chemical Week.

Steel bars: "The Japanese purchase American scrap, haul it back to their mills in the Orient, manufacture it into finished products, reship it back across the Pacific, and still undersell American producers by as much as $29 a ton, for example, on reinforcing bars." (R. Blough, in U.S. News & World Report.)

Soviet pig iron: Arrived Buffalo at $49 a ton (including duty) contrast with United States at $66.

Typewriters—Knock-out, buy-out: Foreign competition now elevated to gradual level as Olivetti, big Italian business machine manufacturer, which helped knock out Underwood's markets, now buys out controlling interest in U.S. firm. Competitive strategy calls for Italian company to push foreign products—under Underwood label—through ready-made distribution network of 700 U.S. salesmen, 1,200 servicemen, and over 500 agents.

Italian-United States trade: Imports from Italy up 47 percent ($141 million to $208) first 7 months 1959 over same for 1958; U.S. exports to Italy down 26 percent ($304 to $225 million) for similar periods. Result: Italy's U.S. trade deficit cut almost 90 percent or $163 to $17 million.

Committee activities: Committee directors, at annual board meeting, called for U.S. withdrawal from further tariff-cutting commitments at GATT's meeting in 1960. Chairman of board, "another tariff cutting conference is out of focus with competitive realities and would represent an economic misstep of the utmost gravity."

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks and include extraneous matter.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. DAVIS of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

Mr. DAVIS of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, since the 4-year extension of the Trade Agreements Act a year and a half ago, our trade position in the world has come to be recognized for what it is, namely, a highly vulnerable posture in the face of rising import competition.

We have had a deficit in our foreign account annually since 1950 with the exception of 1957. Beginning with 1958 this deficit began to reach serious proportions, that is, $3.4 billion. In 1959, the year just closed, the deficit was yet greater, or some $4 billion.

During the first 9 months of 1959 our imports from Europe increased 43 percent compared with the same period in 1958. Imports from Japan increased still more steeply, or 54 percent. These are startling increases indeed. Needless to say, most of these imports compete sharply with our own production.

We do not have to look far for the reasons. For one thing we have lowered our tariff over 75 percent in the past 25 years. The effects of these reductions would have been felt much sooner had we not been protected by war and postwar conditions. That such a deep cut in our tariff was a monumental error is now coming to be obvious.

Beyond the sharp tariff reductions that have been made several other factors have contributed to our difficulties. Our foreign industrial competitors have gained greatly in productivity during the past 5 or 6 years. From the United States alone they imported over $20 billion worth of modern machinery, a good part of it in the form of foreign aid. Altogether in the past 12 years they have imported from us over $30 billion in machinery, much of it under the Marshall plan.

Their production techniques were also improved as a result of visits through our plants by thousands of foreign productivity teams. Is it any wonder that these countries can now outproduce us, outsell us, and take markets away from us almost at will.

While their wages have risen more rapidly than ours in the past 5 years, according to such statistics as there are, our wage rise began shortly after World War II and was quite far along before foreign wages started their climb. It stands to reason that foreign productivity has risen faster than foreign wages. This fact accounts for the greater competitive capacity of a number of foreign countries today.

If this were not the case, then how could it come about that even the mass-production industries in this country, those with the highest productivity per man-hour, have seen their exports shrink while imports soared? The automobile industry is one. The steel industry is another. We are now on a net import basis in both of these industries. The typewriter industry is yet another. For the first time in history we are importing more typewriters than we are exporting.

We can no longer say that we can outproduce other countries even in our most advanced industries. We are vulnerable and becoming more vulnerable across a broad and ever-widening front. Electronics, athletic goods, copper and brass goods, fishing tackle, candy, flower bulbs, and many other lines are coming under heavy attack. Textiles have long been bothered.

Our prices are high because of high wages, high profits, high employment, price-supported agriculture, social security, obligatory collective bargaining; but above all because of the heavy expenditures of World War II, and the high defense budgets since 1950. These have given us a heavy debt and a heavy tax burden; and these come out as higher production costs in all lines.

We have willingly helped many other countries back onto their feet. While they were down we condoned the highly restrictive trade practices to which they resorted, in the form of import quotas, import licensing systems, exchange controls, and so forth. We recognized their needs in this respect. Their diplomats were able to convince us of the gravity of their situation; and we listened to them.

In recent times it has become obvious that some of these foreign countries are now in a position to relax some of their import restrictions. England, in particular, has already taken some concrete steps in this direction. France and West Germany have made some moves toward liberalizing their import quotas. Japan has promised to take action next year.

These are significant developments.

However, some very strange interpretations have been placed on them. Immediately the free-trade enthusiasts threw their hats in the air and said, "Now that our friends are liberalizing their trade controls we must reduce our barriers as a gesture of appreciation and goodwill."

Such maudlin sentiment has no place in our trade relations with other countries.

Let us keep two things in mind and we will be able to think more clearly.

First. The European countries and Japan established strict import controls when they needed them. They did not ask us whether they might do so. They did tell us why they needed them; but the national need was the final consideration and indeed the only question.

Second. These controls succeeded in their purpose. It was by their use that these nations were able to rise from the depths. Of course, our aid contributed a great deal; but yet if the import restrictions had been bad for these countries, the phenomenal rise toward prosperity that they have experienced could not have occurred.

Very well, the import restrictions were helpful to the economically disrupted countries. By use of the controls they were able to rebuild their monetary reserves and to approach convertibility of currency with confidence.

If we look at our own position of today we may get an idea. Our total foreign account, including, beside merchandise exports and imports, such items as foreign investments, tourist expenditures, and military and foreign aid, is now badly out of balance. Recently our commercial imports from Japan outran our commercial exports. We have lost some $3.5 billion in gold since January 1958. The Fort Knox gold supply is down from the $25 billion level to $19.5 billion; and other countries own most of this reserve. Should they exercise their claims—something that is not expected—we would have left insufficient funds to cover the legal reserve requirements for our paper currency.

This is not a cause for alarm or panic but it is cause indeed for concern and for corrective action.

We should have the good sense that these other countries exhibited when they protected themselves as they needed protection. We should use import quotas and increased tariffs in those instances in which imports are rising too rapidly and capturing fast rising percentages of our home market. We should improve the investment climate here at home so that our manufacturers would not be tempted to go overseas for their expansion. Scores of them are doing this now and many have already done so in the past. Others are studying the possibilities and making up their minds right now.

I think it is imperative that we give these industries and producers the assurances that other countries were able to give their industries, namely, that the home market will be protected according to its needs, so that import-vulnerable industries may be assured of a market for their products. This is all the more urgent since our foreign markets have either been shrinking or standing virtually still. Already we are subsidizing heavily to maintain our exports. This, of course, helps little but adds to the woes of the Secretary of the Treasury because the subsidy bills are sent to him and he must pay them.

Mr. Speaker, under these circumstances it becomes unthinkable that we should go into another tariff-cutting conference later this year. The law authorizing the President to enter into further trade agreements and to reduce tariffs another 20 percent was passed a year and a half ago. That was before the present position of this country had become so clearly defined. The great rise in imports had not reached a crest. Indeed it possibly has not yet done so. The decline in our exports had not yet become so deeply set; and foreign productivity had not yet reached its present magnitude.

We should reassess our position and should take our cue from present realities rather than from those of 18 months ago. As matters stand today the very idea of further tariff reductions is at odds with the facts of our position, and should be so recognized.

I think that Congress should so express itself. If we do not, the Department of State, which carries on the negotiations, will feel free to make further cuts in tariffs that are already too low. We in Congress represent the people back home. We have the responsibility of bringing their needs to those in the executive branch who are not elected but appointed to carry out existing policies.

It is up to us to reflect the changing conditions and circumstances as they affect the people of this country. We cannot expect the State Department to share our concern about those who send us here. That Department is in touch with foreign countries and the representatives of foreign interests. If we do not speak for the people back home, they are left without a voice. For that reason I feel that it is incumbent on us here in Congress to make our views known.

It would perhaps be better to repeal the authorization of the further 20 percent tariff reduction; but it might be argued with some merit that this would be a more drastic step than is necessary. For that reason, for the time being at least, I think it would be more appropriate for Congress simply to make known its sentiment.

I strongly urge that the resolution be brought to the floor and adopted.

Mr. BERRY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Maine [Mr. MCINTIRE] may extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Dakota?

There was no objection.

Mr. MCINTIRE. Mr. Speaker, I am happy to join with the gentleman from West Virginia—CLEVELAND M. BAILEY—and others who have introduced this resolution, a concurrent resolution which expresses the sense of Congress that the United States should not grant further tariff reductions in the forthcoming tariff negotiations under the provisions of the Trade Agreements Extension Act of 1958.

During my years of congressional service I have not supported legislation relating to reciprocal trade. I was apprehensive lest such complications referred to by other speakers would arise, leaving us unable to cope with them effectively owing to our support of the general agreements on tariffs and trade.

Industries in Maine's Third Congressional District are considerably disturbed over the adverse effects prompted by imports of foreign commodities, and there is no question but that such imports have a marked negative influence on the Maine economy. Agriculture, boots and shoes, wood turning, and fisheries—these are some of the industries that stand to be adversely affected by increased foreign imports as a consequence of lowered tariff rates.

I have today introduced this concurrent resolution in behalf of these many small industries in Maine's Third Congressional District, being happy to join with others who have introduced this identical resolution.

I urge the support of my colleagues for this concurrent resolution.

Mr. BERRY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BAILEY. I yield.

Mr. BERRY. Mr. Speaker, I want to congratulate the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. BAILEY] for a very fine statement and for bringing forward the resolution in which I join him.

I agree with him that this is no time to make further tariff reductions. The position of this country today in its foreign competitive standing calls not for further tariff cuts, but for measures of protection that will prevent particular industries and agricultural producers from being driven progressively out of the home market by imports.

The situation today is less reassuring than it was 2 years ago when the present Trade Agreements Act was sent to Congress. The Congress authorized the President to reduce existing tariffs as much as 20 percent. At that time the trade deficits that the United States was to experience in its foreign transactions in 1958 and 1959 had not yet become a reality. In fact, in 1957 we did not have a deficit but a small surplus. There was not as evident a condition then in 1958 as there is today, calling for caution and prudence in tariff negotiations.

In 1958, as has already been said on the floor this afternoon, we fell $3.4 billion short in covering our international outgo. In 1959 we fell behind even more, or about $4 billion. This makes about $7.5 billion in 2 years.

There are those who say that this trend will be reversed and that signs of a change have already appeared.

I wish to address myself particularly to the agricultural aspects of this question. I can tell you that I see no ray of hope on the horizon in exports of farm products. On the contrary there is every likelihood of more and more imports.

A great deal has already been made of the increase in raw cotton exports during the present fiscal year. If this is the best example that can be found by the free-trade element of the hoped-for upsurge in farm exports, they are indeed hard up.

The fact is that our cotton exports had fallen to a low level in the fiscal year 1958–59. They fell to 3,129,000 bales from 5,666,000 bales in the preceding fiscal year, 1957–58.

We must go back to 1956 if we want the whole picture. Exports had dropped to a low point of 2,214,000 bales in that year from a level of a little over 5 million bales during the years 1950–52. This decline resulted from the lower world cotton prices compared with prices in this country.

Then we began subsidizing our raw cotton exports at 6 cents per pound. In 1957 exports jumped to 7,598,000 bales, a figure three times as high as 1956. This was a short-lived spurt for in 1958 (calendar year) exports dropped to 5,717,000 bales. This was followed by a slide to the figure mentioned above, that is, 3,129,000 bales during the fiscal year 1958–59.

On August 1, 1959, the export subsidy was raised from 6 percent per pound to 8 cents; and exports have again responded. However, the more we export, the more it will cost the Treasury. Should exports rise to 6 million bales, the subsidy would amount to $240 million. Such increase in exports should not be counted as evidence that our total trade deficit is declining. If we can increase our exports only by subsidizing to the extent of 30 to 35 percent of the world price, we can hardly gain comfort from our international competitive position.

The story of wheat is much the same. Our export subsidy bridges the gap between the domestic support price and the world price. This gap amounts to some 60 to 65 cents per bushel at the present time. Yet, in spite of this, our exports of wheat have declined. In 1956 we exported 410 million bushels of wheat; 414 million bushels in 1957. During fiscal year 1957–58 the exports dropped to 322 million bushels and then rose to 360 million bushels in the 1958–59 fiscal year, still well below the 1956 and 1957 figures. The subsidy at 60 cents per bushel would amount to $144 million for 1958–59. Again, I want to point out that this subsidized sale cannot rightly be counted as part of our exports. Our trade deficit is actually wider by that much more than the official export figures show.

Aside from the cotton and wheat subsidies which amount to nearly $400 million per year at present, a large part of our agricultural exports are sold for foreign currencies under Public Law 480. The proceeds of these so-called sales are generally used as aid to foreign countries in the form of counterpart funds which must be spent within the country itself.

During the fiscal year 1958–59 our agricultural exports moved to the extent of 56.7 percent either under our Government subsidy or as sales for foreign currency. Only 43.3 percent of our agricultural exports were sold for dollars in private commercial unsubsidized transactions.

It is clear from what has already been said that we can hardly look to agricultural exports as a source of overcoming the deficit in our foreign account. The price differential between our producers and those of foreign countries seems to range from 30 to 40 percent in favor of the foreign. This does not augur well for any great expansion in our exports of farm products except as foreign crop failures or famines may create an extraordinary demand or as we increase the export subsidies.

When we read the bulletins from the Department of Agriculture, we note the curious emphasis on exports, such as runs through the expressions of all the executive departments of the Government that have a hand in our foreign trade. All of them emphasize the value of exports to our economy, often in highly exaggerated form. In the bulletin entitled "Foreign Agricultural Trade" issued by the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year 1958–59, dated November 1959, is found the following propagandistic statement:

> High-level agricultural exports are vital to U.S. agriculture as an important part of the Nation's economy. Last year's exports represented the output of 41 million acres, or 1 out of every 8 harvested. This was equivalent to 32 million long tons of cargo—enough to fill 800,000 freight cars and 3,600 ships. In moving these exports, an average of 10 ships weighed anchor each day.

Now what was the purpose of this commentary? Is it the function of the Department of Agriculture to beat the drums for the merchant marine of this country and to support the trade agreements program in reports issued at public expense?

Why do these reports, to be fair, not also point out how many millions of acres are not put into cultivation or utilized as grassland because of imports? Calculations such as these are carefully avoided. How many acres could be turned into cane and beet sugar if imports were limited more sharply? If beef and lamb and live cattle imports were eliminated, what acreage could be added to our grazing land? How many thousands of acres of feed crops would be required to fatten this beef, mutton, and pork? It has been estimated that 1959 meat imports passed the billion pound mark. Fresh or frozen beef and veal alone during the first 9 months of 1959 exceeded 500 million pounds. In 1958 we imported 39,769 head of sheep and lambs, Lamb—slaughtered—imports have also risen spectacularly. In 1958 we also imported 1,152,407 head of cattle and the carcass equivalent of 909,049 head, or a total of 2,061,456 head.

If we should run through all the agricultural imports and reduce them to acreage as the Department of Agriculture seeks to do with respect to agricultural exports we would find, I am sure, that the acreage needed to produce the imports would be materially greater than that needed for exports.

During the fiscal year 1958–59 our agricultural exports amounted to $3.7 billion, or 22 percent of our total exports, while agricultural imports amounted to $4.0 billion or 29 percent of our total imports.

It is a well-known fact, as already amply demonstrated, that our prices are from 30 to 40 percent higher than foreign prices in the case of cotton and wheat. This differential, we may be sure, extends to other products as well.

Therefore, from simple arithmetic we can conclude that our agricultural imports of $4 billion would be greater in point of quantity by some 30 to 40 percent than an equal dollar value of exports. Our exports of agricultural products, however, amounted, not to $4 billion but to $3.7 billion.

It would seem safe to say then that if our exports of agricultural products represented the output of 41 million acres, our agricultural imports represented the output of something like 60 million acres. Oddly enough, no bulletin of the Department of Agriculture ever carries speculative calculations along these lines. Why?

Mr. Speaker, all the evidence points to the untenable position of this country in foreign competition with respect to our most important export crops and also with respect to other agricultural items such as wool, lamb, beef, cattle and many others. Certainly there is no call for any tariff cutting in this field. It must be obvious that we are actually in need of some restrictions on such imports as are hurting different domestic agricultural products. Besides beef, lamb, pork, and other animal products and grains, such as barley, oats, and rye, where we have actually imported more bushels during the past 10 years than we have in storage today, we have many specialty products such as fruits and vegetables, nuts, figs, garlic, dates, flower bulbs, and so forth, which are also adversely affected by imports.

I am in hearty support of the resolution of the gentleman from West Virginia, which I have also introduced as evidence of my interest and concern. I call on the Ways and Means Committee to hold early hearings and urge all who have a stake in the domestic economy that is adversely affected by imports to lend their vigorous support.

I thank the gentleman from South Dakota for yielding to me.

Mr. BETTS. Mr. Speaker, I wish to compliment the gentleman from West Virginia on his remarks this afternoon on the subject of the growing damage of foreign imports on our domestic economy. This subject is of particular concern in the Eighth Ohio District which I represent.

Within the last few months I have received correspondence from a wiremill in my district, officials of which tell me that wire can now be imported from European sources and laid on the docks in Cleveland at much less cost than it can be produced 100 miles away. Not long ago a porcelain insulation factory lost a bid to a Japanese company which I am sorry to say was a Government order and this domestic firm lost the bid simply because of the inability to compete with low-cost Japanese production. Another similar instance was called to my attention by a small manufacturing company in my district which lost a bid on electrical equipment to an Austrian firm for the same reason. As a result of this I introduced H.R. 8345 which if passed into law would protect small business bids on Government projects from foreign bids submitted at much lower prices due to prevailing low wages in foreign countries.

Last summer my attention was called to a serious condition in the plumbing industry which is suffering from low-cost foreign competition. I do not wish to take time to discuss in detail how this industry is suffering but I did introduce a bill, H.R. 9272, which curbs imports in an attempt to help this injured industry.

These are only isolated examples of the problem which the gentleman from West Virginia is discussing. I think it is time that this issue should be discussed and am glad that the gentleman from West Virginia saw fit to provide this opportunity for a full discussion in the House.

Mr. BAILEY. I thank the gentleman from North Dakota for his remarks and support.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BAILEY. I yield to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. OLIVER].

Mr. OLIVER. I thank the gentleman from West Virginia for making it possible for me at this time to participate in this discussion concerning this very vital issue which is so important to the economy of this Nation, to the industry of the Nation and to the workers in the industries of America. I would be derelict indeed if I did not take this opportunity to make a few remarks about the impact of the low-cost, low-wage imports upon the economy of my own State.

This serious impact, Mr. Speaker, has been felt in the textile industry where Maine has lost thousands of jobs. This, in turn, has developed the areas of chronic unemployment where we, once, had economically healthy and thriving communities. It has caused untold anxiety among the thousands who have been forced into involuntary unemployment after years of dedicated and conscientious labor in the textile industry which was, at one time, the leading basic industry of our State. It has caused families to move away from Maine and reestablish themselves in other work in other parts of America.

Mr. Speaker, America has already been critically damaged by the unfair low-wage, low-cost production of the Orient. It was only a few years ago that Biddeford-Saco textiles and its wages stimulated the entire southwestern area of Maine with its great economic contribution from hard-working employees of unexcelled skill busily engaged in an exceptionally healthy industry.

Then, the floodgates of imports on a cost basis with which it is impossible for American standards to compete were permitted to open. From this time, we have been fighting a losing battle. It is true that we have a portion of our textile industry still at work and surviving. For this we are indeed most grateful to a labor force which has been extremely cooperative and to a management which has been efficient and willing to keep modernized.

But, Mr. Speaker, we are worried now because of new threats. The administration under permissive authority to negotiate is already engaged in discussions which could very well lead to further reductions in tariff duties and to further removal of import quotas. This should not be allowed. This House should adopt the concurrent resolution which together with several other Members, I have introduced, today, declaring it to be the sense of Congress that we should not lower our tariffs further at this time.

We have only to understand that Hong Kong is rapidly developing into a more serious threat, if that be possible, than was Japan, before its Government agreed to voluntary export control which did, at least, slow down the increase of low-wage, low-cost competition for our American working men and women.

Japan now considers Hong Kong to be her finishing factory in the export of cotton goods to America. Spinning, weaving, and finishing factories are now established and working briskly in Hong Kong to make the consolidated production from spinning to sewing within the territory of Hong Kong for export to the United States.

In Hong Kong today, there are many refugees from Red China and many of them have established factories there as the last place of their investment. It is interesting to note that this is a British colony and that there is an annual profit of some $400 million for the United Kingdom interests from these under-standard operations with which our people are becoming increasingly in competition. Much of this production uses American produced cotton. It is also noticeable that American traders are making very positive investment activities in Hong Kong.

How much more can American labor and industry take of this type of unfair and unmatchable competition? This is no time, I repeat, Mr. Speaker, to negotiate further liberal reductions and advantages for this competition.

Also, while I am discussing the impact of foreign imports on our Maine economy, I certainly would be remiss in my responsibility if I did not here record the value of the shoe industry in Maine and the threat from foreign imports of footwear which is causing us to shudder as we realize what happened to our textile industry.

The 1957 census of Maine manufactures shows leather and leather products as being in the top position in employment—20,996—in our State while in gross wages this industry held the second spot of all Maine industries with payrolls of $59,394,711.

The threat which is posed again by low-wage, low-cost imports of footwear from foreign sources, including the Orient, becomes manifest when we compare imports for 1959 contrasted with 1958 over a 10 months' period, in both instances, total of all footwear imports in 1959 was 57,083,000 pairs at a value of $57,083,000 while in 1958 there were 37,475,000 with value of $34,110,000. The trend against us is obvious.

In the words of President A. W. Berkowitz, of the Songo Shoe Manufacturing Corp., of Portland, Maine, in a letter to me, recently:

"We do not want to be lulled to sleep as the textile manufacturers were, with low priced imports from foreign countries with substandard wages."

It is not my intention, Mr. Speaker, to be lulled to sleep with this siren song of those who would destroy American jobs by substituting the low living standards of these unfortunate areas of the world for the high living standards which the American way of life has made possible.

Therefore, I have introduced this concurrent resolution and shall support it with the utmost of my energy and capacity. America needs to take account of stock in this vital problem of foreign competition. Now is the time to call a halt to further reductions in the tariff and import quota protection for our people.

Mr. DORN of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BAILEY. I yield to the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. DORN of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I am honored and flattered to join with my distinguished, able, and astute colleague from West Virginia in introducing this timely concurrent resolution. This is one of the greatest issues before the American people today, in my opinion; and if we lower these tariffs any further and take additional steps toward completing free trade, it could well destroy this Nation within 10 years, particularly the standards that we have built up for our working people in the industries of this country. This may be an attempt to circumvent and undermine all of the great wage-and-hour legislation, as well as fringe benefits, that this Congress over more than 50 years has fought so hard for and passed for the benefit of the American people of these United States.

I hope that the Committee on Rules, one of whom, distinguished and able, is presiding over this body today, will consider this concurrent resolution favorably and report it to the House.

I thank the distinguished gentleman from West Virginia again for his unceasing and untiring efforts over the years on behalf of industry and the working people of America.

Mr. BOW. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BAILEY. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. BOW. I thank the gentleman from West Virginia for yielding to me so that I might express just a few of my own thoughts on this subject which we have discussed so many times.

First, let me say and point out again, as the gentleman well knows, the matter of the Constitution of the United States is involved in this matter. The Constitution provides that the House of Representatives and the Congress shall set the tariff imports. For this reason we have been violating, in my opinion, the provisions of the Constitution over a period of years.

What is the situation? I am delighted that the gentleman from Pennsylvania, who spoke just a few minutes ago and who is still present on the floor, said what he did because he, in many cases, is a great representative of labor. I am also delighted to see many of the labor groups of the country beginning to realize the dangers of foreign importations to American jobs.

Under the reciprocal trade agreements as they have existed in the past, we have been exporting American jobs, taking jobs away from American workers. I would have you come into my congressional district and see the crumbling walls of a great industry, the watch industry. Come to my district where you can see the crumbling walls of the pottery industry, the glass industry, and other industries that are being threatened out there.

One of the interesting things, Mr. Speaker, is the fact there is now some complaint in Japan because of low-cost imports. On the island of Taiwan they are now manufacturing electric fans at the specifications of the great companies in this country at about 50 percent of what they can be manufactured in Japan. They are doing it with child labor. I believe the great labor unions will join with us in fighting against child labor and the produce of child labor coming into the markets of this country.

I am delighted that they are now joining with us. It is not only a question, Mr. Speaker, of the exporting of American jobs, but it seems to me when we do this we export American industry as well, that by these American industries going out of the country we prevent profits and the development of plants which would create more jobs for the coming generations. I think that is important.

I should like to point out to the House, Mr. Speaker, a matter in this same category that disturbs me very much. This House not long ago appropriated money, out of friendship, to build a new bridge in Panama, for which the American taxpayers are going to pay over $20 million to build this great steel span across the Panama Canal. Mr. Speaker, the lowest bid for the construction of that bridge contemplates the use of steel made in Europe, but the American taxpayers, the steelworkers who have been paying their taxes year in and year out, are going to contribute to the buying of steel abroad to build that bridge. How silly can we be? And, the difference? Mr. Speaker, it is about $20,000, but it is the lowest bid, they say. What will the taxes be that the steelworkers pay into the Treasury of the United States from their wages in making that steel? What will the taxes be to the carriers shipping that steel to New Orleans for shipment? It would run into the hundreds of thousands of dollars. So, it is not the lowest and the best. I hope this House will go on record that whenever we build bridges and other structures of that type, that we will do it with the products of American industry, because that is the only way we can survive.

May I, in conclusion, simply say this, and I will have more to say about it in a day or two. This is the week that we will recognize and pay tribute to William McKinley. I hear many people get up on this floor and say that McKinley was the father of reciprocal trade. Well, he was. But, they were true reciprocal trade agreements, where there was some reciprocity. The present agreements have no reciprocity. They are one-way streets. Sometimes when I speak about representing the same district that William McKinley did in this Congress, people sort of shy away from me as though there was something wrong. "You go to the right of McKinley," they say. Let me say this to you. He suffered defeat in this House standing upon his principle for the protection of the American workingman, which later made him President of the United States. And, along that line, may I also say to those who casually like to dig at us a little bit about William McKinley, that when he was Governor of Ohio he recommended to the legislature and signed the first bill in any State of the Union which provided protection to a workingman who joined a union. McKinley offered and signed the legislation that made it a crime to discriminate against a man because he belonged to a union.

Well, that is only incidental, Mr. Speaker, and again I compliment the gentleman from West Virginia. I hope I may be here with him to continue this fight, for I think it is most important. I congratulate him on taking the lead year in and year out in connection with this very important matter.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Washington [Mr. MACK] may extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from West Virginia?

There was no objection.

Mr. MACK of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I agree completely with the observations that have been made about the forthcoming GATT tariff conferences. I do not believe that the United States is in a position to grant further tariff reductions at this time.

It was ridiculous in the first place to believe that we could go on forever cutting our tariffs when it was already obvious that in many lines of products we could be and have been badly undersold by other countries. In my own State of Washington, we have been thus undersold on fish, plywood, crabmeat, fresh and frozen trout, flower bulbs, lumber, and other items for years. Already our tariff has been cut beyond the peril point. That was also true of scores of other products in other parts of the country.

Today our average tariff is only 20 percent of what it was when we first began reducing duties 25 years ago. That is to say our tariff on the average is down 80 percent. We have gone a long way toward complete dismantling of our so-called tariff wall.

Many of us have said time and again as successive tariff cuts were being made in one international conference after another that our tariff had already been cut far enough, that war and postwar conditions had hidden the effects of these cuts. Very few people paid attention to these warnings. Now for the first time other countries have come into a position to take full advantage of our low tariff and they are doing so.

When imports from Japan could increase 54 percent from one year to another as they did in the first 9 months of 1959 compared with the same period in 1958 it must be clear that they have a virtually unobstructed access to our market. During that same period imports from Europe increased 43 percent. Do these experiences indicate that we need to reduce our tariff any further in order to stimulate imports?

Mr. Speaker, the present Trade Agreements Extension Act was passed about 18 months ago. It was actually sent to Congress 2 years ago. One of the principal reasons for asking further tariff-cutting power was laid to the setting up of the Common Market in Europe. Apparently we were to be placed in the position of buying fair treatment all over again. It was said that we might be discriminated against by the European countries if we could not offer them additional concessions. This is the same as saying that we cannot trust those countries to stand by their previous commitments, all of which we paid for by sharp tariff reductions. One of the very cornerstones of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade is nondiscrimination. This principle has been advertised as one of the great virtues of GATT. Why should we then have to grant further concessions to avoid discrimination against us? The Common Market countries are all members of GATT. Are we to fall victims to blackmail? Do we have to buy fair treatment?

Not only that, but only now are other countries beginning to make some serious moves to take off some of the restrictions other than tariffs by which they have been regulating their imports. For years the tariff concessions that those countries granted us were almost completely nullified by the imposition of exchange controls, import licenses, quotas, and even embargoes. Now that those countries have recovered and built up monetary reserves, thanks in great part to the use of these restrictions and our aid, they are showing a willingness to lift some of the restrictions; that is, now that they no longer need them.

Let me say that I for one did not blame them for using restrictions when they needed them. I think the value of import restrictions to the extent that they are needed has been demonstrated by the countries that used them. Those countries might still be in financial straits if they had not placed stringent restrictions on imports. Also we can be sure that they will put back any restrictions that they may regard as necessary when they again feel the need of doing so; and they will not bother to ask our leave.

Mr. Speaker, the question raised by these observations is: Why should we not have the same unquestioned right to take care of ourselves as have these other countries?

Today we find ourselves in an untenable international competitive position. That we are badly overpriced in most lines in relation to other countries has become obvious on many sides. In agricultural products such as wheat and cotton we find it necessary to subsidize by about 35 percent in order to export. In those instances where foreign bidders seek public contracts from our Government and enter the bidding contest our manufacturers usually find themselves underbid anywhere from 30 to 40 percent. Recently when it was ruled that development loans granted other countries must be spent in this country an outcry went up on the grounds that if the funds from such loans had to be spent in this country they would go only 50 to 60 percent as far as they would if the purchases could be made in other countries. This was an open admission, made by those who steadfastly deny that we are priced out of foreign markets, that we are indeed outpriced.

Under these circumstances we should not only not make further tariff reductions but should take the steps that may be necessary to prevent many of our industries from destruction. In case after case under present tariff rates we have seen imports start at a small figure and in a few years' time capture 10, 20, 30, 40, or 50 percent of our market. In some instances imports have not gone beyond 10 or 20 percent of the market. This halting of imports is usually attributable to shortage of the foreign supply. For example, I am sure that if an adequate supply of crabmeat were available in Japan or Russia they could run our industry out of the market. Her competitive margin is such that our producers stand no chance in competition. The same observation applies to other items.

We can be sure that if the countries that are now relaxing their import restrictions found themselves in the same competitive situation such as our industries in the face of foreign costs of production they would use import restrictions without the least concern about what our reaction might be. Their diplomacy would make clear to us their imperative need and we would listen, as we have listened in the past.

Those who say that we would invite retaliation from other countries if we imposed restrictions on imports confess either that our diplomacy is faulty and far below that of other countries or that other countries are so devoid of principle that they would retaliate against us when we take measures such as they themselves have become accustomed to through long usage. If such countries did indeed resort to retaliation under these circumstances, our diplomacy would have shown itself to be weak indeed; or the other countries could not be regarded as worthy friends.

Mr. Speaker, I have said that now for the first time have other countries come into a position to test our tariff cuts. By this I mean that up to now those countries over the past 25 years have either been in a depression, preparing for war, actually engaged in highly destructive war, or making recovery from war. Now they are recovered and are in a position to compete as never before. We face a situation that has no counterpart in the past.

Under these circumstances we find ourselves with our tariffs down, far down, and our hands tied by membership in GATT. Today we are sitting ducks to be disposed of competitively at the pleasure of countries that for the first time are our match technologically in many lines while still enjoying the competitive benefits of very low wages compared with our own.

This whole matter becomes a question of the competence and integrity of those who conduct our foreign relations. There is evidence on all sides, becoming daily more obvious, that the United States faces a competitive situation that is new to us in several vital aspects. As I have just said, we are no longer alone in the field of industrial know-how. We have willingly given to other countries our production methods, our mass production techniques, and much else that previously provided insulation against low foreign wages, at least in those of our industries that were in the lead industrially. Many of our industries, especially those in which mechanization had not advanced as far as in others, have long had great difficulty in competing with imports. Now we find even our most advanced industries helpless in the face of the new competitive realities. This is because foreign wages have lagged behind the rising foreign productivity.

We all know that many billions of dollars' worth of the best machinery and equipment that we have produced in this country is now also operating in other countries. It would be a dull person indeed who could not discern what this means in the face of lagging wages abroad. I daresay that many foreign companies have increased their output per man-hour several times over as a result of this new machinery while their wages have gone up in much lesser proportion. That is why the automobile and steel industries now for the first time feel the bite of foreign competition. That is also why so many of our companies are seeking oversea production facilities. They are losing foreign markets, and even their home market and seek to recoup by opening up abroad.

Everyone in the business world who is up against the guns of foreign competition knows this. The outlook for a reversal of this situation is not bright. Foreign wages are not about to catch up with ours even if foreign productivity succeeds in doing so. This is what our diplomacy should tell other countries.

To me the combination of circumstances we face is simple enough and calls for a relatively simple answer. All we have to do is to take a leaf from the successful policy of our foreign competitors. We may be sure that the last thing they would do under our circumstances would be what we now propose to do in Geneva, namely, make further tariff reductions. The idea is not in American interests.

I strongly urge adoption of the concurrent resolution as expressive of the good sense of Congress.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. PHILBIN] may extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from West Virginia?

There was no objection.

Mr. PHILBIN. Mr. Speaker, there is a widespread interest in the resolution submitted by our most able and distinguished colleague, the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. BAILEY] relative to the trade agreements extension bill, providing that the United States should grant no further tariff reductions in the forthcoming negotiations and for an investigation as to the extent and effect of limitations other than tariffs imposed by foreign countries on exports from the United States.

The resolution itself now pending before us is admirably descriptive of the serious economic situation that confronts this country as the result, in large measure, of the operation of the reciprocal trade treaties. American workers, indeed, the entire American people, have been alarmed by the sharp increase in imports and the decline in exports and the resultant mounting deficits incurred by the United States in the total foreign account, which was $3.4 billion in 1958 and an estimated $4 billion in 1959.

In order to satisfy these deficits it has been necessary, of course, for this Nation to tap our gold reserves and thus produce a gold outflow of several billion dollars at a time when our gold stock at Fort Knox is reduced to $19.5 billion with about $18 billion in foreign claims against it, $16 billion of which could be withdrawn on demand.

As the resolution points out, gold outflow to foreign countries augments the pressure on the Treasury to offer higher interest rates on current and future borrowings, greatly increasing the annual national outlay for interest on the national debt so that the United States currently is paying about $10 billion in interest. Both these figures and the latest figures on increase of imports are very disturbing to thoughtful citizens who are surveying economic developments and foreign trade with great concern. It is clear that, as many of us have feared, we are being flooded with imports both from the East and from the West and this is not only harmful to our domestic industries and employment here, but is also very harmful to our foreign markets. In the broadest sense, it is clear that there has been a migration of American industrial machinery, technology, skills, and know-how financed by the foreign aid program which has resulted in the creation of sharp, destructive, foreign competition in the form of goods coming in under the trade treaties and products of many kinds competitive with our own which are moving in world trade.

It is clear that these developments are threatening the prosperity of many basic American industries—automobiles, steel, sewing machines, typewriters, and others—and reducing employment opportunities for American workers as well as business for American producers that, in effect, is also to diminish American industrial power and substantially decrease tax revenues at a time when the national budget is rising in order to meet defense and security needs and to carry on essential functions of government.

It is true, as the resolution states, that efforts have been made to cut down the shrinkage of U.S. exports by subsidizing the exports of cotton, wheat, and some other products. Admittedly, this is a very unsound approach to these difficult economic problems and in the long run can be of no lasting value in correcting the present deficit position of our total foreign account. On the whole, as a product of certain American policies of foreign aid and trade and so-called economic stabilization, we have reaped for ourselves nothing but steadily increasing destructive competition from abroad with a prospect of unemployment and diminished standards for American workers since it could never be denied that there is any prospect of closing the wage and production cost differential between foreign and domestic products in the foreseeable future.

However, as I have stated so many times, our great Nation is desirous of conducting profitable and constructive foreign trade and commerce with all nations of good will that mean to do business with us on a mutually advantageous basis, but it is quite another thing, I submit, to finance the expansion and growth of foreign competitive units and then open wide the trade doors of our Nation to steadily increasing quantities of competitive goods produced by cheap labor under conditions which in this Nation would be considered to be substandard.

I am a strong supporter of this resolution and I hope it will be adopted by the Congress. It is moderate in tone and effect and merely seeks to take necessary action to prevent further diminution of our valuable gold supply and to reappraise the impact of current trade policies with a view to introducing into these policies a more realistic regard and consideration for all the interest and needs of American workers and American industries and the general prosperity of the Nation.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members who desire to do so may be given permission to extend their remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from West Virginia?

There was no objection.

Mr. STRATTON. Mr. Speaker, I want to join with my colleagues who have already spoken to urge support of the legislation which we have joined in introducing. Whatever one may feel from a theoretic or philosophical point of view about the subject of world trade, it seems clear to me that the present is no time to talk about any further reduction of our own tariffs and the encouragement of a still greater disproportion of imports to exports in our system.

I have the honor, Mr. Speaker, to represent a district which has been extremely hard hit economically, to a large extent because of the growing volume of imports from low-wage areas abroad. As a result of these imports my congressional district is one which has the dubious distinction of having been listed as an area of very serious unemployment. In fact, just a few weeks ago the Special Committee on Unemployment Problems of the other body paid a visit to my home city of Schenectady and there held hearings on this subject. The evidence presented before that committee, as I discussed at some length on the floor of this House on January 13, indicated the extent to which foreign imports had contributed to our unemployment situation. A representative of the General Electric Co., for example, testified that 1,000 jobs were lost to Schenectady for a full year because of contracts for turbine production which had been placed last year, mainly by Government agencies, in foreign countries rather than in Schenectady. Just last week the women's leather glove industry, which is located in my district in Fulton County, was afforded a hearing before the U.S. Tariff Commission to appeal for immediate relief under the provisions of the so-called escape clause of the Trade Agreements Extension Act.

This problem of foreign competition, which has long been felt by industries like the glove industry and the carpet industry in my district, is today beginning to be felt severely, as I have indicated, by such major and widespread industries as the heavy electrical equipment manufacturing industry, the automobile industry, and the steel industry.

I am not opposed to foreign trade, of course, and I recognize the importance of such trade both for our own economy and for the role that it plays in contributing to our common alliance against communism. But I honestly cannot believe we have a responsibility to carry on this trade without any regard whatsoever for its impact on our own industries and on our own people's jobs. It is a relatively simple thing to export American capital abroad. Unfortunately, when we export capital we find we are also exporting employment, employment we can ill afford to share.

And so I feel, Mr. Speaker, that a thoroughgoing study is needed of the overall impact of foreign trade on our domestic economy, particularly in those areas most severely hit by unemployment. Certainly this study should be made before any further reductions are even considered in our own tariff structure. Indeed, as our concurrent resolution provides, the subject should not even be discussed until those restrictions which now limit American exports going abroad are removed.

Mr. Speaker, I hope the House will speedily adopt this resolution.

Mr. FISHER. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. BAILEY] has performed a valuable public service by his timely and enlightening discussion of our competitive situation in certain areas of foreign trade.

The gentleman has discussed a subject that calls for the application of prudence and commensense. That is, the plight of domestic industries should be taken into account when our Government undertakes the reduction of tariffs on competitive commodities from low-cost foreign products.

There appears to be much logic in the suggestion that the State Department seriously consider freezing all tariff rates until the dust settles, and the effect imports in vast quantities is having on domestic industries. Then, it would seem, any changes should be selective and applied where the minimum of damage would result, while at the same time allowing for a proper amount of incentive for an abundance of international trade.

THE CUBAN SITUATION

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from California [Mr. UTT] may extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Nebraska?

There was no objection.

Mr. UTT. Mr. Speaker, I am deeply disturbed and I know that other Members of the House have been deeply disturbed by recent events in the neighboring country of Cuba. Nobody in this body can afford to ignore the insulting treatment given to our President, to our Ambassador, and, indeed, to the entire people of the United States by the present Castro regime, as related by Secretary of State Herter in his testimony before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee on January 21.

I have a most sympathetic and affectionate regard for the Cuban people. I have the same regard for our other neighbors in Latin America. I have observed during the past year how these nations have refrained from criticism of the tolerance we have displayed in the face of the most insulting provocations. They have been patient and confident that, sooner or later, in line with our traditional policy of noninterference in the affairs of other nations, we should find an equitable way to handle this young man, who takes upon himself the license of acting without regard to international law or, in fact, to the laws of his own country.

I am not taking the floor, however, solely to discuss Mr. Castro. I ask the attention of Members of this distinguished body to a fundamental economic problem underlying our relationships with all of our Latin American neighbors. This is the problem of sound sugar legislation and specifically of the role which neighboring Latin American countries should properly play in supplying the sugar needs of the United States.

Our Sugar Act in its present basic form has been in existence for the past 25 years. It has been the custom of the Congress to review the operation of the act periodically and to amend it in the light of changing conditions. According to the custom we have followed, this periodic review should have taken place during the year 1959. Certain distortions in the law had developed, some unforeseen, some due to economic changes, but all required rectification if the producers and consumers of sugar in the United States were to continue to benefit from the legislation.

In spite of this we did not review nor amend the act because some of the changes required for the benefit of our own sugar economy would have resulted in a reduction in the Cuban sugar quota. I think it would be a travesty, Mr. Speaker, if we failed now to follow our time-tested custom to amend this law simply because of the advent of a viciously anti-American Government in Cuba.

At the present time domestic sources supply only approximately 53 percent of the sugar requirements of the United States. This means that almost one-half of our sugar supply must come from foreign sources. Of the 47 percent of our sugar requirements supplied by foreign countries over 70 percent is supplied by one of these countries, that is Cuba. Of all sugar supplied by our neighbors in this hemisphere, more than 92 percent is supplied by Cuba. We are importing this year 3,391,000 tons of sugar from Latin America. Of this total, the quotas of seven countries amount to only 271,000 tons, while Cuba's amounts to 3,120,000 tons.

This monopoly has resulted and must result in higher sugar prices for U.S. consumers. Our Department of Agriculture, in its bulletin dated September 3, 1959, stated that the U.S. price of refined sugar was the highest since 1920. Those who managed to secure a stranglehold over such a large segment of the U.S. sugar supply were in a position to dictate prices and, in effect, to tax the American housewife.

For example, if a U.S. refinery has a need for raw sugar, which is not readily available from domestic sources, there should be some element of competition for that sale. Instead, we find that virtually all of the foreign supply available to our east and gulf coasts is locked up in the hands of one country. This in turn means that our refiners and consequently our consumers are in effect at the mercy of that supplying country for their sugar needs. We either pay their price or we do not get the sugar when we want it. That is why I say, Mr. Speaker, that even if the vicious political attacks against the United States by the present leader of the Cuban Government had not taken place, common sense and sound economics would demand a more sensible distribution of foreign sugar supply.

Lest there be some among you who believe that our consumers must continue to depend on this monopoly, it is time that this shibboleth be destroyed once and for all. I quote from an article in the New York Times of January 23, 1960:

> The United States would have little difficulty meeting any temporary shortage because of the large surpluses in other countries. These surpluses are estimated as follows: Mexico, 500,000 tons; Philippines, 300,000; Dominican Republic, 174,000; Peru, 90,000; Argentina, 250,000; Taiwan, 140,000; and Brazil, 1,220,000.

The Latin American countries mentioned in this article have surpluses totaling 2,234,000 tons. In addition, these same countries are filling quotas in the less attractive world market which amount to 1,677,000 tons. There is therefore available to the United States at this moment in friendly Latin American countries anxious to supply our requirements, 3,900,000 tons of sugar in comparison with the 1960 Cuban quota of 3,120,000 tons, an excess of 780,000 tons. Furthermore, the total sugar production of these countries is well in excess of Cuba's, which is a guarantee of their ability to continue supplying our market.

The higher price paid by our market would be a boon to these countries whose economies at this moment are suffering from the low prices they are receiving for most of their exports. Is this not a situation which calls for rectification? Should we go on subsidizing our enemies while our friends stand by patiently waiting for equitable treatment?

A very few of my colleagues are counseling delay. They say it would be wiser to avoid draping the bearded frame of Mr. Castro with the cloak of martyrdom. But I say to you that the real martyrs to the cause of our delaying tactics are our other Latin American neighbors. We have no right to use them as pawns in a game. We are playing with their economic rights and resources in the hope of placating an anti-American dictator.

In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, we should take Mr. Castro at his word. If he disdains to accept as a sugar quota what the Congress deems best for the proper operation of the sugar economy of the United States, let him ship his sugar to the rest of the world where he will find the markets left open by our friends, who are willing and anxious to accept the judgment of the Congress.

It is clear to me that when sound economics demand a destruction of the Cuban monopoly for the benefit of the American housewife then a preservation of the Cuban quota as it is today would constitute a reward for creating a political furor and would be an acquiescence on the part of the United States to a type of political blackmail. It is our traditional doctrine, in which I concur, that we should avoid interference in the affairs of any other nation. But, Mr. Speaker, I submit that a preservation of the status quo would constitute interference in favor of Mr. Castro and against the interests of our Latin American friends who are willing and able to supply sugar to the United States competitively and at reasonable prices and whose supplies are as accessible to us as Cuba's.

The very distinguished Secretary of State is reported to have suggested that it would perhaps be advisable for Congress to delegate to the executive branch the authority to manipulate sugar quotas in order that the executive might have more flexibility in dealing with a situation such as we are presently faced with in Cuba. I have a very high regard and great respect for our able Secretary of State. I respectfully suggest, however, that in this situation he has chosen the wrong remedy.

As one who has had occasion to be concerned with sugar legislation for some time, may I say that in my opinion a statute which delegates to the executive authority to change sugar quotas among foreign suppliers would result, not in flexibility but in virtual paralysis. At the present time, if the Congress faces squarely up to the situation in Cuba and makes a sensible reduction in the Cuban share of the U.S. market, it may make Castro unhappy. But I can assure the Members of this honorable body that if the executive department should attempt to shift quotas among Latin American countries, for the purpose of furthering negotiations with Mr. Castro, we would have many disappointed friends. It would be virtually impossible for the executive, which is responsible for continuing day-to-day relations with our foreign suppliers, to arbitrate the competing quota claims and equities among them. As a net result, the executive will find that it is able to do nothing. Moreover, even if it could be done successfully, it would result in chaotic conditions in the industry from the managerial point of view, since suppliers would not know what they were called upon to supply from time to time.

The only realistic thing to do is to advise producers, both foreign and domestic, as to what their quotas would be over the next 4 years, as we have always done in the past. If this entails a cut in the Cuban share, in the interest of sound legislation, and, indeed, sound legislation does so require, the United States is certainly big enough to face up to the problem.

Mr. Speaker, I submit that prompt consideration should be given to new sugar legislation, to extend over a 4-year period which will accomplish the following basic objectives:

First. To continue to encourage normal, healthy evolution of the domestic sugar industry of the United States.

Second. As regards the foreign component of our U.S. sugar supply, to develop a 4-year program which will: (a) Achieve a more balanced division of the foreign portion of the U.S. sugar supply in order to more fully insure that at all times there will be some measure of competition in filling the requirements of U.S. consumers; (b) decrease our dependence for sugar supply upon any single country to a level where failure of such supply could not have deleterious effects upon the U.S. economy; and (c) stimulate the foreign trade of the United States by increasing our imports from those Latin American countries which desire to buy our products.

Mr. Speaker, I think this is a time for action and not pussyfooting. The issue is clear, the problem is here, and the time for action is now.

MILITARY STRENGTH

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from California [Mr. WILSON] may extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Nebraska?

There was no objection.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. Speaker, in view of the current controversy about the more realistic appraisals of the military programs of the Soviets now being made by the Department of Defense, I think we should examine some of the appraisals of the past.

In the 7 years that I have served on the Armed Services Committee it has been my privilege to sit in on a number of secret briefings on Soviet military strength. The Soviet strength was always projected in term of "capabilities" rather than in terms of "probabilities." Their total productive and operating capability for secret weapons was always used to compare with our own known planned capabilities.

Mr. Speaker, I submit that our defense planners can make just as serious errors in planning military programs based on the enemies' capabilities as they can make by basing it on the enemies' intentions. For example, we were told several years ago that the Soviet capability for submarines would indicate over 1,000 submarines operating by 1959. This figure is far above what we now know to be their actual operating submarine fleet.

Two years later we were told about the Russian long-range bombers, which had at that time made a few prototype flights. We were told the Russians had a capability of several hundred long-range bombers in operation by 1960. This has not proved accurate. Few such bombers are operating today.

At other times we have been told what the IOC, or initial operating capability, of various missiles would be at a given date in the future. In most instances the capability does not become a reality. In other words, capability is not a magic word. It can be misleading.

It seems to me that the decision of Secretary Gates and the National Intelligence Board in basing our plans on Soviet probabilities rather than capabilities gives us a better chance of realistically countering and surpassing enemy weapons of all types.

In all cases a constant reappraisal of the enemies' probable operating plans and our own plans must be made. As new and more accurate intelligence becomes available to us we must obviously adjust our own military plans.

The important thing is that we remain ahead of the enemy in total military strength. His problem in competing with us is far greater than ours. He has two-thirds of the globe for a target which means that enemy bases that could operate against him must be knocked out quickly or he must expect devastating retaliation. On the other hand we have a target half as large as his. Theoretically, with twice the targets he would have to be twice as strong as we are to have an even break in the event of an overall conflict. As it stands the ratio of military strength is actually the reverse and we are far stronger than he in overall deterrent strength. I am confident he will never match us as long as we continue to devote the intelligent attention to the problem now evidenced by those responsible for our defense posture.

SENATOR THEODORE FRANCIS GREEN

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. FOGARTY] is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. FOGARTY. Mr. Speaker, on Monday evening, January 11, I received with regret the advice that my colleague in the Congress, Senator THEODORE FRANCIS GREEN, had chosen not to seek reelection to the Senate on the expiration of his term this year. At the time this news reached me I know I experienced the same emotion which must have touched the hearts and minds of all our fellow citizens. Rhode Island without THEODORE FRANCIS GREEN as its vigorous spokesman—the Democratic Party and the U.S. Senate without Senator GREEN in its active councils—presents a prospect which is difficult to accept without a tinge of genuine sorrow and a sense of keen loss.

I ask indulgence to speak for a moment in what may seem a partisan vein. But it is one altogether fitting and appropriate in discussing the life and times of this great public figure.

The name of THEODORE FRANCIS GREEN has been inevitably linked with the Democratic Party in Rhode Island since he first pledged his full energies to it more than a half century ago. Since that time his name has become a hallmark of progressive and enlightened government, both there and on the national scene.

While his devotion to sound and just principles of social justice has placed him on a plateau high above narrow partisan criticism, he always made it plain that it was as a member of the Democratic Party that he proceeded to consider and act on legislative matters presented for his judgment and decision.

I cannot help but recall that he steadfastly stood with the Democratic Party during the succession of years when there was little hope of outstanding success to its members in Rhode Island. Long before he tasted the sweet fruits of victory, he drank deeply of the bitter waters of defeat. Through this travail of many years he persevered. He never faltered or waivered in his dedication to the principles of Government handed down by Jefferson, Jackson, Cleveland, and Wilson. His reward was at last forthcoming in 1932 when he became our Governor and his political destiny has continued with brilliant success ever since. He stood by the side of his good friend, Franklin Delano Roosevelt, and was steadfastly devoted to the leadership of Harry S. Truman, both of whom regarded him as one of their most stalwart supporters and advisors in the Congress. I truly believe that all of us in the Democratic Party have been the beneficiaries of the decades of toil and sacrifice of THEODORE FRANCIS GREEN and his early associates who kept our banner high in many an adversity. In my personal book of great Americans I inscribe his name with the foremost.

However, THEODORE FRANCIS GREEN is too great a man to attempt to describe in terms of a particular State or a particular party. Because history will substantiate, I am sure, that his mind and energies were primarily directed to aiding and assisting the average man and woman, of whatever political creed, in all parts of our vast and complex union of States. For the past 23 years here in the Congress this has been his mission. It is for this very reason that on January 13, on the floor of the Senate, he received the most eloquent tribute ever paid to an individual Member in my recollection. Little wonder that I take some reflected pride in the fact that this man—a citizen of the Nation, a man of world affairs—is a product of my State and of my party.

The record of Senator GREEN amply demonstrates that he had no love of power, as such, despite the entrustment of so much of it to him for many years. This was remarkably demonstrated last year when he voluntarily relinquished the chairmanship of the Foreign Relations Committee—an almost unprecedented action. He has had a higher ambition—to serve his country well. And in this he has succeeded. So that by consistently exerting his great and learned talents in the cause of justice and mankind, he has achieved a remarkable reputation. And, as Shakespeare once said, "The purest treasure mortal times afford is spotless reputation." A former Speaker of this House, Champ Clark, once aptly commented that some public men are bigger than their reputations, some smaller than their reputations, some equal to their reputations. I am sure all will agree that THEODORE FRANCIS GREEN is one of those rare public men who are bigger than their reputations.

In conclusion let me say that I have had the good fortune to work with Senator GREEN in numerous campaigns, to serve with him in 20 sessions of the Congress, during which time I have had the benefit of his wise and educated advice and his invaluable assistance. It is my hope and expectation that he will continue to render public service, in some capacity commensurate with his personal wishes, in the years ahead. He has enriched the times in which he has lived and the men with whom he has associated. He leaves a political heritage to us second to none in the annals of American Government.

To him I wish the blessings of continued health and many years in which to enjoy the rich rewards that God has given him.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

LIFO (H.R. 6014)

OF

HON. NOAH M. MASON

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 26, 1960

Mr. MASON. Mr. Speaker, during the past several months a great deal of interest has been shown in my bill, H.R. 6014, which would ameliorate the impact of inventory depletion caused by shortages resulting from labor disputes in the case of taxpayers using the LIFO—last-in, first-out—method of inventory accounting.

For the benefit of my colleagues I want to give you an explanation of this bill, showing what it purports to accomplish.

My sponsorship of this legislation early last spring was based on my concern over the possible impact that a prolonged steel strike might have on fabricators of steel who utilize the LIFO inventory method. The purpose of my legislation is to permit such individuals to avoid the tax impact that would otherwise occur where the taxpayer has had to liquidate his LIFO inventories because of inability to obtain additional inventory caused by a labor dispute or threat or imminence thereof.

LIFO is a method of identifying inventory items in the taxpayer's closing inventory for the purpose of determining the cost of goods sold. Under the LIFO method, the last inventory additions are the first items included in the cost of goods sold. In a period of rising prices, the cost of goods sold tends to be higher and taxable income lower under LIFO than would be the case if the FIFO—first-in, first-out—method were used. If, however, a LIFO taxpayer is unable to replace inventory, then to the extent of the liquidation his base stock is depleted and his cost of goods sold will reflect an amount less than the cost of replacement. The effect will be to increase his taxable income over the amount that would properly reflect replacement cost.

H.R. 6014 would alleviate the consequence of the inventory liquidation of base stock because of shortages that are induced by labor disputes affecting suppliers of inventory to the taxpayer.

The bill would provide an election to the taxpayer to treat as if he had in the year of liquidation replaced the inventory, which he does, in fact, replace within the 2 succeeding years. The taxpayer would be able to treat the costs of inventory replacement incurred in the subsequent 2 years as if they had been incurred in the year of liquidation. This has the effect of decreasing taxable income for the year of liquidation in the same manner as would have occurred if the reduction in inventory had not occurred.

If a partial or a complete replacement is accomplished within the 2-year period, the taxable income of the taxpayer for the year of inventory liquidation shall be decreased by an amount equal to the excess of the aggregate replacement cost over the aggregate cost of the opening inventory of the year of liquidation. An increase in tax liability would occur if the opening inventory cost exceeded the aggregate replacement cost. Provision is made that interest shall not apply to deficiencies and overpayments resulting from the operation of this bill.

As introduced, this legislation would be effective with respect to inventory liquidations occurring in taxable years ending after December 31, 1958.

Election Campaign Spending

OF

HON. THOMAS L. ASHLEY

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 26, 1960

Mr. ASHLEY. Mr. Speaker, late yesterday afternoon the Senate passed a commendable piece of legislation which if agreed to by the House will vastly improve the outmoded and inadequate laws which now control election campaign spending and reporting.

The underlying principles of this legislation are no different than those upon which previous laws regulating Federal elections are based, that is, that there should be certain limitations on the amount of money spent or contributed in election campaigns and, secondly, that such expenditures and all contributions should be reported. The proposed bill is simply an extension of the bases of existing law, enacted in 1925, and is formulated in language realistic to the changes which time has wrought in our economic life. It is generally recognized that the existing law displays serious shortcomings. Some have developed with the pasage of time and are due to changes in the cost of services and the rise of prices. Present allowable campaign spending by candidates for congressional offices as well as current limitations on contributions and expenditures of political committees is understandable in terms of price levels as they existed 35 years ago. Since then economic conditions of the country have changed to such a degree that the limitations in existing law can no longer be considered realistic.

In another regard, one which this bill seeks to cure, the reporting requirements under existing law are at the same time too onerous and not sufficiently specific. Existing law, despite its professed philosophy that corrupt election practices can be cured or prevented by full disclosure of campaign financing, fails to provide for a wide dissemination of reports dealing with campaign contributions and expenditures. Only through the media of the press can the public be informed as to the sources and volume of campaign financing.

Without going laboriously into the technicalities of the proposed legislation, I would merely point out that if enacted there would for the first time be a limit on the amount an individual may contribute for political purposes; it would raise the campaign ceilings in both Houses of Congress and increase the amount which our national political committees may expend to direct presidential campaigns. It contains a provision that campaign financial statements be filed not only with the Secretary of the Senate or the Clerk of the House but also with the clerk of the Federal district court thereby disseminating such information on a local level. In short, this legislation, which I earnestly hope will meet with equal success in the House, will vastly improve the election machinery to provide fuller participation and greater publicity and inhibit other excesses in the legislative process.

The New President of NAREB

OF

HON. WILLIAM T. CAHILL

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 26, 1960

Mr. CAHILL. Mr. Speaker, today Mr. C. Armel Nutter is being installed as the president of the National Association of Real Estate Boards to serve during the year 1960.

I am proud that Mr. Nutter is a resident of the State of New Jersey and an outstanding member of the Camden County and the New Jersey State board of realtors. I have personally known Mr. Nutter for the past 20 years and can understand why he was selected to lead approximately 66,000 realtors of the United States of America. He has been a leader in his field in New Jersey and throughout the country for the past quarter of a century. A glance at his background indicates the firm foundation upon which his ultimate success was established.

He was born in Milford, Del., November 13, 1900. He graduated from the University of Delaware in 1923 and attended Temple University Law School and South Jersey Law School where he specialized in real estate law. He was president of the Camden Real Estate Board in 1936; president of the New Jersey Association of Realtors in 1941; regional vice president of the Mortgage Bankers Association of America in 1947; president of the Philadelphia Mortgage Bankers Association in 1949, and international president of the Society of Residential Appraisers in 1959. During the past 25 years he also served on every important committee of the Camden County Board of Realtors, New Jersey Association of Real Estate Boards, Mortgage Bankers Association of America, Philadelphia Mortgage Bankers Association and Society of Residential Appraisers. He has served in almost every elected capacity on these various real estate boards. In addition to these activities he found time in 1953 to act as chairman of the annual drive for the benefit of Cooper Hospital in Camden, N.J., and to serve as president of the board of trustees of the Moorestown Methodist Church in 1956.

Mr. Nutter is a 32d degree Mason, being a member of the Excelsior Consistory of Collingswood, N.J. He is likewise a member of the Crescent Temple of Trenton, N.J., and the Union League of Philadelphia, Pa.

Mr. Nutter is married and resides with his family in Moorestown, N.J.

His achievement in being elected president of the National Association of Real Estate Boards is evidence of his ability, industry and enthusiasm. It is also a reflection of the esteem in which he is held by his fellow realtors throughout the country and demonstrates the personality, reputation and character of the man. He has brought honor, not only to himself and his family, but to his native State. The National Association of Real Estate Boards is to be commended for their selection of such an outstanding president.

On behalf of all the residents of the first district of New Jersey, I wish him continued success in his new office.

What Is the Truth About Lindbergh?

OF

HON. EMANUEL CELLER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 26, 1960

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, one of the tragic heroes in American life is Charles A. Lindbergh. His contribution to aviation science and his example of personal courage will always be remembered and honored. But like many another who departed from his narrow field of competence, Colonel Lindbergh committed great blunders or worse when he ventured into the field of politics and international diplomacy.

Beginning with his acceptance of the German Air Medal from the Nazi General Goering, continuing thereafter in his propaganda work for the America First Committee, and culminating in his 1941 nationwide radio broadcast in which he threatened that American Jews would suffer if they continued to work against the Nazi danger, Colonel Lindbergh's career was a pathetically unheroic one. We do not have to believe what the German Ambassador to this country said about Lindbergh's contributions to German propaganda efforts here to conclude sadly that Lindbergh was woefully out of step with his countrymen and with the best interests of America during this period. The facts are on the public record.

But the other day—from a most roundabout source in the ultraconservative magazine, National Review—an opposite viewpoint appeared, attributed to the former American military attaché in our Berlin Embassy, Col. Truman Smith, now retired. According to Smith, Colonel Lindbergh did not want the Nazi medal and was surprised when General Goering suddenly produced it at a private dinner given by the American Ambassador. Again, according to Smith, Lindbergh had come to Germany at the request of Army Intelligence to see if he could discover vital information about the growing German Air Force and to help persuade Goering to accept a plan to permit Jewish emigration from Germany.

Lindbergh himself is silent. Is this an attempt to rewrite history, to change the record as it was known to American public figures and historians for almost a generation? Or, is it a newly unearthed fact? If it is a fact, I will be among the first to give it due weight and publicity even though it cannot, of course, change the record of Colonel Lindbergh's propaganda activities for the America First Committee. If it is a fact, we should all be delighted to credit Colonel Lindbergh with this civic and humanitarian act.

I hope, therefore, that the State Department and the Army will give us now an authoritative and balanced statement on this new development since I am advised that authentic documents are in their possession.

Forty-second Anniversary of Ukrainian Independence

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LEONARD G. WOLF

OF IOWA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 26, 1960

Mr. WOLF. Mr. Speaker, last week was the 42d commemoration of the Ukrainian Declaration of Independence. This occasion has not gone unnoticed. Wherever free men gather they have marked this anniversary in their minds and hearts for that time when there will be a complete resurgence of freedom in those areas of the world where the spirit and the acts of men are fettered by authoritarian or totalitarian governments.

In the United States we must renew our efforts at home and abroad to encourage dignity and freedom among men no matter where they may be.

Increased Tobacco Allotments

OF
HON. EUGENE SILER
OF KENTUCKY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, January 26, 1960

Mr. SILER. Mr. Speaker, I feel that under current market conditions of burley tobacco and under the supply situation for this crop, as we know it to prevail right now, there could well be an increase in the tobacco allotments all over the country where burley tobacco is produced.

But in order for this good achievement to mean the most for those worst off, I have proposed that two-thirds of this suggested increase be given to the smaller or semirural industrial areas where burley tobacco is now produced and where there is 10 percent or more of the labor forces unemployed. In other words, my bill would give every grower some increase and would give every depression area grower still more increase. Everyone wants to help economically depressed areas but no one seems willing to do anything to help them. My bill, H.R. 9745, would help tobacco growers and would alleviate conditions in depressed areas, all in one legislative effort. It might aid the general economy in most of the following small industrial areas of our Nation now suffering from unemployment.

Maryland, two minor areas.
North Carolina, two minor areas.
Virginia, one minor area.
West Virginia, eight minor areas.
Kentucky, seven minor areas.
Tennessee, one minor area.

On January 20, 1960, I sent Secretary of Agriculture Benson a copy of my bill and asked him to consider it and approve it, if possible. My letter to him is as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D.C., January 20, 1960.

HON. EZRA TAFT BENSON,
Secretary, Department of Agriculture, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. BENSON: Enclosed is a copy of my own burley tobacco allotment bill for 1960, same being H.R. 9745, introduced by me on January 19, 1960, which I would like very much for you, your Tobacco Division, and your Department to consider. And I would fervently hope that this bill, or one similar thereto, might have the approval of the Department of Agriculture.

My bill would grant a 15-percent increase in burley tobacco allotments, but in practical effect the increase would only amount to about 5 percent because most of the increase would go to the least of tobacco producing areas, those located in some of the economically depressed, labor surplus counties of minor industrial importance in our Nation. I myself represent one of these areas, the Eighth Congressional District of Kentucky, where we have much unemployment and labor surplus with just a few small tobacco bases in most of our counties.

My bill would be a double-barreled benediction because it would recognize the current disappearance of burley tobacco supplies and the high market prices of tobacco by—

1. Giving some increase, not less than 5 percent, to all burley growers everywhere so that they all might share somewhat in the fortunate circumstances of this crop's present status; and by

2. Giving special recognition and consideration to tobacco's poor relations in depressed areas of our country, where the maximum economic needs of our American citizenship prevail right now.

Our President and his administration have heretofore been recorded in favor of depressed areas legislation. My bill would accomplish something in that very area of legislative effort and this would help the entire economy in certain counties of Virginia, West Virginia, Tennessee, Kentucky, and possibly other States where burley tobacco is produced in a small way.

According to statistics at hand, applying to the period of November 1959 the following burley tobacco growing States had 10 percent or more of available labor forces unemployed in minor or small industrial areas, viz:

Maryland, two minor areas.
North Carolina, two minor areas.
Virginia, one minor area.
West Virginia, eight minor areas.
Kentucky, seven minor areas.
Tennessee, one minor area.

Undoubtedly some of those small industrial areas of economic depression in West Virginia and possibly in other States would have no burley tobacco production whatever at the present time. The intent of my bill would not be to add any territory whatever to presently existing burley tobacco places of production but would be to help all presently existing territories some and the economically depressed territories still more. "Blessed is he that considered the poor; the Lord will deliver him in time of trouble." Psalms 41.

With all good wishes and thanking you for your consideration, I am,

Yours truly,

EUGENE SILER,
Member of Congress, Eighth District of Kentucky.

It would certainly be pleasing to me if other House Members from economically depressed, burley tobacco areas would introduce bills similar to mine and then lend a hand toward getting some legislation of this type enacted.

A Bill To Authorize the Award of the Congressional Medal of Honor to the Four Chaplains

OF
HON. PETER W. RODINO, JR.
OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, January 26, 1960

Mr. RODINO. Mr. Speaker, I am reintroducing my bill, H.R. 5089 of the 85th, to award the Congressional Medal of Honor to the four chaplains who gave their lives in the sinking of the Dorchester.

These brave men of God—Chaplain George Fox, Chaplain Alexander Goode, Chaplain Clark Poling, Chaplain John Washington—displayed faith and courage of a kind which will always remain a challenge and an inspiration to every American.

Their sacrifice was not only one far above and beyond the call of duty; it was a lesson in the essential brotherhood of Americans and the unity of our separate faiths.

The award of the Congressional Medal of Honor can add nothing to the nobility of their act, or to the greatness of their sublime sacrifice.

But surely this is the least which Congress can do in recognition of this example of selfless devotion to God and country.

Mr. Speaker, unfortunately, no action was taken on this bill in the 85th Congress. I ask the House to act on this bill now as a fitting and proper tribute to the heroes of the Dorchester.

Baring Reveals 1958 Highway Spending Binge

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WALTER S. BARING
OF NEVADA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, January 26, 1960

Mr. BARING. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include a copy of my speech that was recently broadcast in the Reno, Nev., area relating to the 1958 highway spending binge. The speech follows:

BARING REVEALS 1958 HIGHWAY SPENDING BINGE

Friends and citizens of Reno, I have been invited to address you on a subject of vital interest to not only you who are concerned with the routing of the Interstate Highway through or around your city, but to all of the people of this country who have been taxed to support the most gigantic program ever undertaken by our State and Federal Governments or, for that matter, by the governments of any country in the world.

I refer, of course, to the construction of the Interstate Highway System under the Federal-Aid Highway Act of 1956, implemented by the Federal-Aid Highway Act of 1958. The integrity of our Federal Government has already been impaired by reckless highway spending. Back in 1954 it was estimated the Interstate System basically would cost $23 billion. This estimate was revised to $27.6 billion in 1955. Now the program has been revised and the estimate raised to $39.9 billion to complete 40,000 miles in the System.

Several months ago a special committee of the House of Representatives was formed and authorized to investigate the Nation's highway program. The committee hired Walter May, former FBI agent, as its top counsel. It also hired Carmine Bellino, John Konstanty and Sherman Willse. You may recall these names. They were the investigators who produced sensational evidence before the Senate Rackets Committee. The committee was appointed by House Public Works Chairman CHARLES A. BUCKLEY, Democrat, of New York, in the wake of bitter House dissension over passage of the one-cent-a-gallon increase in the gasoline tax. I might say here that the President has announced he will demand an additional one-cent-a-gallon hike in gasoline tax at this session of Congress.

During 1958, in the name of recession, Federal spenders abandoned the highway pay-as-we-go policy and gorged themselves on authorizations and allocations, knowing full well they were exceeding the ability of the trust fund to meet the bills. In a plea to the Secretary of Commerce, under a provision of the Highway Act which requires that the Secretary make a new estimate of the Federal highway program situation in all its aspects and report its findings and recommendations to the Congress immediately after it convened in January of 1961, Senator BYRD described our present situation as the morning after the 1959 binge. He said that: "No one involved with the suspension of the highway pay-as-we-go policy or the exploitation of the suspension can escape blame for what was done * * *. Our great highway programs were never before precipitated into such an inexcusable mess. The trust fund was broke and the integrity of the Federal Government was impaired. State highway programs all over the country were seriously disrupted and threatened with chaos." Senator BYRD is Chairman of the Senate Finance Committee and he wrote Secretary Mueller in his official capacity.

Those, ladies and gentlemen, were his exact words, but he said more. He said: "It would be unfortunate if some States, seeking more Federal dollars for less State money, yielded to the temptation to divert their funds from 50–50 ABC roads to 90–10 interstate projects. Do you remember when the Bureau of Public Roads rejected the plan submitted by Huston Mills, as then head of the State highway department, because it could not support the department's request for 90–10 Federal assistance to build railway underpasses? Do you remember Mr. Mill's public statement that followed? It was to the effect that there was more than one way to skin a cat and that these underpasses would be built with funds diverted from the primary and secondary road systems. Let me again read the Senator's quotation, "It would be unfortunate if some States, seeking more Federal dollars for less State money, yielded to the temptation to divert their funds from 50–50 ABC roads to 90–10 interstate projects."

The Senator reminded Secretary Mueller that rights-of-way acquisition costs are proving to be a tremendous item, running to billions of dollars, in the Interstate program. The temptation to grab land, hike prices, and profiteer is inherent in such a multibillion-dollar, multiyear, 90–10 program. And there is the possibility of collusion and fraud, he said.

There is a growing feeling of concern throughout the Nation because of the reckless spending of billions of dollars of taxpayers' money. Members of Congress share this concern and as a Member of Congress I, too, am very much concerned. No one person is responsible for the curtailment of highway construction in Nevada. No one person is responsible for the curtailment of highway construction in every State in the United States. The slowdown came possibly as the result of trying to anticipate requirements too far in advance and the building of whole systems too fast on borrowed money. The barrel was empty, and in order to meet the crisis Congress had to enact legislation to temporarily divert funds from our general revenue to the highway trust fund and to temporarily increase our gasoline tax.

The program will continue and Nevada will receive its fair share of Federal money to complete its segment of the Interstate System. There has never been a time that highway construction could not have moved forward in Nevada, linking urban areas over undisputed sections. There is no legitimate reason why a disputed section of highway through the Reno area, less than 20 miles in length, should hold up construction of the entire highway system across Nevada. I think it is quite significant that this section involved the acquisition of some $30 million worth of property, boosting the entire cost of the section to close to $50 million.

In its column "Heard Around City Hall," the New York World-Telegram and Sun said: "Robert Moses' $2 billion block-busting highway program for New York City may become the prime target of a Federal investigation now being made into the Nation's huge Interstate highway program. President Eisenhower himself said this week he was concerned over growing complaints that the nationwide program was shot through with waste and that too much money was being spent for highways within cities rather than for linking those cities."

Have I been wrong in charging reckless Federal spending? Let me read you from Secretary Mueller's reply to Senator BYRD. He says: "The events of the past year have taught many of us a great deal about highway problems, and have shown us the need for more thoughtful consideration of the fundamental background of highway policy. * * * During the past year, as you have observed, our main problem was to get out from under the chaos resulting from the Federal-aid Highway Act of 1958, an act which suspended provision for 'pay-as-you-go' financing and which raised authorizations for highway aid far beyond the revenue capacity of the highway trust fund." He went on to say: "We cannot afford to allow another such highway crisis. To avoid another such affair we must bend every effort to improve the direction of highway policy and to revamp the entire system of financial management.

As you know, I have been critical of the Bureau of Public Roads in their highhanded methods. I charged the Bureau with influence peddling in connection with the Verdi Route J selection. This charge was definitely supported by the Blatnik investigating committee. Now listen to what the Secretary had to say on the subject: "It cannot as in former years, be considered exclusively the affair of one committee in each House, or of one bureau in the executive branch. Highways and Federal highway expenditures touch the fiscal policy of the Nation in a major way, they touch the basic formulation of budgets and appropriations, and they affect our national transportation policy as well as our whole manner of national living. * * * In the administration, highway policy has claimed an increasing share of the attention of the Secretary of Commerce, the Director of the Bureau of the Budget, the Secretary of the Treasury, the White House staff, and the President himself."

Yes, ladies and gentlemen, the job was too big for the Bureau of Public Roads and it bogged down under its own weight. I am proud that I have been able to represent the expressed interests of some 85 percent of the people of Reno in their opposition to the Third Street routing. You, who stood firm in your opposition to such flagrant and unwarranted expenditure of millions of dollars for elaborate geometric highway design over your city, are to be congratulated. You and other people all over the United States are primarily responsible for bringing these matters to the attention of the Congress and even to the President. It is because of your efforts that the Secretary of Commerce now admits that highway policy cannot be formulated by a single bureau, but rather it is the concern of the entire Department as well as the Bureau of the Budget, Treasury Department, and the White House.

The Department of Justice has informed me that highway violations have to its knowledge occurred in Arkansas, Georgia, Illinois, Missouri, Tennessee, and Texas. Criminal prosecutions are pending in these States which involve allegations of fraud and conspiracy. Senator BYRD pointed out to the Secretary of Commerce that: "Witnesses took the fifth amendment more than 200 times in Senate hearings on landgrabbing on only a few projects in one State."

I fervently hope that the special committee of the Committee on Public Works will make a complete and thorough investigation of the entire highway program which will result in the fulfillment of a sensible Interstate Highway System moving traffic between urban areas as intended.

I hope there will be an investigation of the Bureau of Public Roads from stem to stern, and that controls will be placed on that Bureau to limit any recurrence of the 1958 fiasco.

I am hopeful that the Bureau's 1958 approvals of elaborate geometric interchange designs and expensive superstructure planning will be reviewed and that within the overall efficiency program Third Street selection of the Interstate System in the Reno area will be killed forevermore.

Don't Sell America Short

OF
HON. RUSSELL V. MACK OF WASHINGTON
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 26, 1960

Mr. MACK of Washington. Mr. Speaker, an interesting news dispatch from Moscow, Russia, appeared on the front page of the New York Times recently.

This Russian dispatch said that the Soviet Government had given an unnamed U.S. automobile dealer a franchise for the distribution during the next 2 years of 10,000 Russian-manufactured Moskvich automobiles. The Moskvich is a four-cylinder, four-passenger car that sells in Russia for 25,000 rubles—$6,250. If anything like that price is asked for the Moskvich in the United States, it probably will obtain few buyers here.

The Times Moscow dispatch went on to say that the Moskvich factory is now producing 70,000 cars a year and that this production represents more than half of all the passenger automobiles produced in Russia. In short, Russia's present production of passenger automobiles, according to the Times dispatch, is less than 140,000 cars a year. American automobile factories, with an annual production of more than 6 million cars, are producing as many passenger automobiles in 48 hours as Russia produced in an entire year.

Many engineers are required to design and constantly improve American automobiles and to invent the many parts that go into them. It requires many more engineers to invent, design, and produce the great variety of machine tools necessary to manufacture the 6 million American cars a year and the parts that go into them. Great numbers of other engineers and chemists also are needed to design and build the highways on which these automobiles operate and the highgrade fuels that assure their efficient operation. Multitudes of mechanics are needed to keep the Nation's present 60 million automobiles in repair and in operation.

The automotive industry and its allied industries are not the only ones in which the United States is ahead of the Russians in the production of peacetime goods. We outproduce them manyfold in radios, television sets, telephones, in electrical goods of all kinds and in housing and the manufacture and use of modern farm tools and machines of all kinds. All of these industries require engineers, inventors, and scientists to maintain them at peak production and to ever expand the production of peacetime consumer goods for the American people.

Comparatively, Russia employs few engineers, inventors, scientists, and chemists in these peacetime fields. She employs most of her engineers, scientists, and technicians in war efforts. In this field Russia from time to time makes some spectacular achievements.

These few spectacular achievements, however, do not justify claims of political orators and writers that are heard and read from time to time that Russia has more and better engineers, more and better scientists, and a better educational system than the United States.

The vast numbers of American scientists, engineers, and inventors engaged in producing civilian goods are not lost to the American defense effort. In World War II and again in the Korean war it was demonstrated that plants and the skilled manpower of engineers, chemists, and inventors engaged in peacetime production could be quickly and effectively diverted and transferred to defense efforts when and wherever necessary. In World War I the United States in the making of defense weapons not only equipped its own millions of fighting men but also supplied a large part of the weapons, planes, tanks, and other fighting equipment used by our allies.

A few spectacular achievements by the Russians is no reason for anyone to sell America short.

Michigan Day, 1960

OF
HON. LOUIS C. RABAUT
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, January 26, 1960

Mr. RABAUT. Mr. Speaker, today is Michigan Day. She was admitted to the Union 123 years ago today. On January 26, 1837, Michigan became the 26th State. It is fitting indeed that we should pause and take note of this anniversary. For since that date in 1837 the State of Michigan has risen to become one of the truly great States in this Nation.

Michigan takes her name from two Indian words "Michi-gama" meaning great water or large lake. This is quite apt since Michigan—bordered as she is by four of the five Great Lakes—has the greatest supply of fresh water of any of the 50 States. There are over 11,000 inland lakes and more than 36,000 miles of streams in Michigan.

Michigan is the largest State east of the Mississippi. In 1834 when the legislature petitioned Congress for permission to form a State, the Michigan Territory included the present States of Michigan, Iowa, Minnesota, Wisconsin, and part of Dakota. Michigan's Upper Peninsula alone is presently equal in size to Connecticut, Delaware, Rhode Island, and Massachusetts combined.

Michigan has grown tremendously in population also. At the time of her entry as a State the population was just over 87,000. In 1870 the population passed the million mark. Increasing steadily it reached the 2 million mark in 1890, 3 million in 1920, and over 5 million in 1940. The Federal census of 1950 placed the population at 6,372,009, the seventh largest of all the States.

Industry, agriculture and the tourist trade are the three pillars upon which rests the economy of Michigan. During World War II, the magnificent performance of Michigan's automotive industry earned for our State the title of "Arsenal of Democracy." Michigan continues today to be one of the foremost producers of military vehicular equipment and also is in the forefront of the vast new developments and rapid expansion in the manufacture of ballistic missiles.

The automotive industry, however, is only one among many in which Michigan is a leader. On the basis of value added by manufacture, Michigan also ranks first in boatbuilding, output of internal combustion engines, mobile homes, steel springs, hardware, industrial patterns, special dies and tools, and conveyors. Michigan is also known far and wide as an outstanding producer of furniture, breakfast foods, drugs and chemicals, sporting and athletic goods, steel, salt, and paper products.

Diversification of industry has proceeded at such a pace that of 453 industries classified by the U.S. Bureau of the Census, Michigan has 369 or 81 percent of the total.

Michigan is well endowed with natural resources. She is noted for her limestone. Michigan is first in production of salt, gypsum and marl. The Lower Peninsula has extensive quantities of sand and gravel. Michigan's splendid highways are built of her own native materials.

The mention of highways brings to mind Michigan's wonderful record with respect to traffic safety. Michigan is high up among the States with the highest traffic volume, yet she has the second lowest number of traffic fatilities per 100 million miles traveled. In addition to industry, Michigan is a top-notch agricultural State. Michigan's agriculture brings in more than $730 million each year. Michigan's Lower Peninsula raises 97 percent of the Nation's crop of navy beans. Beans may be baked in Boston, but they are raised in Michigan. One of the finest fruit belts in the Nation is located in the western part of the State, along Lake Michigan. The State's commercial crop of apples, nearly 12 million bushels of them, last year put Michigan in third place in apple growing. Peaches, pears, and cultivated blueberries from Michigan are relished throughout the country. Michigan is first in production of tomatoes and cucumbers. Many other vegetables—onions, snap beans, carrots, and celery—are grown in Michigan. In all, 44 different fruit and vegetable crops are raised commercially in Michigan.

It is obvious that the great State of Michigan is well deserving of an eminent place among her sister States. With such an abundance of resources and diversity of commercial activity we are proud to say that Michigan's economy is gaining year after year. Michigan approaches the seventh decade of this century with confidence and optimism. It is with considerable pride that I call the attention of this body to this—Michigan Day, 1960.

Address by Hon. John H. Dent Before Jeannette Rotary Club, November 30, 1959

OF
HON. ROBERT N. C. NIX
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, January 26, 1960

Mr. NIX. Mr. Speaker, it is not often that one of our colleagues gets a special note of appreciation from his constituency and especially from his own hometown.

Recently, our colleague, the Honorable JOHN H. DENT, of the 21st District of Pennsylvania, addressed his local Rotary Club, November 30, 1959.

The following excerpts from the Rotary Spokesman is a credit to our colleague and it is with personal pride and pleasure that I submit with the excerpt a copy of his address before this group of local business and civic leaders:

[From the Rotary Spokesman, Jeannette, Pa., Dec. 7, 1959]

All members in attendance last Monday agreed that we can be inordinately proud of our own JOHNNY DENT, who has not only been our own to the town but has been our own in Rotary until the meeting days and makeups got too much for him. Congressman JOHN H. DENT gave not only a masterful address (copies, too, in mimeographed form) to the club last Monday but showed a grasp of this international monetary system that is short of miraculous. With his many activities, miles of traveling, office routine, days in Congress, and multitudinous duties in connection with his office, it is a wonder that he maintains any kind of mental equilibrium and emotional stability. But he does it. And in so doing is the same affable, energetic, JOHNNY that makes Westmoreland proud to have him in Washington. Our thanks to Al Condo for tying him down for us.

The address follows:

CONGRESSMAN DENT'S SPEECH TO THE JEANNETTE ROTARY CLUB, NOVEMBER 30, 1959

My subject tonight will be relative to our financial weakness in the field of international finance. The word "blackmail" has come to be used in many different phases of our daily lives. For instance, the labor reform bill was passed by the frequent and ofttimes unrelated use of the word "blackmail" when talking about picketing. It has become the one word that describes pressure applied with a threat of bodily injury, loss of personal reputation, political defeat and in the relationships between nations it has virtually become about the only word that can describe some of our international diplomacy and foreign policy.

It does not take an expert to realize that something is wrong when countries scattered all over the world are scenes for riots and demonstrations against Americans and in some cases our flag is spat and trampled upon. Let us not delude ourselves into a position of false security by the talk of double dealing diplomats.

Our problem is one of an unwillingness on the part of leaders to recognize the need for a complete review of our international position, a reappraisal of our reciprocal trades program and a very searching look at our mutual and foreign aid program.

When I first called for action along these lines in my first month as a Member of the Congress of the United States, I was scoffed at and even ridiculed by many persons and periodicals. It is interesting to note the change and the demand now by national periodicals, editorial writers and even the President, for a reappraisal of our positions on trade and aid. When I first offered my amendment to make the Buy American Act operative I received such an overwhelming defeat that I started to doubt my own conclusions and opinions. However, in the last session it took all the power of the leadership of both sides, Republicans and Democrats, to defeat my amendment and then only by a few votes.

I mention this because recently I attended a meeting of western Pennsylvania Members of Congress with both parties represented. The subject of conversation during the entire afternoon was the question of foreign trade and aid, and in particular the flight of the American gold reserve. For your information, I want to give you a quick analysis of our precarious financial position and some of the suggestions made by men considered to be leaders and thinkers in both our economic as well as our political activities.

It is too much to expect to cover the whole picture of the past 30 years, but sufficient to say that there was a very demanding need for the Marshall plan of foreign aid in the beginning and the only trouble with our situation is that we failed to make a turn in the road when the road signs called for a reappraisal of our program at least 6 years ago. When the Marshall plan was proposed it was intended as a means of stopping the spread of communism by helping our allies and friends to rehabilitate to the level of their economy as it was in the latter part of 1939. Long ago our help passed this goal and we are now embarked upon a program of establishing in practically every country an economy to not only match our own, but actually to surpass us in some fields. We are stretched out so thinly that our military presence in some countries has become a bone of contention rather than an assurance of security.

Our financial position can best point up our weakness because of its dramatic threat of catastrophy. Let us look at our 10-year history of U.S. gold on a short-term position. In 1949, we had a gold reserve of $24.4 billion with a short-term claim on foreign countries of $800 million and a short-term liability to foreign countries of $5.9 billion. This left us a net worth in gold reserve of $19.3 billion. At the end of June 1959 we had a Treasury reserve of gold of $19.7 billion with claims in our favor of $2.4 billion and a liability against us of $15.7 billion. This left us a reserve net worth of $6.5 billion.

This is even worse today because we are losing our reserve at the rate of $4 billion annually right now. If a run is made on our Treasury by foreign claimholders, we find ourselves in a serious difficulty because Congress long ago established a reserve ratio to be maintained by the Treasury which calls for $11.8 billion in order to keep our present dollar volume sound and protected by gold reserve. This means we would be short $5.3 billion, or, in plain words, bankrupt.

In fact, as of June 30, certificates representing beneficial ownership of $19.4 billion of this gold were held by Federal Reserve banks. This was $7.9 billion in excess of minimum requirements of 25 percent required by law against such liabilities. This in itself shows the worst financial picture this Nation has ever been in during our lifetime.

The main reason the foreign claims have not been exercised is because this country has raised its interest rate to the highest in history on short-term borrowing. They, therefore, are content to leave their claims and collect the heavy interest (tax free in this country) while still holding a first mortgage on our gold reserve. This, then, is one of the forms of blackmail on an international scale.

We, the taxpayers of America, have to pay high interest in order to keep the foreign claimants from calling for payment of their mortgage. One wonders how much of this money used by these foreign countries to create these claims in the first place come from the American taxpayers by granting foreign aid, preferential treatment in reciprocal trades, and American investments in foreign production factilities.

It is a recognized fact that unless we do something drastic our bankers cannot lower interest rates, our Government cannot lower short-term interest rates because of the blackmail threat of foreign claims to start a run on our Treasury reserve. The $5.3 billion question then is this: What can we do? Frankly, no single person knows the answers, but here are a few suggestions proposed by various groups and individuals.

Stop the outflow of gold to foreign countries by—

(a) Limiting the amounts of American money travelers, tourists, and businessmen can take out of our country.

(b) Making all purchases by foreign stationed American troops and personnel subject to made-in-America orders and even so far as limiting amounts they are given out of their salaries and pay checks to spend for foreign goods.

(c) Making it mandatory that our own military buy all-American supplies, etc.

(d) Limiting all financial aid to all countries and giving only goods and services as mutual and foreign aid.

(e) Reevaluating our trade agreements to allow domestic industry protection at least in the amount represented by taxes and Government-imposed payroll costs on American goods.

(f) Having Congress remove any requirement of gold reserve to back up our own Federal Reserve bank notes.

(g) Increasing the price of gold from $35 to $70 an ounce. (In anticipation of this move Canada and England have put gold bar certificate stock on the market, and a cleanup of billions will be made by the holders of these gold bar certificates.)

(h) Puting into effect drastic restrictions on the American economic front by limiting profits, stopping all wage increases, and increasing production of trade goods.

These are the most prominent suggestions; however, there are many more. Personally, I feel that these moves appear to be an admission of panic thinking, and not, as a whole, a program that can be instituted with any degree of confidence. Time does not permit an analysis of each suggestion, but with your kind indulgence I would like to give a hurried comment on some of the issues involved.

Suggestions (a), (b), (c), (d), and (e) would immediately be put under the heading of "Foreign Policy" since the spending and giving of American money have been the main plank in our platform in our foreign relations program. Castro's actions in Cuba and Egypt's action on the Suez Canal are just a few of the examples of what happens when we refuse or curtail our money aid to our friends.

Again we are faced with a form of blackmail in that when we try to curtail our aid the door is opened wide (by invitation) to Communist Russia. This, then, is a tread-easy path if we attempt to follow it.

Suggestion F would create a situation where Congress and the people would lose all control on the amount of paper money the Federal Reserve System could put into the market because any other restrictive covenant would still be a brake and this solution requires elimination of any reserve.

Suggestion G would not be a very satisfactory answer because nothing would stop the claimant nations from increasing their money price and, in fact, would bring on the very thing we are trying to avoid, a run on our Treasury.

Suggestion H speaks for itself. To stop all economic increases in this country would jeopardize our way of life, our national debt service and particularly our world prestige.

All in all, Congress and the people have serious and threatening problems that require immediate attention.

Standing pat because of the national elections next year may be the most dangerous move ever made by our Nation. For fear of being called isolationists, protectionists, and high tariff advocates, many of our powerful voices have been stilled over these past eventful years.

The time has come to face facts and to forget personal ambitions and personal and corporate profits derived from foreign trade and investments. Our financial dilemma can be traced strictly to the balance of trade, foreign aid, military grants, loans, and importations of goods and services which we produce in surplus.

Following this is a hypothetical transaction, indicative of what has been happening all over the world and the direct cause of much of our present crisis in gold. No business in the United States could stay solvent if it treated its competitors in this manner.

I have not touched upon the long-term position simply because no living person can guarantee the obligations of foreign countries to the United States on long-term credits.

Would you guarantee the moneys owed the United States by Cuba at this moment? In this area we are like a football team that goes into the game a 20-point favorite because it looks good on paper, but loses the game.

My friends, I am sorry time and patience will not allow me to continue this all important subject, but one thing is sure. This Nation will have to reevaluate its own economy, determine what standard we want to live under and make up our minds that other countries will have to do the same.

It is one thing to help the family of a friend, relative, or neighbor in an emergency, but an entirely different picture when you take "them to raise."

Incidentally, this poses a question. If you had limited aid to give, to whom would you give it—a friend, a relative, or a neighbor? Think about it a while.

In closing, let me quote something Abraham Lincoln once said: "If we could first know where we are and whither we are tending, we could better judge what to do and how to do it."

Thank you for listening.

HYPOTHETICAL TRANSACTION

The U.S. Government makes a grant of $3 million to a foreign government to enable it to undertake a specific $3 million project in its own country. The grant is effectuated by the U.S. Treasury's giving the foreign government a check for $3 million drawn on the Treasury's account at some Federal Reserve bank. The foreign government deposits this check in its own central bank, giving that bank a balance of $3 million in U.S. funds.

The project requires the importation of $2 million of materials and equipment from the United States and the use of domestic labor and materials costing the equivalent of $1 million. In making payment through its central bank for the imported materials and equipment, the foreign government uses up $2 million of the U.S. funds that it turned over to the central bank. The central bank invests the remaining $1 million of U.S. funds in short-term U.S. Government securities. (They pay their domestic bills with their own currency.)

In paying for domestic labor and materials costing the equivalent of $1 million, the foreign government draws checks on its central bank payable in domestic money, and through such disbursements exhausts its balance at the bank derived from the U.S. grant.

Such checks are deposited by the recipients in domestic commercial banks and then are redeposited by such commercial banks in the central bank, increasing the commercial banks' deposits in the central bank by the equivalent of $1 million.

Upon completion of these transactions:

(1) The foreign central bank holds $1 million short-term U.S. Government securities which can quickly be translated into a claim on U.S. gold;

(2) the foreign central bank's reserves inclusive of such potential claim on U.S. gold have been increased by $1 million;

(3) the liabilities of the foreign central bank in the form of deposits of domestic commercial banks have been increased by the equivalent of $1 million; and

(4) the ratio of the foreign central banks' total reserves to total liabilities has been strengthened (assuming that it previously was less than 100 percent).

The essence of the entire transaction, as between the United States and the foreign country, is that the United States gave the foreign country $2 million materials and equipment and a claim on $1 million gold.

Dent Demands Facts on Foreign Bids

OF

HON. JOHN H. DENT

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 26, 1960

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, sometimes one wonders how far we can go in underselling the importance of maintaining our own economic defenses as well as our military.

Russia and the communistic threat seems to have made this country into a punch-drunk fighter shadowboxing the sound of every bell, or even worse, a cringing coward who dodges every feint and anticipated punch and forgets to throw a few of his own.

All one has to do is read our own papers and business magazines to find out that all is not well in our economy.

The following release by me followed a story in Business Week which covered the subject matter contained therein:

DENT DEMANDS FACTS ON FOREIGN BIDS

Congressman JOHN H. DENT, Democrat, of Pennsylvania, today called upon the Bureau of Reclamation to disclose facts in the bid controversy between English-Electric, England, and Baldwin-Lima-Hamilton, United States of America for eight hydroturbines for Glen Canyon Dam, a Federal project.

DENT claims that this case points up the ridiculous and idiotic position in which this Government has placed American producers and American workers because of the interpretation of the Buy American Act by this administration.

Here are the facts outlined by DENT: The English bid, $6,214,552; the American bid, $6,392,000. Although the President has cut the buy American 25 percent differential down to 6 percent, the American company met this unrealistic differential and was in line for the work.

The English company has protested and won a 45-day delay in the granting of the award on the grounds that the American company is producing more than 50 percent of the costs of the equipment in a foreign country (Belgium). The English argue that under this arrangement the American company is denied the protection of the Buy American Act.

The controversy began over which figure is right, the British or the American.

DENT further explained that the real issue is not that an English company can tell our Government where to buy, but goes deeper.

The American company was forced to go to a foreign supplier in order to even come close in the bids by the ridiculous operation of our Federal purchase plan.

If the product were wholly manufactured in the United States, the American company would be so far out that the British company would have had no competition for the bid.

DENT said that the problem posed is this—Do we quit bidding American products? Do we buy all the component parts in foreign countries and still claim "buy American protection"? Do we stop kidding ourselves and get back to American fundamentals, or do we quit kidding the foreign countries about the meaning of buy American legislation.

"As a Congressman, and as a citizen taxpayer," said DENT, "I want to know and it's about time the American people, especially the American workers, businessmen and particularly Members of Congress know, what's going on in our Government."

I will not elaborate on this particular case because the record contains my many presentations on this subject. I will say, however, in passing, that sooner or later this subject of American investment abroad, American aid to other competitive nations, American home economy, and social security amendments will be the major issue in our political arena. We cannot continue with the kind of idiotic thinking that seems to start from nowhere and aims to go to the same place.

In this regard, listen to this little item out of one of the leading American newspaper's business section, telling American manufacturers that there are many fine locations for their plants in Europe. It goes on to show where the locations are that offer the least costs of operation because of lowest wages. It further goes on to say that they can sell not only in the European trade bloc, but can undersell their own plants here in America.

How then do we help our economy by taking American money, investing it in Europe and Asia, hiring foreign labor, selling to our former customers as well as shipping back into the United States the same goods we manufacture here in surplus?

Recently, a notice came out about the Japanese building a watch factory in India. However, when you read the details, you find that the Japs are building a plant for the Indian Government to operate. Further, they are being paid for building it and for providing the technical assistance. Of course, we do it differently, we not only give them the money but we even allow them to buy the construction needs somewhere else and then give them a free market here in America for their products. We not only help private enterprise abroad, but we also help governments to get into business to compete with us.

One question seems unanswerable. How can an American watch manufacturer pay taxes, dividends, wages, and local civic charges and compete against monopoly government-owned, non-tax-paying plants abroad?

One example of this is Volkswagen, owned and operated by the West German Government. Here is a little story of how we get suckered in by our friends: The United States refused to allow American pipe producers to sell Russia 12,000 miles of pipe for an oil pipeline on the grounds of security, and so forth. The West German Government sold Russia the pipe from plants rehabilitated by American foreign aid and American taxpayers' dollars. The Germans take 100,000 Russian-made automobiles as part of the payment. The German Government took the Russian-made cars, sold them through the Volkswagen distribution system and released 100,000 Volkswagens for sale outside of Germany mostly in the United States. We not only lost the pipe order, but in the end we probably paid for most of it.

Another angle that this administration seems to overlook is its blind opposition to area development, high interest rates and refusal to amend the Social Security Act by lowering age limits and increasing benefits, both medical and minimums. In the face of this attitude, it is strange to see the President demanding more economic aid for foreign countries when these same countries are doing exactly what he refuses to do here in America and in many cases doing it with our money.

West Germany, for instance, has set up a special tax and development aid for so-called distressed and underdeveloped industrial areas and communities in Germany. The President and our own chamber of commerce oppose this program for Americans, but both support vigorously the billions for foreign countries.

Belgium: This is really a dandy setup. Belgium has also set up a special set of help moves for its own underdeveloped industrial areas and one of the concessions is that these communities can borrow money at an interest as low as 1 percent. Imagine this—when your community and mine cannot get money without paying the exorbitant high interest rate demanded by this administration who are even now demanding that Congress lift the ceiling on interest rates on long-term bonds to an unrestricted amount.

Where do the Belgians get the money they loan? Much of the money used by these nations comes from the World Bank, the International Monetary Fund, foreign economic aid, the technical assistance program, the Export-Import Bank, the Development Fund—United States completely—Special United Nations Fund, the new Inter American Development Fund for Latin American countries only, and, of course, the new IDA under the World Bank.

This will make it possible to loan money to India and other so-named underdeveloped countries on "soft" loans, loans that can be paid back in the "soft," hardly negotiable funds of the countries getting the money.

The United States starts this one off with over $320 million and also this will give us a chance to spend the accumulated funds under Public Law 480, which is the soft money, that the countries now owe us and which we cannot take out of their country, owed us in payment for farm products, and so forth, but we can spend it by loaning it back to them, or giving it to other needy nations to build production machinery for industrial goods.

One thing I want to call to your attention is that the new Fund will be able to loan money where the World Bank is restricted by law and cannot do it. I will quote from the Washington Post of February 1 to give you an authentic position and not one prejudiced by political partisanship:

> World Bank officials said yesterday a deliberately "broad latitude" will be used in granting loans to the underdeveloped nations. Some may be free of interest, some long-term, some repayable wholly in "soft" currency.
> Individual nations will not be required to stand as guarantors for loans made to borrowers within their borders, such as is true now for World Bank loans, and IDA, unlike the World Bank, will be able to loan money for such projects as community water supplies, sanitation, and housing developments.
> One item in the IDA charter is of particular interest to the United States. It permits a member nation to contribute "soft" currency in addition to its own "hard" currency quota. This means that the United States will be able to put to use the huge accumulations of Public Law 480 funds, which may total $5 billion this year. These funds are the repayments in "soft" currency which underdeveloped countries have made for U.S. surplus crop shipments.

Now to keep the record straight, the "surplus farm products" they are talking about were paid for by American taxpayers; and if in the end we get no payments for them, then why did we not just give them away in the first place, and stop all the added costs, and so forth, that we are still paying.

You will also note that this administration and business organizations such as the national chamber of commerce claim that it is inflationary to spend money for public facilities in urban redevelopment, housing, and for other area needs, but it is OK for others to spend our money to do the same thing.

This is only part of the picture. For instance, the arguments against social security benefits for medical and hospital care here in America are advanced by the same promoters of giving our American aid to countries that have complete socialized medicine as part of their system of government.

We further find the President opposing aid to education for student housing under a loan program while promoting student housing and aid to education in other countries.

Recently Campbell Soups announced the plans for a large canning plant in Mexico—Business Week—"because farm produce is cheaper, construction and labor costs are the lowest, and they can still sell through their established American outlets."

We are paying for surplus farm products, the American farmers' income is lower than it has been for years, we have surplus labor, surplus farms, but that does not seem to matter to the kind of profit-seeking internationalism we are now practicing in this country.

This, Mr. Speaker, is only a scratch on the surface of this economic as well as military problem. I am personally convinced that just as we are admitted to be second to Russia on missiles, if we do not stop our "ducking at every swing," we will be knocked out of the economic war not because we were hit, but because we wore ourselves out.

Statement of Principles on Civil Defense

OF

HON. CHET HOLIFIELD

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 26, 1960

Mr. HOLIFIELD. Mr. Speaker, yesterday the Civil Defense Committee of the Governor's Conference met with the President at the White House to discuss some of the civil defense problems now facing our country. It is my understanding that this conference was arranged at the request of Gov. Nelson Rockefeller, who has sponsored a civil defense program in the State of New York that would require individual home and apartment house owners to pay for the construction of fallout shielding.

Governor Rockefeller and I have exchanged views on this matter, and in a previous address to the House I commented on this proposal at some length, pointing out the serious shortcomings which I believe to be inherent in this approach to the large and complex problem of building a realistic civil defense program in this country.

Last October I had the privilege of meeting with the Civil Defense Committee of the Governors' Conference in Chicago, at which time I presented my own views concerning the civil defense needs of the Nation.

At this time I should like to present to the House a statement of principles on civil defense which I submitted to the President on January 12, 1960, which sets forth the main objectives to be sought in a national civil defense effort and points up the important relationship between civil defense preparedness and negotiations for a successful general disarmament agreement.

At the conclusion of this statement, I am attaching copies of my correspondence with Governor Rockefeller and my letter of January 12, 1960, to the President.

STATEMENT OF PRINCIPLES ON CIVIL DEFENSE SUBMITTED TO THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES BY CONGRESSMAN CHET HOLIFIELD

The prime objective of our declared military policy is to deter Soviet aggression, either against the United States or against our allies, by posing the threat of massive nuclear retaliation against the Soviet homeland. It is said that such a threat offers the best hope of preventing either direct aggression against the United States or extremely provocative actions that might also lead to war.

Two key assumptions underlying this nuclear deterrence policy are (1) that the United States would be able to survive a surprise attack and strike back with forces sufficient to cripple the Soviet Union; and (2) that the United States would be willing to accept the consequences of attacking the Soviet Union in response to a Soviet attack against one or more of our allies.

Basic to either of these assumptions is the ability to survive a nuclear attack launched by the Soviet Union; in the first instance a surprise attack, in the second a retaliatory blow, or counter-attack. If it becomes apparent to the Soviet leaders that the United States could not survive such an attack, there is great danger that our threat of massive nuclear retaliation might be discounted or otherwise misunderstood and thereby fail to deter aggressive action on the part of the Soviet Union.

In other words, if the Soviet Union calculated either that a surprise attack would render the United States incapable of effectively retaliating or that the United States would not be willing to accept the probable destructiveness of a Soviet counter-blow, and thus would not massively retaliate in the event of provocative Soviet action, it follows that the nuclear deterrence policy would not necessarily deter aggressive Soviet actions.

Thus it can be seen that preparations designed to enable the United States to withstand and survive the effects of a possible nuclear attack have a direct bearing on our nuclear deterrence policy. Such preparations not only improve our defensive posture, but they also tend to reinforce and make more meaningful our offensive power in that the use of such power becomes feasible—or at least is not incredible—under certain defined circumstances.

Nonmilitary defense, or civil defense, preparations also serve to reduce the risks inherent in any possible disarmament program and thus may represent the key to successful negotiation of a workable general disarmament agreement. To the extent that civil defense can reduce the effects of a possible enemy attack, it would tend to reduce the advantage any opposing nation might hope to achieve through secret, undetected offensive military forces. At the same time, each nation could develop a substantial degree of protection without creating a threat to the security of any other nation.

It thus would seem practical to gear a phased disarmament program to a civil defense program designed to offset each successive reduction of armaments with added increments of civil defense preparedness.

International inspection of armaments could follow the same pattern, beginning with limited coverage of critical areas and gradually extending to the type of coverage considered essential to permanent arms control and inspection.

Viewed from this standpoint, the following principles concerning civil defense in the United States can be set forth:

1. Large-scale civil defense preparedness is essential to national security and to any safe progress in military disarmament. Such preparedness would provide a degree of personal protection which would serve to "insure" our peoples' lives against the risk of cheating by an enemy power during a period of disarmament and thereafter.

2. A meaningful civil defense program must encompass, on a national scale, all the preattack preparations required to minimize loss of life and to insure the post-attack availability of resources necessary for national recovery.

3. Responsibility for developing such a program rests with the Federal Government as a part of its constitutional duty of providing for the national defense.

4. The States and localities should be called upon to provide maximum assistance to Federal authorities in developing a workable national master plan and in the use of State and local resources, including governmental institutions and personnel, for civil defense emergency and postattack recovery operations.

5. The roles and missions of the Nation's Armed Forces should be recast to encompass a predetermined role in the civil defense field. Such a role should be planned for clearly defined relationships and integrated action with regional and local civil defense and disaster programs.

6. The first task of national civil defense is to provide protection for the American people from the devastating immediate hazards of nuclear war. Shelter protection from fallout, emergency stocks of basic subsistence supplies, and radiological monitoring equipment are essential for the entire population. Blast protection and protected communications and control facilities should be developed in key areas to insure the continuity of essential governmental operations and to minimize the number of possible blast casualties.

7. The second most important task of civil defense is to provide a basic framework for the postattack recovery of the Nation. This task should be performed concurrently with the protective function and should include measures to insure the availability of material resources in the immediate postattack period for the long-term recovery effort. Standby legislation should be enacted to provide for the necessary economic and industrial control authority and administrative structure, and a Federal stockpile of basic survival and recovery resources should be created and positioned in properly dispersed or protected storage.

8. An effective civil defense as outlined above would make the risks inherent in disarmament more acceptable. Civil defense preparedness should be built up in phases geared to each step in the reduction of our military forces.

9. In the event agreement on arms reduction and control is achieved, a portion of the funds ordinarily earmarked for military purposes should be applied to civil defense needs.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D.C., July 27, 1959.

Hon. NELSON ROCKEFELLER,
Governor of the State of New York,
The Governor's Office,
Albany, N.Y.

DEAR NELSON: Your personal note transmitting a copy of the report on civil defense was appreciated. I believe you have performed a real public service in sponsoring the civil defense study in New York State and in making public its findings and recommendations. As you know, I have felt very keenly for a long time that the people must be fully informed about the facts of nuclear radiation and the implications of nuclear war for the survival of our country and indeed of all mankind.

In my congressional work as chairman of the Military Operations Subcommittee of the House Committee on Government Operations, and as chairman of the Special Subcommittee on Radiation of the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy, I have tried to make public, through investigations and hearings, as many of these facts as possible. Our basic studies and investigations in civil defense, I truly believe, have set the groundwork for a national reappraisal of the tasks that lie ahead in protecting the people and affording a means for national survival in the event of nuclear war. The 1956 report of the Military Operations Subcommitee exposed the fallacy of evacuation as a national civil defense measure and recommended a national shelter building program, the need for which has been recognized by many distinguished study groups, including the Rockefeller special studies project in 1958.

A basic tenet of our 1956 and succeeding reports is the obligation of the Federal Government to provide for civil defense as a part of its broad constitutional responsibility to provide for the common defense. I do not think this premise can be challenged in the face of the terrible and widespread damage that would result from a nuclear attack, and that is why I am concerned about the possible meaning and effect of your State civil defense report.

Assuming the New York State Legislature were to give effect to the recommendations in your report, I see little hope that other States would follow suit. Consequently, there would be no uniform national legislation in this vital area. In an address to the U.S. House of Representatives on July 15, 1959, I took the liberty of suggesting there is little chance of legislative action in your State.

More important is the question whether it is fair to compel private citizens to take action for their own defense against nuclear attack when the Federal Government has not even begun to acknowledge its responsibilities in this area. I do not discuss here the legal or constitutional questions posed by a program of compulsory shelter protection for individuals and property owners. The problem is too large, the tasks too complicated, the time too short for us to expect that a nationwide shelter system ultimately can be achieved by State and individual action in the manner proposed in your report.

Of course, as the Governor of a great State, you are proposing a course of action within the sphere of your responsibilities. With that no one can quarrel, and indeed you are to be commended for asserting responsibilities where others have been laggard.

The value of your report, as I see it, lies in drawing national attention once more to the civil defense problem; and you have been an eloquent spokesman on this subject which has little popular or political appeal but which is crucial to the Nation's welfare. I hope the report will serve the further valuable purpose of alerting the Federal Government to its responsibilities and will not be used as a pretext by those who would relieve themselves of burdensome and costly tasks by attempting to transfer responsibilities to the States or to individual citizens.

I voice these thoughts frankly because of my deep concern. They are not intended in any way to disparage your great public service for civil defense.

Sincerely yours,

CHET HOLIFIELD.

STATE OF NEW YORK,
Albany, N.Y., August 25, 1959.

The Honorable CHET HOLIFIELD,
Congress of the United States,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR CHET: Please forgive the delay in replying to your thoughtful letter about the report of the special task force on radioactive fallout. I appreciate very much having your observations which I know will be of considerable interest to the committee presently working on the project.

I do, indeed, feel this course of action is within the sphere of my responsibility for the protection of the lives and health of the people of the State of New York. It is this realization that has prompted my interest, my concern, and my action.

It is encouraging to have your comments. Your extensive familiarity with so vital a topic and your total awareness to the danger make your comments all the more meaningful to me.

For your information, enclosed is a copy of the resolution on fallout, unanimously adopted by the Governors at the recent conference in Puerto Rico.

With best wishes,

Sincerely,

NELSON.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D.C., January 12, 1960.

The PRESIDENT,
The White House,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: In view of the White House-sponsored Conference on Civil Defense, which I understand was arranged at the request of Governor Rockefeller, I take the liberty of enclosing an exchange of correspondence between Governor Rockefeller and myself on his civil defense proposals for the State of New York. My letter to Governor Rockefeller of July 27, 1959, you will note, is critical of his proposals while commending him for his attention to this vitally important subject.

On the basis of extended studies of civil defense and the effects of nuclear radiation, conducted by the Military Operations Subcommittee of the House Committee on Government Operations and the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy, on both of which I serve, I am convinced that civil defense demands an acceptance of responsibility and an allocation of resources by the Federal Government in far greater measure than has heretofore been evidenced.

As you prepare for the so-called summit meetings, in which disarmament undoubtedly will be a crucial topic of discussion, I hope you will consider this point: That progress in disarmament does not obviate the need for civil defense. In fact, the need for civil defense grows greater because it is the only ultimate insurance against enemy cheating.

The enclosed statement of principles on civil defense outlines this and other points which may be of help to the conferees meeting with you on January 25.

Sincerely yours,

CHET HOLIFIELD,
Chairman, Military Operations Subcommittee.
